"'Soirées de Vienne,' valses caprices, d'après F. SCHUBERT, pour le pianoforte"—composées par FRANZ LISZT (Ashdown and Parry).

"D'après F. Schubert," is expressive. It is lucky that these "Viennese Evenings" (evenings, we should think, with phantoms, ghouls, and hobgoblins) came, at any rate, après (after) Schubert; for if Schubert had heard his innocent ("absolute") music thus travestied, he would most probably have gone stark mad.

To begin with the end. The ninth "Valse-caprice" ("caprice" with a vengeance) is built upon, or rather dug out of, the well-known waltz in A flat, which German, French, Italian, and Turkish music publishers palmed off for a long time on the world as "Beethoven's Last." M. Liszt begins with a page of introductory howl, in the shape of "preludio," and then presents the composition of Schubert, in the right key, and correctly, with one exception, viz., the alteration of a note in the second part, which completely spoils the melody, and renders it more or less "Zukunft;"—

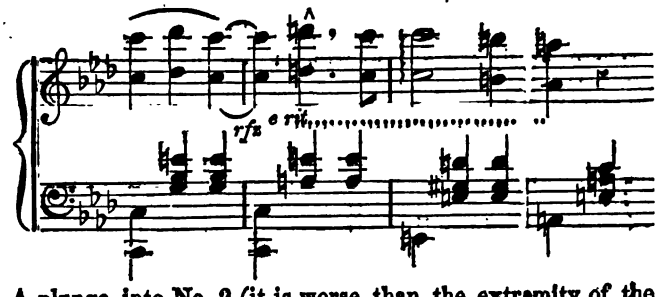
Now, we need scarcely remind our readers that there is no such note as the D flat in the 6th bar, over which the asterisk is placed. See, further on, to what a use M. Liszt puts this unwarrantable licence:—

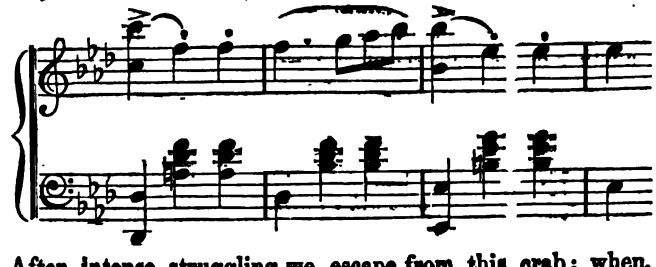
We cannot stop to multiply instances; but may add that the other eight numbers present every one of them delectable examples of the same species of "caprice"—which reminds us of the vulgar French idiom, "il y a caprice et caprice." Beethoven had "caprice;" so had Weber; so had Mendelssohn; so has Liszt. We have to deal with Liszt. Take, at random, No. 7, which is for the most part as straightforward as it is vigorous. Here is a bit of harmony for the edification of polite ears:—

"Dolcissimo," indeed! A dip into No. 1 brings us to the following:—

"Espressivo," indeed! And as if this were not "espressivo," and to spare, we have yet another "espressivo," two lines further on, in the shape of a modulation—or rather an abrupt transition—from F minor to A minor (the very idea makes us shudder):—



A plunge into No. 2 (it is worse than the extremity of the Russian bath), and we find ourselves clawed hold of by the subjoined crab:—



After intense struggling we escape from this crab; when, lo! as we are emerging from this disagreeable water, our right foot is caught hold of by another of the same species. Behold him:—

"This" (as King Arthur might have exclaimed, in a similar predicament) "is the fiercest crab we were ever clawed withal, except one in the river Jordan, but this was fiercer." Strolling on the banks of No. 3, we are suddenly stung by the little gnat below, which, though diminutive, hath a pungent proboscis :—

Annoyed by the nuisance, we rush for shelter to No. 4, and in a brief space are conscious of an earwig, crawling inside of our shirt collar :—

—and ever and anon nipping us in still "other-guess ways." Where to fly? Not to No. 5; for look at this nasty spider :—

"Molto espressivo il canto"—a singing spider, but one, nevertheless, which can bite in divers manners. Here is another of its manners of bite :—

"Calando," indeed (calandrino)! "Smorzando," forsooth (smorfioso)! Still less to No. 6, where runs a frisky tarantula, who disports himself friskily in this wise :—

(Forbid it, St. Job of Pacheco, that we should be bitten by this tarantula!) Where, then, must we seek refuge from these crabs, and earwigs, and spiders, and tarantulas, and what not?—of harmony (say discord)? Where?—if not to No. 8? At No. 8 we at least are neither clawed, nor nipped, nor stung, nor bitten; and if this quiet nook—

—be not all that would be desirable, it is at any rate a resting-place of some sort where we are free of the newts and scorpions of the "Zukunft." And is this the way that "Friar Liszt" has bestowed his "Evenings in Vienna"? An American enthusiast goes frantic about the conclusion of a Missa Solennis, composed by the Weimarian Chapelmaster who gave Richard Wagner his French passport (which has served him in such good stead). The last four he particularly extols :—

Nevertheless, until we had perused the "'Soirées de Vienne,' valses caprices, d'après F. SCHUBERT," we could not believe that Friar Liszt had written them. Now, we can believe anything. Three quarters of a century and more since, when the renowned Sarti (who ministered to Catherine of all the Russias) had heard some quartets by Mozart, he exclaimed,—"Si puo far di più per stonare gli professori!" What would the renowned Sarti (who ministered to Catherine of all the Russias) have said to these aston(ar)ishing perpetrations of Friar Liszt?

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

THE last week has been productive of more concerts than the most robust amateur could possibly survive were he to have attempted the feat of hearing them all. It is only by judiciously popping in at each in the very nick of time when the chief attraction is going on, that I am enabled to say something about the principal affairs of this kind. The promising young violinist, Sarrasate, who carried off the premier prix at the Conservatoire, deserves the first mention among the concert-givers. The "gem" of his concert, to use the slang of musical notice writers, was a symphonie concertante of Alard, for two violins, played by the composer and Sarrasate, who is his pupil. The execution of this piece was marked with such admirable precision, elegance, and spirit—master and pupil playing as though animated with one intelligence—that the most enthusiastic applause was repeatedly elicited. Next, we will mention a concert given by M. Adolph Fétis, whose venerable name, perhaps, as much as his reputation as an organist and composer, insured him a considerable audience and a gracious reception. Among the compositions of his own, which were received with the most favour, may be cited les Veillées Brétonnes, a song without words for the organ, L'abandon, Souffrances d'Hiver, Dieu, and le Bon Dieu. Another concert, just deserving passing mention, was that of Mlle. Amelie Bido, one of the numerous and undesirable tribe of phenomena. The instrument whereon she phenomenises is the violin. By the way, when the wonder appeals to the ear, should it not be acoumenon rather than "phenomenon"? Think this over, and tell me if I have not added to the restricted vocabulary of musical critics. To return to "the" Bido, she played Spohr, and Vieuxtemps, and Leonard (her instructor), and Ketherer, and Hermann, and it must be conceded to her, she possesses several qualities necessary to constitute a good violinist, although the important one of mechanical dexterity is certainly deficient. A different affair from this was the concert given by M. Léon Jacquard, a violoncellist, who holds in Paris a deservedly high position. He is an accomplished master of all the resources of his instrument, and whether in the solid style or in the ostentatious brilliancy of the showy concert piece, is equally capable of holding his ground. A concerto by Molique, (composed for your Piatti), a fantaisie by Servais, and an adagio by himself, were among his chief performances. A remarkable feature of this concert was an allegro for pianoforte and violoncello, by M. Edouard Lalo, a young composer, who has raised high expectations of his future achievements. The piece was much applauded, and displayed the knowledge of an accomplished musician, no less than invention and refinement of taste. M. Edouard Colonne, first violin of the opera, has also figured among the concert-givers. Of course he is an estimable violinist, and neither in concerted pieces by the great masters, nor in a fantasia for effect, did he disgrace himself. Mlle. Balbi sang at this concert some light couplets from Maître Claude, and being very pretty, as well as an agreeable songstress, was warmly applauded. Then there has been the concert of Mlle. Mattmann—whose position as a pianist of the first rank has been legitimately acquired; and a soirée by M. Armingand, where, with the exception of a brilliant trio by the same M. E. Lalo, and two pieces by M. E. Lubeck (the well-known pianist), the programme was made from the works of the soirée-giver, some of which were songs executed by Mlle. Balbi and M. Archainbaud. An organ player of mark—M. Auguste Durand, who officiated at St. Roch—must be mentioned too as the giver of a matinée, attended by immense court celebrities; and likewise M. Luigi Ruiz, a light basso, whose concert was illuminated chiefly by the presence and exertions of Mad. Borghi-Mamo. The most original of all these musical entertainments, however, was the soirée given by M. Farrenc, the celebrated musical antiquary, whereat some of the results of that gentleman's researches were brought forward, illustrating the origin of pianoforte music. Several pieces originally written for the harpsichord and the spinet, were executed by Mlle. Farrenc (his daughter—the esteemed and laborious composer), who showed great tact and intelligence in bringing out their peculiarities.

The mention of this interesting evening brings us naturally to the classical concerts of the week. A new institution, called La Fondation Beaulieu, for the performance of classical vocal music has just commenced its second series. The programme included specimens of the vocal music of Felice Anerio, Orlando Gibbons, Handel, Pergolese, Marcello, Graun, Haydn, Mozart and Cherubini. Mad. Viardot and M. Bataille were the chief vocalists. Selections from Haydn's oratorio of Tobias were executed at the commencement and at the close of the concert. Among the most curious as well as the most showy items of this semi-antiquarian entertainment was a bravura air from the Britannicus of Graun, chapel-master to Frederic the Great, which was admirably sung by Mad. Viardot, who (as you must frequently have heard her do in London), with the true feeling of an artist, gave its full value to the substratum of passion which underlies the cumbrous adornments systematically resorted to by composers of that day.

I regret to have, in the distinct discharge of my duty as a faithful chronicler, to mention yet another phenomenon (or acoumenon), nay, yet other phenomena (or acoumena). A certain infant of ten has come forward as a public pianoforte player, and, were it possible to feel astonishment at these precocious displays, when, in fact, they are plenty as blackberries, would have astonished her audience by a variety of remarkable qualities. People don't stare now-a-days at a basket of fine juicy strawberries exhibited at Chévet's in midwinter, nor do they raise their eyebrows at these specimens of human forcing. A few, perhaps, shake their heads at the cost implied in such artificial introversions of the course of nature, and its mournful contrast with the insipidity of the result. Anna Meyer, the above-mentioned "child-wonder" (so named), had, as associates, two other wretched babes, trained, the one to spout verses she is said to compose herself, and the other to sing comic songs with infantine attempts at buffoonery. This moral massacre of infants out-herods Herod!

Now for some miscellaneous gossip, operatical, theatrical, problematical. At the Opera, Mlle. Gueymard is in full career as the acknowledged representative of Valentine in Les Huguenots, which is drawing large houses. She has restored the romance in the fourth act, cut out by her predecessors; and Meyerbeer has written a coda to append to it, expressly for her. M. Faure, who is now with you at Covent Garden, where he is engaged for three years, has just signed a three years' engagement at the Grand Opera, at 5,000fr. per month for the first year, 6,000 for the second, and 7,000 for the third. A congé from April to July enables him to fulfil his English engagement concurrently. Felicien David's Herculanum, it is said, will be shortly revived, and also the Muette de Portici, on a magnificent scale. It is currently reported that Signor Alary, of sacrilegious note (inventor of the dish Fricassée de Mozart, à la maître de chant), has composed a comic opera to a libretto by Scribe, called La Beauté du Diable, which is speedily forthcoming. The gentleman who has the toupet (Anglicè et vulgo, "cheek") to adapt Don Giovanni to the exigencies of an ambitious tenor and of his own notions of taste, ought to do something original. This was hardly the case, however, with the Tre Nozze, in which Lablache danced to a polka warbled by poor Sontag. Mario, by the way, has again, according to his wont (or shall we say according to his cant?), announced himself indisposed; and Montanaro, the slippery gentleman who jilted Mr. Beale, replaces him in Count Almaviva. So I hear that Grisi is again at the Royal Italian Opera. Is this to be another farewell engagement?

"Fare thee well, and if for ever, Still for ever fare thee well,"

has been fitted with a new reading, illustrating the confusion that may arise between bidding farewell for ever, and for ever bidding farewell. Norma, with her sickle for ever cutting and for ever coming again, might stand now as a female companion to Chrono, with his scythe. By the way, our experience of this artist may legitimately found a new idiom as a contrast to the expressions taking "French leave." As this means to leave without giving notice, so Italian leave would mean to give notice without leaving. Mlle. Trebelli has just bidden adieu to the public of the Italian opera here in Rossini, after making a decided impression. Managers must be on the look-out, for there is very little doubt this young contralto is likely to prove a prize of importance. Mad. Penco has appeared in Norma, in which she shows so much dramatic power, assisted by a new Adalgisa, under the name of Blondini. Her real name is Mlle. Eunequist, and she is a pupil of M. Masset. Her nervousness rendered it impossible to judge of the capabilities of Mlle. Eunequist.

Only the other day a theatre at Barcelona was burnt down, and now another at Brussels has shared in the fate which seems sooner or later to await buildings devoted to the drama. The Théâtre des Nouveautés, the establishment in the Belgian capital I allude to, was built only eighteen years ago. Like the fire at Covent Garden, it seems to have originated in the lofts above the audience part. Letters from Berlin announce that Mad. Lagrua has arrived in the Prussian capital, and will make her appearance in Nourmahal, and in Spontini's Vestale.

I had other matters of some little interest to mention, but must put them off till my next.

TANNHÄUSER.

To the Editor of the MUSICAL WORLD.

SIR,—In a letter addressed to Berlioz, and inserted in the Journal des Débats, M. Wagner has told us the secret of his journey to Paris. It might have been thought that he had come to submit his works to the judgment of the Parisians. Far from it. The circumstance to which we owe the honour of a visit from him is this. Exiled from his country, M. Wagner is the only German (these are his own words) who has not heard Tannhäuser and his other works. He has come, therefore, merely to borrow from the French their Opera-house, their artists, their choruses, their orchestra, and 250,000 francs' worth of getting up, that he might have the very legitimate satisfaction of hearing, and, as a matter of course, admiring himself. Well, the thing is done. He has heard himself. I don't know whether he is satisfied; but I am inclined to fancy he won't begin again in a hurry. As for myself, my first prayer, on hearing of his exile, was that M. Wagner might be speedily pardoned, and return to his country forgiven, and free to hear himself executed at home, at his ease and convenience. He ought, above all, to assure the happiness of his fellow-countrymen. When he has progressed triumphantly from town to town; when he has deliciously drunk in the ovations due to him; when he has seen Tannhäuser played a thousand times, the Dutchman a thousand times, Lohengrin a thousand times, and at least two thousand times Tristan und Iseult, he may give us Parisians another look in. In the mean time we shall have worked away hard; we shall have been very steady and industrious; and may possibly be sufficiently advanced to comprehend him. Such was the heartfelt prayer of those who were present at the first performance of Tannhäuser. The good public is prevailed upon to swallow a multitude of things, but a time comes when it revolts, and will no longer swallow anything. Yet it had come to the Opera with the best intentions in the world. It had been informed that a genius of the first order, a revealer of mysteries, a prophet, a Messiah, was to proscribe for ever the lascivious dance, the sensual song, and to bring us back to pure art, to Greek art, to the perfect harmony of the true and the beautiful. Well, therefore, might that eagerness be exhibited, that tiptoe expectation, that religious silence, that attitude of collected attention, which marked the first few minutes. What applause, too, would have followed had there been oftener a chance for it!

The overture was admirably recited, for all the players, and especially their chief, were sensible of the immense responsibility weighing upon them, and had at heart to show themselves, what indeed they are, the first musicians of Europe. After this piece, which had real worth, heightened, moreover, by masterly execution, the bravos broke forth with a vigour at which the most ardent friends of M. Wagner must have felt satisfied. The curtain then rose on a magnificent scene, and again there was applause, which was not addressed to the musicians this time, but to MM. Thierry and Cambon, the marvellous creators of that enchanted grotto. Venus, or the goddess Holda (according to a little treatise of German mythology at the beginning of the libretto), softly couched upon a bank of verdure, was contemplating her lover, who had dropped at her feet. This lover was a poet, a knight, a master-singer. Tannhäuser was his name. He happened to be slumbering on the lap of Venus, which was scarcely good manners.

It is known that M. Wagner makes his words as well as his music, and that he attaches extreme importance not only to each phrase but to each word of his poems. That of Tannhäuser must have lost a great deal in the transfusion from one tongue into another, for although, as we have learned through a recent lawsuit, the piece was translated under the master's eye, by three persons of equal skill—an artist, a custom-house officer, and a dramatic author—we find it anything but interesting.

It seems that M. Wagner, being determined to owe no part of his success to extraneous aid, formally resisted the introduction of any kind of ballet which might divert the attention of the spectator from the main work. He consented, however, after much entreaty, to bring in a little divertissement at Venusberg, while Tannhäuser is enjoying his siesta, and Venus is contemplating him. A little went a great way in the matter of amusement at this happy retreat. This was all that the pretended divertissement in question comprised. Twenty-four bacchantes marched from right to left, and raised their arms above their heads. This movement performed slowly and gently may have diverted the ladies of the ballet, but no one else. Thereupon, twenty-four fauns marched from left to right, and raised their arms in like manner as the bacchantes; sixteen nymphs followed the fauns, still lifting up their arms in the same fashion; sixteen young men sleeping upon the rocks started from their slumbers and uplifted their arms likewise, drawing them asunder with a gentle motion; lastly, twelve cupids, not to appear singular, raised their little arms aloft, but were evidently puzzled to tell why.

All these arms upraised formed no doubt a charming picture, but it was kept before the eye a little too long. There yet remained the Three Graces, however, Mlles. Rousseau, Störkoff, and Troisvallets. I was in hopes that they had been exempted from obedience to the general word of command, and that they would employ their arms according to their individual fancies. It soon became apparent that not any more than the fauns, nor the bacchantes, nor the young men, nor the nymphs, were they permitted to drop them, and that they were likely in the end to be seized with cramp. To all appearance the dance of the future will only admit of this upstretching of arms, and indeed I am free to confess that there is in the simultaneous elevation of so many pairs of them something mystical—something quite sacerdotal.

But if the dance was chaste and sober, the music was tumultuous, deafening, infernal; exasperated fiddle-strings, cymbals furiously clashing, Chinese bells in delirious excitement. The same effect was produced, and an equal degree of pain, as though a hundred needles had been run into your ears at the same moment. The most courteous of the audience, who were bent on maintaining an air of decency, endured their sufferings without wincing; the rest writhed in their seats, turning from one side to the other like St. Lawrence on his gridiron. A number of young ladies attempted to smile, but they ground their teeth in spite of themselves, and crushed their spy-glasses or their fans in their little convulsed fingers. At last the bacchanal rout was over, and Tannhäuser, by no means a light sleeper, opened first one eye, then the other, and finding himself still at the feet of Venus seemed to derive from that fact a strong feeling of dissatisfaction.

"Thou whom I love! Of what art thinking? Say!" Would to heaven Venus had never thus familiarly interrogated her lover, for the answer, and the explanations which resulted therefrom, took up not less than six pages. It was not a duo; it was not a recitative, nor a scena, nor even an act, but a Wagnerian dialogue of intermin-able length; and what rendered the position of things more serious still, was that M. Wagner has the sorry habit of under-scoring with a trait of violins, double basses, and brass instruments, every word, every syllable of his eternal harangues. This is, to use a common expression, making mountains of molehills. One is lost in the maze of detail, and the collective whole is forgotten; a world of trouble is frivolously spent in giving a particular expression to each word, and the result of this toilsome labour is to overwhelm the audience under an irremovable load of weariness.

When Tannhäuser had quite done telling about his dreams, his aspirations, his aversions, his fits of sadness, and Venus had come to an end of her supplications, adjurations, complaints, and threats, the two lovers part—not, upon my honour as a gentleman, one moment too soon. The public had ceased paying any regard to this domestic broil, which seemed never likely to end. As soon as it was evident that this maniacal knight and headstrong goddess would neither make it up, nor separate at any price,—that they constantly kept falling back on the same repetitions, the same roundabout digressions, the same old scores,—the audience left them to settle it between themselves, and began to gossip about indifferent matters,—the weather, the rain, the toilettes of the ladies, the news of the day. Now and then the conversation was interrupted just to observe how the lovers were getting on, and when it was found they were still quarrelling, people said, "It's no use expecting an end of it to-night; we must call again to-morrow; say Monday, or in ten days, a month, and we may find them still at their agreeable tête-à-tête." After an hour's squabbling, however, Venus and Tannhäuser showed their good taste by separating amicably, avoiding all scandal or appeal to the law. The lady and her grotto vanished, and Tannhäuser found himself sleeping in a green and smiling valley. Remark what a fellow for sleep this Tannhäuser is. In the first tableau he was dreaming on the lap of Venus; in the second he was stretched out on the turf, taking out the rest of his nap. The spectators had need to envy the rogue.

Here occurred the famous air of the herdsman, so calm and primitive in its monotonous simplicity. It was welcomed as a blessing, for it gave rest to the ear, when all at once a comical passage, some such popular burthen as J'ai de bon tabac dans ma tabatière, moved the audience to an explosion of laughter. Report proclaims M. Wagner unbending in the extreme. Sooner than listen to any compromise, he exclaims, "Perish my works rather than my principles." Good. Now I bet Don Juan, Der Freischütz, the Pré aux Clercs, the Muette, and the Barbière, to the Phantom Ship, Tannhäuser, and Lohengrin, that he would cut out the trait de chalumeau, and that incredible rocket-flight of violins which excited, at the end of the second act, such homeric laughter; and I won my bet. Would it not have been wise to yield to the advice of friends before the performance, sooner than expose himself to so mortifying a disaster? Pride, without doubt, is the spring of many a noble action; firmness is a rare virtue, but it should not degenerate into obstinacy, and a little modesty is not out of place when one stands face to face with a public enlightened and competent like that of the Opera, and whose just requirements the greatest masters have held it a point of honour to respect.

A piece which produced a great effect was the grand septuor (I don't know whether I am quite justified in venturing to call it so), let us say the grand concerted piece which terminates the first act. There is a powerful fulness of sound, a tolerably complete conclusiveness, a felicitous clearing up, which, coming after such heavy clouds and so much darkness, relieves and cheers the public. I will say as much of the grand triumphal march framed in a splendid piece of scene-painting. These are happy moments, but they are dearly purchased.

I come now to that Court of Love where the knight-poets seemed to wrestle which should be lengthiest and most oppressive. The public appeared to take about as much pleasure in their contest as at those competitions of the Conservatoire, where we hear the same pianoforte piece played twenty-seven times over consecutively. It seemed so to affect their nerves, that every time a knight took up his lyre there was all over the house either a convulsive movement of impatience, or a plaintive wail of grief. So that Morelli having merely motioned, as if to touch his harp, there was a general cry of "Oh! no! thank you! In pity, don't, don't do it again, good Wolfram; we can bear no more." Whereupon Morelli put down his harp, and the public felt grateful for this kindly impulse. What shall I say of the recital of Tannhäuser, which lasts three quarters of an hour, watch in hand? I was not surprised that Niemann, indisposed the day before, had to take to his bed the day after. A composer must have strange notions of the nature of a singer's lungs to entrust him with such a monotonous and declamatory narrative, after a journey to Rome and back.

A terrible penance was this for the public as well as for the singer, and it may be held to reckon against many a transgression. But perhaps I may be told that I am not seriously discussing the doctrines and music of M. Wagner; that I recount what took place at the Opera, without showing that M. Wagner was wrong in writing as he has written, and that the public were right to give him the reception they did. And yet how can we discuss the void, the chaotic, the systematic, and premeditated overthrow of every principle, of every rule of dramatic and musical composition? Let M. Wagner put himself forward as a skilful symphonist, and I will recognise his good points, and loyally render all the justice due to his ability. As a dramatic composer, he is tried and condemned, as far as we in Paris are concerned, and was already so à priori, when we had read his strange book and found how he rated all the great geniuses the world admires. We are of the school of Mozart, of Glück, of Weber, of Spontini, of Rossini, of Meyerbeer, of Boieldieu, of Hérold, of Auber, and of many other masters who have followed in their footsteps, or have hewn out fresh paths for themselves amidst the applause of every civilised people in the universe. We are for lucidity, for melody, for song, and have a horror of disorder, confusion, noise, nothingness, and darkness. Moreover, to speak frankly, we Parisians feel humiliated to find we are taken for naturals. People fancy they have only to assume a supernatural self-reliance, an imperturbable confidence, to take in the most subtle, the most sceptical, and the most satirical public in the world. There were, on the first night of Tannhäuser, in the orchestra and the amphitheatre of the Opera-house, a score of French composers, who have written works superior to all that M. Wagner has done, and before these masters M. Wagner sets himself up as an inspired reformer and an infallible genius. He has only now to pass as the victim of a cabal, and to deny the impartiality and the competency of his judges. This is the grand resource of all unsuccessful authors. M. Wagner can say that the public of Paris are incapable of understanding his music. Alas! nothing can be more true! I am afraid we are all a parcel of ignoramuses—we cannot, at the first smack, detect the flavour of his works; we must return to the charge once and again, and finally the taste may be acquired. Heaven be praised!

But there are folks more deserving of pity than even the Parisians. I mean the artists who, after six months' toil, of unheard-of exertions and fatigue, were constrained to bear the brunt of the battle, to stand the fire of sarcasm, of grumbling murmurs, of derisive shouts. Look at poor Niemann, a tenor to whom success had become a habit, obliged to make his début in the midst of all this tumult. He fell into a swoon at rehearsal, and had to be taken home. He stepped upon the stage, his heart beating heaven knows how fast; he was on his knees for twenty minutes in a painful posture; and at last declaimed for three hours a part than which none was ever less favourable to a singer.

But I will trouble you no longer with details. All I wish is, that you in London should be made aware that some folks at Berlin, Weimar, Leipzic and elsewhere have misrepresented us in Paris.

AT THE NINETEENTH CONCERT OF THE THIRD SEASON, ON MONDAY EVENING, MAY 13, 1861,
The Programme will be selected from the Works of VARIOUS COMPOSERS.

PROGRAMME.

PART I.—Quartet, in D major, No. 10, for two Violins, Viola, and Violoncello, MM. STRAUS RIES, WEBB, and PIATTI (Mozart); Air, "Pria che spunti," Mr. SIMS REEVES (Cimarosa); Song, "Sleep, heart of mine," Mr. SANTLEY (Henry Smart); Song, "Twilight is darkening," Mr. SIMS REEVES (Kücken); Suite de Pièces, containing "The Harmonious Blacksmith," Miss ARABELLA GODDARD (Handel).

PART II.—Sonata, in B flat, for Pianoforte and Violin, Miss ARABELLA GODDARD and HERR STRAUS (Dussek); Song, "Adelaida," by desire, Mr. SIMS REEVES, accompanied on the Pianoforte by Miss ARABELLA GODDARD (Beethoven); Song, "As o'er the Alps he ranges," Mr. SANTLEY (Schubert); Duet, "Venti scudi," Elisire d'Amore, Mr. SIMS REEVES and Mr. SANTLEY (Donizetti); Quartet, in A minor, Op. 29, for two Violins, Viola, and Violoncello, MM. STRAUS, RIES, WEBB, and PIATTI (Schubert).

Conductor—Mr. BENEDICT.

To commence at Eight o'clock precisely.

Sofa Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Stalls, 5s.; Balcony, 3s.; Unreserved Seats, 1s.

Tickets to be had of Mr. Austin, at the Hall, 28 Piccadilly; Messrs. Cramer and Co.; Hammond, Addison and Co.; Schott and Co.; Ewer and Co.; Chappell and Co.; and all the principal Musicsellers.

MR. CHAS. HALLE'S BEETHOVEN RECITALS.—Mr. Charles Hallé begs to announce that he intends giving EIGHT PERFORMANCES of CLASSICAL PIANOFORTE MUSIC, in the large Room of St. James's Hall, on the afternoons of the subjoined dates:—Friday, May 17th; Friday, May 24th; Friday, May 31st; Friday, June 7th; Friday, June 14th; Friday, June 21st; Friday, June 28th; and Friday, July 5th.

To commence each day at Three o'clock precisely.

The Programmes will be exclusively devoted to the Sonatas composed by Beethoven, for Pianoforte without accompaniments—the whole to be introduced in regular succession, according to the original order of their publication, for which the numbered "Operas" respectively assigned to them are warrants.

Prices of Admission:—Sofa Stalls (numbered and reserved), for the series, 2*l.* 2*s.*; Single Ticket, 10*s.* 6*d.* Reserved Seats (Balcony and Area), for the series, 1*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.*; Single Ticket, 7*s.* Unreserved Seats, for the series, 1*l.*; Single Ticket, 3*s.*

Subscriptions received at Chappell and Co.'s, 50 New Bond Street; and at Mr. Hallé's, No. 18, Clifford Street, W.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"OUR SISTER MAY."—The second copy has come to hand. The first must have miscarried.

M. W. (Oxford).—Mr. —— has not resigned his lease. At present there is no chance of the desired "restoration." About the "future prospects" of the "time-honoured" establishment we have no opinion, possessing no data upon which to base an opinion. That it will "re-open" some day, sooner or later, is, however, our firm belief.

SPHINX.—M. Liszt was lately at Brussels, and was present, on the 6th inst., at a performance of M. Gounod's Faust. His next destination was Paris, which he probably has reached by this time, too late, however, to witness the triumph of his Tannhäuser. M. Roger has returned to Paris, after his very successful tour in Germany. The name of Duprez' pupil, who is to succeed Tamberlik on the Italian stage, is Lefranc, a tenor of course. Any more questions?

LONDON: SATURDAY, MAY 11, 1861.

"THE opinions of musicians"—says the Post—"doubtless vary very much with respect to the merits of Robert Schumann's Symphony in B flat (first introduced to the London public, if we mistake not, by Herr Manns at the Crystal Palace concerts), some considering it a vague and incoherent string of thoughts, others seeing in it a deep, all-pervading meaning, which it falls not to the lot of ordinary mortals to catch. No one, however, ventures to deny that the work is interesting, thoughtful, and artistic in facture; and as even tolerable symphonies are becoming rarer every day, and as we ought to be glad to discover any bearing the stamp of our time, and including passages, however brief, that indicate something like genuine inspiration, the propriety of introducing Robert Schumann's composition at a concert of the Musical Society of London, which professes liberal principles and a deep sympathy with the present no less than the past of art, cannot be reasonably questioned. The Society, to our thinking, acted consistently and wisely in bringing forward the intellectual composition which served as a commencement to the concert of last night, and we trust that other large orchestral works, equally new to the British public, may yet be heard from its superb band. This enterprising spirit, this active determination to try all things, and hold fast by the best, is most eminently calculated to keep creative art alive."

The Post, as usual, is consistent, and does justice to the intentions of the Musical Society of London in bringing forward Schumann's Symphony, which, by the way, was first performed in this country, not, if our memory serves us, at the Crystal Palace, but at the Philharmonic Concerts. The Post was equally just in appreciating the intentions of the same Society, last year, when Schubert's Symphony in C was produced; and it is to be regretted that the highly intelligent writer of the musical notices of that influential journal did not draw some comparison between the merits of the two works, and show—as no one is better able to do—how, the vast superiority of that of Schubert taken into consideration, the treatment it experienced at the hands of the somewhat pedantic, and, in a certain sense, egotistical audience assembled at St. James's Hall on these interesting occasions, and also at those of a majority of the critics, was anything rather than fair, anything rather than logical.

"Schumann," says the Daily News, "is a third-rate composer, and will never be generally esteemed as anything more, though strenuous efforts have been made, both in Germany and here, to push his name into notice. His music is lauded by critics, but coldly listened to by the public. Undoubtedly he is (or rather was) a distinguished musician, versed in the learning and technicalities of his art, but he lacks the one thing needful—the inborn genius which makes the great artist, and enables him to command the feelings and sympathies of the world. In the Symphony performed last night there is no want of masterly skill. It contains effective passages, especially the Scherzo and its two trios, which are very spirited, albeit not very original; but, as a whole, it betrays too evidently the labour bestowed upon it—smells too much of the lamp, and never shows that abundant stream of beautiful thoughts, flowing, as it were, from an exhaustless fountain, as in the music of the four greatest of symphonists—Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn."

The Daily News, too, is consistent. The esteemed writer of its art notices never expressed admiration for the compositions of Schumann, nor did he ever applaud the Musical Society of London for introducing examples of the post-Beethovenite school at their capital concerts. In one sense we are happy (in a great measure) to agree with, in another sense we are sorry (in a greater measure) to differ from him. We are not Schumannites, as our readers know very well; but because we are not Schumannites, that is no reason why Schumann, who has written so much and so earnestly, and who is the idol of a big section of the thinking population of musical Germany, should remain unheard. That would, indeed, be pedantic and egotistical (or egotistic and pedantical); and we feel assured the Daily News would be the last, on mature reflection, to suggest such a miserably foregone (and woe-begone) conclusion.

"In medio tutissimus ibis." Flaccus said well; and the thoughtful critic of the Daily Telegraph has evidently adopted his golden axiom, without, however, pressing it, as is too frequently done, into the service of common-place and platitude. His views of the opposite duties of the Philharmonic Society and the Musical Society of London are worth perusing:—

"It is the duty of a society, like the old Philharmonic, essentially conservative in its character, to devote all its energies to securing an able performance of all the established masterpieces. The Musical Society, however, has other duties. While paying due homage to universally acknowledged genius, it is also incumbent on the directors to give the members of the society an opportunity of forming an opinion on works on the merits of which authorities are divided. Indeed, few real lovers of music would be sorry to see in each programme some unknown, or comparatively unknown, work of a modern writer side by side with some mighty legacy from the past. Schumann's great reputation quite justified the directors of the Musical Society in bringing forward his first Symphony on Wednesday, and they merit high praise for doing so. At the same time, we believe the work was listened to rather with interest and curiosity than with actual pleasure. Schumann is never wanting in ideas, and scattered through all his works we find charming melodies and unusual combinations which prove that he was not only an original thinker, but that he was endowed with a vivid fancy and a powerful imagination. Unfortunately, he seems to have been deficient in the faculty of using his musical ideas to the best advantage, so that his more ambitious works always produce an unsatisfactory effect. The Symphony in B flat is no exception to this rule, and in spite of the new and sometimes effective harmonic combinations in the first movement, and the characteristic SCHERZO and trios, the applause which followed its conclusion was called forth by the magnificent performance of the band rather than by the qualities of the work itself."

It is not our purpose here to discuss the question of Schumann's merits or demerits as a composer, but merely to show our readers how three of the most distinguished critics of the London daily press have viewed the introduction of one of his large orchestral works at the concerts of the youngest but most vigorous of our musical institutions. We do not fully assent to any of their opinions, but we give them the advantage of our wider circulation, thinking the question one which at the present time is well worth ventilating.

OUR readers have seen from time to time, in our notices of musical doings in America, and doubtless have remembered, the name of Adelina Patti, a young soprano of high repute in the United States. The name, indeed, has frequently appeared within the last year or two in the pages of the MUSICAL WORLD, invariably set in eulogistic and glowing periods by our transatlantic correspondents. The young lady has now arrived in London, and as she is likely to be heard sooner or later in the season at some of our concerts, it is meet, we think, to introduce her beforehand to the reader, narrate something of her story, and endeavour to make known what her pretensions are in reality. We ourselves have not yet had the pleasure of hearing the new candidate for operatic honours, and cannot say whether her talents and capabilities befit her most for the parts of Bosio or Piccolomini, to both of whom she has been compared; we shall, therefore, have recourse to the transatlantic journals for information, merely observing, en passant, that one or two who have recently heard Mlle. Patti in America, speak in high terms of her artistic powers and instincts. We must confess we are not over sanguine about new singers, and do not always put the most implicit faith in Brother Jonathan's judgment on matters of art, more especially where gallantry may play a prejudicial part. It must be admitted, however, that America has sent us some admirable artists, Bosio, Gassier, and Badiali, among others, to say nothing of Malibran, whom England exiled as a singer beyond all hope, and who returned in a few years afterwards from the United States, crowned as Empress of Song.

The following sketch of Mlle. Adelina Patti's life and career is abridged from Harper's Weekly Journal of Civilisation:—

"Adelina Patti was born at Madrid, Spain, April 9, 1843. Her mother, Mad. Barilli Patti, was prima donna of the Grand Theatre at Madrid, and, on the evening preceding the birth of Adelina, had sung Norma. Mad. Patti left Madrid soon after Adelina's birth, and returned to Milan. Here the impresario Strakosch made the acquaintance of Adelina, then only four months old. The Patti family emigrated to America in 1844, when the father joined Sanquirico, the buffo, in the management of the Italian Opera, Chambers Street. There were four daughters; Clotilda married the son of Colonel Thorne; Amalia, wife of Mr. Strakosch; Carlotta is a teacher of music; and Adelina, the singer. Adelina could sing almost before she could speak. At the age of four she sang all the gems of the operas. Her first public appearance was at the age of nine years, when Mr. Strakosch, Ole Bull, and the infantile prima donna made a tour in the provinces, where Adelina sang pieces made familiar by Jenny Lind, Sontag, Bosio, and others. The little lady created the greatest enthusiasm, and her share of the profits amounted to twenty thousand dollars, which her father invested in a country seat, the summer residence of the family. At this time our prima donna received the highest compliments from Sontag, who told her she would be one of the greatest singers in the world; and from Alboni, who said, if she went to Paris, she would make a furore."

Thus, if we may credit her memoirs, Adelina Patti was eighteen years old on the 9th of April last, about the same age at which Mlle. Piccolomini made her first appearance at Her Majesty's Theatre. We all know how frantic the Turin and other journals were about the little Italian lady. Hear a New Orleans paper about the American prima donna:—

"It is now three months since Adelina Patti came amongst us. She has appeared in Lucia, Martha, Barbiere, Il Trovatore, Rigoletto, the Huguenots as Valentine, and in the Pardon de Ploermel. In each of these operas a new triumph attended her. Adelina Patti may well be proud to have produced such a great sensation here, and to have crowded our Opera-house for three months every night she has appeared; and when she appears in London and Paris, and takes possession of the place left vacant by Sontag and Bosio, whose legitimate successor she now is, New Orleans will have the satisfaction of having first recognised and appreciated the wonderful young artist. Miss Patti is, in our opinion, the most extraordinary artist on the operatic stage. She unites to a voice clear, powerful, always in tune, capable of expressing every sentiment of the soul, and of executing the most difficult and intricate passages with the utmost ease, a chastity of style, a grace of delivery and musical accentuation, perfectly marvellous."

But this is only one writer's opinion. Let us hear how a critic in cooler Philadelphia expresses himself:—

"After the death of Mad. Sontag and Mad. Bosio, there was lamentation in musical Europe that there was no good soprano singer left to the operatic stage; the best school of vocal music had died with them. But it lives still in the person of Miss Adelina Patti, the young artist who last evening enchanted a large audience at the Academy of Music by her exquisite performance of the heroine in Lucia di Lammermoor. There were hundreds there with whom Lucia had long been worn threadbare, and a new sensation in connection with it was pronounced impossible. But even to the most blasé of opera-goers, the evening was one of delighted surprise, and greater enthusiasm has never been exhibited in the Academy on any occasion.

"Miss Patti is very young in years and appearance, but she is a finished artist. She makes her début, indeed, at a point of perfection to which most mature prima donnas never attain. In the character of Lucy her gentle, graceful, ladylike manner is exactly appropriate, and there was no deficiency at all in her acting. Her voice is a pure, delicious soprano, of great evenness and purity of tone, amply powerful in the upper and medium parts and promising greater strength in the lower. It is a fresh, unspoiled voice, with no tremble in it, and none of the cracks that exposure to the Verdi-fire always makes in that delicate article, the female voice. It is as flexible as Sontag's, with a good natural shake, and a facility of execution that makes all appearance of physical effort in the most elaborate passages totally unnecessary. Nature has done everything for Miss Patti; but the very best teaching has given her that beautiful graceful delivery, noticeable particularly in recitative passages, but not the less to be admired in others. She has been singing ever since she could walk, having really 'lisped in numbers.' She has been heard here in concerts, when only eight or ten years of age. But the usual fate of infant prodigies has not attended her; for her talent and her voice have grown with her growth, and having ceased to be an 'infant phenomenon,' she is now that far rarer phenomenon, a beautiful singer, of the purest and best school.

"The audience, as usual in Philadelphia, were quite cool and indifferent at the beginning of the opera. But before the first act closed there was hearty applause. The duet with Edgardo and that with Ashton each revealed new talent. But the triumph of the evening was in the mad scene, which was full of touching tenderness, united with as beautiful singing as ever fell from mortal lips. At its close the audience were entirely thrown off their usual reserve. Bouquets flew from every part of the house, the young artist was thrice called out, and at the last call there was an irrepressible shout of enthusiasm, the most honest and legitimate ever displayed in the Academy. Miss Patti will become the pet of the public, and the only fear is that she may be carried off to Europe, to wear the hitherto unappropriated mantle of Mad. Bosio, which she alone, of young Italian singers, seems worthy to receive."

These extracts must, doubtless, excite curiosity in no ordinary degree. Even allowing that one half of what the writers say be true, it makes out Mlle. Patti to be a singularly endowed and accomplished artist. We could supply other notices of the young lady from various sources, no less high-sounding and full of unqualified praise, but shall content ourselves with the above, and look forward to hearing her with much interest.

Shortly after writing the above, we learned that Mlle. Adelina Patti had been engaged by the director of the Royal Italian Opera, and that she was to make her first appearance on Tuesday, in La Sonnambula. The début of a prima donna is always an interesting event, particularly when the character to be assumed is one with which the remembrance of so many renowned artists is associated; and therefore our preliminary notes may have some value. The interest becomes deeper when the débutante is so highly recommended, and expectation is elevated in proportion. "Shall we hear and see a Malibran, a Persiani, a Lind, a Bosio?" This question we shall be enabled to resolve satisfactorily next week. In the meanwhile, we wish every success to the youthful and much-be praised cantatrice, and trust that the result of Tuesday's performance may realise the most sanguine anticipations of her friends on the other side of the Atlantic. R.

To the Editor of the MUSICAL WORLD.

SIR,—If any regret sullies the recollection of the Great Exhibition of '51, it is that the Fine Arts did not participate in the beneficial influence of the undertaking. Architecture was not advanced by the vast sums of money expended upon the colossal glass-house, which, however remarkable for the materials of which it was constructed, offered no striking feature either in design or detail. Sculpture was made available only for the purposes of ornament and decoration; music to increase the effect of some special ceremony; while painting, unless identified with the productions of the manufacturer, was altogether ignored. As far as any immediate benefit or encouragement to the arts is concerned, the Great Exhibition was of no account.

Aware of this omission, and anxious to insure the success of their scheme, Her Majesty's Commissioners have enhanced the interest of the International Exhibition to be held next year, by inviting architects, painters, sculptors, and engravers to send in their works, for the purpose, it is said, of illustrating the progress and present condition of Modern Art.

The Royal Commissioners have done wisely so far; but there is an omission in their plan which must inevitably cause surprise and disappointment to many. I allude to music. Why should music and musicians be so invidiously excluded from such an undertaking? Is there any other country in which music is so generally cultivated at the present day as in England? Why, then, should it not be represented on an occasion when it is proposed to bring together a careful and perfect illustration of British art? Perhaps the Royal Commissioners decline to acknowledge the right of music to join the graceful companionship of her sisters; or are they at a loss to determine in what way she should be introduced?

The hanging of pictures or the placing of statuary involves but little trouble, certainly, as compared with the organisation of musical performances. I believe, however, music, if allowed, could be made to contribute materially to the success of the International Exhibition, and at the same time serve its own cause.

This would be achieved if facilities were afforded to the different instrumental and vocal associations in England and on the Continent of comparing their skill. Prizes might be offered for competition, also, to the composers for works in the various styles of composition. By adopting some such plan, in which there are no great difficulties to overcome, the interesting question of the respective proficiency of the different countries in music would be determined, while its advancement would unquestionably be very materially promoted. As the matter stands, I cannot refrain from expressing sorrow and indignation at the fact of the most beautiful and civilising of the arts being repudiated by Her Majesty's Commissioners. ANTEATER.

MISS M. B. HAWES.—We have already announced the rumour that it was the intention of Miss Maria B. Hawes to resume her profession as vocalist, a statement that receives something like confirmation from the Court Journal.

RICHARD WAGNER est de retour de Carlsruhe où l'avaient appelé le grand duc et la grande duchesse de Bade. Tristan et Iseult sera prochainement mis à l'étude au théâtre Grand-Ducal pour y être représenté vers le mois de décembre prochain. Le grand duc a invité Wagner à choisir lui-même parmi les meilleurs artistes de l'Allemagne, les artistes qui devront concourir à cette exécution pour laquelle aucune dépense ne sera épargnée. Les études auront lieu sous la surveillance de l'auteur qui, en outre, dirigera personnellement les premières représentations. (Communiqué.)

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

After two disappointments, caused by the indisposition of M. Faure, Guillaume Tell was produced on Tuesday week, and, we need hardly add, filled the theatre in every part. The amphitheatre, and amphitheatre stalls, above all, were crowded to suffocation, and, indeed, from this part of the house proceeded the real applause of the evening; for there, in consequence of the abridgment of the pit, were congregated all the musical spirits of the metropolis, drawn thither in anticipation of a grand performance of Rossini's grand work. Everything tended to the expectation of such a result:—the seeming completeness of the cast, the great resources of the theatre, the efficiency and power of the basses and chorus, the energy of Mr. Costa, than whom Rossini has no more ardent admirer. The cast was as follows: Guillaume Tell—M. Faure; Arnold—Signor Tamberlik; Walter—Herr Formes; Melcthal—Signor Polonini; Gesler—Signor Tagliafico; Fisherman—Signor Neri-Baraldi; Mathilde—Mad. Miolan-Carvalho; Jemmy—Mad. Rudersdorff; Edwige—Mad. Tagliafico. Guillaume Tell was first produced at the Royal Italian Opera—the old theatre, of course—in 1848, M. Roger sustaining the part of Arnold, Tamburini of Guillaume Tell, and Mad. Castellan of Mathilde. It was played once only that year, in consequence, as was said, of the indisposition of the French tenor. A year or two later the opera was produced with Herr Ander as Arnold, but did not create any great sensation. Subsequently, it was revived with Signor Tamberlik in the principal tenor part, and the Italian was found immeasurably superior to his French and German rivals. Had Signor Tamberlik, indeed, sustained the part of Arnold in the first instance, a thorough success, we believe, might have been reckoned on. Every one who knows music and feels its power must recognise the immense merit of Guillaume Tell; but most unfortunately the climax is attained at the end of the second act, and the interest decreases thence to the last finale. In fact, the opera, like most French operas (which are almost interminable), is too long. The quantity of music in the first two acts alone of Guillaume Tell is at least equal to the whole Fidelio. The director of the Royal Italian Opera, notwithstanding, was determined to give Rossini's master-piece another chance, and for this purpose called in all the resources of the establishment; but as the performance commences so late at the Royal Italian Opera it was impossible to give the whole work, and curtailments were indispensable.

That the management has done everything possible to render the performance complete we feel assured. Signor Tamberlik is by far the best Arnold we have seen in this country. M. Faure, although the music of Guillaume Tell is too low for him, sings like a thorough artist, and acts with great force and intelligence. The Walter of Herr Formes would be inimitable in every way, if only his vocal power was economised a little in the magnificent trio of the second act. That the music of Mathilde would not suit the voice of Mad. Miolan-Carvalho, was to be expected. Occasionally, when the voice has not to be forced, Mad. Carvalho sings with infinite sweetness and delicacy; but this cannot extenuate the fault of embroidering the air and subsequent duet with ornaments of her own manufacture. All the remaining characters are entitled to unqualified praise, and nothing better could be desired in their respective ways than Mad. Rudersdorff's Jemmy—a signal success—Signor Neri-Baraldi's Pescatore, Signor Polonini's Melcthal, Signor Tagliafico's Gesler, and Mad. Tagliafico's Edwige.

To the performances of the band and chorus we can apply the term "magnificent," with few reservations. Every evening the overture is encored with acclamation, and the enthusiasm of the audience, after the great scene of the "oath of liberty," is unbounded on all occasions. One of the greatest hits of the performance is, of course, the famous air in the last scene, "Sulvez-moi" ("Corriam, corriam"), in which Signor Tamberlik electrifies the audience with an "Ut de poitrine" that Duprez himself might have envied in his best days. The scenery is marvellously beautiful, and the appointments and dresses all in the best taste. Guillaume Tell was repeated on Thursday night for the third time.

Perhaps Il Trovatore was as good an opera as could be selected for the first appearance of Mad. Penco and Signor Graziani. Both received on Tuesday night the hearty welcome due to their merits and popularity. Mad. Penco, although comparatively a new-comer, is even now a general favourite, and, indeed, considering the rarity of first-class dramatic sopranos in the pure Italian school, is entitled to a distinguished place. Her Leonora, while exhibiting all those sterling qualities for which it was applauded last season, offered no absolutely novel points for comment. The opening air, "Tacea la notte placida," was given with genuine feeling, and the accompanying "cabaletta," or quick movement, "Di tale amor," with the utmost neatness and brilliancy of execution. Equally to be commended from another point of view was the scene of the tower, in which it was difficult to know whether most to praise the tender expression with which Mad. Penco sang the address to her imprisoned lover, or the passion she threw into the subsequent duet with the Conte di Luna, where Leonora sacrifices herself to insure the deliverance of Manrico. Better still, perhaps, was the final scene, in which, after enduring the unmerited reproaches of her lover, Leonora gradually sinks exhausted at his feet, and death bears witness to her fidelity. All this was thoroughly well done, and showed Mad. Penco (not for the first time) to be an actress no less than a singer. Her companion was Signor Tamberlik, whose Manrico is, in many respects, equal, and in one or two superior, to any we have seen. "Ah! si, ben mio," the pathetic apostrophe to Leonora, has possibly been rendered with more intensity; but no one before has ever imparted such fire and enthusiasm to its pendant, "Di quella pira"—which allows full scope for the display of those exceptional resources peculiar to the singer. On Tuesday night, by the energy with which he declaimed this vigorous outpouring of a belligerent impetuosity, and by the interpolation, in an unexpected place, of one of his extraordinary high chest-notes ("C") Signor Tamberlik—so to speak—"electrified" the house, and was twice called before the curtain amid vociferous acclamations. The Conte di Luna of Signor Graziani, though a performance of evenly balanced merit, is principally noted for the smooth and unctuous delivery of the romance in Act II. ("Il balen del suo sorriso"), a placid melody, just fitted to show off a voice which, however limited in range, for mellow ripeness of quality, stands alone among barytones. This favourite air, sung with Signor Graziani's accustomed excellence, was, as usual, and as a matter of course, encored. Mad. Nantier Didiée's impersonation of the witch, Azucena—that "inauspicious and ghastly woman," as she is designated in the English version of the libretto—was as remarkable as formerly for its histrionic earnestness; while her execution of the music—from the plaintive "Stride la vampa" to the simple and melodious "Si, la stanchezza m'opprime"—was everywhere marked by the ease and fluency that belong to thorough artistic acquirement. At the conclusion of the grand duet with Manrico in Act II., Mad. Didiée was summoned forward, with Signor Tamberlik, and loudly applauded. Signor Tagliafico recited the long and somewhat prolix narration of Azucena's early exploits (Act I.)—the only opportunity for distinction afforded to Ferrando—as emphatically as though he believed it all to be true. His appearance, however (an unusual thing with Signor Tagliafico), is not precisely what it ought to be. Ferrando, an old retainer of the Luna family, and supposed to have been present at the birth of Manrico and his brother, should certainly not be made to look younger than either of them. On the whole this was one of the most effective performances of Il Trovatore we remember. The house was well attended.

Sacred Harmonic Society.—Handel's Israel in Egypt was performed for the first time this season, with Mlles. Parepa and Banks, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Santley, and Signor Belletti. Particulars in our next.

Herr Reichardt has left London for Frankfort; from thence he proceeds to Darmstadt and Wiesbaden, to give a series of representations at the theatres in those towns. The admirers of this talented vocalist will not therefore have the pleasure of hearing him at any of the fashionable concerts till late in the season.

Herr Franz Abt, the well-known composer of "When the Swallows," &c., and Capellmeister of the Ducal Opera at Brunswick, intends visiting London in the course of the season.

MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—The instrumental portion of the third concert on Wednesday last, excited more than ordinary interest, as it included a symphony by Robert Schumann. The symphony in B flat (No. 1) was lucky in having for "interpreters" a body of executants who did as ample justice to its merits as if they had been performing any of the well-known works which afford as much gratification to players as listeners. Moreover, it enjoyed the advantage of an audience unbiassed by cliques and uninfluenced by claques; and whatever the opinion may be of the work in question, the directors of the Society were justified in producing it, although (despite the applause at the end of the last movement) we question the probability of its being repeated. Far more to the general taste was the symphony which opened the 2nd part—the No. 10 in E flat of Haydn. Here everything was spontaneous, flowing, genial, and intelligible; and, rendered as it was to perfection by the band, over which Mr. Alfred Mellon so ably wields the conductor's stick, the audience were fairly charmed. Spohr's first clarionet concerto (in C minor) served to display all the exquisite purity of tone, faultless mechanism, and command of expression for which Mr. Lazarus is justly renowned, and which entitle him to challenge all contemporary clarionet players, native or foreign. The applause, in which the whole orchestra cordially joined, was as hearty and unanimous as it was thoroughly deserved. Mendelssohn's exquisitely poetical overture, "The Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," at the end of the 1st part, was the most wonderful performance of the evening, as well as the most wonderful composition in the programme. To the vocal department Mlle. Parepa contributed Beethoven's "Ah! perfido," and Signor Belletti the telling air "Chi mai vedo?" from Mr. Balfe's Italian opera Falstaff, the two artists uniting in the charming duet from Mozart's Figaro, "Esci omai garzon." Auber's sparkling overture to Le Lac des Fées brought to a brilliant close a concert which, with all its admirable features, laboured, nevertheless, under the drawback of being too long. Another season we should recommend the council to consider the desirability of commencing at eight o'clock. The next concert, and last of the season (June 5th), a great treat may be expected, as the Pastoral Symphony, the overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream, Professor Sterndale Bennett's third pianoforte concerto (by Miss Arabella Goddard), and other sterling works are promised.

NEW PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—The third concert was given on Monday night, and attracted an immense crowd, the engagement of Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini, no doubt, greatly enhancing the attraction. The following programme was given:—Overture, Ruy Blas, Mendelssohn; Grand Scene, Der Freischütz, Weber; Aria, "Dalla sua pace," Mozart; Symphony, "Power of Sound," Spohr; Cavatina, "Com' è bello," Donizetti; Concerto, G major, pianoforte, Mozart; Aria, "Aurora che sorgerai," Rossini; Duet, Lucia, Donizetti; and Overture, Preciosa, Weber. This was a grandly constructed programme, and the execution was universally worthy of the music. Of course Spohr's magnificent symphony was the crowning rose of the garland, and Dr. Wylde evidently took the greatest pains to arrive at a perfect realisation of that wonderfully poetical and picturesque composition. Nor should we forget the rapturously glowing and exciting overture of Mendelssohn, which opened the concerts with surpassing splendour. Beethoven's glorious concerto—No. 4 of the five masterpieces the composer has bequeathed to pianoforte and orchestra—was a worthy companion to such a symphony and such an overture, and was the more acceptable as it was so well recommended by the vigour and superior intelligence of Mr. John Francis Barnett's playing, which pleased and surprised in an equal degree the immense congregation, which paid marked attention to the performance throughout. The concerto in G was, we think, the piece which first introduced Master John Barnett, then pupil of Dr. Wylde, to the subscribers of the New Philharmonic Concerts several years ago. The improvement in the young pianist from that time, of course, is immense, and indeed we perceive manifestations of amelioration in style and expression even from last year. Mlle. Titiens sang the scene from the Der Freischütz more magnificently than we have heard it for—we know not how long, and the cavatina from Lucrezia with extreme brilliancy. We cannot say which air suited Signor Giuglini best—that from Don Giovanni or that from the Donna del Lago; but both were given to perfection, and exhibited the admirable tenor in his best mood. Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini are re-engaged for the next concert. Weber's splendid overture brought a most remarkable concert to a fitting close.

MR. G. W. HAMMOND, the pianist, pupil of Mr. W. H. Holmes, gave a concert on Wednesday morning, at the Hanover Square Rooms, which attracted a very large attendance. With Mr. Hammond were associated as instrumentalists, Mr. H. Blagrove (violin), Mr. Aylward (violoncello), Mr. J. Balsir Chatterton (harp), and Mr. W. H. Holmes (pianoforte). The pianoforte share of the programme was more than usually important, comprising Beethoven's trio in B flat (dedicated to the Archduke Rodolf), Handel's allegro in F, Bach's Allegro Moderato in B minor, Professor Bennett's Scherzo in E minor, Kullak's "Les Arpèges," Mendelssohn's Lied ohne Worte in C, Mr. Cipriani Potter's Pezzi di bravura in C, jagdlied by Schumann, Romanesca by Moscheles, fantasia by Dohler, and finale allegro for two pianofortes, by Mozart. Thus the audience were perfectly enabled to pass judgment on the concert-giver, who was tested in almost every style. Mr. Hammond commenced somewhat nervously in Beethoven's trio, even with the assistance and support of such powerful auxiliaries as Mr. H. Blagrove and Mr. Aylward. He improved, nevertheless, as he went on, and was loudly applauded in the exciting scherzo of Professor Bennett—a capital bit of execution, as he was also in Kullak's showy concert-room piece. Assisted by his master, in Mozart's allegro for two pianofortes, he played still better, and pleased even more. Thus we are permitted to chronicle a decided success for Mr. Hammond, whose qualifications as a pianist are far beyond the average of merit. Besides his share in Beethoven's trio, Mr. Blagrove contributed Vieuxtemps's Deuxième Morceau de Salon, a masterly performance; and Mr. Balsir Chatterton executed a fantasia of his own composition on the harp with his wonted power and skill. All the vocal music was the composition of Mr. W. H. Holmes, and was distributed among Miss Marian Moss, Mad. Laura Baxter, and Mr. Wallworth. Four pieces were given from Mr. Holmes's new vocal work, "Voices of the Night," words taken from Longfellow, viz., prelude-song, "Pleasant it was when woods were green;" trio, "The Reaper;" song, "Hymn to the night," and song, "The light of stars." All were received with much favour, the last two, perhaps, eliciting most applause. The sacred song, "When the wicked man turneth away from his wickedness," admirably sung by Mad. Laura Baxter; and the trio, "To the Lord God belong mercies," finely rendered by the three artists, were no less admired and applauded. Mr. W. H. Holmes and Mr. J. S. Noble conducted.

MISS ELEANOR ARMSTRONG gave her annual concert on Tuesday night at the Queen's Rooms, Hanover Square. The solos she selected for the occasion—namely, Macfarren's popular ballad, "The beating of my own heart," Rossini's "Bel Raggio," and the grand scena from Lurline, "Sad as my soul,"—though all in such very different styles, seemed equally suited to the capabilities of her pure and flexible voice; and the taste and expression with which she delivered them justly elicited the unanimous and cordial applause of a full and a fashionable audience. The fair concert-giver also joined Mad. Laura Baxter in Winter's duet "Vaghi Colli," and Mr. Rhodes in a duet of Spohr's from Faust, besides Macfarren's trio, "The Troubadour," with Mad. Laura Baxter and Mr. Rhodes. The other vocal artists who appeared were Mr. George Perren and Miss M. Baxter; and the instrumentalists Herr Adolphe Ries (piano), Herr Louis Ries (violin), Herr Lidel (violoncello), and Herr Oberthür (harp), all of whom did ample justice to an excellent programme. Mr. Frank Mori conducted.

MISS THERESA JEFFERYS' concert on Thursday evening at St. James's Hall was a brilliant affair, and brought together a brilliant, if not an overcrowded audience. The artists comprised among the singers, Miss Stabbach, Mlle. Parepa, Miss Emma Heywood, Miss Rebecca Isaacs, Miss Theresa Jefferys, Messrs. W. Winn, J. Morgan, Ramsden, Trelawney Cobham, and Sims Reeves; among the instrumentalists, Mr. Henry Baumer (pianoforte), M. Vieuxtemps (violin), and Master Butler (flute). The performances which afforded the very greatest satisfaction were two songs by Mr. Sims Reeves, "Twilight is darkening," by Kücken, and "My Guiding Star," from Robin Hood, both encored and (strange to say for Mr. Reeves) repeated; the duet "Deh Conte," from Norma, by Mlles. Parepa and Theresa Jefferys, also redemanded and sung again; M. Vieuxtemps' violin solo, "Bouquet Americain," and his fantasia "I Lombardi,"—the great Belgian violinist being recalled after each performance; and the flute solo of Master Butler (pupil of Mr. Clinton), a first-rate display considering the young gentleman's years, which was rapturously applauded and encored. Master Clinton is a real credit to his master. For our own parts, however, if we had a young son ever so bent to the flute, we should not greatly like to see him expend so much of his tender breath upon the treacherous embouchure. But this opinion is apart. Among other things which produced a good effect we may mention a new song, "O sunny hills," most charmingly given by Miss Theresa Jefferys (whose voice, by the way, we and others remarked, was fast ripening into force and beauty); the ballad, "Days of Chivalry," by Miss Stabbach, the applause consequent upon which brought back the fair songstress to the platform; and a new and very elegant ballad by Mr. Balfe, "Mary," most sweetly and expressively warbled by Mr. Sims Reeves. We have selected enough from the twenty-six morceaux of which the concert was composed to show of what metal it was made, and how far the assemblage was gratified. Messrs. Sydney Smith and Francesco Berger alternated as conductors, and Mr. Clinton accompanied his young pupil in his flute solo.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—The first opera concert of the season took place on Friday afternoon in last week. The present series is to consist of twelve concerts, in all of which Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini will take part, while Mad. Grisi and Mad. Miolan-Carvalho will appear alternately. The programme of the first concert comprised some of the most popular operatic selections. Mlle. Titiens sang "Com' è bello," from Lucrezia Borgia, with immense power and dramatic effect; Mad. Miolan-Carvalho, "Voi che sapete," from Figaro, and "Come per me sereno," from La Sonnambula—Bellini suiting her style far better than Mozart. Signor Giuglini gave the romance, "Angiol d'amore," from La Favorita, and the Italian version of "When other lips," both with surpassing grace and purity of voice; and M. Gassier sang Figaro's air from the Barbiere. The only concerted pieces were the "Miserere," from Il Trovatore, and the trio, "Qual voluttà," from I Lombardi. Not the least interesting portions of the concert were two solos of Paganini, "Le Carnaval de Venise" and "Le streghe," by M. Ole Bull, and the performance by the Crystal Palace band of the overtures to Rossini's Siege of Corinth and Auber's new Opera, La Circassienne. Considering the enormous attendance attracted by the great Haydn Festival on Wednesday, and the high price charged, 7*s.* 6*d.*, the concert was very liberally supported; but of course the patronage was not so extensive as it would have been under ordinary circumstances, and had the weather been more favourable. The second concert yesterday was graced by the first appearance this season of Mad. Grisi, whose engagement, in addition to that of Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini, as may be imagined, made a difference in the number of visitors. This day an extra Saturday concert will be given, when Mad. Alboni will sing for the last time this season, and Miss Arabella Goddard will play. Of yesterday's and to-day's concert we shall speak in our next.

Provincial.

THE Liverpool Mail writes as follows:—

"Our musical readers will be glad to hear that Miss Anna Whitty, whose vocal triumphs in Italy have been so frequently recorded in our columns, and who débuted last season but one at Mr. Benedict's concert, in London, will make her first public appearance in her native town on the 21st of this month. Miss Whitty has been engaged by the directors of the Philharmonic Society for the sixth subscription concert, which takes place on the above date. This concert will be the most brilliant of the season, for in addition to Miss Whitty, Miss Banks, Miss Laura Baxter, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Santley, are engaged, and the programme will include Mr. Benedict's new cantata of Undine, which has never yet been performed in Liverpool."

The Brighton Gazette of May 9th gives a luminous report of the concert held, on Tuesday last, by the Willert-Beale touring-party. The following is an abridgment of this article:—

"The name of Alboni possesses such a powerful charm, that everybody is anxious to hear her. She came not alone, but was accompanied by Miss Arabella Goddard, an ornament to our British pianists, and who, on this occasion, fully sustained her musical reputation. In addition to these distinguished artists there was the renowned Regondi, who stands first in his profession. Mr. Wright, finding that an extraordinary demand was made for tickets, was induced to enlarge the reserved seats. Only three rows were left unreserved, and, in order to accommodate applicants, places were arranged on the platform for twenty or thirty more. It reminded us of the Jenny Lind mania when she first came to Brighton. The concert took place in the large room of the Town Hall. Miss Arabella Goddard, who was hailed with much applause on ascending the platform, gave a fantasia by Benedict, entitled Albion, in which is introduced the well-known air of 'Pray Goody.' The variations were rendered with wonderful lightness of touch, and the performance might well be pronounced faultless. We remember this artist when she first came out performing a fantasia on airs from Lucia di Lammermoor. She was then very young, but there was the promise of future excellence. What a marvellous change has time wrought in her artistical powers. Miss Goddard now displays a versatility of talent that few artists possess, male or female. In Benedict's Albion, whilst her left hand was arduously and skilfully employed in pouring out the lower tones, her right sent forth a shower of notes of a lighter character, so skilfully as to astound her hearers, and to make them wonder how so much could be achieved. We need scarcely say that she was immensely applauded. Mad. Alboni was of course greatly applauded on ascending the platform. She had selected for her first piece the well-known 'Una voce.' We could not for one moment imagine that increase of years would have ripened a voice that was perfection long ago. But so it is. Alboni's voice appears to us not only increased in power, but in flexibility and in extent of register. It is, so to speak, three voices combined in one, and that she should possess the capabilities of running these three voices into one, with scarcely the semblance of a break, is a circumstance perhaps unprecedented in the history of vocal performance. At the close of the air ('Una voce') she was, as might be imagined, loudly applauded. Signor Regondi performed a solo on the concertina, on airs from the Sonnambula, 'Still so gently o'er me stealing,' and 'Do not mingle.' To praise Regondi would be quite superfluous. He has earned, by his genius, a reputation that nothing can shake.

"The first part closed with a duet for pianoforte and concertina, performed by Miss Goddard and Signor Regondi, the joint composition of Osborne and De Beriot. The players seemed to endeavour to outvie each other in the execution of the music. If we were asked which we thought had carried away the palm, we should be unable to say. The performance might be compared to the working of a beautiful piece of machinery. In the second part, Miss Arabella Goddard introduced a solo by Thalberg. If our eyes had been shut, if we had not seen the lady, we should have almost imagined that we were listening to that great master himself. In this solo the left hand was again vigorously employed, thundering forth the bass with masculine power. We may say that in this performance Miss Goddard almost excelled herself, and a rapturous encore followed her successful efforts. She very kindly came forward, and treated her hearers to Benedict's fantasia on the beautiful air, 'Where the bee sucks,' in which her extreme lightness of touch was very remarkable, particularly in the successive shakes, whilst ascending to the upper notes of the instrument. Applause renewed again and again followed her performance. Mad. Alboni then gave Rode's variations, one of the finest specimens of roulade singing that were ever heard. To describe the purity of the intonation, and the extreme accuracy with which every note was rendered, would be impossible. Let our readers imagine the skilful fingering of a pianist, Miss Goddard for example, and then hear Mad. Alboni, and they would discover that she realises with her voice almost what a pianist can perform. The audience encored the artist, who kindly appeared again on the platform, and the moment the conductor commenced the well-known air of 'Il segreto,' Mad. Alboni was greeted with immense applause. It was the song which first established her fame in England. She gave only one verse, but that verse will never be forgotten by those who had the pleasure of hearing it. The powerful lower notes and the sustained shake in the upper note produced an extraordinary sensation, and the fair vocalist retired from the platform amidst a burst of applause. Signor Regondi treated his hearers to a solo on the guitar. He is equally clever on this instrument as on the concertina, making the guitar all but talk. The pianoforte used was a new concert grand of most magnificent tone and quality, by Broadwood, sent down expressly for the occasion. It was the admiration of the whole room. The general arrangements, under the direction of Mr. F. Wright, gave every satisfaction."

might state that they laboured under the radical disadvantage of being unadapted for the finer class of acting. Their great dimensions rendered it impossible for the audience [generally to observe] the play of the features in an actor or actress on the stage. Apropos of the Haymarket, he related, with much humour, an account of a night spent in his boyhood, under the regime of old Morris, when those who waited till the close of the performance (1·15 A.M.) could boast that they had sat out five pieces, including a five-act comedy. Of the Princess's under Kean's management, however opinions might differ regarding his Shakspearian revivals in some respects, there could be no doubt that for costly splendour they were an institution of theatrical England. In mentioning the Lyceum, the lecturer paid a well-merited tribute to Madame Vestris for the exquisite taste displayed by her during her ever-memorable reign at that establishment. Space will not permit us to follow Mr. Brooks in detail through his remarks on the other houses, though we would not omit noticing his appreciative mention of the credit due to Mr. Phelps for his services to the legitimate drama at Sadler's Wells. A brief notice of the leading London managers was succeeded by a judicious and witty sketch of that important element in British dramatic authorship —translating and adapting. On this duplicate point Mr. Brooks was particularly happy, his observations and illustrations being repeatedly applauded by the more observant of the audience. Of all English adapters the palm, we were glad to observe, he conceded to Mr. Planché. Supposing the case of a play being finally and fairly accepted by a manager, the lecturer proceeded to sketch briefly, but with rare unction, its progress through the further stages of being read in the green-room, having the characters cast, the separate parts written out and distributed, rehearsals, &c., until the eventful night, to the author, of its production on the stage. The young play-wright's excitement was then alluded to, and the different degrees of success, short of total failure—a rare occurrence—which his piece might attain. In conclusion, Mr. Brooks explained the operations of that body with which he was connected, the Dramatic Authors' Society, and which, on the whole, he thought, now worked equitably and well, mainly through the new system of charges which had been devised for the society by Mr. Mark Lemon, the editor of Punch, an author of some seventy summers. With regard to the vexed question of the influence of the drama, he thought there was a deal of cant talked on both sides. For himself, and disclaiming partisanship, he saw in the drama a refined and elevating amusement, but not, as some would have it, a substitute for the pulpit. On the other hand, they talked equal nonsense who accused a hard-worked man of frivolity because in the evening he partook of the amusements afforded by the stage. To the promulgators of such extreme views, either way, he would say with Burchell in the Vicar of Wakefield—"Fudge." A great mistake, too, he thought, was made by those who indulged in the "no actors now-a-days" cry. We have, he thought, a great many actors and actresses in our day; and could they be brought together as in the good old times, on the boards of the two great theatres, we should find the fact abundantly demonstrated. Returning his thanks to the audience for their attention, Mr. Brooks then closed his altogether admirable lecture.

PECKHAM AMATEUR MUSICAL UNION.—The eleventh concert of this flourishing society, held on Saturday, the 6th inst., was attended by between 400 and 500 of the élite of the neighbourhood. The artists were Mad. Laura Baxter, who obtained well-deserved encores in the "Fanciulle," song, and in "Home, sweet home;" Miss Rose Hersee, who was encored in the florid scena from L'Ambassadrice, and in "I'm but a simple peasant maid," both of which were brilliantly executed; Mr. George Perren (whose new song, "When first the bells," was deservedly encored); Mr. Allan Irving (encored in the duet, "The syren and friar," sung with Miss Rose Hersee); Mr. George Genge, Mr. Melchor Winter (encored in "Good-bye, sweetheart"), Mr. Frank Braine (pianist); conductor, Mr. F. Osborne Williams. The choral pieces were much applauded, and the concert appeared to give general gratification.

WESTBOURNE HALL, BAYSWATER.—Mr. M. S. Myers delivered a very clever and interesting lecture on Tom Moore, last night week, at the above new hall, which was crowded in every part. The lecturer was assisted in the vocal illustrations by Mrs. Harriette Lee and Mr. George Perren; Mr. W. Aspull presided at the pianoforte.

On Wednesday, Mr. J. Theodore Petters, the blind pianist, gave a Concert, being assisted by Mad. Gilbert, Miss Susanna Cole, Mad. Andrea, Mr. Suchet Champion, and Mr. Frank Elmore, as vocalists; and Mr. J. Theodore Petters, and Dr. Bennett Gilbert (grand pianoforte), Mr. Wells (flute), Herr Karl Otto Booth (violin), Herr Ferdinand Booth (violoncello), Dr. Bennett Gilbert (French horn), and Mr. W. Layland (harp), as instrumentalists; Mr. W. C. Filby, conductor. Mr. Petters' best performance was Beethoven's Sonata, op. 27, which he played with extreme neatness and fine expression. The vocal hit of the evening was Mr. Macfarren's ballad "The beating of my own heart," by Miss Susanna Cole.

MADEMOISELLE ELVIRA DEL BIANCO, a pianist of whom the Parisian journals have spoken in the most flattering terms (a pupil of her father Professor del Bianco, of the Conservatory at Florence, and of her uncle, Professor Gherardi), has arrived in London, and will perform at several concerts during the season; among others at the annual (or rather trimestrial) musical entertainment given by Mad. Puzzi.

"Autumn Song"—words by Lois Bolingbroke, music by J. Bolingbroke Cooper (Ashdown and Parry).

Miss Lois Bolingbroke has a poetical feeling worth cultivating. See what she has to say about "Autumn"—that weird season which is so expressively termed "the fall":—

"In the calm October weather,
Droops the harebell, fades the heather;
In the sunshine, soft and mellow,
Turns the brake from green to yellow—
Passing away!

'Neath the trees the leaves lie sprinkled,
Sapless, dry, and brown, and wrinkled;
In the west, the sunset's glimmer,
Waxes every moment dimmer—
Passing away!

The sick man, in his chamber lying,
With the fading day is dying;
And while earth seems fairer, dearer,
Draws his soul to Heaven nearer—
Passing away!

The soul has fled, the light is banished;
But both, although from our sight vanished,
Will rise again.
The flowers next day, the sun to-morrow,
The dead man's soul where dwells no sorrow,
Will rise again."

But for the more or less unfinished workmanship, the above lines might have been signed "Longfellow," and even Shirley Brooks would have refrained from demurring. The music of Mr. J. Bolingbroke Cooper is conceived and carried out in a thoroughly congenial spirit. It is for the most part "triste;" but had it been otherwise, it would have been altogether out of order. To conclude, it is well written, the only fault we can point out being (page 5, line 2, bars 1, 2) the unceremonious relinquishment of a six-four on C, for a seventh on D:—

"Oh, Sunny Beam"—By Robert Schumann (Ashdown and Parry).

This is an English version (by Mr. Desmond Ryan—one of his neatest and best) of the well-known Lied, "An den Sonnenschein," which is as charming in its way as any of the little songs of Schumann. Nevertheless, we cannot help "wishing away" such progressions as the subjoined:—

What pale shadows of Mendelssohn's Lieder are the Lieder of Schumann, has yet to be taken into consideration by the critics of the day. About posterity we have no fear. Posterity will be all right—maugre Wagner.

"Sweetly sounds the Harp"—by Hermann Berens (Ashdown and Parry).

An English version (not over-vigorous), by Mr. Arthur Carleton, of a bonâ fide German "Gute nacht!" Herr Berens' melody, which is not without prettiness, begins—almost note for note—like that of "Are you angry, mother?"—which Miss Stephens used to sing to Mrs. Davison in Bishop's opera of Aladdin. It is tolerably well dressed up, however; although Bishop would hardly have ventured upon such harmony as the following:—

There are one or two other progressions equally doubtful; but, on the whole, the song is acceptable.

"'Alice,' morceau de salon, pour le piano,"—par Eugen Woycke, Op. 2, (all music sellers).

A "variation" in E flat (again!), which might be played &c., &c., &c. We trust that Mynheer Woycke's "Op. 3," whenever it appears, may, at any rate, not be in E flat. Everything in E flat is not equal to the overture to Die Zauberflöte or the Sinfonia Eroica—"Alice, morceau de salon," by no means excepted.

"A Thought of the Rose"—words by Mrs. Hemans, music by William Staton (Robert Cocks).

Twenty years since one Sterndale Bennett set some lines by Mrs. Hemans, entitled, "The Better Land." The song is in A major. We know not exactly at what period one Felix Mendelssohn set a German version under the title of "Der Blumenkranz" ("the Garland") of some lines by Thomas Moore, beginning, "By Celia's Arbour;" but his song is in A major. In the seventh ("posthumous") book of Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte, there is a Lied (No. 5) in A major. What, our readers may ask, has all this to do with Mr. Staton's very clever setting of "How much of memory dwells amidst thy bloom, Rose!" (Mrs. Hemans)? Well, we can't precisely say. Our "Better Land" has been mislaid; so it would have been as well not to call that into question. Our "Garland," however, is at hand. In Mr. Staton's song we find this passage:—

In the "Garland" we find this passage:—

The harmony in both is identical. (The bad prosody in the "Garland," by the way, must not be laid to the charge of Mendelssohn, who composed his song to a German translation of Moore's words.) Our seventh ("posthumous")

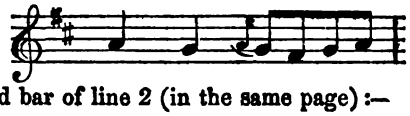
"Twilight is dark'ning"—English words by WILLIAM HILLS, music by F. W. KUCKEN (R. Cocks and Co.).

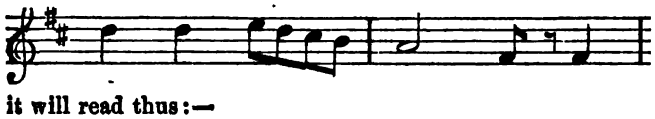
A "Schlummerlied" ("slumber song"), not without grace, not without sentiment, but wholly without originality. We prefer Herr Kücken in the "Trab, trab," and "Kleine Rekrut" vein, which is certainly more his speciality than the other. Mr. Sims Reeves, however, has taken the "Schlummerlied" in hand, and under such auspices it can hardly fail of success.

"Weep not, fond heart"—English words by WILLIAM HILLS, music by F. W. KUCKEN.

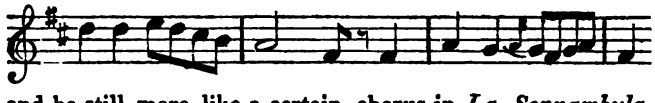
"O weine nicht" (a Lied im Volkston), not without grace, not without sentiment, but wholly without originality. We prefer Herr Kücken in the "Trab, trab," and "Kleine Rekrut" vein, which is certainly more his speciality than the other. Mr. Sims Reeves, however, &c. By the way, talking of originality, if Herr Kücken will transfer the second bar of line 1, page 1:—



to the third bar of line 2 (in the same page):—



it will read thus:—



and be still more like a certain chorus in La Sonnambula, which was sung the other night at the Royal Italian Opera, while little Senora Patti was lying asleep on the bed. In the "Schlummerlied" as in the "Lied im Volkston," the English rendering of the words, by Mr. William Hills, is in an equal measure free and independent.

"Jenny Jones;" "Cherry Ripe," transcribed for the pianoforte—by BRINLEY RICHARDS (R. Cocks and Co.).

Both these "transcriptions" bear evidence of Mr. Brinley Richards' accustomed taste and cleverness; but his heart was evidently with the more beautiful and genial air of Charles Horn. "Cherry Ripe," in short, is done to perfection; and (at page 2) developed by Mr. Richards in a manner worthy of the original melody. We cannot accord higher praise.

"The Colleen Bawn Quadrilles," for two performers on one pianoforte—by WILLIAM FORDE (R. Cocks and Co.).

A lively and brilliant set of quadrilles on the tunes introduced in Mr. Dion Boucicault's highly successful "sensation drama." Most of these are Irish, and among the rest are a "Planxty," the "Rose tree full in bearing" ("I'd mourn the hopes that leave me"), "The dear little island," "Garry Owen," "The minstrel boy," "Boyne Water," "Cushla ma Chree," "St. Patrick's Day," and—last not least—&c.

"The Skylark,"—vocal trio—words by BARRY CORNWALL, music by ALFRED GILBERT (Addison, Hollier, and Lucas).

A light, pretty, not ineffective, and by no means original part-song, for women's voices—soprano, mezzo-soprano, and contralto.

"Logie o' Buchan"—by WILHELM KUHE (Ashdown and Parry).

A moderately difficult, and at the same time very showy piece, in which the character of the old Scotch melody is not (as is so frequently the case) sacrificed at the shrine of the transcriber's leaning towards "virtuosity."

"Two characteristic Pieces" for the pianoforte—by JOHN ASPINWALL, Op. 5 (Ashdown and Parry).

We have only received one of these "Characteristic pieces;" but this one ("Song of the Leaves") is so thoroughly and unaffectedly charming that we must beg Messrs. Ashdown and Parry to forward the other to the office of the "MUSICAL WORLD" without delay. The "Song of the Leaves" is a lied ohne worte—a song without words; but its expression is so genuine that it requires no words to make it plainer. It is also tolerably easy to play—another recommendation.

"Our Sister May"—words by G. MONTAGUE DAVIS, Esq B.A., music by W. H. EAYRES (Robert Oliver). "Remembrance of Childhood"—words by J. H. JEWELL—music by EDWARD WHITEHOUSE (J. H Jewell). "Close to a Mother's Heart"—words by JOHN YOUNG, music by CARLO MINASI (Charles Jefferys).

It is enough to acknowledge the reception of these ballads, the best of which (somewhat, too, in Mr. Balfe's melodic vein) is "Remembrance of Childhood," to some well-written and graceful verses by Mr. J. H. Jewell.

"Instructions and Scales for Thomas Grocer's new Patent Transposing Metallic Harmoniums" (Thomas Croger).

These "Instructions and Scales" will doubtless be useful to those amateurs who practise on "Thomas Grocer's new Patent Transposing Metallic Harmoniums." What more need be said?

"I haven't got a Beau"—words by JOHN YOUNG, music by CARLO MINASI (Charles Jefferys).

An unoffending duet for women's voices—soprano and contralto.

"Château des Fleurs," schottische—by HENRI LAURENT (Boosey and Sons).

Fresh, sparkling, and rhythmical, this is just a happy specimen of what such a piece of music ought to be. It is, indeed, one of the best of the recent contributions to dance-music by its late young and much regretted author.

"Un Moment de Recréation," romance pour piano—by FERDINAND ALBERT JANECK (Ashdown and Parry).

Without the slightest pretensions to originality, this romance, for those young pianists who seek to acquire freedom and equality in both hands, may be recommended as useful practice.

"My Thoughts will wander far Away"—words by PENELOPE, music by FRANCIS ROBINSON, Mus. Doc. (Bussell, Dublin).

"Penelope" writes pretty verses, and Mr. Francis Robinson writes graceful melody. In this somewhat sentimental ballad, poet and musican are well matched, and they have accomplished a "pretty piece of work" between them.

"The Brave Volunteers of the Island"—words by EDMUND YATES.

Some spirited words on the subject (rather hacknied) of the "Volunteers," and well matched with the old tune to which they are set. We compliment Mr. Yates, and we compliment the composer (whatever may be his name) of the old tune (whatever may be its name).

"The Waterloo Galop"—by CHARLES MARRIOTT (Boosey and Sons).

The subject is in the same key, and otherwise recalls the second theme in the allegro of Auber's overture to his delicious ballet-opera of La Bayadere. "The Waterloo Galop," however, is none the worse on that account.

MUSIC IN BERLIN.

(From an Occasional Correspondent.)

BERLIN, that "ostrich's egg laid in the midst of a desert," as a German writer once happily called it, is more than usually animated just now. One great and absorbing topic of conversation is the Macdonald affair, which has been brought before the notice of the Chamber of Deputies by Herr Vincke. The Prussians, as you are aware, do not, to use a vulgar expression, hardly suited, perhaps, to your columns, "think small beer" of themselves, and are indignant at the censures passed by Lord Palmerston and Lord John Russell on the course adopted by the petty officials, and endorsed by the higher authorities, of the beloved but somewhat puffed-up Fatherland. The tone of the English press with regard to this business has considerably wounded their amour propre, and nearly every subject of his Prussian Majesty, from the noblest Graf, who can boast of sixteen quarterings on his escutcheon, though his worldly possessions do not amount, perhaps, to more than an old umbrella and an inconvenient number of debts, down to the "Eckensteher," or commissionnaire, in the street, would, I believe, at the present moment, be glad to hear that England had suddenly disappeared beneath those waves which it is her boast to rule. I never knew the good citizens of this capital so excited before. I am rejoiced to be able to say, however, that Captain Macdonald has not quite banished Beethoven from their recollection, nor Herr Möller made them forget Mozart. On the contrary, music still pursues its calm onward course, irrespective of railway squabbles and diplomatic notes resulting therefrom.

Mad. Lagrua has been giving a series of "starring" performances, which were excellently attended. This lady is a great favourite with the Berliners, and will, no doubt, soon pay them another visit. Her engagement was a real success, though, I am sorry to say, she was, on one occasion, prevented from appearing by sudden indisposition. She was announced to sing in Norma, but Mlle. Lucca took her part at a very short notice, and acquitted herself, under the circumstances, most creditably. She possesses intelligence and dramatic talent, but is over-weighted in the character of the Druid-priestess, for which her voice wants the requisite volume and power, and her acting the necessary dignity. Any impartial individual would have been at once convinced of this by her rendering of the first recitative, which struck me as singularly deficient in that grandeur and elevation with which we have been accustomed to hear it given. She sang the "Casta Diva," however, very pleasingly, and merited the applause bestowed on her. Adalgisa found an agreeable representative in Mlle. Fliess, who, although a novice, displays great ability, and will ere long, I am inclined to believe, prove a valuable acquisition to the operatic stage. Herr Fricke was an excellent Oroveso. The chorus and band did their part towards the success of the performance.—We have just lost, though only for a time, Mad. Jachmann-Wagner, who is now "on leave of absence;" for even fair vocalists here—if they belong to the Royal Opera—are treated with military discipline, and can do nothing without permission of the commanding officer, the Superintendant of the Theatre. Cases have occurred of a tragic queen being placed under arrest, and actually incarcerated, for refusing a part as unworthy of, or not suited to, her talent and position. The character selected by Mad. Jachmann-Wagner, in which to bid a temporary adieu to her admirers, was that of Lady Macbeth in Herr Taubert's opera of Macbeth. The part affords full scope for her dramatic powers, while, in a vocal sense, it is just adapted for her peculiar style. She was especially successful with the fourth act, in which she was enthusiastically applauded. The part of Malcolm was played, for the first time, by Mad. Bötticher, who appeared to great advantage.

"Business" is exceedingly good just now at the Friedrich Wilhemstädtisches Theater, the attraction being Mad. Jauner Krall, who is engaged for a limited number of nights. She has been playing in Dittersdorff's burlesque opera of Dierothe Kappe, which has been revived expressly for her, and in which she lately created a great sensation at Dresden and Breslau. She is one of the best bravura singers in Germany, while, for playful archness, there are very few actresses who can equal her. She has become quite the rage here, and the theatre is crowded every night. While speaking of the theatres, I may mention that M. Levassor and Mad. Tesseire are giving their peculiar entertainment at the Royal Schauspielhaus. M. Levassor's comic songs and scenas are as popular as ever, and meet with a due amount of patronage from the public.

Every one imagined, some weeks since, that the regular concert season was at an end, and jaded musical critics fancied they had, for a time, escaped from close rooms to revel in al fresco Garten-Concerts, at the various semi-rural coffeehouses in the neighbourhood of Berlin. But, alas! how often are we doomed to experience the truth of the old proverb, "Der Mensch denkt, Gott lenkt," or, as the French have it, "L'homme propose, Dieu dispose." Winter seems to have set in again with its accustomed vigour, and the hail and cold have effectually put an end, for a time at least, to all outdoor amusements, which spring up here with the daisies and flourish with the flowers. The result is that the coverings have been again removed from the benches in our concert-rooms, the gas is relighted, and a new course of indoor concerts inaugurated. This week, for instance, a concert was given for a charitable purpose by Herr Radecke. The principal novelty was a duet-sonata for pianoforte and violoncello, by Herr Rud. Radecke, brother of the concert-giver, which was very well played by Herr Radecke and Dr. Bruns. The concert was brought to a close by Schumann's Pianoforte-Quartet, Op. 47, admirably executed by Herren Radecke, Grünwald, Kahle and Bruns.—Another very good concert was the fourth and last given by the Frauverein for the benefit of the Gustav-Adolph Fund, at which a new sonata in G major, by Taubert, for pianoforte and violoncello, was performed for the first time, by the composer and Herr Stahlknecht. No less interesting was the execution of Beethoven's so-called "Horn Sonata," Op. 17, by Herr Taubert and Herr Schunke. Mad. Jachmann-Wagner sang, among other pieces, the beautiful alto air from Elijah; and the Royal Domchor gave Meyerbeer's Brautgeleite in first-rate style. I cannot conclude this short summary of our doings in the concert line, without mentioning a concert given by Herr Friedrich Kiel, assisted by Herren Stahlknecht and De Ahna, at which four very pleasing compositions of his own were performed, and met with unanimous approbation.

Herr Richard Wagner has gone to Carlsruhe for the purpose of being presented at Court. It is reported that his opera of Tristan und Isolde, dedicated, as you are aware, to the Grand-Duchess Louisa, is shortly to be produced there under his own superintendence.

The following scraps of news, which I have gathered from the various journals, may, perhaps, interest you. At Dantzig the greatest musical event lately has been the production of Meyerbeer's Dinorah, which, I need scarcely inform you, was most triumphant. At the second representation, Mad. Von Marra, who took the part of the heroine, was called on ten times in the course of the evening. Herr von Bülow has just given two concerts at Schwerin, and also been invited to play before the Ducal Court, where he is a great favourite. "De gustibus non est disputandum." Having indulged in this much Latinity, allow me to go a step further in the same style, and end my letter with

VALE.

MR. CHARLES HALLE'S BEETHOVEN RECITALS.—The first took place yesterday afternoon in St. James's Hall. Mr. Hallé played the three sonatas dedicated to Hadyn (Op. 2), and the sonata in E flat (Op. 7)—all from memory. Miss Banks sang Dussek's "Name the glad day," and Macfarren's "Ah! why do we love." Full particulars in our next.

ZURICH.—A musical festival will be held here on the 25th, 26th nd 27th of June.

ON THE PRINCIPLE OF DRAMATIC COMPOSITION.

If we regard comprehensively the whole art-area occupied by Music, we shall perceive that it divides itself generally into two grand phases of manifestation: the Combinative and the Sinuous. The first consists of the projection of phrases, the arranging of tonal masses, the hanging of huge fragments of sound, by law and æsthetic design, into proportion and unity; in a word, of the Architecture of Music. The second is composed of effects of succession, of the linking of sounds, and, to furnish a converse to the above simile, we will say, of the Painting of Music. One is an æsthetic design wrought out of the variations of tonal force; the other a similar intention wrought out of changes in the character of sound, or variations in tonal pitch.

Taking a like broad view of that vast medium of emotion in which the human heart may be said to live and move and have its being (emotion being the very incarnate essence of music), we shall see that this also defines itself into two grand and diverse varieties of character. There is, on the one hand, that sentiment which we possess with reference to one another, the emotion arising in our human relationship; and on the other hand all that sentiment which is not elicited in our ordinary and mutual intercourse, the emotion which we feel solely with reference to ourselves and to surrounding nature. The first is personal emotion; the second, mental sentiment or abstract emotion.

Bearing in mind these general facts, we pass on to the statement of another proposition connected with the subject.

In the operation of human language, leaving out of the general effect all the influence produced by its material burthen, the positive facts which it represents, and the feelings (having names) which it suggests, there may still be observed two other and very remarkable principles which enter in an important degree into its action, and which go particularly to produce the shaping of the finer portions of its effect: the one is that influence which emanates from the nervous modulation, the soft inflection, the fine and delicate gradation,—in the pure vocal tone; the other is that effect which is wrought in change of accentuation, and in the contrast of emphasis and pause. Now the first of these two principles is synonymous and identical with the principle of "melody" in music; the second, in every respect the same principle which dictates the metaphysical plan of all groupings of tonal masses, and on which depends all concerted and antiphonal effects.

Reverting now to the two phases in the character of all human emotion, which we defined a few paragraphs back, let the reader attentively consider the following remarkable fact which we are here prepared to state.

In analysing the effect of a human utterance, it will be distinctly observed, upon due inspection, that the variation in tonal pitch in speech expresses, of the general emotional burthen involved, the personal feeling, the instinctive sentiment, the ordinary human and natural emotion; whilst just as inevitably the changes in the tonal force, the earnest rhythmical march, the enlarging waves and chasms in the rolling tide of accentuation, demonstrate the grander truth, indicate the broader sentiment, and express the abstract emotion.

To fully establish this fact, argumentatively and logically, would involve far greater dissertation and occupy far greater space than is compatible with the design of these few remarks, which, as has been stated, constitute merely a group of memoranda culled from more elaborate inquiries, and applied to a particular case for a temporary purpose. But with reference to the general feasibility of the last proposition in the argument of these inquiries, let it be considered, in passing, that in the higher and more artistic forms of language (rhetoric and poetry) the eloquence, the impressiveness so far as expressional form, and not the matter involved, is concerned,—exists almost solely in the variety of accentuation, the rhythmical and sentential design; whilst, at the same time, the pure vocal tone (supposing the expression be uttered) becomes firmer, steadier, and more monotonous, and loses almost altogether the slight deviation, the sharp inflexion, and the fine gradation, indigenous to the language of ordinary speech.

In illustration of this take the following example:—

"For freedom's battle once begun,
Bequeathed from struggling sire to son,
Though baffled oft, is ever won."

In this passage, the leading idea of "Freedom" being a grand and comprehensive idea, one appealing to the imagination, drawing the sympathies from their natural and instinctive sphere, into the imaginative world, and thus eliciting a flow of mental sentiment and abstract emotion—evokes in its expression, in human language, only that dignity and auxiliary impressiveness which dwells in rhythmical evolution and sentential design, leaving almost totally unexemplified all effects of variety in tonal character. The firm and steady monotone it would appear being a more appropriate material for the reception of the bold and broad outline of sentential and rhythmical variety, than the soft and yielding vocal medium, which adapts its pliant surface-character to the expressive modulation and gradation indicative of personal feeling. Even as the hard and massive stone, having no expressiveness in the abstract—no specific surface-character, is more adapted for the embodiment of architecture than "all hues of gem or marble" appropriate for the working of a more delicate order of design.

To recur to the main path of inquiry, if the last proposition we have broached be true,—that, with reference to human speech, in the alternations of "tone" lies the general vehicle of expression for personal feeling, and that in the contrasts of accentuation, the rhythmical change, lies that vehicle selected and prescribed by nature as appropriate for the demonstration of abstract emotion, and if from the first principle of human expression proceeds the melodic, and from the second, the combinative,—order of musical effect; then these facts lead plainly and directly to the inference (or if the reality and truth of this inference, as is more probable, be allowed as a self-evident fact, without reference to these enquiries,—then the above facts explain clearly its reason) that abstract emotion—the sentiment accruing from the extension of the sympathies into the imagination, from the mingling of thought with feeling—will mainly display itself in the great combinative issue of musical effect, and that natural emotion—the instinctive feelings of the heart, the simple action of the sympathies, uninterrupted by the interposition of thought and untransported into other circumstances through the illusion of imagination—will mostly be interpreted by the mystic instinct of musical genius, in effects of succession, in the linking of sweet sounds, in "air," "tune," or "melody."

We have now arrived at the first main period in this inquiry. We have, figuratively speaking, shaped a mental implement, and it is to be hoped, magnetised it with the subtle element of truth. We shall in the next place, and very briefly, proceed to apply it in the exploration of our ultimate field of research, Dramatic Composition.

In this great order of composition, what are the general circumstances under which music is invoked to take up, as music ever must, wherever it resounds, the wondrous tale of human emotion?

Now these are the peculiar circumstances—this is the momentous occasion, wherein is perceived the phenomenon of abstract emotion and personal feeling, acting conjointly and simultaneously.

For, in the conditions of the drama, there is always more or less, some broad, general and comprehensive principle at stake. There are inevitably, more or less, some exceptional circumstances—some occurrences on a grand scale—the agonies of great social changes—the excitement of great events, which tend to spur the mind to action, to expand the imagination; thus to call into play some mental sentiment to kindle the divine fire of some abstract emotion. The influence may be "Religion," "Freedom," "Patriotism," or "Glory;" or if none of these, it will certainly be "Love," "Fame" or "Ambition." All these are ideas tending directly to inflame the imagination of even the smallest of the actors on the mortal scene involved, and thus to call into being in every breast the elevated phenomenon of abstract emotion, that is, feeling elicited through the action of the sympathy drawn from out its natural and instinctive sphere, up to the vivid realms (be they facts or fictions) of imagination.

But these ideas being still only the spirit of certain human institutions, it will be perceived, that, in the historical crises of these institutions, in their jeopardy, rivalry, strife, or in their triumph, the above ideas must necessarily be brought into nearness, and blended intimately with the social and individual circumstances of man; and thus the abstract emotions they arouse must come into contact, either for strife or union, with the natural emotions and instinctive sentiments of his heart.

Thus, in the emotional circumstances of the drama, we have the mental spectacle of some grand and overhanging idea, the broad and grand excitement of some abstract emotion,—relieved by the softer beauty and more delicate brightness of the simple natural feelings; these latter being brought out in all occasions like the present, by the minor dramatic circumstances, into all the keenness of manifestation and force of effect of which they are capable.

This being the nature of the emotional occasion, to the interpretation of which, in the circumstances of the drama, the voice of music is invoked, what would be then the general principle regulating its application to such a case? and this point constitutes the focus of these inquiries.

From what has been already concluded concerning the general office of the combinative form of music on the one hand, and that of the melodic order on the other, we should answer, simply this. If we are to sketch any division whatever in the grand effect, if we are to divide at all the general function and ministration of music as a whole, we should say that those resources which it possesses, that are particularly appropriate for the projection of grand effects, for defining bold and broad rhythmical outline, for erecting resonant antiphonal constructions, for weaving the rich fabric of concerted expression—the orchestral and choral implements of impression—should be entrusted with the illustration of the broad principle, the grand truth, the prevailing and fatallic idea, with the demonstration of the abstract emotion, and all the high mental and imaginative phenomena involved; whilst that most perfect resource for twining the graceful wreath of melodic effect, that which can utter the softest inflection, the finest gradation, and kindle into the warmest expression—the human voice—should be selected as the exponent of all the personal sentiment, instinctive feeling and natural emotion called forth, whether it utter the soft breathing of the unruffled flow of this phenomena, or the stormy declamation it impels, when lashed to the turbulence of passion.

It will be understood that this principle, of the orchestra expressing the abstract ideas, and the human voice the natural sentiments involved, in dramatic composition, is only laid down as of general application. There are truths only visible through broad observation, and such we must consequently be content to define generally. In the circumstances of the drama, just considered, we should doubtless find that there would exist no part of any music equal to the subject, into the character of which did not, to some extent, enter, and which was not generally animated with the spirit of all the circumstances of the dramatic occasion involved. The vocal melody, though carrying the personal emotion, would catch some of the lineaments of that higher strain constituting the orchestral form of expression assumed; and in the same way the vast antiphonal structure and combinative design displayed through the instrumentality of the orchestra and chorus, would be softened and relieved by the implantation of some of the sweeter features of the vocal melody.

In concluding these observations, we may remark, that although it may be interesting for composers to pursue these æsthetical and metaphysical considerations—to learn the mental principle regulating the form and character of their creations—still these are truths couched in the very nature of the laws of human demonstration and expression; and in a composer fitted to grapple with a work of such dimensions as high dramatic composition—that is, endowed not only with emotional impressiveness, but in a high degree, with the faculty of emotional demonstration by music—these laws would conspicuously exemplify themselves, and with them, those principles and truths which in their practical manifestation they involve, and which are in these pages endeavoured to be pourtrayed.

JOSEPH GODDARD.

THE OPERA IN ITALY.—An attempt is being made to revive the fortunes of opera at Naples and Milan. In the latter city, a new opera by Maestro Pedrotti, Guerra in quattro, is to be played during the spring.

ANTWERP.—Nicolai's opera, Der Templer, translated by Dangias, has been successfully produced. Nicolai composed this work, under the title of Il Templario, in Rome, before he composed the Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor. It is quite Italian in style, and full of pleasing melodies.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

THE second performance of I Puritani, on Saturday, was remarkable for nothing but the substitution of Signor Graziani for Signor Ronconi in Riccardo—no improvement.

La Sonnambula, on Tuesday, was one of the most interesting performances we have witnessed at the Royal Italian Opera. The success of Mlle. Adelina Patti—now, indeed, the principal topic in London musical circles—took everybody by surprise, except those who had been present at the rehearsal, and who were let into the secret. The reports of the American journals, alluded to in our last, although apparently overcharged and extravagant, must really be received as a close approximation to the truth. The writers in the London papers on Wednesday, except in one or two instances, are as high-flown, uncompromising, and enthusiastic in the young artist's praise as their contemporaries of the New Orleans and Philadelphia press, whose articles we have published. Mlle. Patti is even now, at eighteen years of age, in many respects, a great singer. Her voice is beautiful in quality—a real soprano equal in every part of the register, without the slightest tendency to tremulousness, and reaching to F in alt. with astonishing ease. It is, moreover, extremely flexible, and is managed with more than ordinary skill. The young lady, indeed, is almost a thorough mistress of vocalisation, and has evidently devoted her whole soul to her profession. One so young and so accomplished on the operatic boards we never heard, and no doubt the very highest destiny awaits her in her future career. It would be ungracious just now, after a single hearing, to endeavour to find out faults in Mlle. Patti's method and style. We shall prefer hearing her again before pronouncing an adverse or even qualified opinion on any one point. It is much more agreeable to declare that we were surprised and delighted beyond measure with her performance of Amina, which created the greatest sensation we have known at Covent Garden for years. Mlle. Patti's histrionic—if not so marked as her vocal—powers, everywhere betray the true instinct of genius; and there are some parts of her acting in the Sonnambula which could hardly be surpassed for truth, grace, and intensity of feeling. Her second appearance in the Sonnambula is announced for Wednesday. Signor Tiberini was Elvino, and Signor Tagliafico Count Rudolph.

On Thursday Guglielmo Tell, given for the fifth time, attracted another enormous audience, not a seat being vacant, although it was a non-subscription night. It will be repeated on Thursday.

Mad. Grisi appears to-night in the first of her eight farewell performances, as Norma.

Don Giovanni was given for the first time this season on Monday—an extra night—and filled the house in every part, as it has never failed to do for many years. Although three of the prominent parts were sustained by foreigners, or, more strictly speaking, by non-Italians, the performance recalled old times, and was in most respects worthy the best days of the opera. An ideal Giovanni is hardly to be looked for now, and the comparison of the last new aspirant with Signor Tamburini becomes tiresome perforce of repetition. When we have said that M. Faure has neither the grace nor the spirit of Tamburini, and that his voice has neither the richness nor the flexibility of his renowned predecessor, we have merely stated what might have been assumed in advance by those acquainted with his talent. On the other hand, it may be fairly asserted that, viewed as a whole, the Don Giovanni of the French barytone is superior to any that has been seen on the boards of the Italian Opera since Tamburini retired from the arena of public exhibition. M. Faure has more of the required nobility of presence, and enters more thoroughly into the dramatic exigencies of the character, than nine out of ten who have essayed it during many years past. He has, besides, completely mastered the musical text, and displays an equal degree of fluency in the recitatives—which, being in what is called the "parlante" style, are extremely trying to a Frenchman—the airs, the duets, and the concerted pieces. His performance, indeed, both in a musical and histrionic sense, is one of level and well-sustained excellence, correct to the utmost nicety of expression, note-perfect, and always prepossessing from its gentlemanly ease and naturalness. It was an unqualified and, what is more, a well-merited success.

Mad. Csillag's Elvira is not only the best the London stage can boast just now, but the best in our remembrance of Don Giovanni. Critical justice, however, has been awarded to this; to the Don Ottavio of Signor Tamberlik; to Signor Tagliafico's Commendatore; and to the Leporello of Herr Formes, whose last scene is a powerful conception, and upon whom — as was evident from the manner in which he kept his voice under control in all the concerted music—well-intended counsel has not been thrown away. Of Mad. Penco's Donna Anna and the Zerlina of Mad. Miolan Carvalho — both new to the English public — we must speak on another occasion, premising that there is much to call for eulogy in both impersonations. Signor Ronconi's Masetto — one of the most racy and perfect embodiments ever witnessed of a subordinate part—gave unusual strength to the "caste." A character generally thought unworthy the attention of a first-class artist, became, for the first time, one of the most important features in the opera, simply because the admirable Italian barytone (whose versatility is unrivalled) made Masetto what Mozart intended him, a well-defined and complete portrayal, and not the preposterous nonentity to which the artists of the Italian stage have accustomed us. The strange association of earnestness and weakness, of the anxious solicitude and genuine desire of a sincere lover, with the awkwardness and imbecility of a boor, worried almost beyond redemption by the insolent invasion of his rights at the hands of a rich and profligate nobleman, was depicted to the very life; and although Signor Ronconi in his long career has played many more arduous parts, he certainly never distinguished himself more honourably.

The band was superb from the overture to the end; and the restoration of Mozart to his original purity, by rejecting in toto the barbarous "modifications" of Signor Alary, added no little to the interest created by this remarkably fine performance. No less than five pieces were encored — viz., "La ci darem" (Mad. Carvalho and M. Faure); "Batti, batti" (Mad. Carvalho); the "trio of masks" (Mad. Penco, Mad. Csillag, and Signor Tamberlik); "Deh vieni alla finestra" (M. Faure); and "Il mio Tesoro" (Signor Tamberlik). All the principal singers were summoned before the curtain after the magnificent finale to the first act, and at the end of the opera a similar compliment was paid to M. Faure alone.

Provincial.

THE Hull News gives an account of the opening of a new organ on Friday the 10th instant, which will doubtless be perused with interest by our organ-loving readers:—

"The churchwardens of the Mariners' Church have for some time been actively engaged in providing funds for defraying the expenses connected with the erection of a new organ, and the painting and renovation of the edifice. Their efforts have been rewarded with more than ordinary success, for although they only date from last November, and the outlay is about £600, the amount realised towards that object up to last evening, comes up to within about £20 of that sum, a result which must be very gratifying to the churchwardens and the congregation, for whose comfort their operations have been directed. The new organ, built by our townsmen, Messrs. Forster and Andrews, was opened yesterday, when services were held in the church morning and evening, the sermon in the morning being preached by the Rev. R. H. Parr, M.A., and in the evening by the Rev. H. W. Kemp, B.A. The 'opening' was inaugurated by full choral services. The organ, which in exterior is of the decorated Gothic style, with open tracery from the towers, was presided at by Mr. Jeremiah Rogers, of the parish church, Doncaster, whose ability is universally recognised. Mr. Rogers was assisted by Mr. J. W. Stephenson, of St. John's. During morning service Mr. Rogers played three voluntaries, which displayed his accustomed ability, and brought out the full powers of the new instrument. The organ contains 1313 pipes, the great organ ranging from CC to G, and the swell organ from CC to G. The second voluntary was one of Adams's, which, besides requiring considerable executive power, was remarkable from its calling into requisition the whole resources of the instrument. We noticed in this voluntary and in the symphonies, that the various fancy stops were remarkably well brought out. Great fulness and body of tone were discernible in the diapasons, and we were struck with the clearness of the stop diapason and the flute of four feet. The cremona is an exceedingly beautiful stop, whilst the cornopean is particularly rich, especially in the lower notes. The reeds, too, appear to be all that could be desired. We also marked the harmony between the viola di gamba and the stop diapason, while the hautboy is considered quite equal to the other reeds. The organ, for its size, may be classed amongst the very best in the country, reflecting credit not only on the builders but on the owners; and the congregation may congratulate themselves on the possession of such an instrument, as the old one with which they have just parted never was—one of eminently superior quality and manufacture. The churchwardens are perfectly satisfied with the organ, and it is only a matter of regret that the church is not better adapted for showing its fine qualities to advantage. On Sunday, sermons will be preached in the church in aid of the funds of the institution, by the Revs. F. F. Goe, J. Monke, and Chas. Campe."

The following report of the last Antient Concert in DUBLIN is abridged from the Evening Mail:—

"The concert of last evening was gratifying to an overflowing audience, although not what might have been expected at one of our Antient Concerts; we believe the selection made was more in accordance with the wishes of the subscribers than that of the committee. The concert opened with Mendelssohn's, 'Hear my prayer.' The solo was rendered by Miss Pyne, with true artistic excellence.' The sestet, 'The cloud-capped towers,' sung by the whole choir, was an effort worthy of notice; as was also the quartet and chorus, 'The Vale of rest.' Beethoven's 'Jubilate' was not so well, the quartet wanting firmness and truth of intonation. Rossini's 'Dal tuo stellato' was unanimously re-demanded. Mr. Hatton's part song, 'O could I with fancy stray,' was sung with great charm; and the two madrigals, 'Now is the month of Maying,' and 'Who shall win my lady fair,' were all that could be desired. Miss Pyne sang 'The convent cell,' 'Rode's aria,' and 'The power of love,' each with distinguishing charm of tone, style, and finish. In 'Ah dolce canto' the executive finish was so clear and brilliant as to make one marvel at the ease with which it was delivered. Wallace's trio and chorus, 'Hark, how the chimes,' was nicely sung by Miss Herbert, Mr. O'Rorke, and Mr. Richard Smith. Mr. Gerhard Taylor played two fantasias on the harp, on themes from Meyerbeer's operas, with great brilliancy. The Misses Flynn, Miss Kate Cruise, Messrs. Keane, Khramer, P. Stewart, Dobbin, and B. Mullen, were, with those already named, the singers of the concerted pieces, and the whole was under the direction of Mr. Joseph Robinson."

From the Lynn News we learn that the Lynn Choral Society concluded its season on Friday last week, with a miscellaneous concert. The principal features of the programme were Spohr's Ode to St. Cecilia, Rossini's "Carita," and a selection from Beethoven's Mount of Olives. The soprano part in Spohr's ode and Rossini's chorus was taken by Miss Susanna Cole, who is mentioned in terms of high praise by the local prints.

MISS EMMA BUSBY'S CONCERT.—A first-rate entertainment in every respect — on Friday morning, the 10th — the programme being quite a model, which, had we space, we would quote entire, as an example to all concert-givers. The pieces in which Miss Emma Busby played (we need hardly inform our readers that the young lady is a pianist of remarkable ability), were Spohr's trio in E minor, for piano, violin and violoncello, in which she enjoyed the co-operation of Herr Molique and Signor Piatti; Beethoven's Kreutzer sonata, with Herr Molique; rondo by Weber, and two solos by Chopin. All these performances indicated, no less the classic feeling than the superior mechanical power of the fair executant. Two solos, by Herr Molique and Signor Piatti, are also worthy mention. The vocal music, by Miss Augusta Thomson and Mlle. Elvira Behrens, calls for no particular remark. Mr. W. G. Cusins was the conductor.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.—The annual performance of the Messiah, in behalf of the funds of the above society, took place last night at St. James's Hall, under the direction of Professor Sterndale Bennett. The principal singers were Mads. Lemmens-Sherrington and Weiss, Miss Wilkinson, Miss Palmer, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Messrs. Wilbye Cooper, Whiffin, T. A. Wallworth, W. Winn and Weiss.

BERLIN, APRIL 27TH.—Mlle. Lucca, who, in consequence of the success of her "star" performance, has been engaged at the Royal Opera House, and was to have made her first regular appearance as Recha in Die Jüdin, was prevented from so doing by indisposition, resulting from a cold, but is expected to be well enough to appear next week.

ST. JAMES'S HALL
(REGENT STREET AND PICCADILLY).

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

For the Benefit, and last appearance this Season, of

M. VIEUXTEMPS.

THE TWENTIETH CONCERT OF THE THIRD SEASON,
MONDAY EVENING, MAY 27, 1861,

The Programme selected from the Works of

VARIOUS COMPOSERS.

PART I.—Posthumous Quartet, in B flat, No. 13, for two Violins, Viola, and Violoncello (first time at the Monday Popular Concerts), MM. VIEUXTEMPS, RIES, WEBB, and PIATTI (Beethoven). Canzonet, "Name the glad day," Miss BANKS (Dussek). Air, "Dalla sua pace," Mr. SIMS REEVES (Mozart). Sonata, "Il trillo del Diavolo," with Pianoforte accompaniment, M. VIEUXTEMPS, (Tartini).

PART II.—Märchen (Legend), for Violin and Pianoforte, M. VIEUXTEMPS and Miss ARABELLA GODDARD, (first time at the Monday Popular Concerts), (Vieuxtemps). Song, "I arise from dreams of thee," Mr. SIMS REEVES, Howard (Glover). Song, "Ah! why do we love?" Don Quixote, Miss BANKS (G. A. Macfarren). Trio, in D minor, No. 1, for Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello, (by desire), Miss ARABELLA GODDARD, M. VIEUXTEMPS, and Signor PIATTI (Mendelssohn).

Conductor—Mr. BENEDICT.

To commence at Eight o'clock precisely.

Sofa Stalls, 5s.; Balcony, 3s.; Unreserved Seats, 1s.

Tickets to be had of Mr. Austin, at the Hall, 28 Piccadilly; Cramer and Co.; Chappell and Co. 50 New Bond Street, and the principal Musicsellers.

MR. CHAS. HALLE'S BEETHOVEN RECITALS.—The 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th, and 6th will take place on Fridays, May 24th and 31st; June 7th, 14th, 21st, and 28th; July 5th.

To commence each day at Three o'clock precisely.

The Programmes will be exclusively devoted to the Sonatas composed by Beethoven, for Pianoforte without accompaniments—the whole to be introduced in regular succession, according to the original order of their publication, for which the numbered "Operas" respectively assigned to them are warrants. The universal popularity of these works in England, as elsewhere, and their admitted superiority to all other compositions of the class to which they belong, support Mr. Hallé in the belief that such an uninterrupted presentation of the entire series may elicit the attention both of students and of connoisseurs. Many of the Sonatas, never having been publicly performed, though familiar to professors, are unknown to the majority of amateurs; and some of these are quite as worthy admiration as others, which, owing to their frequent appearance in concert programmes, have obtained unanimous acceptance.

As exemplifications of the gradual advance of their composer's talent, from its early stages to its ripe maturity, the Pianoforte Sonatas of Beethoven may be consulted as advantageously as the Quartets or the Orchestral Symphonies. They begin at the commencement of his "First" manner, play a very conspicuous part in his "Second," and extend far into the meridian of his "Third." No less than thirty-two in number, there are enough of them to illustrate, more or less pointedly, every phase of the great musician's artistic progress; and, if merely regarded as a series of compositions for a single instrument, in variety, beauty, and originality, they stand wholly unparalleled.

At each of the eight performances two vocal pieces will be introduced. The programmes will contain descriptions, historical and analytical, of the Sonatas as they occur. The object aimed at in these descriptions—from which criticism will, as a matter of course, be excluded—is not to guide the taste, but to assist the appreciation of the audience.

Prices of Admission:—Sofa Stalls (numbered and reserved), for the series, 2*l.* 2*s.*; Single Ticket, 10*s.* 6*d.* Balcony and Area, for the series, 1*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.*; Single Ticket, 7*s.* Unreserved Seats, for the series, 1*l.*; Single Ticket, 3*s.*

Subscriptions received at Chappell and Co.'s, 50 New Bond Street; Cramer and Co.'s, 201 Regent Street; Keith, Prowse, and Co.'s, 48 Cheapside; Mitchell's, 33 Old Bond Street; at the Hall, 28 Piccadilly; and at Mr. Charles Hallé's, 8 Mansfield Street, Portland Place.

LONDON: SATURDAY, MAY 18, 1861.

NO more hopeless task presents itself to managers of Italian Opera than that of discovering an adequate representative of Mozart's Don Giovanni, and yet no character is more frequently essayed by artists incompetent to sustain it. The performance of Don Giovanni has resolved itself into an annual necessity, and the opera must be presented whether the singer who undertakes the part of the libertine be good, bad, or indifferent. The manager is satisfied, and imagines the public will be satisfied, if the other personages are more or less efficiently supported, and trusts to the popularity of the music for the rest. But, it may be asked, wherein consists the difficulty of Don Giovanni? Does it tax alike the highest powers of the tragedian or the comedian? Is the music so written that none but an exceptional voice can sing it? The music, on the contrary, is simple enough, so far as the notes are concerned, and any average barytone may master it with tolerable ease. It is the variety of expression that defies the capacity of most singers. No part in the whole range of the drama necessitates the embodiment of so many passions as Don Giovanni. No half dozen parts, indeed. To perform it aright, the artist must be as gentle as the dove and bold as the lion; at once condescending and haughty, humble and scornful, flattering and defiant; with a tongue of oil and a heart of iron. He must don the semblance of one who cares for nothing and feels for nobody,—a sensualist, a voluptuary, who, through the most winning accents, the most captivating glances, the most seductive demeanour, must declare himself in every word, look and motion. Surely an artist may rank high in the scale of excellence without being in the least adapted for the part. And so indeed it has proved; the most consummate singers and actors in other characters having entirely failed to reach Mozart's hero. The difficulty will be acknowledged much greater when the personal graces and refinement of manner required are taken into consideration. Indeed, it is no wonder that, from the first production of the opera in this country, only two artists have been found who could be said to pourtray the character of Don Giovanni with anything like an approach to the ideal truth. These were Ambrogetti and Tamburini. Let us see in what they excelled, and what were their special gifts. We may thus obtain an insight into the difficulties that present themselves, and be able to find excuses for many admirable vocalists who have so signally fallen short of the reality.

Ambrogetti and Tamburini were serious actors of the highest order. They were also first-rate buffoons. Their repertory, in short, embraced the highest tragedy and the lowest comedy. Either could throw the audience into hysterics one night, as the father in Paer's Agnese, and the next night provoke their utmost risibility as Figaro or Bartolo in the Barbiere. But Signor Ronconi could do both one and the other with at least equal power and equal effect. We must, therefore, look for some other quality, or qualities, in the artists who thus specially distinguished themselves. We never saw Ambrogetti, and can only speak from what we have heard and read. Report describes him as having been a perfect gentleman in appearance; graceful and easy in every attitude and movement; courtly in manner; gay, hilarious, buoyant, and overflowing with animal spirits. In his acting he displayed that entire self-possession which betokens the consciousness of inward power. His instinct was unfailing, and enabled him to seize on the salient points of any character he was representing, and verify them to the life. He was, moreover, remarkably handsome, and had that variety of expression in his features which is of such vital consequence in a part like Don Giovanni; in short, was a positive rara avis. All we have said of Ambrogetti, may, to a great extent, be affirmed of Tamburini. But personal appearance and refinement of manners would not of themselves necessarily befit an artist for the personification of Don Giovanni without the additional gift of genius. Let us give an illustration. In the scene where Don Giovanni fights and kills the Commendatore, Tamburini, by a few simple gestures, was wont to afford a key to the character of the libertine, clearer and more powerful than a whole host of commentaries. The Commendatore having fallen, pierced by Don Giovanni's sword, Tamburini used to feel his way in the dark to the body, lay his hand upon the heart, lift up the arm, and let it fall, and finding life extinct, kiss his fingers to the corpse in the way of adieu. Genius alone could have hit upon this. So, too, in the tremendous last scene, Tamburini made points that betokened the most subtle and profound conception, or at least an instinct supplying its place. When the statue enters and announces that he has come to avail himself of Don Giovanni's invitation, Tamburini used to walk round him, a candle-stick in hand, as though endeavouring to pierce through the trick which man or devil was playing him; but, finding that the object before him was veritably of stone, seemed awed into belief, and throwing aside the candle confronted his supernatural visitant with undaunted heart and eye that never quailed.

The admirable performance of M. Faure, in his new part at the Royal Italian Opera, has led to the above remarks. The French barytone, in our estimation, has succeeded in giving a more finished and complete version of the character of Don Giovanni than any artist since Tamburini, and it is something to be so far satisfied. If a great deal is wanting, much more has been effected than was anticipated. For years we have been compelled to put up either with mediocrity or absolute unfitness; and now that we have got a thoroughly intelligent artist, who acts becomingly, and sings right well, we should be thankful, and not grumble because neither Ambrogetti nor Tamburini is at hand. A good Don Giovanni is better than no Don Giovanni; and so here is "Long life and Prosperity to M. Faure."

THIS year's celebration of the Niederrheinisches Musik-fest, which has now been established for forty-three years, and has weathered all the storms with which, through political complications, its very existence was threatened, promises to be unusually interesting and brilliant. The programme, dedicated to the works of the greatest classical masters, contains, for the 19th inst. (to-morrow) the Missa Solennis in D major, and the Sinfonia Eroica. The first day, therefore, is devoted to Beethoven, a plan worthy of all commendation. Whether it would not have been advisable to change the order of the pieces, we will not attempt to decide, though experience taught, at the third Gesellschafts-Concert, this year, in Cologne, that one of Beethoven's grandest symphonies (the C minor) did not produce, after the same Mass, a degree of enthusiasm equal to its merits.

The concert on the second day (Monday) commences with Mozart's magnificent Symphony in C major (the one with the fugued finale — nicknamed "Jupiter"). This will be followed by Handel's oratorio of Joshua, which has not been heard at any of the Rhenish festivals since that of 1845, at Düsseldorf. It was first performed at the festival of Cologne, in 1838, when the part of Joshua was sung by Herr Vrugt, an admirable Dutch tenor. The Rhenish public will, therefore, in all probability, welcome with enthusiasm the "table-music" of one of Mozart's symphonies, and the "elephantine tramp" of an oratorio by Handel, and thus, once more, reduce the coryphées of the "post-Beethoven" school to a state of despair.

The chorus and orchestra have always been so excellent at the musical festivals of Aix-la-Chapelle, that we look for the very best results from both on this occasion, especially since they have profited greatly during the last few years, by Herr Wüllner's untiring zeal and talent as a disciplinarian. There is, however, an additional guarantee for the success of this festival, in the person of the conductor, Herr Franz Lachner, General Musical Director at Munich, and in the solo singers, among whom amateurs will be gratified to find Mad. Rübsamen-Veith, Mad. Potthof-Diehl, and Herr Carl Schneider, who, by birth or long residence, belong to the Rhenish provinces.

When it is added that, besides the attractions already mentioned, two of the most popular artists in Germany—Mad. Clara Schumann, and Herr Joseph Joachim—will, on the third day (21st May), delight the public by their truly admirable performances on the piano and violin, we have said enough to convince our pleasure-loving readers that a trip to Aix-la-Chapelle by this night's mail (viâ Dover and Ostend) will—despite Herr Mölder (Bonn is two journeys from Aachen)—be amply repaid in amusement. We English hold our music meetings in brown September, the wiser Teutons theirs in "the green and merry worth of May."

IT is delightful to experience a new sensation — more especially in art, in which the highest excellence is the greatest rarity nowadays. Good actors and good singers are so seldom to be found, and disappointments are of such frequent occurrence, that we have long since relinquished our faith in new-comers on the dramatic or operatic stage, even when the trumpet of fame has been sounded loudest and longest in advance. The cry of "Wolf" has lost all its power, and we quietly determine to trust to nothing but our own eyes and ears. Such were our feelings when we went to the Royal Italian Opera on Tuesday evening to witness the début of Mlle. Patti. We had read about the lady in foreign journals, and had written about her no later than last week; but, although all we had read was highly eulogistic, and though we presented her in the most favourable light to the reader—as far as we were enabled to do, not having heard her, without compromising ourselves—we were by no means sanguine as to the result. The general audience, of course, who knew nothing whatsoever about Miss Adelina Patti, was apathetic in the extreme, and there was not the least excitement manifested. The theatre, though subsequently full, at first, indeed, was badly attended, and little interest or curiosity was betokened for the débutante. A few, however, who learned what had taken place at rehearsal, were anxious and excited, and these were her solitary friends; and so Mlle. Adelina Patti made her first appearance in England with little or no hope or expectation from any feeling previously created in her favour. Never did singer make her début in this country with so little known of her antecedents, and with so little stir made about her beforehand. Generally speaking, a new candidate for lyric and dramatic honours, as soon as announced, becomes the topic in musical circles, and affords matter for speculation in clubs and drawing-rooms. A new "first lady" in the operatic world is a great fact, and subscribers prepare their opera-glasses as astronomers their telescopes on the advent of an unexpected comet. Mlle. Patti, however, had not figured in the programme of the season, and her name had only appeared four days' in advance of her début, and without a single remark in the advertisements. Not only was the young lady unheralded by puff of any kind, but the usual, indeed indispensable, statement as to who she was, and where she came from, was omitted altogether. Did the director, assured of success, follow this unprecedented mode of securing a sensation? Or did he fear for the result, and so hold his peace? We think the latter most probable, as the temptation to disclosure involved in the complete conviction of having something great to exhibit would be almost too much for managerial forbearance. Mlle. Adelina Patti, we may therefore conclude, came out without any extraordinary hope on the part of the director—at all events until after rehearsal, when announcement was too late—and with no expectation on the part of the public.

Never was surprise greater, nor result more triumphant. Mlle. Patti was welcomed with the warmth due to her extreme youth and prepossessing appearance; but there was no enthusiasm. The utmost attention, however, was paid to the recitative preceding Amina's address to her companions, and the first hearing was satisfactory. The young artist for a moment or two betrayed nervousness; but she instantly shook off all fear, as if conscious of her strength, and executed a passage di bravura, which completely electrified the house. The audience was now indeed all ears, and Mlle. Patti's success may be chronicled as a perfect climax, rising from the first scene, and attaining its culminating point in the famous rondo finale, "Ah! non giunge." What our opinions of the débutante are will be found in our notice of the young lady's performance in its proper place. Meanwhile, we may assert emphatically that Italian Opera has obtained an accession of strength in a certain line which we did not expect to witness in our own time. Mlle. Adelina Patti is a triumphant refutation that art and genius have deserted the operatic stage. Having now obtained the legitimate successor of Bosio, Persiani—we were about to add (and why not?) Jenny Lind—why may we not look for another Pasta, Malibran, Catalani, Rubini, Tamburini, Lablache? Why should not the advent of Mlle. Patti fill us with hope for the fortunes of Italian Opera? We may indulge imagination so far. At all events we have experienced a new sensation, and that is something.

R.

FAILURE is too frequently the result of zeal and perseverance in a good cause to be matter of great astonishment. Dr. Mark, who has for many years laboured indefatigably and disinterestedly to promote a taste for music among the rising generation, and, as every one reasonably supposed, was laying the ground-work of a handsome fortune, when he established his Royal College of Music at Manchester, has been forced to succumb to the caprices of the fickle goddess, and is now involved in serious difficulties. These difficulties, however, have been so grossly exaggerated, especially in a report which was published in the Lancaster Gazette, that Dr. Mark had no alternative but to insist upon a rectification of the statements therein furnished. This was acceded to by the Lancaster Gazette so readily as to prove that its managers had been influenced by no motives hostile to Dr. Mark, but had merely given publicity to a very prevalent rumour. In the recantation (which we subjoin) will be found a true account of Dr. Mark's actual position, which cannot fail to excite the sympathy of all who feel interested in the progress of musical education in this country.

"We hasten to express our extreme regret that an erroneous statement should have originated in our columns of last week, respecting the liabilities of the above gentleman. They are not 40,000*l*., as stated, but only about 2,000*l*. We deeply deplore this mistake, the more so—since the report has already reached a wide circulation, and may have a prejudicial effect upon Dr. Mark. We could have no vindictive feelings in publishing so gross a mistake, had we not received information from a party pretending to know Dr. Mark's affairs. We have on the contrary and at all times expressed our full appreciation of the eminent services Dr. Mark is rendering to this country, not only by fostering a love and taste for music amongst the rising generation by his effective system of musical education, but also for the spirit and energy he has displayed in establishing single handed a National Institution in the midst of us, from which he intended to foster branches in every locality in the kingdom. For the last three years he has maintained his large establishment at an annual expenditure of 10,000*l*., having nothing but the receipts of his concerts and the sale of his works to depend upon, and travelling with a number of boys giving concerts and lectures to illustrate his plan practically in every district. It is the insufficiency of these resources that has occasioned this temporary stop in his noble exertions, and we consider it a great pity that so valuable a public institution as the Royal College of Music, likewise the energies of its worthy founder, should be crippled for means and for the want of efficient and annual aid, and when it will be more generally known that Dr. Mark has laboured for the last 15 years, and devoted his honest earnings during that time, amounting to upwards of 100,000*l*. in promoting his scheme, we consider Dr. Mark's present position a most painful and undeserved one. The public is greatly indebted to him for his services; he is the originator of a great national idea, which has already advantageously developed itself in the organisation of numerous juvenile bands since "Dr. Mark and his Little Men" have been known about the country, and we are glad to learn that as soon as Dr. Mark is at liberty, he has fully determined to continue his labours, and we trust that the public will encourage him anew in his novel endeavours, and that he may receive sufficient aid from our wealthy friends, and eventually the reward he so justly merits, both from Her Majesty's government and the people of Great Britain, as a national instructor and a great musical reformer. With these few remarks, and animated by a sense of justice towards Dr. Mark, we sincerely hope that the high respect in which he is held throughout the country will induce all those who have published our first report to insert also this paragraph."

That Dr. Mark may be enabled to surmount his difficulties we sincerely hope. He has proved himself truly the "Children's Friend," and is entitled to unanimous sympathy in his hour of need.

M. Ole Bull, the celebrated violinist, has announced an evening concert on Tuesday, May 28th, at St. James's Hall, when he will be assisted by Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington and Signor Gardoni. Mr. Benedict will conduct.

Crystal Palace.—The National Choral Society will give a performance of Locke's music to Macbeth, on Saturday next, the 25th inst., to be sung by a chorus of 1000 voices, in the great Handel orchestra. A selection of madrigals, part songs and glees, will also be given. Mr. Wilbye Cooper, Mr. Lewis Thomas, and Miss Wilkinson, will take the solo parts, and Mr. G. W. Martin conduct.

ABANDONMENT OF THE LEEDS MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From the "Leeds Express," Saturday, May 18.)

BY ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH viâ BRADFORD.

"THE projected Leeds Musical Festival for 1861 has been abandoned, a resolution to this effect having been passed at a special meeting of the Committee held on Thursday last. The causes which have decided the Committee to take so important a backward step, are — the visit of the Royal Agricultural Society to Leeds a few weeks only prior to the time fixed for holding the Festival; the dulness of trade consequent on the American crisis; the exorbitant demand made by vocalists whose services are considered indispensable; the meeting of the British Association at Manchester during the first week in September, being the identical days of the proposed Leeds Festival; the resignation (from illness) of Mr. Walker Joy, one of the hon. secretaries; and the conduct of the chorus-master with respect to the selection of a chorus. As this question is of considerable importance to the town, and one that is likely to cause no little discussion, we will endeavour, in an impartial and fair spirit, to give our readers some idea of the difficulties with which the Festival Committee were beset, and which have induced them to adopt a course that must produce a baneful effect on our position as a musical town.

"To very few persons will the fact be unknown, that for some years past there have been in existence two musical parties — one ranging itself under the guidance and control of Mr. Spark, organist of the Town Hall, and the other being ruled by Mr. Burton, organist at the parish church. Could that harmonious feeling which generally obtains amongst other professions be instilled into the musical section of a community, a spirit of friendly competition and emulation — not of jealous rivalry — would prevail, to the manifest benefit of the art itself. But, unhappily, rivalry and ill feeling exist in nearly every town large enough to support two sections of musical partisans, and Leeds is by no means an exception to the general rule. We will not stop here to inquire which party is to blame in Leeds for this division, because we are assured that 'much may be said on both sides;' but we had hoped that, in Leeds, as in other large towns where periodical grand musical events take place, the various discordant elements would have united for this occasion in one harmonious whole — all personal considerations being abandoned, and every one using his utmost to secure that benefit and prestige to the town, towards which a successful Musical Festival so much tends.

"Early in the present year the Festival Committee selected Mr. Burton as chorus-master, and he accepted office unconditionally. Following the usual order of things, a Committee was appointed, to whom was entrusted the onerous duty of selecting a chorus of 260 voices, whom Mr. Burton was to rehearse in the choral pieces to be performed at the Festival, the Committee being responsible for the efficiency of the chorus selected. An unwise attempt was made by a portion of the General Committee altogether to exclude Bradford chorus singers from taking any part in the Leeds Festival, because, we understand, that excellent body of voices did not belong to a society called 'The Yorkshire Choral Union,' of which Mr. Burton is the conductor. As it was manifestly unfair, if chorus-singers from other towns were absolutely required, thus to exclude the singers from so large and important a neighbouring town, the General Committee, after mature deliberation, unanimously resolved to engage a portion of the Bradford chorus, and decided that the entire chorus for the Leeds Festival should be selected from the Leeds Madrigal Society, the Leeds Festival Choral Society, the Bradford Festival Choral Society, and the Yorkshire Choral Union, which includes singers from Halifax, Huddersfield, and Sheffield. Lists of competent singers were applied for to each of these societies, and something like 600 names were sent in. Of the Leeds Madrigal Society, comprising 180 members, a selected list of about 80 was forwarded to the Committee, and an equal number was sent in from the Festival Choral Society. The Madrigal Society's singers were guaranteed for efficiency; but they were also willing to undergo any test by an impartial musician — for it was believed from the experience of the previous Festival in 1858, that, however good the members of the Madrigal Society may be, many of them would be rejected, unless some such plan were adopted. The decision of the Committee, therefore, was the only one by which even-handed justice to Leeds singers could be dealt out. The Chorus Committee, which comprised Messrs. E. Wurtzburg, T. Eagland, Walker Joy, J. W. Atkinson, and Julian Marshall, after numerous discussions, unanimously recommended to the General Committee that any chorus singers selected by them, if objected to by the chorus-master, should undergo examination by some eminent and impartial professor of music. When the Committee's decision was made known to Mr. Burton, he declined to have anything to do with the chorus, unless he could also have the entire and sole selection of that body. While thus demanding this extraordinary power, he stated his intention entirely to exclude Bradford singers, and take only about 20 or 25 from the Leeds Madrigal Society! Thus the chorus for the Leeds Festival would comprise every member of the Leeds Festival Choral Society — good, bad, and indifferent — and a few from the Madrigal Society, in all about 100 from our own town; and the remaining 160 from Sheffield, Halifax, and Huddersfield only. This, then, is entirely a matter between the Committee and the chorus-master; and those who characterise it as 'a party question', continue that cry in direct opposition to the facts

"Look at it which way we will, the exclusion of Bradford singers would, in our opinion, be a suicidal policy. It is our interest to keep on friendly terms with so large and important a town, where music is cultivated and encouraged to a larger extent than in any other borough in the county, if we may judge by the Triennial Festivals which have already been given there. The Bradford Festival Choral Society is undoubtedly one of the finest bodies of voices in the kingdom. They have sung at every great festival at the Crystal Palace — one hundred of them having been engaged for the Creation given on the 1st May last with such distinguished success; and they have also sung before the Queen, 'by special command.' In neither Halifax, Huddersfield, nor Sheffield has Leeds so much interest as in Bradford; whilst its contiguity to this town renders the cost of transporting singers thence less expensive than from the places named above. But this chorus dispute would by no means alone have prevented the holding of a Festival, for there is no question whatever that a magnificent body of chorus-singers can be obtained in Leeds, Bradford, and the district, entirely independent of Mr. Burton; and there would not be wanting equally competent persons to rehearse the chorus in a satisfactory manner.

"Touching one or two of the other causes which would be likely to militate against the success of the Festival, we may state that several members of the Committee have from the very first been of opinion that the Royal Agricultural Show coming so near the Festival, would seriously effect the receipts; and it has often been urged that could a series of grand musical performances be arranged during the Agricultural Show, a large sum for charitable purposes would in all probability be secured. Mr. Walker's Joy's resignation is, too, a serious matter, for he is possessed of considerable tact in musical arrangements, and, with the near approach of the Festival, the efforts of every individual member of the Committee would absolutely be needed. The dulness of trade would of course materially injure the Festival; and should the American war continue, its evil effects upon us as a commercial town must assuredly be increased.

"Such, then, are the main reasons upon which the Festival Committee have based their determination to abandon for the present the Leeds Festival. Next year Bradford will hold its fourth Triennial Musical Festival. We must therefore, in all probabili y, wait till 1868 for our second grand musical event, in which year, too, we shall avoid the danger of clashing with the Birmingham Triennal Festival.

"Whilst the above gives a correct statement of the position of affairs, it is right we should state that a communication was made to the Festival Committee on Thursday, to the effect that arrangements were pending by which the differences which have so long existed amongst musical men, will, in all probability, be soon completely healed. None will rejoice more than ourselves should this desideratum be achieved; and no festival will go off with greater éclat than that in Leeds, when every well-wisher to the cause of music uses his utmost efforts to promote the art, and the art alone; and when as we hope, no great counter-attraction, like the Royal Agricultural Show, will interfere with the probabilities of a Festival equalling in grandeur and success the music meeting of 1858.

MR. TENNANT, one of our most successful organisers of "Monster Concerts," has announced his annual entertainment for Monday evening next, at Exeter Hall, which (as on former occasions) will no doubt be thronged to "overflow," by the crowd of music-lovers, anxious to get as much as can by any expedient be obtained for their money. Besides the great contralto-soprano, Alboni (a host in herself), Mr. Tennant has secured (among other well-known artists) Mad. Catherine Hayes, Mad. Ferrari, Mad. Louisa Vinning, Signor Ferrari, Mr. Alberto Laurence, Herr Formes, Mr. Charles Braham (who by the bye, makes his first appearance in England as a barytone, on this occasion), Mr. Charles Hallé and M. Ole Bull. Mr. Tennant always caters liberally for his patrons, and amply deserves the success that has hitherto awaited his public undertakings.

Sacred Harmonic Society.—The performance of Handel's Israel in Egypt on Friday week may be considered on the whole as the finest ever heard in the metropolis, and we are not surprised to find it announced for repetition on the 24th instant. In no other oratorio does the success depend so little upon the solos and so entirely upon the choruses, and it reflects the highest credit upon their talented chief, Mr. Costa, to say that from beginning to end the singing was marked by a degree of unwavering precision, certainty of intonation, with due attention to every modulation of piano or forte that must have satisfied the most critical. One of the most remarkable displays, to our mind, was the wonderfully suggestive chorus, "He sent a thick darkness," which, although it did not command an encore, as in the case of the well-known "Hailstone" chorus, was nevertheless one of the most effective bits of singing throughout. But, grand as was the singing of the chorus and playing of the orchestra, there were yet other triumphs in store, and none greater than Mr. Sims Reeves's magnificent declamation of the trying air, "The enemy said I will pursue," in which the great tenor fairly surpassed himself, rousing to enthusiasm an audience that set at defiance the conventional etiquette of Exeter Hall, and called for its repetition with a unity of purpose which would take no denial, Mr. Reeves repeated the air, with, if possible, additional effect, and seldom have we heard anything more spontaneous than the applause which greeted his renewed exertions with so much justice. The soprano has but little to do in Israel in Egypt; but the one air, "Thou didst blow," was sung by Mlle. Parepa with all her accustomed skill, while the contralto music found a representative in Mad. Sainton-Dolby, whom it would be difficult to excel, either in purity of style or dignity of manner. The somewhat boisterous duet, "The Lord is a man of war," is but too frequently treated as a mere vehicle for displaying the shouting capabilities of two rival bass singers, whose only object appears to be the mutual drowning of each other's voices. In this instance an agreeable exception was found, as its delivery fell to the lot of Signor Belletti and Mr. Santley, both artists in the full sense of the term, and as we never heard the duet go better, were not surprised at the very genuine encore which it elicited. The Hall was densely crowded in every part.

Philharmonic Society.—We annex the programme of the fifth concert.

Part I.—Sinfonia in C, No. 1 (Beethoven); Recit. and aria, "Zum Lieden," Mad. Rieder, Zauberflöte (Mozart); Fantasia appassionata, violin, M. Vieuxtemps (Vieuxtemps); Scena and romanza, Signor Delle Sedie, Maria Padilla (Donizetti); Overture, Freischütz (Weber).

Part II.—Sinfonia in G minor (Mozart); Aria, Signor Delle Sedie, "Deh, vieni alla finestra" (Mozart); Concerto in D minor, pianoforte, Signor Nacciarone (Mendelssohn); Duet, "Ai Capricci," Mad. Rieder and Signor Delle Sedie (Rossini); Overture, L' Alcade de la Vega, (Onslow).—Conductor: Professor Sterndale Bennett, Mus. D.

The reputation of the Society is in good hands when such performances as the one under consideration are by no means extraordinary events in its career. Two masterpieces of the art were never given with more exactitude of tempo, more delicate attention to the nicer orchestral effects, nor with more energy and spirit. The overtures were played with tremendous effect, the ultra-dramatic Der Freischütz particularly. M. Vieuxtemps played his well-known "Fantasia appassionata" with musicianly skill and artistic expression. Of Signor Nacciarone we cannot speak altogether favourably. He is wanting in the simplicity of manner that our better known pianists of England and Germany possess, and which invests their playing with so much real worth and so many charms. The singing of Signor Delle Sedie wants nothing that an artist should have. He is naturally gifted and artistically cultivated. His delivery of "Deh vieni" was pure and legitimate dramatic art; and was londly redemanded. Mad. Rieder improves in many ways. To the energy and accomplishments of Dr. Bennett we may mainly attribute the success of this one of the best performances of the season.

Monday Popular Concerts.—Mr. Sims Reeves's Benefit.—The announcement of Mr. Sims Reeves upon an ordinary occasion is a tower of strength to any concert-giver, for there is perhaps no other singer, native or foreign, who is so great a favourite of the public, and no single name exercises so powerful an attraction as that of the eminent tenor, whom Englishmen may well be proud to claim as their countryman. Although the ground-work of the great and unprecedented success of the Monday Popular Concerts must undoubtedly be attributed to the instrumental music with which it has been the means of familiarising its attendants, still the vocal element must be credited with its share, and as Mr. Sims Reeves has upon so many occasions contributed his services and introduced so many compositions whose intrinsic merit render them most welcome and valuable additions to our store of really good chamber songs, we think he did wisely in associating his benefit with a series of concerts whose achievements are amongst the most remarkable even in this musical age. Mr. Reeves has the good fortune to possess a voice of a quality so beautiful that it may be said to be almost exceptional in its character, combining as it does the most perfect sweetness with a power altogether unrivalled among tenors, a register of most extensive compass, and a thorough knowledge of music, which enables its possessor to turn these great natural advantages to the best possible account. It is not in singing any particular class of music that Mr. Sims Reeves's speciality consists, his capability is universal; and whether in sacred, operatic or chamber compositions, he is equally at home, standing confessedly a master in each and every style. Three solos and a duet afforded Mr. Reeves's admirers an opportunity of appreciating his quality, and most thoroughly was each piece enjoyed. Cimarosa's aria, "Pria che spunti," from Il Matrimonio Segreto, a song of Kücken's, "Twilight is darkening," so charmingly sung as to cause its repetition to be insisted upon, and the two last verses given again, were Mr. Reeves's contributions to the first part. But the greatest treat was reserved for the second; and those of our readers who have heard how Mr. Reeves can sing the "Adelaide," and how Miss Arabella Goddard can play the accompaniment, may imagine the combined effect of two such artists—each unrivalled. To those who have not had the good fortune, any attempt by mere words to convey the impression would be hopeless—the English language is limited, and we have but one word in our vocabulary that can apply, and that word we need hardly say is—perfection. The duet of Nemorino and Belcore, 'Venti scudi,' from l'Elisir d'Amore, by Mr. Reeves and Mr. Santley, terminated the vocal portion of the programme, before dismissing which we must render our just tribute of praise to the latter gentleman for the admirable manner in which he sang Henry Smart's charming song, "Sleep, heart of mine," and Schubert's no less charming song, "As o'er the Alps," the last being unanimously encored. There was but one instrumental solo, Handel's well-known suite de pièces, containing "The Harmonious Blacksmith," rendered with all that delicacy of expression, suppleness of finger, and thorough command of all the resources of the piano, of which Miss Arabella Goddard is so completely a mistress. A hearty recall rewarded the efforts of the accomplished pianist. In Dussek's sonata in B flat, Miss Goddard enjoyed the co-operation of Herr Straus, whose neat and finished execution was also evinced in the quartets with which the concert began and ended, Schubert's, in A minor, op. 29, and Mozart's, in D major, op. 10, both compositions of sterling worth, the latter being given for the first time here. The Hall was crammed to overflowing. On May 27th, M. Vieuxtemps announces his benefit and last appearance, the vocalists being Miss Banks and Mr. Sims Reeves, and Miss Arabella Goddard the pianist.

Crystal Palace.—At the second opera concert, on Friday week, Madame Grisi made her first appearance this season. Her voice, though showing signs of wear and tear, has lost none of its charm, and the first movement of "Qui la voce" was listened to by a very numerous and fashionable company with great delight. The cabaletta was delivered in that perfect manner which has for years been Madame Grisi's characteristic, though, perhaps, only less brilliant than when it issued in time past from the same lips. The prima donna's other song was "Home, sweet home." It was sung in English, and was encored. A similar compliment was bestowed upon "The last rose of summer," by Mlle. Titiens. Mlle. Titiens also sang "Casta diva," and joined Signor Giuglini in the duet from I Martiri. Signor Giuglini sang the aria "M' appari," from Martha, and, in the second part of the concert, sang "La donna è mobile," to which his style is not well suited. Signor Belletti gave Mozart's "Questi avventurier" admirably, and his excellent singing was also brought to bear upon the song from Balfe's Falstaff, which he introduced at the concert of the Musical Society. The instrumental music consisted of the overtures to Der Freischütz, William Tell, and La Nuit de Noel (Reber), with two cornet solos by Herr Kosleck, a member of the King of Prussia's private band, and a very clever performer. The chorus were not employed in any operatic finale or concerted piece, but sang Horsley's glee, "See the chariot at hand," and the market chorus from Masaniello.

If not nominally Saturday's was really a winter concert. The removal of the concert-room enclosure has proved premature, chilling blasts being still the rule rather than the exception. The day was not only cold but dismally wet. Consequently we were not surprised that the audience should have been smaller than was proportionate to the merits of the concert. The attraction, indeed, was of the highest order, and included the party which has been recently touring in the provinces under the auspices of Mr. Willert Beale, Mad. Alboni, Mlle. Sedlatzek, Mr. Land, Sig. Coselli, and Miss Arabella Goddard. To these were added Miss Helen McLeod and Signor Giulio Regondi. Mad. Alboni, who was enthusiastically received every time she made her appearance, sang the aria from Semiramide, "Eccomi alfin in Babylonia!" magnificently, and the brindisi from Lucrezia Borgia as magnificently in its way, the latter being encored but not repeated. She also sang, with Mlle. Sedlatzek, a Venetian duo by Goldberg, joined in the quintett, "Pour les attraits," from Niedermeyer's Marie Stuart, and sang one of the solos in a new Italian national hymn, by Arditi, a simple composition of a decidedly military order. The great contralto was in her most superb voice, and was never listened to with more breathless attention, nor ever afforded more unmitigated delight. Miss M'Leod gave Balfe's "Power of Love" with a good deal of expression. Miss Arabella Goddard played Weber's concerto in E flat with exceeding brilliancy, and in the second part of the concert charmed every one with Mr. Benedict's new fantasia, "Albion," for the encore of which she played Thalberg's "Home, sweet home," which drew down thunders of applause. Signor Cosselli, amongst other things, rattled off the buffo song from Cenerentola with volubility that well-nigh distanced the band. The overtures to Semiramide and La Perle de Bresil (Félicien David) were admirably played, and Signor Regondi exhibited his wonderful executive powers in his own morceau de concert, "Les Oiseaux."

HERR ADOLPH SCHLOESSER'S evening concert — a very capital entertainment — took place at the Hanover Square Rooms, on Thursday evening. There were several new pieces by the concert-giver, in the programme, and, doubtless, the many friends and patrons of the talented pianist were as desirous to hear his compositions as to hear him play. The concert opened with a new quartet, by Herr Schloesser, for piano and stringed instruments, executed to perfection by the composer, M. Vieuxtemps, Mr. R. Blagrove, and Signor Piatti — a work of ambitious design and real merit, which would have found more favour had it not lasted one entire hour. The other compositions introduced by the concert-giver were, Fantaisie de Concert, for the piano, on Guillaume Tell, admirably played by himself; and three vocal pieces: —trio, "Ave Maria," sung by Mlles. Parepa and Behrens and Signor Gardoni; two German lieder, by Mlle. Behrens; and a sacred song, "He that keepeth Israel," by Mlle. Parepa. The trio was, perhaps, the most favourable specimen of Herr Schloesser's talents in vocal composition, being both melodious and skilfully written for the voices. Herr Schloesser's "classic" taste was exhibited in Beethoven's duo with variations for piano and violoncello, which he performed with "the incomparable" Signor Piatti, and which met with well-merited success. Herr Schloesser's talents as a pianist were further tested in a Nocturne by Chopin, in Liszt's arrangement of the march from Tannhäuser, and in Vieuxtemps and Wolff's brilliant duo for violin and piano, on Don Giovanni, played with the magnificent Belgian violinist himself. From the vocal performances we may single out Signor Gardoni's "Adelaida"—as a chaste and artistic rendering of that exquisitely beautiful song—as worthy special praise.

HERR SIGISMUND BLUMNER, a recent addition to our list of foreign pianists and professors from the Conservatorium at Berlin, gave a grand orchestral concert at the Hanover Square Rooms, on Wednesday evening. He was assisted by Madame Lemmens-Sherrington and Mr. Walter Bolton, vocalists, and by Herr Ernst Pauer and M. Vieuxtemps, instrumentalists. Henselt's pianoforte concerto, Op. 16, played by Herr Blumner, was not heard for the first time in this country, although stated so in the bills. It is a lengthy, dry, and elaborate work, but being executed with great skill and vigour, found favour with some part of the audience. Herr Blumner is entitled to praise for the introduction of a work of so much pretension, by a composer who enjoys no mean reputation in his own country, though known principally in England by his minor contributions to the pianoforte. Moreover, the concerto had already been deemed worthy of a place in one of the programmes of the New Philharmonic Concerts, some two or three years since, when Herr Klindworth played the pianoforte part. Herr Blumner's other performances were a prelude and fugue, by Bach; a prelude by Chopin; "triolino" and "allegro de concert," by Charles Mayer; a mazurka of his own composition; and Robert Schumann's variations for two pianos, with Herr Pauer. The pianoforte pieces were varied with a solo on the violin by M. Vieuxtemps. Madame Sherrington sang an air by Pacini, "Vedrai carino," and "My long hair is braided," from the Amber Witch; and Mr. Walter Bolton (primo tenore from the Italian Opera at Lisbon, according to the bills), with a pleasing tenor voice, the air, "Caro imagine," from Il Flauto Magico, and the romance, "Tutti m' appari," from Martha. The band, which was under the direction of Mr. Alfred Mellon, and was selected from the Philharmonic and Royal Italian Opera orchestras, executed Beethoven's overtures to Prometheus in first-rate style.

M. SAINTON'S second soirée was attended by a numerous and brilliant audience, who evinced marked satisfaction at the excellent programme provided for them. Mozart's quartet in C, No. 6 (one of the set dedicated to Haydn), with which the concert opened, is now tolerably familiar to the public, thanks to the Monday Popular Concerts, to which the lovers of good music are also indebted for the introduction of the Beethoven quartet (so called posthumous) in A minor, No. 16 (Query 15). Both were rendered in a style which fairly left nothing to desire, the executants being MM. Sainton (who has so often distinguished himself in these two quartets), Bezeth, Doyle, and Piatti, the first and last-named gentlemen joining Mad. Piatti in a trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello by Rubinstein. Mad. Piatti also contributed solos, including one of Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne worte," and Chopin's "Valse Brillante" in A flat, while the marvellous talent of her husband was shown in Schubert's "Ave Maria" and a "Bergamosca," the latter Signor Piatti's own composition. Two songs, "Sleep, dearest, sleep!" by Randegger, and "The days that are no more," by Blumenthal, besides an aria from Handel's opera, Il Radamisto—the last two for the first time of performance—constituted Mad. Sainton-Dolby's share of the programme, and when we say that our justly-admired contralto was in excellent voice, and sung with all that artistic feeling and expression of which she is so consummate a mistress, our readers can quite understand that the effect produced was in the highest degree gratifying.

MLLE. DE VILLAR'S CONCERT. — This affair came off on Friday evening, the 10th, and attracted a large and fashionable attendance. Mlle. de Villar, who is well known as a soprano singer of high excellence — first introduced to the public, if we mistake not, by Mr. John Hullah, at St. Martin's Hall — sang the grand aria from Ernani, "Ernani, involami;" German lied, "Oh Bitt ench Liebe Vögelein;" "The power of Love;" Schifferlied, by Fesca; besides joining Mr. George Perren in the duet "Sulla tomba" from Lucia, and taking part in Mr. Henry Leslie's trio "Memory," with Miss Palmer and Mr. George Perren, in all displaying an agreeable voice and good style. Among the other vocal performers, Herr Hermanns created the greatest sensation, eliciting an uproarious encore in Boieldieu's air "Mein Gebot soll man hier," from Jean de Paris, and in Falstaff's Trinklied, from Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor. Mr. John Francis Barnett was encored in Thalberg's introduction and variations on the Elisir d'Amore — a very brilliant performance; and played three sketches of his own composing. Mr. Balsir Chatterton executed a fantasia on the harp, accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. W. H. Holmes, and Herr Lidel played two solos on the violoncello. Herr Wilhelm Ganz was conductor.

NEW WORK FOR STUDENTS.

THE most important CADENCES and MODULATIONS through the MAJOR and MINOR keys, with HARMONISED SCALES, composed for the pianoforte, harmonium, or organ, by IMMANUEL LIEBICH, is just published, price 3s., by Duncan Davison and Co., 244 Regent Street, W.

"MAY."—New Duettino, by HENRY SMART, composed for equal Voices. Price 2s. 6d.

"Mr. Henry Smart, in this melodious and truly exquisite little duet, has, if possible, even surpassed in elegance and vocal finish, the pieces so warmly eulogised in our last impression."—Musical World.

London; Duncan Davison and Co., 244 Regent Street, W.

"THE KNIGHT'S VIGIL," by W. H. WEISS, composed and sung by the composer, with the greatest success, as well as by Mr. WINN and other vocalists of celebrity, is published, handsomely illustrated, price 3s., by Duncan Davison and Co., 244 Regent Street, W.

"The song of Mr. Weiss is as bold, vigorous, and unaffected as anything we have seen from his pen, and if sung frequently in public, likely to become a formidable rival to his very popular setting of Professor Longfellow's 'Blacksmith.' The adventurous knight could hardly watch his armour in the chapel to more manly and congenial strains. The coloured lithograph on the title-page is in good keeping with the theme, and the erect and stalwart figure of the new-made chevalier, might easily pass for that of Sir Tor, Sir Sagramore, or Sir Dodinas le Savage."—Musical World.

NEW HARP MUSIC, by CHARLES OBERTHUR.—Reichardt's popular song, "Thou art so near, and yet so far," transcribed for HARP SOLO by C. OBERTHUR, is just published, price 3s., by Duncan Davison and Co., 244 Regent Street, W.

BACH'S PRELUDE and FUGUE, ALLA TARANTELLA, As played by Miss ARABELLA GODDARD,

Is published, for the Pianoforte, price 5s., by Duncan Davison and Co., 244 Regent Street, W.

"The above composition, played by Miss Arabella Goddard at the Monday Popular Concerts, is one of the most individual, remarkable, and difficult pieces ever composed for a keyed instrument, and as practice for the fingers of both hands it is particularly recommended. An uninterrupted succession of running passages in the fugue gives to both hands equal strength and facility."

Evans's Ten-Guinea

HARMONIUM

Is in a solid, handsome French-polished Case, and possesses that rich and organ-like quality of tone which particularly distinguishes these Instruments from the French.—BOOSEY and CHING, Manufacturers, 24 Holles Street, Oxford Street, W.

Evans's English

HARMONIUMS;

WITH TWO ROWS OF KEYS,

At 45 and 63 Guineas, without Pedals, and 47 and 130 Guineas, with Pedals,

Although particularly adapted for Churches, are equally effective in the Drawing-room. Not only have the leading members of the profession, including Messrs. Sterndale Bennett, Balfe, Potter, Henry Smart, Best, &c., but the Clergy and the Press have also testified to the very great superiority of EVANS'S HARMONIUMS. These Testimonials may be seen upon reference to Boosey and Ching's Illustrated Catalogue of Harmoniums.

The whole of EVANS'S INSTRUMENTS possess that organ-like quality of tone which has been hitherto unattained by any other manufacturer, and are made throughout in the strongest and most substantial manner by the best "ENGLISH WORKMEN." They are neither affected by heat nor damp.

Reviews.

"Would I could centre all my thoughts in thee"—words by M. Deigh, music by Frederic Clay (Addison, Hollier and Lucas).

Whoever heard this ballad sung by Mr. Wilbye Cooper, at one of the concerts of Mr. Henry Leslie's choir, must remember it with pleasure, as a graceful and truly musician-like setting of words by no means its equal in purity. Mr. M. Deigh's hero, or interlocutor, or at any rate locutor, is an arrant coxcomb. Hear his conceit:—

"Would I could centre all my thoughts in thee,
Would that a simpler, truer heart were mine,
Would I could love thee as thou lovest me,
And seek to gain no other smile than thine!
Would I could deem thee fairest, best of all,
As once when thou wert all my hope and pride,
Gladly would I those blissful days recall,
And seek no happiness but by thy side!

I know thou lov'st me with a love as pure
As ever burnt in gentle woman's heart,
And that thy fond affection will endure
While life remains, so good and true thou art.
Then be it mine with earnest will to strive
To teach this erring heart no more to rove,
Blest by thy smile, for ever may I live,
Faithful to thee, more worthy of thy love."

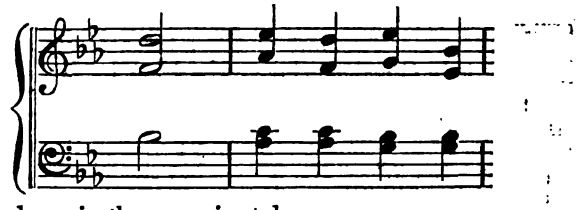
The silly fellow! We should like to hear the lady's answer. Mr. Clay's music is much too good for such Brummagem-French sentiment as this. The song is almost irreproachable. We say almost, because, in our opinion, one progression might be improved:—

But this may, after all, be a question of taste. Mr. Francesco Berger would, doubtless, quote some license for it in Mr. Macfarren's book on harmony.

"The People's Tune Book"—by Lowell Mason, Mus. Doc. (Sampson Low, Son and Co.)

"The People's Tune Book" is, as the title sets out, "a class-book of church music for choirs, congregations, and singing schools." The preface contains some sensible remarks on the utility of music in church services, and advocates the application of art to the ends of religion, in contradistinction to the application of religion to the ends of art. The author seems to believe that too much is thought of art, and too little of religion. Psalmody is looking up, however; but much remains to be done. Of course, "The People's Tune Book" (the old song) is to do it. It is designed "for singing-schools established especially for the purpose of improvement, not in singing merely, but in the service of song in the house of the Lord." So is every old hymn-book extant, and every new hymn-book that appears. Mr. Mason's work is, at all events, voluminous, comprising (preface and index taken in) no less than 304 pages of letter-press and music-type. There are a good many new tunes, and among the best (old and new) we may single out Shawmut, Barby, Belt, Albec and Aknal, Cave, Cliff and Cole, Duke Street, Ell and Effen, Eutah and Ellard, Fleet Street and Ganges, Glen, Iosco, Kane and Kitto, Janeway and Lyte, Mead and Mear, Oak, Naul, Ocean and Olivet, Ord, Ovio and Oyson, Pekin, Pike, and Phuvah, Shorne, Praise, Pisgah, Shining Shore and Silver Street, Toplady, Tyng, Trumpet, Tully and Tytherton, Wayne and Welt, Winner and Wisner, Zane, Worth and Zebulon, Vail, Vital Spark and the Old Hundredth. To cite a specimen or two, "Pekin," the work of Mr. William Mason, sets off quite in the masonic style:—

continues in the masonic style:—



and winds up in the masonic style:—

"Strand" is also the work of Mr. William Mason. This too, is in the masonic style. Hear the second section:—

[Take notice:—The first line stands for tenor, and sounds an octave lower; the second line for alto, and sounds as it is written; the third line for soprano, and sounds an octave higher; the fourth line for bass, standing where it sounds, and sounding where it stands.]

Dr. Lowell Mason's contributions ("legion") to the "People's Tune Book" have none of this ultra-masonic tendency. "Shawmut" is as simple as a hammer; so is "Oak" (which, however, might not pass in the University of Chirk); so is "Olivet."

"'Malbrook,' mélodie historique pour piano"—par Ferdinand Praeger (Ashdown and Parry).

Herr Praeger has done military justice upon the air upon which Beethoven did military justice in his Battle of Vittoria; only Herr Praeger has executed seriously that which his predecessor executed comically.

"'Valse Caprice,' pour violon, violoncelle, et piano,"—par Auguste Ergmann, Op. 15 (Ashdown and Parry).

The motive of the waltz is extremely graceful and cleverly developed. The instruments are in each instance well suited, and the whole makes an agreeable and effective trio for the drawing-room — we beg pardon, salon.

"'La Speranza,' aria poesia di METASTASIO, posta in musica" dall' HONORABLE MRS. GREVILLE (Duncan Davison and Co., London; presso di G. G. Guidi, Firenze).

It is a long time since we have seen so many Italian words on an English cover as on the English cover of the Italian air "dall' Honorable Mrs. Greville." La "Speranza," nevertheless, is pretty and singable; so is "Quando nascente il dolce sorriso," a canzonet (same publishers), both words (Italian words) and music "dall' Honorable Mrs. Greville;" so is "La Costanza," another canzonet "dall' Honorable Mrs. Greville," the words of which are by nobody, or at least by nobody with a name.

"Sketch for the Organ," No. 2—by JAMES GATTIE (J. H. Jewell).

"No. 2" is better than either "No. 1" or "No. 3," inasmuch as it is more definite and less incoherently rambling. "No. 2" is in C major, while "No. 1" and "No. 3" are in no key whatever; another point in favour of "No. 2." "No. 2," moreover, is refreshingly curt; while "No. 1" and "No. 3" are sinuously lengthy; yet another point in favour of "No. 2." "No. 2"——but enough of "No. 2."

"An Address to Bees"—music by FREDERIC C. ATKINSON (Joseph Williams).

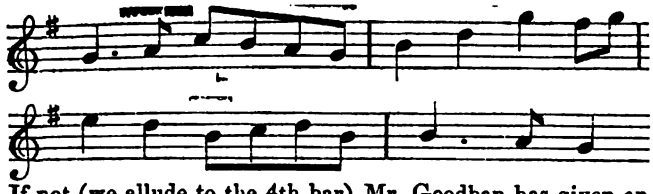
The anonymous poet upon whose high-poised line Mr. Frederic C. Atkinson has hung out his musical ideas to air, apostrophises the bees, as "Ye musical hounds;" and farther on tells them that "the souls of the flowers" are their "viands." This is a trifle in "Ercles' vein;" but to "make up," Mr. Atkinson's music is lively and pretty (if not perplexingly original).

"Good News from Home," for the pianoforte—by HENRY W. GOODBAN (Ashdown and Parry).

A graceful and effective, showy, and at the same time easy arrangement, with short introduction and brilliant variation, of one of the most popular (though not most new—"Thou art so near, and yet so far," by Herr Reichardt, to wit) melodies sung by Christy's Minstrels. One progression, however, demands reconsideration:—

'The Minstrel Boy"—by HENRY W. GOODBAN (Ashdown and Parry).

Is the following a correct version of the Irish melody (the "Moreen")?



If not (we allude to the 4th bar) Mr. Goodban has given an incorrect version of the Irish melody (the "Moreen"). In what page of Mr. Macfarren's book on Harmony will Mr. Francisco Berger find a licence for the subjoined?

And for the subjoined?

When the foregoing questions are resolved, we are resolved to recommend this "Minstrel Boy" as a really clever "transcription, out of which, too, with small mechanical appliance, considerable effect may be obtained.

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARISIAN MANAGERS have made up their minds to give no heed to the warning of the Psalmist—"Place not thy faith in princes." On the contrary, it seems the fashion for Dukes and Princes, instead of patronising managers, to be patronised by them. What a pity it is that nature should be so unworldly as to bestow her gifts without respect to rank and titles, and that laurel crowns and jewelled diadems do not, by equal title, cincture the same brows. Unfortunately, however, inspiration is not even impartially breathed upon all classes of mortals alike, but absolutely seems to shun the turres regum, and haunt preferentially pauperum tabernas. It is on positive evidence the Muses affect low company. This is all à propos of a new comic opera which Prince Poniatowski has had performed at the Théâtre Lyrique, under the title of Au travers du Mur. The subject seems to have been selected to prove the truth of the saying, "The weakest goes to the wall;" for a very weak and commonplace vapid and villanous affair it is. Princeish decidedly—not princely. The best things were old—which is not extraordinary, by the way—the "Poniatowski gems" are antiques. The thing was produced on the occasion of a farewell benefit taken by M. Bataille, the celebrated barytone, the predecessor of M. Faure, and original representative of Pierre in L'Etoile du Nord. M. Bataille leaves the Théâtre Lyrique to return to the Salle Favart. On the same occasion the third act of Glück's Armide was given, with Mad. Viardot in the character of the enchantress. Here, music, acting and singing were princely, not princeish. Mad. Viardot acted and sang splendidly; her expression, gestures, and attitudes were Rachelesque, and her voice seemed to recover the force and brilliancy of youth, so thoroughly was she the enchantress. After this came the third act of the Sonnambula, a very different affair, indeed, but in its way, with Mad. Vandenheuvel-Duprez as the Amina, quite as good.

At the Grand Opéra, after incessant groans of parturition, we have been at last presented with David's Herculanum. It did not take so long to disinter the buried city itself. On the first night of the revival all the dilettante world was assembled. The principal parts were filled by Mad. Gueymard-Lauters, M. Obin, and Mad. Fortunata de Franco (née Tedesco). The last played the part of Olympia, originally assigned to Mad. Borghi-Mamo, and acquitted herself with complete success. Mad. Gueymard-Lauters was applauded to the echo in Lilia, and called before the curtain at the end of the second act. Owing to this lady's indisposition, the work of Félicien David was not repeated again till Monday last. Der Freischütz is to be the next revival, and it is already in hand.

The Italian Opera closed its doors for the season on the 1st of May, and the troupe is now dispersed over every land, as at the fall of another Babel. Tenors, sopranos, barytones, basses, contraltos, birds of many a tuneful passage, have taken wing in all directions, like frighted wild fowl. Zucchini is to Bologna gone—his own, his native land—the realm of sausage and of song; Mad. Penco and Signor Graziani have crossed the British Channel in search of the golden fleece which Albion ever yields to foreign adventure. Signor Mario has quitted Paris for London, and so has Mad. Grisi. Not so Signor Badiali, who goes I know not where. The theatrical sheet, l'Entr'acte, publishes the financial and statistical reckoning of the past season, which is summed up as follows:—The total number of performances was 121, the highest number hitherto reached. Of these Rossini had for his share 31; Verdi, for his, 49; Bellini came off with 11; Donizetti with 5; and 5, too, was Flotow's share; Mozart's 8, and Cimarosa's a like number. The number of operas performed was 19. The total receipt from the 121 performances was 809,819fr. 95c., giving an average nightly receipt of 6,692fr. 72c.

The Opéra Comique holds out, in expectancy, a new work, the joint production of M. Rosier and M. Limnander, in which the principal part will be allotted to M. Montaubry. M. Bataille is to make his reappearance in La Fée aux Roses, an opera by Halévy. Mad. Viardot had a benefit at the Théâtre Lyrique last night, the attractions being of the most remarkable description. The fragments, namely, of the second, third and fourth acts of Alceste, which created so great a sensation at the last concert of the Conservatoire; following these the third act of Otello, sung by Duprez and Mad. Viardot; the first act of Maria Stuarda, with Mad. Ristori next; then a new opéra comique — first time—called Le Buisson Vert, by M. Michel Carré as to words, and M. Gastinel as to music, M. Jules Petit, prizeman for singing and opéra comique this year at the Conservatoire, playing the principal rôle; the whole concluding with Les Rendezvous Bourgeois.

Now to unpack my budget of dramatic news. There has been at the Gymnase a new comedy of the severe (severe is the word) old-fashioned school, entitled La Vertu de Célimène. The author, M. Meilhac, while donning the stiff conventional garb of rhymed comedy, manages to retain some little life and truth of colour, for which the audience testify their gratitude nightly. At the Vaudeville, a broad, little piece, called Les Mystères de la Rue Rousselet, has had a side-shaking success. It is by MM. Labiche and Marc Michel, who have a patent for the manufacture of what the manager of the Adelphi forcibly denominates "screamers." MM. Numa and Parade are the interpreters of their fun on this occasion. L'Ambigu has just produced Alexandre Dumas' drama of Angèle. This establishment seems bent on resuscitating the entire repertoire of the famous "Drames" of our youth. Would it could recall the innocent state of mind which allowed us to be moved, to quail, and shudder at their sublime effects. Poor Albert Smith, peace to his manes, alone, had he survived, could have now enjoyed the Tour de Nesle, his earliest love, with all the ecstasy of his Quartier Latin days; but his guileless nature preserved the tastes of boyhood with wonderful persistency. What he was at Merchant Taylors' that he was at the Egyptian Hall. Pardon, if I have strayed in the Elysian Fields of another world after the shade of an old comrade. Here I am back again in the Champs Elysées of this, where, for the delectation of mortals yet of the earth, has been opened a new theatre, le Théâtre Féerique, in the structure formerly occupied by the Bouffes Parisiens. The opening night witnessed the production of a new operette, called Un Eclat de Trompette, the authors being MM. Lefebvre and Gérard, and the composer M. Debillemont. The principal part was played by Mlle. Désirée, the clever soubrette, erst of the Palais Royal. Beside her appeared M. Gustave Vierine, a young barytone of promise, Mlle. Jenny Kid (of all artistic Jennies commend me to this "Kid"), and M. Touroul. There was a féerie prologue to follow, more amusing in the promise on the bills than in the performance on the boards. Now I am in those happy purlieus, let me dally here an instant to breathe the unwonted balm of the late come spring—for at last that unholy marriage of May and January, which has chilled us all to the marrow, has been dissolved by the ruling of that upright judge, Sir Apollo Sol. May, liberated from her unnatural bondage, rushes, garlanded with lilac and laburnum, over the bush-sward into the rosy arms of June, who steps forward to meet her. Who shall sing the epithalamium—who celebrate the happy second marriage of buxom widow May in strains of auspicious harmony? Sing, O Musard! flourish thy trumpets, clash thy cymbals, wake the tightened parchment dear to the ears of the martial Gaul! Open thy concert, mingle thy airs with the airs of heaven, turn over the leaves of thy music-books amidst the rustling leaves of overshadowing trees, and teach the feathered choristers that inhabit them to abhor Wagner and warble rhythmically. This frenzied exordium, worthy of Buffalmacco the Ruthless (vide "Septem Filii Mammonis apud Templaria Porta"), is prelude to an egg and butter. It merely leads up to the homely fact that as "summer is y cumen in," the Musard Concerts, which are held al fresco, have commenced, and though the evenings are yet somewhat austere, the foule—as the French, not inaptly, calls a crowd—gathers in tolerable numbers about the orchestra. With the opening of these popular concerts coincides, of course, the termination of the concert season in its true sense. The last art-concert was given by M. Léon Kreutzer at the Conservatoire. M. Kreutzer is one of the best musical critics of the present day, and in his practice as a composer upholds the high and pure views of art which his writings teach. His symphony in B flat, the work of a thorough master of his art, was executed on this occasion, and a grand concerto for the piano, played by Mad. Massart. There were also several graceful melodies sung by Mlle. Marie Cico. The concert was numerously attended, and most of the connoisseurs were present.

There has been some talk of another Orpheonist expedition to London for another Orpheonist festival, but it has been put off, wisely, I think, seeing how badly the first was managed. Instead, there is to be a festival of the Choral Societies of France, at the Palais d'Industrie, at the end of September.

Put in your old maids' corner, that Aristocracy has again honoured itself by a matrimonial alliance with Art, Duke Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, a colonel of infantry, having been married last month to Mlle. Constance Geiger, whom I am unable to describe under any single head of art cultivation, for she composed, sang, danced, played the piano, acted, all indifferently alike, and alike indifferently; for what is true of a Jack-of-all-trades, applies equally to a Jill. However, she is now a duchess, and as duchesses go, no doubt a very accomplished one.—A new claimant has arisen to the authorship of the Marseillaise Hymn. The Gazette de Cologne declares that Rouget de l'Isle copied the air, to which he adapted his strophes from the "Credo" in a solemn mass composed by one Holtzman, a German. Thus, then, it would seem that the French Revolution was accomplished to a German tune instead of a a French one. This is a very doubtful story, and when repeated who alone will answer "Credo"?—His Excellency the Minister of State has just ordered a marble copy of the bust of Auber, by Dantan-Jeune, now exhibiting at the Palais d'Industrie. It is to be presented to the Conservatoire.—The usual monthly account of the gross receipts from all the theatres and public entertainments has been published for April. It is as follows:—

	Francs.
Imperial Theatres, subventioned	560,723·63
Second-rate Theatres	849,669·90

Giving Gye a Lift.—Describing the début last week of Mlle. Patti, whose performance seemed to promise us a second Jenny Lind, one of the critics made a remark that she "raised the house en masse to a high pitch of excitement." On reading this, the Wiscount, who chanced to be just then in one of his facetious moods, observed to his friend Bernal, "Raised the house, did she? Why really, then, she must be quite a hoister Patti!"—Punch.

Tannhauser Redivivus.—As soon as the fiasco of Tannhäuser was made known, (says a Wolfenbuttel leaf,) on the Rhine, the people were in arms—musically speaking. At Mayence the telegraphic despatch was awaited with anxiety, and when the result was known, the people demanded the performance of Tannhäuser, and encored every note.—Tannhäuser Fudge.

Letters to the Editor.

MR. BENNETT GILBERT AND THE "IDYLLS."

SIR,—In justice to myself and to my reputation, allow me emphatically to disclaim all connection with the three "Idylls," "Elaine," "Enid," and "Vivien." I wrote mine at the request of the publisher, without having the least idea of their existence.

At the same time, I beg to inform your correspondent "Alpha," that my "operetta" (not opera), entitled, "A Night in Fairyland," is to be produced at the place he names, in the coming autumn. Yours, faithfully,

BENNETT GILBERT.

AMAZONS OR RIFLEMEN.

SIR,—I have been somewhat surprised at the arrangement of the parts in certain choruses lately published for male voices, and intended for the use of the Rifle Volunteers. This arrangement is always the same, namely, one tenor for the melody; a second tenor and alto for the harmony; and a bass. Now,—

1. Do the arrangers mean the alto part to be sung as it is actually written? If they do, a rifleman would be under the necessity of singing it all in falsetto, the melody for the tenor being generally lower. Is not this style of writing rather adopted for Amazons than Riflemen?

2. Is the alto part intended to be used in the lower octave? This is, I believe, always the custom with treble-clef notes for male voices; but then, in the arrangements to which I refer, the alto part would be frequently lower than the bass. Can you inform me why English arrangers have adopted this style?—Yours,

C. MANDEL.

BACH'S ORGAN TRIOS.

SIR,—Can you tell me the best edition of Bach's Organ Trios, and oblige

A SUBSCRIBER.

[Apply to Mr. W. T. Best, St. George's Hall, Liverpool.—ED.]

CASTARELLI.

SIR,—Will you oblige me by stating in the MUSICAL WORLD whether you know anything of Mad. Castarelli and her system of training the voice, as a friend of mine says she engages to bring persons out for the concert room, &c., in three months. Do you think this possible?—I am, sir, yours,

OMEGA.

PASTARELLI NOT CASTARELLI.

SIR,—I am sorry to be so troublesome, but the wrong name was mentioned to me. It is Mad. Pastarelli, and not Castarelli, who, I am told, engages to bring persons out for the concert room in three months.—I am, sir, yours,

22, 5, '61. OMEGA.

[If "Omega" has further to retract, to reverse, to obviate, to obvert, or to reinstate, our columns will be open to him the week after next.—ED. M. W.]

THE LATE HENRI LAURENT.

SIR,—Will you kindly inform me in the answers to correspondents of next Saturday's MUSICAL WORLD, if there is any likeness published of the late lamented Henri Laurent; if so, where? and it's price.

I am, Sir, yours most obediently,

MANDEL.

[Perhaps some of our readers may be able and willing to answer this inquiry.—ED.]

SIR,—Your correspondent of the 13th April, "Augmented Tone," relates the effect produced upon him by certain remarks of Mr. Filby relative to the minor scale, which were inserted in a previous number of the MUSICAL WORLD. He seems to have been suddenly aroused by them to the conviction of a new truth on the subject; and, in the spirit of a true musician, he not only returns thanks to his enlightener, but anxiously asks of him "more light."

It is very probable, however, that the remarks which have proved so startling and beneficial to "Augmented Tone" have not a like effect upon all the readers of the MUSICAL WORLD. Mr. Filby's ideas on the subject of the minor scale cannot be new to the majority of thinkers on musical matters, and it would scarcely be just to those readers of the WORLD, to whom they are not new, to find any portion of its valuable space occupied by such a "detailed statement" of them as "Augmented Tone" so anxiously desires.

Before Mr. Filby was, Godefroid Weber in his "Theory of Musical Composition" had said all that needed to be said in support of the modern minor scale, i. e. the scale with minor third, minor sixth and major seventh, of which "Augmented Tone" seems to have but just come to a knowledge. The teachings of Weber have since been more attractively and practically set forth and applied by Dr. Marx, of the Berlin University, in his "School of Composition." In these works "Augmented Tone," and the musicians generally to whom he alludes as likely to be interested by an exposition of Mr. Filby's ideas on the subject of the "harmonies of the minor scale," may probably meet with all they desire; and if so, the space of the WORLD will be saved for matters of more general interest. If, however, Mr. Filby has anything to add to what is contained in the works above-mentioned on the subject, I would join with "Augmented Tone" in requesting him to say on.

For my part I was more startled at "Augmented Tone's" request than at Mr. Filby's remarks. Weber's theory has now been before the world more than forty years, and accessible to English readers, either through the American edition of J. F. Warner, or the re-edition of the same by our own countryman, J. Bishop, of Cheltenham, for more than twenty years. Dr. Marx's work was first published in 1837, the English translation in 1852. (Both works were given to the English public by Messrs. Cocks & Co.) Now, considering the prominence that is given to the subject of the minor scale, and to the establishment of the modern form of it in these works amongst others, which I need not particularise, and the long time they have been accessible to English students, one may well feel surprised, I think, that a musician in the year 1861 should confess himself be so ignorant on the matter as "Augmented Tone." Has "Augmented Tone" even seen the smaller work by Dr. Marx, viz.:—"The universal School of Music?" That might, perhaps, supply all the information he seeks.

Should "Augmented Tone" find it difficult to obtain copies of the above works, he is quite welcome to the loan of mine for a few days.

By the insertion of this in your next impression, Mr. Filby may be saved a certain amount of perhaps unnecessary trouble, and "Augmented Tone" probably assisted.—I am, &c.

THOMAS MURBY.

HERR DALLE ASTE, a bass singer of great continental repute, and pupil of the lamented Staudigl, has arrived in London. For some time past the foreign papers have spoken in high terms of his merits as a singer and the beauty of his voice. In Paris, Vienna, Dresden, and lately in Holland, Herr Dalle Aste has, it appears, created great effect in Don Giovanni, Fidelio, Le Nozze di Figaro, and Euryanthe. We hope to have an opportunity of hearing him in some of the many concerts that take place during the season. Signor Dalle Aste, it may be remembered, produced a highly favourable impression in London some years since.

MISS ANNA WHITTY.—This young lady, daughter of the proprietor of the Liverpool Daily Post and Journal, who has been pursuing a most successful musical career at the principal opera-houses of Italy during the last six years, made her début in her native town, Liverpool, on the evening of Tuesday last, at a grand subscription concert given in the Philharmonic Hall. As might have been expected from her antecedents, the fair débutante was most enthusiastically received by one of the largest audiences ever assembled in the town. She sang both in Italian and English; and succeeded in completely satisfying the most exigent that her powers and talents had not been over-rated in the Italian journals. Her voice is an exquisitely sweet mezzo-soprano; her intonation is beautifully true; her execution both finished and brilliant, and her singing of that true Italian character of which Alboni is perhaps the greatest living exponent. Her greatest triumph was in "Non piu mesta" from Rossini's Cenerentola, in which the brilliant fioriture and the novelty and grace of the cadenzas excited the utmost enthusiasm. The début of Miss Whitty was in every respect decidedly triumphant, and we have now another English vocalist in every respect worthy of maintaining a position equal to that occupied by the Grisis, Bosios, and Albonis of the Italian school of art.—Daily News, May 23.

New Philharmonic Concerts.—At the fourth concert, on Monday last, there was, as at the third, an enormous attendance, owing in some measure, we may suppose, to the re-engagement of Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini, whose great success on their first appearance urged Dr. Wylde to secure them a second time. Being Whitsuntide, however, the learned Doctor seems to have thought it incumbent on him to provide some further and extra novelty in the vocal line; and, as he had already a soprano and tenor, he naturally bethought him of a bass; and, desirous of the very best to be had, of course he had Herr Formes. We think undue importance has been given to the singers in this instance; and, but for the fact that the season was Whitsuntide, should feel greatly inclined to break a lance in the cause with the ultra-liberal and vocal-munificent director. The singing, nevertheless, would have redeemed ten times the fault committed. Mlle. Titiens sang the air, "Non mi dir," from Don Giovanni, with wonderful power and grandeur, and the adagio "M' odi, ah! m' odi," from Lucrezia Borgia, with extraordinary brilliancy, eliciting a perfect storm of applause after both, the latter being so continuous that she had to accept an encore, when she substituted the cavatina, "Com' e' bello," from the same opera. Signor Giuglini introduced the air, "Il mio tesoro," from Don Giovanni, and "Pria che spunti," from the Matrimonio Segreto—both exquisitely sung, the last most perfectly. Herr Formes gave the grand air, "In deisen heil'gen Hallen," from the Zauberflöte; the comic song, "O, wie will ich triumphiren," from the Seraglio, and the aria with chorus from the Zauberflöte, "Possenti numi;" the first and last with tremendous vigour and power, and the second with a fund of comic humour the possession of which the Leporello of the great German bass had long ago revealed to us. The instrumental part of the programme comprised the overtures to Lodoiska (Cherubini), Fingal's Cave and the Zauberflöte, Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, and Spohr's concerto for the violin, "Sonst und Jetzt" (Past and present). The execution of the glorious "Pastoral" was magnificent throughout, although, perhaps, a little hurried in the opening of the scherzo and the last movement. All the niceties of the instrumentation and points of detail were brought out with wonderful fidelity. Cherubini's overture constituted a rare treat; and Dr. Wylde is indebted to the thanks of all true musicians for his consideration of the grand old Italian master, who in certain quarters seems to be strangely overlooked now-a-days. Indeed, but for the director of the Old and New Philharmonic Concerts and the Monday Popular Concerts, Cherubini would stand a chance of being well-nigh forgotten. Both Mendelssohn's and Mozart's overtures, also, were grandly played; but we were sorry to see so many take their leave before the latter was performed. The extreme length of the programme and extreme sultriness of the night no doubt compelled numbers to hasten their departure. Spohr's Concerto—not a great favourite with violin players, but not the less valuable for all that, as exemplifying the master in a particular style—was finely executed by Mr. Blagrove. Mendelssohn's music to Antigone will be given at the fifth concert.

Horns Assembly Rooms, Kennington.—On Thursday evening last, a concert took place at the above rooms, the proceeds of which were devoted to the purpose of assisting the Rev. Mr. Laing to free the church of St. Paul's, Newington, from debt, and the following ladies and gentlemen voluntered their services gratuitously:—Miss Augusta Thompson, Miss Rose Hersee, Mad. Arnold, and Miss Fanny Huddart; Mr. George Perren, Mr. Thos. Rogers, Mr. Patey, and Mr. Santley; also, Miss Hamilton, pianoforte, M. Viotti Collins, Messrs. Naylor, Tiddell, and F. Osborne Williams. The concert was highly satisfactory, and we trust that the fund has benefited to the extent it deserved from the eminence of the singers, and the interest exhibited in their exertions. The entertainment was advertised, and intended to have been given at the Lecture Hall, Walworth, but almost at the eleventh hour, an intimation was received from a rival establishment, that is indebted for its very existence to the toleration of the neighbourhood, that certain penalties would be sued for if the concert was given there, leaving no alternative but to change the place at considerable trouble and expense. As "Charity covereth a multitude of sins," we should have thought these informers might have waited for some other occasion to display their good intentions.

Mr. F. Kingsbury's Fourth Soiree Musicale took place on Wednesday, when the following artists assisted—Miss Stabbach, Miss Marion Falvey, Miss Rose Hersee, Miss Topham, Miss C. Williams, Mr. T. Distin, and Mr. H. Wake as vocalists; and Herr Oberthür, Mr. Viotti Collins, and Mr. W. F. Reed as instrumentalists. Mr. Kingsbury confined his performance to a duet with Herr Oberthür, "Erin go bragh," for harp and violin, a brilliant composition of the first-named talented artist—and to a trio by Reissiger, for piano, violin, and violoncello, with Messrs. Viotti Collins, and W. F. Reed, which was capitally executed and deservedly applauded. Most of the vocalists were pupils of Mr. Kingsbury, and they all acquitted themselves in a manner that must have been satisfactory to their instructor. Miss Stabbach was heard to great advantage in a canzonet by Haydn, and a ballad by Mr. Langton Williams; and Herr Oberthür's solo for the harp, a "transcription" of Reichardt's popular song, "Thou art so near and yet so far," was greatly admired and liberally applauded. The rooms were fully and fashionably attended, and the soirée evidently gave satisfaction to Mr. Kingsbury's friends.

The Vocal Association.—The meeting which took place on Wednesday evening was not of the same character as those gatherings on which, from time to time, it is our duty to comment. The members met their friends in social intercourse, and in the general amenities of a conversazione. The brilliantly decorated hall on this occasion presented an appearance of more than ordinary light and colour. The scene was the more animated from the continual motion, and from that universal hum which distinguishes a crowd assembled to find its own amusement, and not to sit quietly while such is provided. To be sure, there was something to be done in the accustomed way of listening; for, besides a selection of madrigals and part songs by the choir, Miss Banks, Miss Delafield, Miss Lisle, Miss Stabbach, Miss Messent, Miss Jessie Cole, the Swiss Female Singers, Herr Formes, M. Jules Lefort, Signor Belart, and Signor Delle Sedie, contributed to the vocal department of an incidental concert, in which Mlle. del Bianco, Senor Sarasatè, Herr Engel, Herr Kosleck, Herr Oberthur, Mr. Lindsay Sloper, Mr. F. Berger, Mr. W. Ganz, Mr. W. Layland, and Mr. Benedict were the instrumentalists. It was in the pauses that the company found opportunities of inspecting many curious objects and attractive works of art. In the former category were MSS. of Beethoven and of Mendelssohn, and a harpsichord with double row of keys. Painting and sculpture had been lent for the occasion; and a very interesting display of photographs completed the exhibition. Altogether the Vocal Association may be congratulated on having afforded a treat to its friends, and a proof of vitality in its own organisation.

Miss Oldfield's Matinee.—Messrs. Collards' Concert Room, Grosvenor-street, was on Tuesday filled by a select audience, Miss Oldfield, a young aspirant to vocal fame, giving her first concert. Of Miss Oldfield, we can only say at present that she has a sweet soprano voice, capable of being disciplined into excellence. She was supported by Signor Belletti, who is too seldom heard in the concert room; by Miss Lascelles; by Signori Ciabatta and Gardoni, who strenghtened the operatic selection, of which the concert was in great measure made up; by Mad. Oury, the well known pianiste; and by M. Ole Büll. The conductors were Signor Vera and Mr. Benedict.

Sale of the Garrick Theatre.—On Wednesday the Garrick Theatre, Leman Street, Whitechapel, was put up to public competition, at the Auction Mart, by Mr. C. J. Baker. The theatre has been entirely re-erected within the last six years. The building is of the most substantial character and occupies a large extent of ground. The entrances are well arranged, leading to the boxes, stalls, pit, and gallery, which afford accommodation for 1700 persons. The stage arrangements are complete. There are two back entrances, and the theatre is so constructed as to be available for horsemanship or a music hall. The estate is held for fifty-six years, at a ground rent of £27 a year, including land tax, and lets at £600 per annum, and is now let for religious Sunday services at the rate of £120 per annum. The first offer was £1000 and the Theatre was knocked down at £1600.

The Musical World.

LONDON: SATURDAY, MAY 25, 1861.

THE explanatory reasons for the abandonment of the Leeds Festival, which appeared in the MUSICAL WORLD last week, and which were copied from the Leeds and West Riding Express, although containing much that is correct, do not in our opinion convey quite such a faithful statement as the readers of this journal are entitled to. With every desire to be impartial, as we are sure the Editor of the Leeds Express always endeavours to be in his musical notices, he must naturally feel disposed to advocate the cause of that party with which his brother, Mr. William Spark, is more immediately connected. The Editor of the Leeds and West Riding Express gives six reasons for the abandonment of the Festival, many of them we think not exactly reasonable. First there is the visit of the Royal Agricultural Association to Leeds. Now, what a show of fat beasts, sheep, and swine can have to do with the abandonment of the Festival, we cannot for the life of us divine. We have to learn for the first time what linseed and rapecake, Thorley's food for cattle, oatmeal, swillings, &c. &c., have to do with high art. The sturdy yeomen who are expected to attend the cattle show are neither the patrons nor the opponents of festivals as a body. They do not care for any music except the bleating of sheep and lowing of cattle. The Agricultural Society's Meeting in Leeds would neither do good nor harm to the Festival, whatever the Committee may pretend. Next the dulness of trade consequent upon the American crisis is urged. This reason is as fallacious as the other. There are statements published every month by the Leeds Chamber of Commerce showing the progress of trade in that town, and with the exception of the cloth business, all other trades are fully employed. The iron, machine, engine, tool, and other trades, are very busy. Again, there was a guarantee fund of upwards of 6000*l.*, raised to cover any loss that might accrue; and, judging by the result of the last Festival, when a profit of 1000*l.* was handed over to the public charities, it was not very likely that the receipts would fall short of expenses.

Thirdly, it is argued that the exorbitant demand made by vocalists whose services are considered indispensable, was a reason for the abandonment of the festival. Now this is sheer twaddle. No vocalist was even written to; and therefore no terms can have been named. The Festival Committee might have been scared by the large sums paid to foreigners at the last meeting, when about 1000*l.* were expended upon the Piccolomini and Alboni party. The terms of the English vocalists would not, we dare say, have been more than heretofore. The meeting of the British Association at Manchester is the fourth bugbear. What next? Had Mr. Spurgeon been advertised to preach in St. George's Hall, Bradford, within two or three weeks of the date fixed upon for the Festival, we should have had even that urged as one reason for its abandonment. The resignation of Mr. Walker Joy, one of the three honorary secretaries, is the fifth fatal objection. Mr. Walker Joy must feel flattered by the compliment. The paid secretary does the work, the honorary secretaries do "the polite." Surely some one might be discovered, in a population of upwards of 200,000, accomplished enough to hand the principal female vocalists in and out of the orchestra, and pass round cake and wine in the artists' room. The sixth and last "reason" is the behaviour of the chorus master. The writer in the Leeds and West Riding Express says, "Mr. Burton (the chorus master) declined to have anything to do with the chorus unless he could have the entire control and selection of that body." Mr. Burton acted very properly in so doing. What would Costa, Mellon, Benedict, or any other conductor say to a committee if interfered with in the selection of band or chorus for any great occasion? The question needs no answer. Mr. Burton limited his selection from the Leeds Madrigal and Motet Society (Mr. Spark's) to a very small number, and some of the members of the chorus committee are connected with that very Society. Mr. Burton would not sacrifice his independent judgment; the chorus committee would not give up their little brief authority; so betwixt two stools the Festival falls to the ground. I believe this sixth and last "reason" to be the long and short of the whole business.

Thus Leeds, after having spent some 70,000*l.* upon its Town Hall (Victoria Hall having been erected principally for musical purposes), after having spent upwards of 5000*l.* on an organ, after having had its first Festival ushered in under the sanction and the presence of Royalty, quietly allows some half-a-dozen people, for party purposes, to throw a veil over art; and Music—like Imperial Cæsar in the Capitol—is stabbed by those who profess to be its nearest and dearest friends. Who can wonder at the scores of Elijah and the May Queen having been advertised, only a week or two ago, by the Town Council, for sale by tender?

The Leeds Town Hall is a splendid building, but it wants paintings and sculpture to decorate its halls, corridors, and approaches. There is a large open space in front, which greatly stands in need of a group of figures. Why not the following:—Mr. Burton and Mr. Spark in the foreground having a set-to, surrounded by their respective backers; and in the background a fat beast rampant, the sheep (which now is suspended in the middle in the Leeds Circus) released from its hanging position, and dying beneath its weight of fat and fleece, the swine revelling in a tub of oatmeal and milk; while Art might be represented weeping in the gutter at its degradation, the scores of Elijah and the May Queen half burried in the mud? The inscription on the pedestal might commemorate the triumphs of party and obesity over Genius, Art, and Intellect, &c. &c., and the powers that hold sway, in the year of our Lord, 1861.

THE retirement into private life of an artist like Giulia Grisi, who, for more than a quarter of a century, exercised so powerful a sway over the destinies of Italian Opera in this country, cannot take place without all but universal regret; and which could not fail to have proved universal, but that she has been so long before the public that many of the present frequenters of the Opera have known her only since her vocal powers began to exhibit symptoms of decline. A more perfect singer than Grisi in her zenith—say twenty years ago—never trod the operatic boards. Let us remember the epoch at which she appeared, and the artists with whom she was tested. At the very period when Giulia Grisi made her début at Her Majesty's Theatre—1831 or 1832—Malibran was astonishing Europe—had recently astonished America—by the brilliancy of her genius and by a combination of artistic and natural qualities never previously found in any singer. Pasta had just declined, leaving a golden track behind her in her setting which still sheds a lustre over the history of the vocal art. Sontag, too, had recently withdrawn into private life; nor yet were the triumphs of Catalani, Fodor, Camporese, Colbran, and other songstresses of the legitimate Italian school, entirely forgotten. It was a perilous essay, indeed, at such a time, for a young untried artist to dare the judgment of an audience whose ears had been thoroughly accustomed to the finest performances of perhaps the greatest singers the world had known. It may well be imagined that but little was expected from the new prima donna, although the French critics vaunted loudly of her powers and her beauty. But Gallican opinion had not much weight with the English people in those days; and when Mdlle. Giulia Grisi was announced to make her first appearance as Ninetta in La Gazza Ladra, the public was not moved, the subscribers smiled, and the habitués shrugged their shoulders. It was a memorable night, that of Grisi's first appearance at the Opera. There was a poor attendance and no excitement—no anticipation, indeed. The first appearance, however, of the new Ninetta created universal interest. At that time Grisi was about two or three and twenty. She was eminently beautiful—need we say how beautiful to those who behold her now, after a period of thirty years?—with features as regular as if hewn out of marble by Phidias or Praxiteles, an expression as various and mutable as that of an April sky, and a figure just budding into the most voluptuous era of womanhood. As she advanced to the footlights she seized on every eye, on every heart. Her triumph was to a considerable extent secured. But when she sang that transcendent burst of love and joy, "Di piacer mi balza il cor," and revealed a voice that for purity, beauty and tender grace has never been surpassed, displaying, moreover, such infinite charm in her singing and acting, the effect may be imagined. The audience was intoxicated, and Giulia Grisi became the prevailing topic of conversation in circles musical and unmusical—became, in short, the operatic idol of the day.

Nor did idolatry lose its worshippers when the first glow and tempest of excitement had passed away. On the contrary, the fame of Giulia Grisi increased hourly; and the artist, except in one instance, did not suffer by comparison even with Malibran, who at the time was creating such unparalleled enthusiasm at Drury Lane, and making mad her audiences by her performances in the Sonnambula. Ah! these were glorious days for the Opera! Malibran, a host in herself, at Drury Lane; and, at Her Majesty's Theatre, Giulia Grisi, Rubini, Tamburini, Lablache, and very good etceteras. And now—heu quantum mutati ab illis!—Let us not pursue the subject. We have no Malibran now; no Grisi, no Rubini, no Tamburini, no Lablache. Of course when Malibran died Grisi absorbed the entire world of favour. It was some time, however, before she even attempted to step into her predecessor's shoes. She had, indeed, essayed the Sonnambula with her renowned rival, but the comparison was not favourable, and Malibran maintained her undoubted supremacy in that character. At first Grisi adhered almost exclusively to Rossini's operas, making her greatest effects in the Gazza Ladra and Otello. Her first effort in the tragic line was Donna Anna in Don Giovanni—it is strange she never appeared in London as Zerlina, although always assuming the equivalent character of Susanna in the Nozze di Figaro—and afterwards Semiramide and Anna Bolena. The first grand opera produced especially for her at Her Majesty's Theatre, if we mistake not, was Rossini's L'Assedio di Corinto. Her reputation as a serious artist was by no means of rapid progress. As her years increased, however, and her voice acquired strength and weight, her genius for the highest order of acting was acknowledged, until at last she was quietly invested with the mantle bequeathed by Pasta to Malibran (which, however, perfidious time did not suffer Malibran to wear), and was crowned with the greenest laurels of tragic song. "She won them well;" would we could add—

"And may she wear them long!"

The leaves are now yellow and sere that once were green and bright, and Norma, victim of the Proconsul Time, ceding her rule to some younger High-Priestess, must fling aside her wreath, and ascend the pile from whose insatiate flames there is no returning.

We are not about to write the biography of Giulia Grisi. We merely desire to draw attention to the fact that an artist who, perhaps more than any other of her time, has won for herself a place in the roll of Fame, is about to quit for ever the scene of her triumphs. What Italian Opera would have been for the last twenty-five years but for Grisi it is difficult to say. The great dramatic singer is now about to withdraw into private life. It behoves everybody to hear and see her ere she quits the scene. So, when she has passed away, vivid recollection may be linked with one of the brightest glories that ever adorned the Opera. R.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

Sir,—When will artists perceive the absolute necessity of banding together to get rid of that pest, the "encore?" I mean, of course, real artists—not pretenders, who make it their stock in trade, nor beginners, who are too inexperienced to see, and if they saw, too eager to admit its absurdity. The "encore" is not merely in one sense an injustice, but in every sense a nuisance. It is a nuisance to three-fourths of any given audience assembled at a concert-room or theatre. The unanimous, or even the general "encore" is an exception. Nine times out of ten—nay, nineteen times out of twenty—an "encore" is carried by a small and turbulent minority against the faint opposition or apathetic indifference of a large and polite majority, who, sooner than create a disturbance, submit to the infliction. If only the greatest achievements were encored, no one would have reason to complain; but when at one and the same entertainment you have co-operated in persuading a Lind, an Alboni, an Arabella Goddard, a Vieuxtemps, a Piatti, a Bottessini, a Patti, a Mario, or a Sims Reeves, to repeat some performance that has enchanted the entire assembly, and almost directly afterwards a small knot of partisans make a successful attempt to obtain a repetition of a thoroughly mediocre display, you are not merely disgusted with the indirect result of your own well-placed enthusiasm, but with the encore system in toto. A long experience of the inconveniences (to say nothing of the yawning) attending some half-dozen indiscriminate encores in an evening has made me feel grateful to Mad. Alboni, Mr. Sims Reeves, and other distinguished public favourites who, within the last few years, have set their faces against them, and in a number of instances resolutely declined to comply with the often unreasonable demands of audiences. What compliment is it to a thorough artist to be fêted precisely in the same manner as a posse of hopeless and forward mediocrities? Many a time has the real "star" of an evening concert declined to comply with an enthusiastic "encore" in pity to the intelligent majority of the audience, already jaded with listening to a string of commonplaces twice over. It is really an act of kindness—of mercy, indeed—to decline under such circumstances.

A case in point occurred only the other night, at Liverpool, near the termination of the sixth subscription concert of the Philharmonic Society, which I had the good fortune to attend. The concert began with Benedict's picturesque legend of Undine, the execution of which, on the part of the principal singers—Miss Banks, Mad. Laura Baxter, Messrs. Santley and Sims Reeves—was all that could be desired. What followed was a miscellaneous selection, which, with recalls and encores, was spun out to an intolerable duration, and which in itself was for the most part wholly uninteresting. After considerably more than an hour and a half of this hodge-podge (imagine one of the old "London Wednesday" programmes at a Philharmonic concert, the symphonies and concertos omitted to make room for it), Mr. Sims Reeves came on to sing the ballad from Macfarren's Robin Hood. This was about eleven o'clock, two hours after he had sung his last note in Undine, when, indeed, the greater part of the audience possibly thought he had left "for good." Well, we all know the ballad is a charming one, and that Mr. Reeves sings it to perfection. He did so on this occasion, and, late as was the hour, the audience re-demanded it unanimously; Mr. Reeves, however, merely bowed, and being again called for, bowed again, but most discreetly (I, for one, thanked him in my heart for it) declined to sing the ballad again. Whereupon there was a good deal of hissing from the galleries, and a semi-"row" in the hall, which it took some time to appease. One of the local papers—the Post—thus sensibly alludes to the occurrence:—

"Sims Reeves also introduced Macfarren's 'Guiding star' from Robin Hood, which so delighted the audience that they persisted for some time in their ill-timed and ineffective applause, ineffective, as it resulted in nothing but a long delay in the business. We thought the public had learned ere this that when an artist has made up his or her mind not to sing, there is little use in continuing to demand an encore; and as we think the whole system of encoring is bad taste, and a great display of greediness on the part of the audience, we shall always raise our voice in support of the artist, and in condemnation of the practice."

Another, however, The Mercury, takes both an erroneous and an ill-natured view of the matter:—

"The song was greatly applauded, and a little scene occurred which was rather foreign to the ordinarily orderly, aristocratic observances of the Philharmonic Hall, and was, to say the least of it, unseemly. Perhaps there was rather more of the popular element in the galleries on this occasion than usual, and its representatives felt inclined to have things their own way. They must know, however, that the great English tenor frequently shows a disposition to carry matters with a high hand, and as frequently to the annoyance of those who pay him liberally for his services, which one would almost suppose he gave gratuitously. Last night the song named was re-demanded, and the cheering signifying the wish of the audience was kept up for some time. But no; Mr. Sims Reeves was not going to condescend to oblige his patrons by singing it a second time, short though it was. He returned to the platform, bowed, and retired. The cheering was kept up for some minutes, until it was mingled with a storm of hisses; but Mr. Reeves did not make his appearance again to sing. It was suggested by a gentleman present that the most sensible thing to do, should the great English tenor again condescend to come to Liverpool and be paid for singing to its people, would be that all applause should be withheld so far as he is concerned."

Is the writer quite sure that the "storm of hisses" was not directed against the ill-mannered obstinacy of what he calls the "popular element in the galleries," so decidedly "foreign to the aristocratic observances of the Philharmonic," and got up expressly to show their dissatisfaction with the encore nuisance, by the "Upper Ten" of Liverpool? That his remarks were not in consonance with the feelings of the better part of the audience, may be seen in the following letter addressed to The Mercury by one of them:—

"To the Editors of the Liverpool Mercury.

"Gentlemen,—I attended the concert of Tuesday evening, and with some exceptions can quite agree with your remarks upon the artists. Permit me, however, to say that I think you are unjust to Mr. Sims Reeves in the concluding portion of your observations. I think that Mr. Reeves was quite justified at that late hour in refusing an encore. Your condemnation is rather due to the whole management, or I should rather say mismanagement, of these concerts, a repetition of which occurs at every concert that is given. In the first place, the time of commencement is advertised for a quarter before eight; it is invariably ten minutes after that time that the first note is struck. Secondly, the intervening interval of fifteen minutes is more often than not thirty minutes. It was fully thirty on Tuesday evening. Thirdly, encores ought not to be permitted at all, excepting under most peculiar circumstances, and this I am sure would be the feeling of the majority, if you could only number those who make a 'noise for,' and those who (in courtesy) but faintly 'object' to encores. I am one of a number of residents on the Lancashire and Yorkshire line of railway, who used regularly to attend the society's concerts, but who as regularly have been deprived of a fourth, and in many cases the best, part of the performances, being compelled to leave the hall, to the annoyance of all about, at a time of the night when the concert should be over.

Liverpool, May 22, 1861. APOLLO."

To this straightforward and sensible letter the Editor of The Mercury attaches the subjoined note:—

"Our correspondent is mistaken if he supposes that we are in favour of a compliance with encores ad libitum. On the contrary, we are decidedly opposed to the frequency of re-demands, have protested against them time after time, and have often thought that the audience were determined to encore almost every song, whether it was good, bad, or indifferent, not to mention the inconsiderate tax upon the powers of the vocalist. Besides which, as 'Apollo' intimates, the entertainment is often inconveniently and disagreeably prolonged. But there are exceptional cases in which the call for repetition may be fairly complied with, and we think that in question was one of them. 'My own, my guiding star' is a beautiful song, from a comparatively new and popular opera, and the audience were not very unreasonable in wishing to hear it repeated, sung, as it was, admirably. It was not altogether in reference to Mr. Sims Reeves' refusal on this occasion that our remarks were intended. The great English tenor is unfortunately celebrated for his haughtiness of demeanour and apparent contempt of the wishes of his audience, and it is not the first time that he has declined to comply with the unanimously expressed desire of an audience in Liverpool. Mr. Sims Reeves, notwithstanding the deservedly high position he has attained in the musical world, has not, perhaps, often had the honour of appearing before a more numerous or fashionable assembly than that which graced the Philharmonic Hall on Tuesday evening; and we should have imagined that the reminiscences of his earlier career in connection with this town would have led him to feel that the unanimously-expressed desire for the repetition of his little song was a flattering compliment at the hands of the people of Liverpool, and a request with which he would have gracefully and gladly complied, seeing, too, that he had only the one song in the second part of the concert."

This by no means hits the nail on the head; and the remark about Mr. Sims Reeves' early career is as irrelevant as the reference in the first article to the fact of his being paid for his services. Do the proprietors of The Liverpool Mercury give away their paper, or do they sell it? Do they accept the gratuitous services of their contributors (including the musical critic and the Editor himself) or do they pay for them? That Mr. Reeves won, if not his first public honours (for they, if I am not mistaken, were earned at Newcastle), at least some of his earliest in Liverpool is certain; but that is only an extra-reason for his doing his very utmost to rescue the intelligent amateurs of Liverpool from an intolerable nuisance. If any gratitude attaches to the fact of his having sung so well at Liverpool, for a small salary, that he should in London very soon afterwards have been considered worth a large one, he could not have shown his gratitude better. It is to be earnestly hoped that Mr. Sims Reeves will not be dissuaded by the affair at the Philharmonic Hall, nor by the comments of the Mercury, nor by any sophistical argument whatever, to desist from the chivalrous stand he has made against what is no less an unjust encroachment on the part of a small section of the musical public than an abiding nuisance to the majority. Every candid and impartial amateur thanks him for putting his powerful shoulder to the wheel, and among the rest no one more cordially than, Sir, your obedient servant,

A LIVERPOOL MERCHANT, and

Liverpool, May 23, 1861. FANATICO PER LA MUSICA.

MR. TENNANT'S CONCERT.—This brilliant affair came off at Exeter Hall on Monday evening, and was completely successful, as might have been anticipated from the powerfully attractive names set forth in his programme. The "star" of the evening was undoubtedly Mad. Alboni, whose transcendent voice and incomparable method were exhibited to perfection in "Di piacer," "Rode's air," of which she repeated the last variation, in answer to the furore of applause and stentorian demand for an encore; and the brindisi from Lucrezia Borgia, which from any one else sounds hacknied, but is always welcome when sung by this unrivalled queen of song. Mr. Tennant, besides joining in some of the concerted music, gave Mendelssohn's "Garland" (his singing of which has already been noticed at the Monday Popular Concerts), and a new song of Blumenthal, accompanied by the composer—"Good night, love! good night," both with excellent taste, and the latter was very warmly encored. Herr Formes was heard to such advantage in Schubert's "Wanderer," that he also had to obey an unanimous encore. Mad. Catherine Hayes was loudly recalled after "Qui la voce," as was M. Ole Bull for his solo, "A mother's prayer," with pianoforte and harmonium accompaniment. Mesdames Louisa Vinning, Stabbach, Lascelles, Mr. Alberto Laurence, Signor and Mad. Ferrari, Miss Spiller—a débutante possessing a nice voice, which, with proper cultivation, may be of great service to her—all contributed to swell the vocal portion of a somewhat lengthy programme, in which Mr. Charles Hallé's solos, the so-called "Moonlight Sonata" of Beethoven, and Chopin's nocturne and valse in A flat were something of a relief to the uninterrupted succession of vocal pieces. The large hall, although not absolutely crammed, was nevertheless well filled. Messrs. Benedict, Francesco Berger, G. Lake, and Harold Thomas officiated as accompanyists at the piano; M. Miolan presiding at the harmonium during M. Bull's adagio religioso, so called.

MR. CHARLES HALLÉ'S BEETHOVEN RECITALS at the St. James's Hall are likely to prove one of the most interesting features of the musical season, as it is proposed to give in a series of eight concerts, the sonatas of the great master in the order in which they were written. A very striking instance of the advanced taste in such matters is to be found in the knowledge and appreciation of the "tone-poet," who towers above his compeers, and who for originality, largeness of conception and power of expression stands almost alone. But a very few years since the later works of Beethoven were to the public almost a dead letter, while even by the majority of professors they were but imperfectly appreciated. True, his symphonies were periodically heard at the Philharmonic or other high-priced concerts, but the quartets, sonatas and chamber compositions in which he was so prolific, were all but virtually ignored. To the inauguration of the new state of things, we need go no farther back than 1859, when the Monday Popular Concerts first began the mission of introducing to the "musical masses," works all more or less new to this generation. We have so frequently dwelt upon the merits of these entertainments, that we need say no more here than to express our opinion that they have been the means of preparing the way and educating the taste for the reception of the recitals in question, and had this experiment been attempted some half dozen years since, we believe it would have then been as complete a failure as it appears now likely to be an entire success. The presentation of these sonatas in regular succession, appears to us in the same light as the arrangement of the pictures at the Manchester Art Treasures Exhibition in 1857, the chronological order being strictly observed, and the spectator thereby enabled to judge of the progress of art in infinitely less time, and with much greater certainty than by devoting years to travel and viewing scattered examples at different times and places. Thus in the four sonatas which were given on Friday the 17th, Op. 2, F minor No. 1, A major No. 2, C major No. 3, and E flat Op. 7, we have the influence of Mozart exhibited over the mind of the composer, although there is still more than ample evidence of the perfect independence and self-reliance which hereafter manifests itself in so remarkable a degree in what are known as the second and third periods of his career. It requires a pianist of no ordinary calibre to attack the difficulties involved in some of the best known sonatas, and even with the aid of a book is no small tax upon the physical and intellectual powers of the player, but when executed from memory alone, the undertaking almost approaches the line of hazardous, and it says no little for Mr. Charles Hallé's qualifications, that all the four sonatas in question were given without the music. If he follows the example in the remaining concerts, as an effort of mnemonics alone, it will be something marvellous. Two songs, Dussek's "Name the glad day, dear," and Macfarren's "Ah, why do we love?" both sung with the unaffected simplicity of manner which is so characteristic of that rapidly rising artist, Miss Banks, agreeably relieved both pianist and audience.—Mr. Harold Thomas was the accompanyist. C.

Mr. Walter Macfarren's second concert was given on the morning of Saturday last, before an audience which completely filled the Hanover Square Room. The programme was really an admirable one, the bénéficiaire wisely preferring quality to quantity, and in lieu of tiring his patrons with an endless succession of pieces, all more or less uninteresting, gave a selection in which the instrumental portion especially was no less welcome for its intrinsic value than the talent of the executants. Mozart's exquisite trio in E flat, for pianoforte, clarionet, and viola, was rendered to admiration by Messrs. W. Macfarren, Lazarus, and R. Blagrove, while in the sonata of Beethoven in A, Op. 30, No. 1, the violin playing of Mr. Sainton was conspicuous for the fulness of tone, delicacy of touch, and perfection of expression, for which the French virtuoso is so eminently famous. Besides joining that clever and rising pianist, Mrs. John Macfarren, in a brilliant pianoforte duet, andante and bolero, of his own composition, Mr. Walter Macfurren contributed, as solos, Mendelssohn's prelude and fugue in F minor, Op. 35, No. 5 a romance, "Parmi les montagnes," and impromptu, "Mountain stream;" the last two also from the elegant pen of the concert-giver. Miss Robertine Henderson was so successful in Spohr's lied, "The bird and the maiden" (the clarionet obbligato deliciously played by Mr. Lazarus) that an encore was insisted upon, while the applause that greeted the same rising young singer in her second song, "I think of thee," by G. A. Macfarren, showed that for once in a way a morning concert audience can be roused from their usual frigidity — indeed their warmth was throughout remarkable; Miss Messent also sharing the approving hands for her singing in Mozart's "Deh vieni non tardar," and a ballad of the average drawing-room quality, by Mrs. Blanchard Jerrold. The magnificent sestet in F sharp minor, by Dr. Sterndale Bennett, with which the concert ended, was listened to with all the attention that so masterly a work deserved, and emanating as it did from the composer when he was under twenty years of age, only makes one the more regret that he has not added a greater number of such compositions to our store of classical music. Full justice was rendered to its merits by Messrs. W. Macfarren, Sainton, Watson, R. Blagrove, Aylward, and Severn. The last concert will take place on Thursday evening, June 11th.

Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir.—The sixth concert was given on Thursday evening, and was more than usually abundant in attraction, to the contributions of the choir being added performances on the pianoforte by Mr. Charles Hallé and Herr Ernst Pauer. The chief novelty of the selection was a setting of the twenty-third Psalm, for soprano and alto voices, "The Lord is my Shepherd," by Herr Pauer, a composition of real merit. It was admirably sung; the solo parts by Miss Emily Gresham, Miss Charlieu, Mrs. Percy, and Mrs. Dixon, being extremely good. The pieces which created the greatest impression were Mendelssohn's forty-third Psalm, "Judge me, O Lord," and Spofforth's glee, "Hail, smiling morn." Both were loudly encored and repeated. Pearsall's madrigal, "Take heed, ye shepherd swains," was perhaps the most perfect performance of all. The choir, indeed, were in splendid force throughout the evening, and never sang better, if indeed so well. The pianoforte performances comprised two solos, —Mendelssohn's caprice in E major, Op. 33, and Stephen Heller's "Wanderstunden," No. 2, executed by Mr. Charles Hallé, and Chopin's "Rondo Brillant," for two pianofortes, by Mr. Charles Hallé and Herr Pauer. The "Rondo" of Chopin is extremely brilliant and showy, wonderfully adapted indeed to display the executive powers of two performers, and was played with remarkable effect. It was, if we mistake not, its first time of performance in England, and, judging from the effect produced on Thursday evening, is certainly not likely to be the last. The concert, on the whole, was perhaps the best of the season; and, although the encores were fewer than usual, we never knew the audience more attentive and more delighted. At the last concert Miss Arabella Goddard makes her appearance.

Mr. Van Noorden's Concert.—The Westbourne New Hall, Bayswater, was crowded to suffocation on Monday evening, on the occasion of Mr. Van Noorden's concert, the attractions being more than usually great in that "far west" locality, Miss Arabella Goddard, Mlle. Parepa, and Mr. Wilbye Cooper, figuring among the engagements. The suburban journal, the Bayswater Chronicle, gives a very enthusiastic and efflorescent account of the performance, from which we cannot forbear extracting the following choice bit apropos of Miss Goddard's playing:—

"The 'Queen of our pianists' played inimitably Benedict's new solo for the piano, entitled 'Albion.' The skill, the treatment (manipulatory and mental), the exquisite touch, so modified, refined, and elegant, that the notes fell upon the ear, especially in subdued passages, like pearls to the eye, liquid, round, and equal. It was received with the utmost enthusiasm. The chef of her performance was displayed in Thalberg's 'Mose in Egitto.' Had it been composed for her expressly it could not have more fairly met her extraordinary powers; with a wrist motion displaying the utmost flexibility and strength of arm in the martellato passages, she displayed a beautiful contrast by playing the charming embroidery which covers the well-known melody with a feathery floating lightness perfectly enchanting. The most vehement demonstrations of applause were given at its conclusion; a recall was made, but gracefully bowed to."

Mr. P. E. Van Noorden, the concert-giver, is both pianist and vocalist, and displayed his talents in both branches of the art on this occasion, performing with considerable skill on the pianoforte Kalkbrenner's solo "Gage d'amitie," and singing the Scotch Duet "Hunting Tower," with Miss M. Van Noorden, which was unanimously encored. Miss Van Noorden, who possesses no ordinary vocal abilities, as our readers are aware, contributed more liberally to the programme, singing Kücken's duet "Treibe, treibe" with Mlle. Parepa, the duet "Si la Stanchezza" from the Trovatore with Mr. Wilbye Cooper, and a Lied "Von Meinen Bergen" (The Twin Parting), the composition — and a very pleasing one — of Mr. Van Noorden, all given with irreproachable taste and admirable skill. Mlle. Parepa gave a new song "On the hills," also the composition of Mr. Van Noorden, and the cavatina "My long hair is braided," from the Amber Witch, with more than usual brilliancy. The other singers were Mad. Gilbert, Miss E. Armstrong, Mad. Albert and Mr. Wallworth. The conductors were Messrs. Frank Mori, Kiakmark and Van Noorden.

Mr. Frederick Penna's "Highways and Byeways."—A very agreeable evening may be spent with Mr. Frederick Penna at the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly, where he is now giving his new entertainment, entitled "Highways and Byeways," three times during the week. We have already remarked on Mr. Penna's qualifications for a public lecturer in our notice of his two readings on the composers of sacred music, recently delivered at the Hanover Square Rooms, and also touched upon his vocal abilities. That Mr. Penna reads well and sings well we are more assured by his new discourse. The "Highways and Byeways of Song" is a very entertaining account, critical and biographical, of some of the best known of our modern composers, including Bellini, Meyerbeer, Schubert, Sterndale Bennett, Balfe, Barnett, Wallan, Loder, Callcott, Rooke, and Wallace, illustrated by specimens of each composer's style. As Mr. Penna is a barytone singer, his illustrations are necessarily confined to vocal pieces of a certain class, but this class comprises all varieties, and the selection made is admirable. For instance, among the songs introduced by the lecturer are those extremely popular ones, "Vi ravviso" from the Sonnambula, Callcott's "Friend of the Brave," Balfe's serenade, "My bark is bounding near," Rooke's air "My Boyhood's Home," the song "'Tis folly to hunt," from Professor Bennett's May Queen, Barnett's "Farewell to the mountain." The new entertainment, in short, is of great interest, and will well repay a visit to the Egyptian Hall.

Miss Steele's Second Chamber Concert came off at Collard's Pianoforte and Concert Rooms, on Thursday afternoon, the 16th instant. Miss Steele was assisted by Miss Banks and Mr. Lewis Thomas, as vocalists, and Miss Arabella Goddard, Mr. H. Blagrove, and Mr. Lidel, instrumentalists. The programme was of more than average excellence, the most important item being Mendelssohn's trio, No. 2, in C minor, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, executed with splendid effect by Miss Goddard and her coadjutors of the strings. The other instrumental performances were Miss Goddard's pianoforte solo "Albion," Mr. Benedict's new and highly successful composition, which, in the fair pianist's hands, never fails of creating a furore; Ernst's Otello fantasia, by Mr. Blagrove; and solo for the violoncello by Herr Lidel. Miss Steele sang the grand aria from Orfeo, "Che faro," Haydn's canzonet "Fidelity," the duet, "Giorno d'orrore," from Semiramide, with Miss Banks; duet, "Come, be gay," from Der Freischütz with the same lady; Mozart's trio, "Soave sia il vento," with Miss Banks and Mr. Lewis Thomas; and Attwood's glee, "The Curfew," with the same artists. Miss Steele's real contralto voice and artistic style was made evident in all pieces. Mr. Harold Thomas presided at the pianoforte.

SIGNOR AND MADAME FERRARI'S CONCERT, on Tuesday last, at St. James's Hall, was commendable in more respects than one, by no means the least of its praiseworthy qualities being its length, or rather brevity, as compared with the interminable bill of fare that most "beneficiaires" think so necessary to set forth for the delectation of their patrons,—we use the term advisedly, for the majority of benefit concerts appeal rather to the friends and connections of the giver, than to the general public. Nevertheless, there was a strong muster of acknowledged favourites, whose names are a guarantee of satisfaction, and we have only to mention Mad. Alboni, Mr. Charles Hallé, M. Wieniawski, Mr. Tennant, and Herr Lidel, to show that the two accomplished professors did their best to set forth a good entertainment. In the air from Semiramide, "Ah quel giorno," with which she first delighted and astonished the musical world at the Royal Italian Opera some fourteen years since, Mad. Alboni's superb voice appeared in finer order than ever, while in the brilliant finale to Cenerentola the hearers were fairly entranced. Mad. Alboni also took part in the quartet from La Donna del Lago, and a dramatic duet by Rossini. Mad. Ferrari's refined style and admirable taste were displayed to signal advantage in Mozart's "Non temer," and the duet just mentioned. She also shared the Lucia di Lammermoor duet with her husband, and joined in the two quartets. Signor Ferrari gave a solo from Handel's Berenice, joined in a duet from Donizetti's Belisario, and in other concerted pieces, all of which were received with favour. The air from Berenice was an irreproachable specimen of pure Handelian singing. Mendelssohn's caprice in E, and two pieces of Heller, served to exhibit Mr. Chas. Hallé's eminent abilities as a pianist. He also, with Herr Wieniawski and Herr Lidel, gave a fine performance of Beethoven's trio in C minor. It was Herr Wieniawski's first appearance this season, and in his own Legende and Air Russe, he in an equal measure astonished and delighted the audience, who applauded and recalled him with rapture. Herr Lidel also displayed his skill as a violoncello player in a solo by Strausky. Mr. Blumenthal's new song, "Good night," which Mr. Tennant introduced at his own concert, was again perfectly rendered by that gentleman. The Hall was well filled; the fair sex largely predominating. As usual, every one was more than satisfied with the rich musical treat provided by the accomplished and highly esteemed professors.

MAD. ANGELO'S SOIRÉE MUSICALE.—The Beethoven Rooms were fully and fashionably attended on Wednesday evening, when Mad. Angelo made her first public appearance as a pianist, and well sustained the reputation she has acquired in private. The fair artist began with Beethoven's Andante in F, after which she gave an excellent reading of the sonata for piano and violin, dedicated to Kreutzer, in which she enjoyed the invaluable assistance of M. Sainton. The slow movement showed Mad. Angelo as much at home in the expressive, as the finale found her an adept in the "bravura" style. From the "Music of the Present," Mad. Angelo selected Charles Mayer's well-known "Tremolo," an elegant romance of her own composition, and Liszt's Fantasia (feu d'artifice?), "Les Patineurs," to display the neatness of her execution and vigour of her style. The only other instrumental performance was M. Sainton's "Solo de Concert," which the eminent French violinist never played more superbly. Miss Palmer and Miss Robertine Henderson were the vocalists. The first sang two Italian canzonets and an English ballad, and the last "Sombres forêts," and an aria by Herr Pauer to Italian words. Their united voices charmed everyone in Mendelssohn's two-part songs, "O, wert thou in the cauld blast," and "May-bells." The vocalists enjoyed the able co-operation of Mr. Walter Macfarren as accompanyist at the piano.

NATIONAL CHORAL SOCIETY.—The success obtained by Mlle. Tietjens at the performance of The Creation at the Crystal Palace, no doubt suggested to Mr. Martin the idea of engaging her for the same oratorio at Exeter Hall. The National Choral Society furnished six hundred choristers on Wednesday, and the orchestra was well selected and efficient. We enlarged so recently on Mlle. Tietjens' grand execution of the soprano music, that we need not again enter into any details. The performance on Wednesday night more than justified the opinion we expressed some weeks ago of the German prima donna's power to assume the very highest position as an oratorio singer. Miss E. Wilkinson undertook the soprano music of the third part, and was much applauded in the duet with Mr. Lewis Thomas, "Graceful Consort." Mr. Thomas was heard to advantage in all the music allotted to the bass voice, and Mr. Wilbye Cooper received such applause for his singing of the favourite "In native worth," as would have justified its repetition, had not Mr. Cooper had the good taste to decline. The chorus had no great scope for the display of their powers, but the two important choral pieces, which conclude respectively the first and second parts, were executed with remarkable decision and power. Mr. Martin conducted with his accustomed energy and care.

SOCIETY FOR THE ENCOURAGEMENT OF THE FINE ARTS.—One of the most brilliant events of the season took place, by kind permission of the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, at the Egyptian Hall, Mansion House, on Thursday evening last, when upwards of a thousand persons assembled at the fourth conversazione of this society. The fine hall, and the entrance to it, were crowded with a collection of the choicest works of art, contributed by the members and from other sources for the occasion. The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor took the chair a little after eight o'clock, and opened the evening's proceedings in a laudatory speech upon the objects of the society, admitting that he had examined carefully its constitution, &c. before granting the use of the Mansion. A paper was read by H. Ottley, Esq., the honorary secretary, after which, a programme of music of the best quality was performed by the following artists: Mlle. Parepa, Mad. Lemaire, Mad. Gilbert, Miss Palmer, Mad. Laura Baxter, Miss Susanna Cole, Miss Theresa Jefferys, Mad. Andrea, Signor Gardoni, Signor Ciampi, Signor Delle Sedie, Herr Herrmans, Mr. Wallworth; pianoforte, Miss M. Baxter; violins, Herr Rauch and Herr Hegar; violoncello, Herr Daubert, and a flute solo by Mr. B. Wells. The music was under the direction of Mr. Benedict and Mr. Alfred Gilbert, who presided alternately at the pianoforte.

THE KENTISH TOWN CHURCH CHORAL SOCIETY, held a musical conversazione, on Friday evening, which was attended by most of the principal inhabitants of the vicinity. Before the music commenced, the Rev. W. Calvert, president of the society, presented to the conductor, Mr. Alfred Gilbert, a handsome silver-mounted baton, which had been subscribed for by the ladies of the choir, as a token of their appreciation of his unvarying courtesy and kindness, and the ability he had displayed in conducting the musical arrangements of the society during the two years it has been in existence. Several solos sung by members were much applauded; especially a song, "When the heart is full of gladness," composed by a well-known musical amateur (Mr. A. H. Dendy); Handel's "Lascia ch' io piango", by Miss Booker, who possesses a fine voice; and Kücken's "Maid of Judah." The first and last of these were encored, as was, "The skylark", a trio composed by the conductor. Mad. Gilbert sang with her usual feeling and expression, and was unanimously encored; Mr. Walbanck, the tenor, gave Beethoven's "Adelaide", and a ballad by Balfe; Mr. G. Hodson sung an old English melody; Mr. Freame Reilly two of Mozart's compositions; and Mr. Alfred Gilbert a new pianoforte composition of his own "Grande valse de concert." The concerted pieces were chiefly glees and part songs. The entertainment, which was very creditable to all parties, appeared to give general satisfaction.

CROGER'S HARMONICON,—An ingenious invention of Mr. Croger has rendered the harmonicon (an instrument apparently becoming more and more in vogue), available not only for amusement, but for educational purposes. In the instruction book, advertised by the MUSICAL WORLD, and favourably noticed last week, a concise and easy system of acquiring a practical knowledge of transposition by the use of Mr. Croger's "transposing" harmonicon is laid down. The novelty of the instrument consists in the power of removing the place of any and every note of it, so that the scale of any key can be formed by simply changing the note or notes required. Mr. Croger's invention is well worth attention, and his instruments are manufactured in first-rate style.

THE CHURCH OF ALL SAINTS, KENSINGTON PARK.—(From a Correspondent.)—Amongst the number of those many churches in our metropolis which endeavour to stand out pre-eminently above their fellows by giving a correct and truthful, not to omit an educational character to their musical services, is the church of All Saints, Kensington Park. For no church service in this country have we ever felt a more earnest hope for its success than we do for this. If we omit the spotless, simple, yet majestically grand service of the Leeds parish church (than which a more perfect model could not have been conceived, and which, through the zeal and unflinching rectitude of that truly famous churchman, the Rev. Dr. Hook, has remained for years in its present perfect and unblemished condition, notwithstanding the many endeavours of the "foolish and ignorant" to spoil and mutilate it), there is no church where the service was more precisely and honestly given than at the church of All Saints, Kensington Park, on Sunday last. The pieces and responses to Tallis were properly and correctly intoned; the Te Deum and Jubilate were here ennobled by having some proper services associated with them; the anthem, that bugbear to so many uneducated minds in church music, was, as the rubric dictates, in its proper place. An extremely edifying and judicious sermon followed with the offertory, while the music in the communion service was well and carefully given, not omitting to mention the Sanctus, creditably given by an extremely well balanced choir, the training of which must have demanded Herculean labour. The church was literally crammed in every part, and required on the part of those who undertook the seating of so large a congregation considerable ingenuity in disposing of such a mass of persons. We cannot conclude without trusting that whoever may have the direction of this, beautiful as it now stands, may have the stability and the courage to pursue it heedless of any conflicting, which, let it be remembered, have nothing whatever to do with the church's ordinances; and that we may not on any future occasion have to record that the hand of destruction has passed over this beautiful church, and left its services one of those musical wrecks, of which we have frightful examples in some other places, as remarkable for their high and dry church feeling as they are infamous for their low and slow musical education.

THE FRENCH ORPHEONISTES.—The late visit of the French Orphéon Societies to this country has been brought again before the Court of Common Council, London. M. Delaporte, director of the festival, applied for the remission of 350*l.* paid to the corporation for the use of the hotels at the metropolitan cattle market on that occasion. M. Delaporte, who attended at the bar of the Court, stated in his memorial that, in promoting so novel an enterprise as the festival in question, numerous unforeseen expenses were incurred, that the amount received by him proved inadequate to cover the necessary outlay, and that in order to meet the deficiency he had incurred in his capacity of director a liability of 1161*l.* odd, which would fall upon the Orphéonist societies represented at that festival, composed of the poorest classes of the community. He asked that 350*l.* might be returned by the corporation through the medium of M. Le Baron Doyen, sub-governor of the Bank of France, and treasurer of the general committee of the French Orphéonist Societies. The petition led to a long discussion, and at length the subject was referred for consideration to the Committee.

PHONATION.—A work on the phenomena of the voice in connection with singing, or Phonation, as it is termed by the author, has been read by M. Bataille before the Academy of Sciences, Paris, and referred to a committee, consisting of the following members—Flourens, Claude Bernard, and Longet.

A SECOND PAGANINI.—A Leipsic correspondent, writing to the Athenæum, speaks in very high praise of a M. Lotto, a very young, but very fine, violinist, of the French school. The universal verdict is, that since Paganini no such "wonderful" player has been heard. We learn from the same source that a selection of forty of Sebastian Bach's songs, ten for each voice, taken from his various oratorios, cantatas, motets, &c., has been published by Whistling, of Leipsic. The selection has been arranged by Robt. Franz, who has arranged the accompaniments for the piano. M. Lotto is a pupil of M. Massart, one of the most respected professors in the Paris Conservatoire.

A BARBEROUS COMPLIMENT.—A popular hairdresser, who is also a fanatico per la musica, and a devoted admirer of the composer of Il Trovatore, has just invented a new pommade, which, by way of compliment to the great musical maestro, he has styled "Verdi grease." We have little doubt but that, like the hundreds of popular airs of Signor Verdi, this brilliant emanation of genius, à la perruque, will soon be in everybody's head.—Liverpool Porcupine.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

BACH'S PRELUDE and FUGUE, ALLA TARANTELLA,
As played by Miss ARABELLA GODDARD,
Is published, for the Pianoforte, price 5s., by Duncan Davison and Co., 244 Regent Street, W.
"The above composition, played by Miss Arabella Goddard at the Monday Popular Concerts, is one of the most individual, remarkable, and difficult pieces ever composed for a keyed instrument, and as practice for the fingers of both hands it is particularly recommended. An uninterrupted succession of running passages in the fugue gives to both hands equal strength and facility."

Reviews.

"Wagner's celebrated Opera, 'Tannhäuser,'" edited for the pianoforte (Boosey and Sons).

This forms No. 21 of "Boosey and Sons' Edition of Standard Operas for Piano Solo," and is unquestionably one of the most interesting of the series. The arrangement has the double merit of being faithful and moderately difficult. Not a piece, not even a recitative, is omitted. Every pianist, amateur or professional, who would like to know something of a man so unmercifully abused by one set of people and so unmercifully praised by another, will here find a sort of epitome of Wagner's inventive powers as a composer. What melody he can make is almost absorbed by Tannhäuser; for assuredly there is little in Lohengrin, none in Tristan, and less than none in Rheingold. In a letter from Paris a short time since, Wagner politely declines the offer, on the part of the Opera at Prague, to have his Rheingold brought out there at present. He (Wagner) "intends to get up a model performance" (next September), of his latest work, Tristan und Isolde, which is to be represented by the best artists, selected from all parts of Germany; and the year following there will be a similar performance of Rheingold. These performances are to be taken as models for the future. As an important principle is involved, and as the personal superintendence of the author is, in his opinion, absolutely necessary for the proper mise-en-scène of the two works, Herr Wagner trusts that no one will feel hurt at his refusal. Happily Tannhäuser presents no such extraordinary difficulties—at any rate, not in the very ingenious pianoforte arrangement before us. Wagner should get the anonymous "editor" of the Messrs. Boosey to "edit" his Lohengrin, Tristan, and Rheingold, after the same fashion as his Tannhäuser. Thus prepared for the most universal of instruments—although, it is true, they become what Herr Wagner styles "hammer-music, they are at least reduced to the ordinary conditions of intelligibility. For our own parts, we have played through this arrangement of Tannhäuser with considerable gratification, and can therefore recommend it with the less hesitation. We have also read with great interest and pleasure the masterly analysis of the book, which—under the head of "Tannhäuser, and the War of the Minstrels in the Wartburg"—stands as preface to the volume. This last, by the way, is remarkably well got up, correctly, and beautifully printed, and (none will complain of this) wonderfully cheap. If Tannhäuser possessed no other recommendation, it can boast of being the best abused opera (en attendant its successors) of the present or any other century. This alone must stimulate curiosity. Here moreover it is in the power of a tolerably skilled pianist to do in a couple of hours what it took the Academie Impériale de Musique et de Danse, under the immediate personal superintendence of Herr Wagner himself, six months to accomplish—and even then by no means to the composer's satisfaction.

"Après l'Orage"—par FREDERIC D'ALQUEN (Ashdown and Parry).

"Après l'Orage," indeed! Why after the storm? Why, M. D'Alquen, "after the storm," or "before the storm," or why "storm" at all, or anything else? In the name of the holy brotherhood of Querists, what has the music to do with the title, or the title with the music? Here are two pages in D flat, or thereabouts, filled with calm arpeggios symmetrically arranged in the manner of a mild waistcoat pattern, but otherwise unsuggestive, followed by two pages of a "pepper" of demisemiquavers enough to make one hoist an umbrella—"after the storm" though it be; and this again, gives way to the final coup, in the shape of more arpeggios of rather "louder" design than before. There really is no sort of merit in music of this kind. M. D'Alquen might use his time better than in making such things as can be produced, at per yard, by anyone who chooses to spoil paper in the business.

"Him I love dearest"—words by J. P. DOUGLAS, music by HENRY SMART (Leader & Cock).

If this beautiful song is not speedily on every pianoforte, it will say little for the musical taste of the day. Although—allowing for the very brief coda at the end of the second verse, through which the climax, by a simple device (the retention of a bass note, making the harmony, which would otherwise be the full close, a six-four instead of a common chord), is so exquisitely deferred—the form is that of the mere ballad, such is the expressive grace of the melody, such the glowing richness of the harmony, that it is as good as a thousand ballads in one. The professed ballad-makers, indeed, might fatten on it for a century. Any one bar — nay, half-bar — transplanted from its original place into one of their jumbles of heterogeneous chords and limping make-shift tunes, would shine like a sun in the midst of a morass. Mr. Smart, too, is lucky in having so evident a scorner of twaddle as Mr. J. P. Douglas, for his poet-in-ordinary.

"The Happy Hours," duettino for treble and tenor, words by BARRY CORNWALL, music by HENRY SMART (Leader and Cock.)

What "Him I love best," is as a ballad; the "Happy Hours" is (are?) as a duet. Two voices (of opposite sexes, be it understood) could not possibly unite more melodiously in song. The first theme—for the voices together—is as charming as it is simple; the second, led off by the treble and responded to by the tenor, until they mingle in one sweet strain, is not a whit less engaging. Why is not this music heard at the Monday Popular Concerts? R. S. V. P.—Mr. S. Arthur Chappell.

"Sylvia"—par CHARLES WEISBECKER (Ashdown and Parry).

Truly a pleasant little piece of pianoforte matter, creditable to the writer, and recommendable to players. It is shaped like a mazurka, and styled so as to make us know that M. Weisbecker is somewhat of a follower of Chopin — not deeply and intimately, as it were, but somewhat reverentially and afar off. Nevertheless, he makes pretty music — Chopin somewhat diluted, and thus more easily accessible to the uninitiated.

ENGLISH OPERA AT CROYDON. — Three entertainments have been given at the Public Hall, on Saturday, Monday and Tuesday evenings, by Mr. Melchor Winter, and his "Boudoir Opera Company." The opera on Saturday was Il Trovatore, with Miss Thirlwall as Leonora; Mr. Melchor Winter as Manrico, and Mr. Morelle as The Count di Luna. Miss Thirlwall unites, with a rich soprano voice, a graceful action and artistic expression. Mr. Melchor Winter is a tenor singer with a voice of sweetness, flexibility, and compass; and on Monday evening, although suffering from a severe cold, it was evident that his vocal powers were of a high order. The same may be said of Mr. Morelle, as a bass singer. The minor parts were all filled up in a creditable manner, and the celebrated "Miserere" chorus was rendered with much effect. The dresses were splendid, and great satisfaction was evinced by the audience.—Croydon Chronicle, 25 May.

THE OPERA COMIQUE.

Its Rise and Progress.

Les Rendezvous Bourgeois owed, doubtless, its sustained vogue, which even now defies the progress of time, to the humorous libretto of Hoffmann*; but the other works which I have mentioned, subsequently possessed an actual musical value, and though they could not bear a comparison with those of Boieldieu, which are distinguished by greater verve, they at any rate contain melodies most seductive from their natural and easy flow. Among the more remarkable pieces in the best productions of Nicolo may be mentioned: the introductory quatuor in Cendrillon, in which the heroine's song, "Il était un p'tit homme," is ingeniously interwoven with the motivo of the two sisters, "Arrangeons ces dentelles," and with the basso air, "Ma chère enfant, soyez tranquille!"—the duo between Clorinda and Thisbe in the same opera, "Ah, quel plaisir! Ah, quel beau jour!" Alcindor's air, "Conservez bien cette bonté," and the duo! "Vous l'aimez, donc, avec tendresse." In Le Billet de Loterie, the soprano air, which has become classical, "Non je ne veux pas chanter; in Joconde, the celebrated air in which Martin was enabled to exhibit the full compass and flexibility of his voice, "J'ai longtems parcouru le monde," the spirited duet, "Ah, monseigneur, je suis tremblante!" the stanzas, "Parmi les filles du canton," in which Mad. Gavandau achieved one of her successes; the quatuor, "Quand on attend sa belle," and lastly, the romanza, "Dans un délire extrême." In Jeannot et Colin the charming duet between Colin and Colette, "Tous mes plaisirs étaient les siens," the sweet romanza, "Oh, Jeannot me délaisse!" and the air which has likewise become classical, "J'ai perdu l'ami de mon cœur."

Etienne had entirely succeeded in arranging for the stage a little fable by Perrault, and he ventured to treat in the same manner a tale which La Fontaine had derived from "Orlando Furioso." The task was a more hazardous one; but it succeeded; and Joconde obtained an immense money success. The two collaborators, unwilling to allow the public enthusiasm in their favour to grow cool, brought out, before the success of Joconde was quite exhausted, Jeannot et Colin, a pastoral piece of the utmost simplicity, which succeeded, thanks to the graceful melodies of Nicolo, whose style was, beyond every other, suited to rustic subjects.

Although the scores of Joconde and that of Jeannot et Colin were superior to that of Cendrillon, they did not attain, at the time at least, an equal vogue. In the present day the result would be reversed.

Nicolo injured his health by excesses, which eventually shortened his life. He was not, in fact, more than forty-two when he died, March 23, 1848.

His last moments were embittered by seeing his rival Boieldieu elected a member of the Institute, when he had himself vainly sought admission at the same time into that learned body.

He left unfinished the score of Aladin, ou la Lampe merveilleuse, which was completed by Benincori;† but neither was the latter gratified by seeing the work performed, as he died a few days before the first representation, which took place on the 6th of February, 1822.

Nicolo produced no less than six Italian operas and thirty-three French operas, several of which were masterpieces in point of style, and yet, as I have before stated, the doors of the Institute were obstinately closed against him. It must be confessed that there is less difficulty in the matter nowadays.

Méhul.

I should compare Nicolo to the painter Lancret and Méhul to David. Nicolo allured one by the easy grace of his scores, by agreeable tableaux de genre; the masculine accents of Méhul, noble pages of history, were not always understood at first by the multitude. Of him may be said what Mozart said of his Don Juan, "I write for myself and for a few of my friends." Méhul also wrote for himself rather than for the public.

His excessive timidity of character, his kind-heartedness, which induced him to think of his friends before he took any care for himself, the pain he suffered from a few unwonted failures, domestic sorrows, and finally sickness, shortened his days and cast a gloom over his life.

He was born at Givet, a small town in the Ardennes, on the 22nd of June, 1763, according to some biographers, and on the 24th according to others. His father was a cook, and obtained in the sequel through his son's interest a place in connection with the corps of Engineers. He received lessons of music from a blind organist. The liveliness of his imagination enabled him to divine the resources of the organ, and he was soon rewarded with the post of organist in the church of the Récollets. Incited subsequently to join the community of Prémontrés by the chorus-master, Abbé Hanser, who discovered his promising bent, he received lessons from this learned master of counterpoint. Méhul while in this convent was second organist. The colonel of a regiment stationed at Charlemont happening to hear him, and being rich and a lover of music, brought him to Paris and provided for his subsistence.

Here Méhul made acquaintance with Glück, and the sincere admiration he professed for the works of the author of Iphigénie won him his friendship.

This intimacy introduced into opéra comique the Germanic element, which it had before wanted, and which was destined to revivify the style, and finally to bring forth the works of Hérold, in which are admirably mingled French esprit, Italian morbidezza, and German poetry. This is an important fact in the history of art.

Méhul had written a grand opera, Alonzo et Cora, the first performance of which did not seem likely to be at hand. The Opéra Comique opened its doors to him, and in 1790 his first piece, Euphrosyne et Coradin, ou le Tyran corrigé, the words of which were by Hoffmann, saw the light. At once Méhul conquered a high position among the composers of his time. Before writing Cora he had submitted to a long preparatory training by composing three operas on old libretti, and under the superintendence of Glück. It may, therefore, be said, that Méhul's talents were already ripe when he presented Euphrosyne et Coradin to the stage.

In this score are to be found both the merits and the defects which are attributable to this master, and which we shall discover in his other works; firmness in his orchestration, a sustained elevation of style, but, at the same time, a degree of coldness in the melody, and at times a certain monotony in the accompaniments.

The overture to Euphrosyne showed that Méhul had learned in the school of Glück the science of employing more robust orchestral combinations than was usual in other comic operas of the day. The piece which produced the deepest impression in this work was, and justly so, the duo of "La Jalousie", superior to anything at that time to be heard. The piece commences in subdued tones to these words,—

> "Gardez-vous de la jalousie, > Redoutez son affreux transport."

Little by little the orchestra becomes animated, and the peroration burst forth in the midst of rapid passages for the violins, and the howling of the trombones, at that time a rare instrument, and the more startling therefore in its effect. Méhul seems to have had the intention of depicting the fury of the Eumenides, and indeed Grétry, in his essay on music, says on this point:—"The explosion at the end seems to bring down the roof of the theatre to crush the head of the spectator. In this masterpiece Méhul exhibits the power of Glück when he was thirty." We must also cite, among the good parts of Euphrosyne et Coradin, the quatuor "Toutes trois, vous êtes jeunettes."

Immediately after this, the Opera hastened to bring out Alonzo et Cora, and the new scores of the same master, Stratonice, Adrien, &c.

*François Bénoit Hoffmann, born at Nancy, July 11, 1760, in his youth treated the writers of opéra-comiques with contempt, and in an epigram protested against the election of Sédaine on this account to a seat in the Academy. He made amends afterwards by writing a number of libretti, Adrien, Euphrosyne, &c. He died in April, 1828.

†Benincori, born at Brescia, March 28, 1779, wrote three little comic operas which were not successful. Grief at these successive disappointments increased the malady which brought him to the grave, October 30, 1821.

He returned to the Opéra Comique with Le jeune Sage et le vieux Fou (1793), and la Caverne (1794), which was played at Favart — the subject being the same as that of the piece produced under the same name by Lesueur at Feydeau the year before. Lesueur's work alone retained a vogue.

In 1797, Méhul met with a partial failure in Le jeune Henri, an opéra comique, the words of which were by Bouilly. It is well known that the overture pleased the public immensely, so much so that they wished to hear it played over again, and then refused to let the piece be finished. Nevertheless, after the curtain was let down, as a sort of consolatory tribute to the musician, the overture was asked for a third time, and thenceforth it became a classical piece at concerts with a grand orchestra.

In 1799, Méhul produced Ariodant, in which the wonted beauties of the author are once more to be found. The exact similarity of Hoffmann's libretto with that of Montano et Stephanie, by Berton, deducted from the success of Ariodant, in which occurs the well known air,

"Femme sensible, entends-tu le ramage."

Epicure (1800), the libretto of which was by Desmoustiers, and in the score of which Cherubini had taken some share, did not succeed, and the same was the case with Bion, an heroic pastoral by Hoffmann. Tragic subjects of this kind will never find favour at the Opera Comique, and the tendency of this theatre to copy the Grand Opera has always appeared to me prejudicial to the special character of the works to which it is devoted. This is a grand point, on which I intend to enlarge at the close of these studies. Méhul signally compensated himself for these failures, on the 19th of February, 1801, by the Irato of Marsollier.

The following circumstances are said to have given rise to this piece of buffoonery.

MUSIC IN BERLIN.

(From our own correspondent).

MOZART'S Zauberflöte, and Don Juan, Weber's Der Freischütz, Meyerbeer's Prophet, and Bellini's Norma, were the operas performed this last week at the Royal Opera House. A goodly list, I think you will acknowledge, both as regards variety, and what, perhaps, in the opinion of true musicians, is still better, quality. The execution of all these works, moreover, was, on the whole, highly gratifying, even to one who, like myself, has been so long accustomed to the admirable manner in which things are "done" at the Royal Italian Opera, under the direction of the inimitable Mr. Costa. May his shadow never be less, say I, although I am afraid the sentiment may not please certain rival conductors, whom the said shadow rather obscures perhaps.

There was a large and highly appreciative audience to hear the Zauberflöte, that great work of a great master. The part of Pamina was performed, for the first time, I believe, by Mlle. Lucca, the usual representative of the character being Mad. Harriers-Wippern. Comparisons, I am perfectly aware, are "oderous," especially between two ladies, and yet every one draws comparisons on every possible occasion. I shall, therefore, do so in the present instance, if only for the sake of being in the fashion. Of Mad. Harriers-Wippern and Mlle. Lucca, I certainly prefer the former lady. There is more unity or consistency, so to speak, in her performance. Her acting and singing blend so artistically together, that they produce, as it were, one homogeneous whole, which, as I take it, is the greatest triumph an artist can possibly achieve. There is no straining after effect. Everything is so easily accomplished, that the hearer fancies the task is one which is attended with no difficulty, and might be entrusted to anybody. Similar notions sometimes prevail with regard to writing a style like that of Jean Jacques Rousseau, or Lord Macaulay, commanding the Channel Fleet, and driving a one-horse chaise. Yet we know that it requires considerable skill to do any one of these things, and that it is not every person who possesses that skill—"Non cuivis homini contingit adire Corinthum." Mlle. Lucca is assuredly not equal to her fair colleague. Yet she is good—exceedingly good—in the part, which, in fact, offers so many opportunities for producing a favourable impression, that, to use a rather vulgar term, any artist who altogether fails to do so must be a "muff." Mad. Köster was admirable as the Queen of Night, and all the other parts were creditably filled.

Le Prophète was as attractive as ever, the house being crammed to the ceiling. The cast was partially new. In the first place, Herr Taubert conducted the work for the first time, and, considering that he undertook to do so at only a day's notice, is fairly entitled to high praise. Herr Theodore Formes was the misguided hero of the piece, and both sang and acted with uncommon talent. Mlle. Lucca appeared as Bertha, one of her most successful impersonations. She was enthusiastically applauded in the duet of the fourth act. As I informed you, in my last letter, Mad. Jachmann is away on leave of absence. Mlle. de Ahna was her substitute as Fides, and a very worthy substitute she proved. Her fresh beautiful voice was heard to excellent effect in the arioso of the second act.

Mlle. Emmy Lagrua concluded her "starring" engagement as Norma, having previously won all kinds of golden opinions from all sorts of people—including even some of the disciples of the Future ——— as Agatha in Der Freischütz. Her rendering of this genuinely German part was a complete triumph. The audience were fairly carried away by her execution of the grand scene, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," and of the Cantilena, "Und ob die Wolke," in both of which she was vociferously applauded. Her Norma is a fine performance, considered both in a vocal and a dramatic light. Her purity of intonation and facility of execution are perfectly charming and might well serve as a model for younger artists, and teach them what is to be effected by a thorough and conscientious study of the rules of classic style. Mlle. Lagrua sings without the slightest effort. And why? Simply because she has learnt to sing—a process too much neglected, I am sorry to say, by many fair artists of the present day, who fancy that all they require is to possess a voice. A man might almost as well imagine himself a Landseer or a Millais, because he had a box of colours and a set of brushes. Mlle. Lagrua was especially happy in the "Casta Diva" and the touching scene with Adalgisa, when the latter confesses her love for the false Roman, as well as in the pourtrayal of the struggle which agitates the breast of the deceived mother at the sight of her innocent children, calmly sleeping on the couch, and altogether unconscious of the danger to which they are exposed. At the conclusion of the opera, Mlle. Lagrua was well nigh overwhelmed with bouquets. Some enthusiastic admirer, also, flung her a laurel wreath, the sight of which occasioned an extra outburst of plaudits from all parts of the house. I am sorry to say that the orchestra was rather too noisy to please me, and that the chorus were far from being up to the mark on one or two occasions, especially in the last scene.

Mlle. Jauner-Krall continues to draw excellent houses at the Friedrich-Wilhelmstadt Theatre.

On the 12th inst. Herr Ries, the eminent Concertmeister, invited a number of musicians and amateurs to his house, for the purpose of introducing to them one of his former pupils, Herr E. Caudella, solo violinist to his highness Alexander John I., Prince of Moldavia and Wallachia. I was fortunate enough to be included in the list of honoured guests. Herr Caudella played several compositions of the modern school; among others, variations by David, and Vieuxtemps' "Rêverie." His style is distinguished for its elegance, certainty, purity and ease. I fully concur in the general opinion freely expressed that, with perseverance and study, the young artist will occupy a high rank in his profession. He already reflects great credit on his master, and that is no small praise. Mlle. de Ahna sang two compositions, full of melody, by Adolph Ries, and came in for a fair share of applause.

An exceedingly interesting performance of Rossini's Stabat Mater was given on Ascension Day, by the Meischner Gesangzirkel. I was particularly struck by the rendering of the introduction, the chorus a capella, and the Inflammatus. The soloists were well selected, and acquitted themselves most creditably, the whole entertainment producing a highly favourable impression on a fashionable and discriminating audience. As concerts are not so plentiful here as they were in the winter months, and as I should like to send a tolerably long letter, I would, if I could, give you a correct account of a concert lately given by Herr Constantin Decker, pianist, from St. Petersburgh. As it was, he might as well, on the present occasion, have remained in the capital of the Czar, or transported his piano to the wastes of Siberia, as far as I was concerned; although I made a point of attending. The Spaniards have a proverb, "Heaven deliver me from my friends;" and never was it more applicable than in this case. Herr Decker was formerly a favourite in Berlin, and, on his quitting that capital, left many friends behind him. Now, not only have those friends certainly not deserted him during his absence in the North, but they appear to have enrolled all their sons and daughters among their ranks, so that they have multiplied to an alarming extent. I could not help thinking of Lovell's exclamation when, in High Life below Stairs, he throws open the cupboard-door: "Why, Mrs. Kitty, your cat has kittened! Two toms and two tabbies!" All these friends of Herr Decker seemed to be present at his concert, and what is more, in order, no doubt, to prove their right to the appellation, appeared to have resolved he should not have a chance of mistaking them for strangers. They accordingly made themselves perfectly at home in the room, coming and going in the middle of the pieces, talking, laughing, and applauding with a vehemence more indicative of partiality than discrimination. The younger portion of the audience was particularly vociferous and demonstrative. The consequence of all this manifestation of Damonic-Pythian feeling was that I have not the clearest idea in the world of what Herr Decker can do and what he cannot; of what his compositions are worth, and what they are not worth. I think, however, I may venture to assert, with a due regard to truth, that Herr Decker is a very fair pianist, but that he is far from being such an artist as Herr Hallé, Mr. Benedict, Liszt, Mad. Pleyell, or, "facile regina," Miss Arabella Goddard. Before he gives his next concert, I would advise him to send a circular to his very numerous friends, asking each one for the loan of four thalers (a large sum here). By this means he will naturally lose them all, or, at any rate, their number will be so reduced as no longer to be a positive nuisance.

Our old friend, R—— has just returned from Brunswick, bringing with him some of the Leberwurst and several bottles of the Mumme, for which that small capital is so celebrated, besides a whole budget of musical news. During his stay, he heard Herr Joachim play Beethoven's violin-concerto, and Tartini's "Teufel's Sonata," as it is termed here, in a manner which fairly astonished the audience, accustomed as they are to listen to music executed in first-rate style. Joachim's style, however, is something more; but as you know it as well, or perhaps better than I do, I will not give you the elaborate description of it with which R—— has favoured me. The programme of the concert—which, by the way, I may as well mention was the last of the series of this year's Symphonie-Concerte—comprised Robert Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Franz Schubert's "Reitermarsch" scored by Liszt, and Wagner's overture to Tannhäuser. The latter was magnificently performed, it appears, and applauded to the echo. The Brunswick public must mind what they are about. If they do not take care, the manager of the theatre will be producing Tannhäuser itself. The other pieces were equally well played by the orchestra—which stands deservedly high in the estimation of all competent judges—and were greeted with hearty applause. "Après moi, le déluge." After Joachim Herr H. von Bülow! That gentleman gave a concert, "all to himself," on the 27th of April, when he played fourteen pieces. I wonder how he liked it, and, above all, I wonder how the audience liked it.

At the theatre, Grétry's Richard, Cœur de Lion, was revived, on the occasion of the Duke's birthday, and favourably received. It was well sung, well acted, and well put upon the stage. The new theatre, a very fine building, which will be a great ornament to the old town, is rapidly approaching completion. According to report, it is to be opened on the 1st of October, and the opera chosen to inaugurate it is Mozart's Don Juan. A more fitting selection could not well have been made. A grand military concert, that is to say, a concert at which the performers are all members of the various regimental bands, was given on the Duke's birthday. Among other compositions included in the programme were a hymn by Handel, a "Fackeltanz" by Meyerbeer, and a new march by the band-master-in-chief, Herr Zabel, under whose direction the concert took place.

From the various musical papers I have picked up the following scraps of intelligence. Mad. Jachmann-Wagner commenced her starring engagement at Dresden as Elizabeth, in Tannhäuser, and Mlle. Georgine Schubert, who has been playing a round of characters with great satisfaction to the public, closed hers, a short time since, as Marie in La Fille du Régiment. A fund has been established, at Leipsic, for the family of the late Carl Zöllner. Concerts in aid of it have been already given in Dresden, Magdeburg, Chemnitz, Vienna, Dantzig, Strassburgh, Liverpool, Ancona, Riga, Bucharest, Hanover, Reval, &c. The following contributions have also been received:—100 thalers from a concert given by the Orpheus Society in Boston, 100 thalers from the German Männergesang-Verein, in Cincinnati; 25 thalers collected by some Germans in the Labati prairie, Texas; 35 thalers from the German residents at Porto Alegro, Brazil; 122 thalers from Lübeck; and 500 thalers from the Liedertafel, in St. Petersburgh. At Stuttgard the opera has suffered severely by the loss—for a time at least; let us hope not permanently—of Herr Pischek and Herr Sontheim, the tenor. The former gentleman has had an apoplectic stroke, and the latter became deranged, so as to render it necessary for him to be placed in a lunatic asylum. From Wiesbaden, I learn that the grand festival of the Rhein-Main-Sängerbund is fixed for the 15th and 16th of June. The following are, at present, the arrangements of the Central Committee. On the 15th instant, the singers invited from other places to take part in the proceedings will be welcomed at the railway station by their brethren of Wiesbaden, and then make their way, in a grand procession, to the Kurhaus, where a general rehearsal will be held. The concert will take place in the same locality, at four o'clock, P.M., and commence with an orchestral work, followed by a choral composition for the whole body of vocalists. After this, each of the seventeen Societies present will sing a piece separately, and the concert will conclude with a second choral composition for all the Societies combined. On the 2nd day (Sunday) there will be a grand "Volksfest" on the Neroberg. At the theatre, Gounod's Faust is in rehearsal. One hundred and twenty-four Vocal Associations (of which 98 alone have sent in a list of 2,200 singers) have already signified their intention of taking part in the approaching Nuremberg Sängerfest. The Finance Committee has disposed of shares to the value of 48,000 florins. One great object of interest connected with the approaching festival appears to be a costly flag, to be carried, I presume, before the singers, on their march through the town, and costing 400 florins. The Germans can never do anything without processions, headed by gay banners in the daytime, or coruscating, if I may use the term, with blazing torches at night. It strikes me that there is a great deal of puerility about all this, but I have no doubt it is quite correct and sensible. At any rate, it is, to a limited extent, good for trade, and delights the simple-minded patrons of Kartoffeln-Salat, who, it must be confessed, are in some things a rather simple-minded people. In England we generally leave such modes of display to charity-children out for a holiday, Temperance Societies, and the Ancient Order of Foresters.

I have nothing more to say for the present, except VALE.

Letters to the Editor.

FILBY versus AUGMENTED TONE.

Sir,—Of course I must admire the apostasy of your correspondent "Augmented Tone," whose extreme candour has given his communication an augmented tone, and who appears to have been a self-constituted judge and jury in a trial of "inclination versus judgment," and to have returned a verdict for the defendant.

I could never expect any one—who, from prejudice or long association, adheres to the mutable minor scale—to give up his convictions until his judgment shall have been fairly convinced—until he shall have discovered the fine combinations which result from the use of the permanent mode, and which he is debarred from in using the other. In this, as in general life, the improvement should necessitate the change, and not vice versâ.

In complying with the wish of your correspondent, I must premise that the subjoined specimens have been framed more with regard to utility than to novelty or ingenuity. Other remarkable progressions have come under my notice, which, for my previous reason and for economy of space, I am obliged to suppress.

It will be observed that I use the real, instead of the accepted, signatures.

Scale as a bass:—

Scale as a melody:—

From these it will be seen that the permanent minor is the legitimate domain of the diminished seventh, and that it here becomes practicable and useful. Of this fact Mendelssohn, Spohr, Chopin, and Schumann must have been profoundly aware. Of this fact Meyerbeer, Stephen Heller, and our (I say it with pride) G. A. Macfarren must be deeply sensible. For do not their works testify its truth ?

Let not our readers suppose that this scale is essentially modern, for it may be found (not to go back quite so far as your tutelar saint, Job de Pacheco) in the works of Mehul, Scarlatti, Rameau, Purcell, &c. &c.

One word to your correspondent "Dominant" (of some three months' standing). I do not consider the mediant a desirable degree to carry common chord; but, if I use it at all, it certainly should contain an augmented fifth. I do not acknowledge a relative major—which is not remarkable, as my near kin do not happen to be in the army.

Trusting you will find space for this,

I am, Sir, yours every faithfully,

23, Kensington Park Terrace, W. W. C. Filby.

In re GILBERT audi GADSBY.

Sir,—I quite agree with Mr. Bennett Gilbert, in his saying, "In justice to myself, and to my reputation, allow me emphatically to disclaim all connection with the Three Idylls," as it appeared by the review that the authorship of the other Three Iddylles was attributed to him; however, I consider it very honorable of Mr. Bennett Gilbert to refute this idea, more especially as the Iddylle "Vivien" (with the name of Gadsby attached to it) was considered by you to be the best of the four.

I should not have troubled you with this epistle, sir, considering I had the more flattering notice, but to take the opportunity of thanking Mr. Gilbert, and readily granting pardon to you, for an error that arose from the similitude in the printing of the four morceaux.

I am, Sir, yours obediently,

60, Albert Street, Mornington Crescent. Henry R. Gadsby, (Author of "Vivien.")

Miss Fanny Corfield, the talented and very successful pupil of Professor Bennett, gave a matinée of Classical Pianoforte Music, on Saturday, at the Hanover Square Rooms. The young lady provided a most unexceptional programme, and gave a concert, indeed, of rare excellence. She was assisted by Herr Molique at the violin, M. Paque at the violoncello, and by Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington and Miss Marian Moss as vocalists. The instrumental selection comprised Spöhr's duet in E, for pianoforte and violin; Dussek's sonata for pianoforte, No. 3, Op. 35, in C minor; Beethoven's pianoforte and violin sonata, in G, Op. 30, No. 3; Haydn's Trio, in G. minor, for pianoforte, violin and violoncello; and "The Harmonious Blacksmith," by Handel. Miss Fanny Corfield is to be commended unreservedly for contributing to the programme Dussek's splendid sonata, which the initiated reader will recognise as number one of the set of three dedicated to Clementi. The fair artist's performance was characterised by great neatness and facility of execution, and undeviating good taste and judgment. In Beethoven's sonata for violin and pianoforte, the pianist fairly divided the applause with the violinist, Herr Molique, and the performance was admirable throughout—the gem of the concert, indeed. The vocal music was akin to the instrumental in point of merit. Mad. Sherrington sang "Angels ever bright and fair," a melodie by Schubert, and Bennett's "May dew"—all three exquisitely given; while Miss Marian Moss displayed her sweet voice and agreeably unpretending style in Mozart's "Vedrai Carino" and Spohr's "Rose softly blooming." The attendance was elegant and numerous.

Beethoven Rooms.—A matinée was given at the above rooms, on Thursday week, by Mrs. Dundas, the pianist, which comprised the services, in addition to those of the fair concert-giver, of Herr F. Hegar (violin), Herr Oberthür (harp), Master Butler (flute), Mr. Lidel (violoncello), and Mr. Klindworth (piano), instrumentalists; and Miss Armstrong, Miss Steele, and Mr. Redfearn, vocalists. Mrs. Dundas, a neat and graceful executant, played Beethoven's sonata in C sharp minor, Op. 27, and Mendelssohn and Moscheles' Duo Concertante, for two pianos, "La Marche Bohemienne," from Preciosa, with M. Klindworth. Although the programme possessed no grand attraction, there were some points of special interest. Herr Oberthür's harp-playing constituted a great feature, and Master Butler delighted everybody by his really extraordinary performance on the flute. In the vocal music Mr. Redfearn particularly distinguished himself, displaying his pure tenor voice and correct style in an English ballad and Mendelssohn's "Hunter's Song." Mr. Arthur O'Leary accompanied the vocal music on the pianoforte.

Madame Puzzi's Concert.—This very interesting annual affair came off at the Hanover Square Rooms, on Monday afternoon, in presence of a brilliant and crowded audience. The programme, though not exactly of the monster kind, was extra-longitudinous, and comprised nearly all the vocal talent not engaged at the Opera in the metropolis. Moreover, there were five conductors, among whom Mr. Benedict and Signor Schira. From the selection, which included no less than four-and-twenty pieces, we can only cite a few for especial mention. Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington supplied the Shadow-song from Dinorah as her special display,—Mlle. Parepa, the air "Le serment" for hers—both eminently successful; Signor Gardoni the romance, "Le Chemin du Paradis," one of his most finished and refined efforts; Mad. Gassier, who made her first appearance in London for two years, the valse, "Ah! che assorta," with more than the old brilliancy, and, with M. Gassier, Iradier's duet, "Iota de los Toreros," given with extreme national unction; Mad. Rieder, the "Carneval de Venise," with variations—a very admirable performance; Signor Solieri, the romance of Donizetti, "E morta," a highly expressive and neat specimen of Italian vocalization; besides other contributions, single, duplicate, and triplicate, by Mad. Lemaire, Miss Susan Pyne, Miss Augusta Thomson, Mr. Henry Haigh, Mr. Patey, Mr. Alberto Laurence, Signors Delle Sedie and Ciabatta. The instrumental part boasted of a new fantasia by M. Ole Bull, a solo on the pianoforte by Mlle. Elvira, Del Bianco Thalberg's Sonnambula, on the same instrument, by Signor Andreoli, &c. &c. The concert concluded with Martini's trio "Vadasi via di quà," sung in chorus by the whole company.

Italian Opera, Lyceum.—A short season of Italian opera is to commence on Saturday, June 8th, at the Lyceum, under the lesseeship of Mr. J. H. Mapleson. The prime donne already announced are Mlle. Titiens, Mad. Gassier (her first appearance these two years), Mad. Lemaire, Mlle. Sedlatzek, and Mad. Alboni; Signori Belart, Mercuriali, Tito Palmieri (his first appearance in England), and Giuglini. Signor Delle Sedie, of the principal continental theatres, will make his debût on the opening night, and Signors Gassier, Casaboni, Mr. Patey, Herr Hermanns, and Signor Vialetti will also perform during the season. Signor Arditi is to be the director and conductor, and Mr. H. Blagrove the leader of the orchestra. The orchestra will be selected from Her Majesty's Theatre and the Philharmonic Society, and will be complete in all departments. The chorus has likewise been chosen from Her Majesty's Theatre, and will be under the direction of Signor Vaschetti.

Musical Art-Union.—This new society gave its first concert last night in the Hanover Square Rooms. The principal feature was an orchestral symphony by Herr Anton Rubinstein, entitled Ocean.

M. Halle gave his third Beethoven recital yesterday afternoon in St. James's Hall. The two sonatas, Op. 14, the sonata, Op. 22, and the sonata Op. 26 were performed again—all from memory.

New Organs Opened.—On Sunday the 19th inst., a new organ by Conacher & Co., Huddersfield, was opened in the Parish Church, Thorner, near Leeds; another instrument, by the same builders, was opened on the same day in the Parish Church, Sowerby, near Halifax. This organ is the munificent gift of John Rawson Esq. of Brockwell, near Halifax, and is erected in memory of his uncle, the late Wm. Priestley Esq. On the 29th Inst., a large new organ by Conacher & Co. was opened in the Wesleyan Chapel, Burnley. All these instruments are very highly spoken of, the workmanship being thoroughly good, and the tone of a full round and musical quality.

The Conservative Land Society.—The two seats at the Board of Directors, vacant by the retirement of B. H. Adams, Esq., and the Rev. Dr. Worthington, have been filled up by the election of H. W. Currie, Esq., of Norfolk Street, Park Lane, and C. E. Newcomen, Esq., of Ovington Square, Brompton, who are now members of Executive Committee.

LONDON: SATURDAY, JUNE 1, 1861.

THE much-talked-of organ for Manchester Cathedral has been completed and opened at last. Three weeks since we quoted a long paragraph from a Manchester cotemporary, wherein the what and the how of the musical doings on the occasion were sufficiently noticed, but as little as possible was said of the organ itself; and this, perhaps, for a very good reason. We shall "live and learn," doubtless, on this point, as on most others. Meanwhile we have something to say, as well about the organ as about the curious circumstances which helped its builder to place it where it is. While the matter was in a condition of little better than talk, we felt a delicacy, for many reasons, about interfering. In the first place, a London journal might be supposed to affect too exclusively metropolitan notions. Again, Manchester, we concluded, was quite strong enough to take care of its own interests. Among the literary staff of its press are men who can, and fequently do, discuss musical affairs with no small amount of ability and spirit. In one instance, at least, this has been unmistakeably shown on the very question in hand. The most influential of the Manchester papers, on more than one occasion, put forth sundry columns of able and technically-argued remonstrances against the thing then doing by the Cathedral authorities. All to no purpose, however. They chose to do the thing their own way, and they have done it. So there's an end—no, there is not an end to it. We cannot mend the past, but we may reasonably hope to influence the future; and, in this spirit, have now to ask, "How, in the name of the year 1861, came such an organ to be placed in the Cathedral Church of Manchester?"

And first, as to the instrument itself. The latest intelligence on this point we derive from a provincial cotemporary, which describes a private exhibition of the organ at its builder's manufactory in Worcester; and, among other particulars, sets forth that all present—professors, amateurs, church dignitaries, and newspaper critics—were highly delighted with its excellence. Of course we are treated to the usual string of unmeaning phrases proper to such occasions: the tone is "rich," "full," "brilliant," and all the rest of it. No doubt it is. We should much like to know when as much hasn't been said on a similar provocation The question is, what is likely to be said in time to come? When the ceremony of the debût is forgotten—when the organ has to speak for itself in its own cathedral—when Worcester (with the money in its pocket) has made its final bow to Manchester, and the organist, fairly left alone with his instrument, comes to ponder on his certainty that, for better or for worse, he must cleave to it for at least the next five-and-twenty years—when all these "whens" shall have been accomplished, will all parties concerned be quite so satisfied with their bargain as they are now represented to be? By way of help to a guess, we need but glance at the plan on which this instrument is built. It has three rows of keys of the usual CC compass, and the ordinary two-octave pedal clavier. The list of its stops is as follows:—

Now, seriously—without knowing how well or ill the organ has been finished—without caring to inquire about the probabilities of its workmanship—we merely ask what that is really fine and grand in the way of tone could be got, by any constructive skill, out of such a scheme as this? It reads like a plan that might have dawned on any cogitative grandfather of the present race. With a trifling exception, it might have walked straight out of the atelier of old Father Smith, just after all German notions had been frozen out of his brain by the English ignorance and parsimony of his time. Not to speak of inventive talent—we remember no large organ-plan of late times that betrays such an absence of reading—such a contemptuous indifference to all that the continent has done, to a few fine examples at home, and to the mass of information which, for some years past, has been floating about on the subject. It shows no evidence of design—no glimpse of the well-recognised principle that the secret of effect lies in varieties of quality—nothing, in short, save a reverential adherence to the old "rule of thumb." It is a very common church organ, magnified by the aimless duplication of some of its parts, instead of a great instrument, designed for a special site, on some clear and defensible principle. Its great-organ is without dignity and character; its swell without force and variety; its choir (with an aforesaid trifling exception) is utterly commonplace; and its pedal-organ fitly accompanies the remainder. Not, we presume, to be altogether behind the age, a startling novelty crops out on the choir manual in the shape of a "grand ophicleide on high pressure." But this seems only curiously contrived to give a lop-sided tendency to all beside it; for if this "great ophicleide" be not merely the shadow of a name—if it be really voiced with that energetic brilliance to which the great English builders have accustomed us—it will assuredly find, in the rest of the scheme, nothing wherewithal to match itself.

And such is the plan of an organ which, in the year 1861, has been thought worthy to be placed in the Cathedral of the second greatest city of this empire! No doubt, all manner of apologies will be made for it. We are informed, for instance, that it is very well made, that it has the pneumatic lever for its great-organ touch, and divers other mechanical excellencies into the bargain. And thil may all be true, while utterly uncompensating the original vices of its design. Tone, and tone only, must be the final test of every instrument; and when the Cathedras authorities of Manchester have shown that their organ is capable, in this respect, of satisfying the exigencies of its position, they will have added one more to the large stock of wonders which their city can already boast.

Again, if the Manchester chapter were resolved not to have their organ built in London (and we do not intend to insist that they were wrong in so resolving), why, of all places in the kingdom, must they needs go a-marketing to Worcester? On what grounds have the claims of the resident builder in that city been permitted to extinguish those of all his provincial rivals? This will be hard to answer, we imagine. A man must win his spurs before he is allowed to wear them; and it is no disrespect to Mr. Nicholson to say, that whatever may be the merit of his smaller works, he has produced no large instrument of high character enough to guarantee his success when entrusted with any of those great opportunities, necessarily rare, such as placing an organ in one of our cathedrals. It seems to us that, in this matter, the capitular body have contrived to make a double-barrelled blunder. They have not done the best possible thing for their church, and at the same time have passed a very undeserving slight on their fellow-citizens, Messrs. Kirtland and Jardine, who are, beyond all doubt, the best provincial organ-builders in the kingdom. It would be simply ridiculous, almost offensive, to compare the bundle of flat common-places we have described with the fine scheme of the equally fine instrument which Messrs. Kirtland and Jardine erected, long since, in St. Peter's church. This organ is known and admired by all the best judges in the country; and we are rendering it the barest justice in stating our belief that, both in the comprehensive excellence of its plan, and the pains-taking and artistic skill bestowed on its execution, it is entirely unequalled by anything of provincial, and but few specimens of metropolitant origin. It is not faultless—we know that nothing is—but its faults are not those of design; above all, its builders are not "bumptious" people;—they are among the few of their order who believe there may be something of the art yet to learn, and this, perhaps, furnishes a not inconsiderable reason for trusting them to the extent of their present acquirement. If, then, London was to be excluded, these builders of this fine Manchester church-organ were the people who ought to have been commissioned to execute a still finer work for the cathedral. By merit and by locality this was their right; and, had it been accorded to them, doubtless they would have denied neither cost nor skill to the completion of an instrument of which their city might have been justly proud.

It is the most disagreeable part of our task to speak of the influences by which the existing arrangement has been brought about. Our information bids us believe that one of the canons, having succeeded in getting the matter into his own hands, chose to ignore the existence of Mr. Harris, the cathedral organist, and to take for his sole councillor Sir Frederic Ouseley, by whose advice the present scheme and builder were decided on. Thus, it would appear, that Sir Frederic Ouseley's judgment was invoked because he was a clergyman, and had not to play the organ, while Mr. Harris's opinion was unasked, on the equally illogical ground, that he had to play the organ, but was not a clergyman. Now, we have the highest possible respect for Sir Frederic Ouseley's personal character, much consideration for his office as the Oxford Professor of Music, and not a little genuine esteem for his talents as a musician. For these reasons we the more regret the many indications now floating about that, owing to a fellowship of cloth, or what, in another calling, would be termed esprit du corps, he should be liable to be placed in a false position in matters of this sort. Doubtless, the clergy, generally, regard Sir Frederic as a phenomenon, esteem him one of the greatest living musicians, and, in the construction of instruments, to possess a knowledge of all that has been done between the days of Tubal Cain and Cavaillée Coll. This may be natural enough, but yet may largely exceed the warranty of facts. Indeed, a large amount of theoretical and executive musicianship may exist without the slightest knowledge of the mechanism of instruments. As there are always exceptional causes of failure, it would be scarcely fair, perhaps, to quote, in proof of this, the organ designed by Sir Frederic Ouseley himself for his own church.

On such points as what an organ should contain, who should build it, &c., there will always be diversities of opinion. Doubtless, the clergy of a cathedral, who provide the money, are entitled to a large share in the discussion. All this being granted, however, there remains no excuse for the manner in which Mr. Harris, after thirty years of highly meritorious service, appears to have been treated in the matter of the Manchester organ.

IT is not very difficult for a writer on the public press to obtain a character for originality. All he has to do is simply to contradict universal opinion, and insist that he alone is right. Moreover, this is a very convenient mode of dealing with criticism, as it brings judgment into no contact, and nobody can establish injurious comparisons. In fact, it is the only safe way for an ignorant scribe, since by condemnation he avoids analysis, and by opposition pledges himself to no particular ideas. He is a shrewd penman, however, who can thus run tilt at the whole world, and manage to secure to himself some modicum of fame. He knows that many are ill-natured and are too glad to hear others abused, and that an air of superiority always attaches to censure. Such a writer, in some respects, is the "London correspondent" of the Liverpool Albion, whose strictures, or, more properly, speculations, have ere now found room in our columns, partly from their novelty, partly from their amusing nature, and on one or two occasions because they happened to coincide with our own opinions. The "London correspondent" was certainly in the right when he directed all his energies against the sensation attempted to be got up for Mlle. Johanna Wagner, some years ago—which is not at all to be wondered at, as he attempts to put down every new success. Nevertheless, he makes a direct misstatement in his letter of last week, when he affirms that "the whole world was blowing Mlle. Wagner's trumpet," except himself; which was so far from being the case, that the leading metropolitan journals showed little admiration for her talent, and we ourselves never flinched from stating our unfavourable opinion. A writer who propounds statements so dogmatically should have a good memory.

The "London correspondent," in his most recent epistle in the Albion, has levied the whole battery of his artillery against the success of Mlle. Adelina Patti—as on principle he was bound to do, seeing that her success was almost unprecedented. This was too good an opportunity to let pass; and so, with the air of "Sir Oracle," all the critics of the press are written down as asses, and the "correspondent" himself glorified as the only true thinker, and the one who alone has the honesty to proclaim his opinions.

"Patti, much to her own surprise," writes the correspondent, "finds herself first among the foremost of several at the same house, whom she would have been flattered to have been deemed a worthy second to a fortnight ago. She has not the voice of Penco; she has not the execution of Miolan Carvalho; and not only can she not act like Csillag, but she can hardly be said to act at all. Yet she transcends the whole trio in popularity already, at least in paper popularity; but how far such crowns partake of foolscap it would be unwise to conjecture. Certainly there is, thus far, little of that brain turning on the part of the many-headed monster which might be inferred from the jubilations of the journals. The public, news-led and nose-led as they are, have been told to accept her as phenomenon, and they do accept her accordingly; for what would be the use of a community paying for thinking machines, and yet the things on two legs pretending to have an opinion of their own? But although the said machines purvey judgment for their purchasers, they cannot supply enthusiasm, any more than matrimony can buy love."

The impertinence conveyed in the above paragraph would be altogether unworthy of notice were it not mixed up with an attempt to shirk the truth in every way. Mlle. Patti's success could not have occasioned any surprise in those who had known her career in America; and as for the young lady's own expectations, and the good opinion she entertained of herself, these may be gathered from the exorbitant terms she demanded from the director of the Royal Italian Opera, and the confidence she displayed on the opening night. There was nothing, indeed, fortuitous in Mlle. Patti's success. It was by far the most legitimate since that of Alboni in 1847. It was altogether unexpected, and was achieved without premeditated favour, without puff, claque, or organisation of any kind. Of how few singers could this be alleged! If there was any influence exercised at all, it proceeded from the public, who were really enthusiastic the first night, and not from the critics who had to express their opinions afterwards. The affirmation, then, about the "public being news-led and nose-led," although extremely witty, is entirely false, since the public were the first who declared the singer a phenomenon; and the notices in the public prints, next day, were but the echoes of the preceding night's jubilations.

The comparisons with Mesdames Penco, Miolan Carvalho, and Csillag must have been forced from "Correspondent," seeing that in another part of his letter he attests to Mlle. Patti being "a genuine artist, and consummate musician, as well as vocalist." Could he lay his hand on his heart, and honestly say as much of any one of the three singers with whom he has placed her in competition? Must he plead ignorance or forgetfulness for this unfortunate slip of the pen? But he tells us, too, that the new prima donna is destined to be "great in small parts," an acknowledgment very like a contradiction of what he has asserted in the paragraph quoted above. "Correspondent's" idea of "great" and "small," however, appears to be of rather a loose nature, if we may be permitted to judge from his denominating Bellini's Sleep Walker "a meagre part." Poor Amina! No doubt "Correspondent" never saw the Somnambula, never read the book, never perused the score, never knew that the part was written and the music composed for Pasta, nor that Malibran had achieved her greatest laurels in the character, nor that Jenny Lind followed in Malibran's footsteps, nor that—but why adduce more "nors" when it is evident "Correspondent" was writing without the remotest knowledge of the subject, which, indeed, is his only excuse for giving publicity to opinions so absurd.

But "Correspondent's" auguries are as unlikely to gain him the name of a true prophet as his sentiments that of a shrewd thinker. "The furore in favour of the new prima donna, Patti," he writes the day on which Lucia di Lammermoor was to be produced, "will probably be abated by her Lucia to-night." Mlle. Patti's second essay brought no abatement of favour, as our readers are now aware, so that the writer's prophecy has proved all moonshine. The correspondent of the Liverpool Albion may be extremely clever, but we fancy he would prove it more if he would be guided oftener by truth and strive less to differ from the majority, who in the end are sure to be right. To be original is a great matter, but, in our humble opinion, it is far greater to be consistent with truth, even though praise do not always follow. Besides, the fact of one being continually in error may sometimes be accepted as a proof of ignorance, when there is danger that even writers like the correspondent of the Liverpool Albion may be ignored as oracles.

THE LEEDS' FESTIVAL.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

Leeds, 29th May, 1861.

Sir,—If the article in your last week's paper had appeared in a local print, I should have paid no more attention to it than I usually do to similar effusions,—the absurdities and falsities it contains being patent to all who are conversant with the position of affairs in Leeds—and whose judgment is not warped by prejudice. But appearing as it does under the sanction of your own pen, I think it proper not only to set the public right in the matetr, but to point out to yourself, sir, the inaccuracy of the statements by which you must have been misled, before you could have permitted such an article to appear in your paper.

It is not my business to discuss the motives which actuated the editor of the Leeds and West Riding Express in his explanation of the causes which led to the abandonment of the projected festival. Whatever they were, the causes are truly stated, and I will, with your leave, make a few remarks on your strictures on each of them in turn.

1. The visit of the Royal Agricultural Society.
2. The dullness of trade.

These must be considered together. There is not, indeed, any immediate connection between fat beasts, linseed, swillings, &c, &c., and high art — but as we are to have the fat beasts at all events, and are, I hope, determined to give a hearty and hospitable welcome to the "sturdy yeomen," and the many more delicate specimens of humanity whom we expect to see on that occasion, the dullness of trade (which is a fact, whatever your informant may think — and, judging from his ignorance of most things, I should not set him up as an authority on this point) — the dullness of trade may well make us consider whether we should be inclined to go through a second course of similar expenditure in the same year. Leeds wishes not to do by halves anything it undertakes — and it would be a poor way of showing its advancement to rush into the Gazette for the want of a little common prudence, and the sake of a little vain display. Nor would the subscribers to the guarantee-fund be very well pleased with a committee which, with the present difficulties staring it in the face, persisted in incurring the risk with almost a certainty of having to fall back upon that fund. The surplus of the last festival was 2000*l.* — not 1000*l.*, as your informant says — but the circumstances were peculiar. The opening of the Town Hall by the Queen in person, and the presence of her Majesty in Leeds immediately before the festival, were sufficient to insure a large profit. A first festival is almost always a success — a second in the same place almost always a failure.

3. The exorbitant demands of the vocalists.—As you characterize this reason as "sheer twaddle," and italicize the statement that "no vocalist was even written to," I must be allowed to say equally emphatically that this statement is a "sheer falsehood." Your informant should not speak so positively of what he knows nothing about. He proceeds to talk of the sum paid at the last meeting to "The Piccolomini and Alboni party;"—no such party was engaged. The engagement of Mad. Alboni was entirely separate, and the sum is wrongly stated. "The terms of the English vocalists would not, we dare say, have been more than heretofore."—Dare you? They are. These matters are worth noticing only as showing that your informant is talking of matters on which he is entirely ignorant.

4. The meeting of the British Association at Manchester. As this commences on the very day fixed for the Festival, and lasts exactly the same time, the absurd parallel of Mr. Spurgeon is inapplicable.

5. The resignation of Mr. Joy.—No one who knew anything about the working of the former Festival, and how and by whom the work was done, could have made the ridiculous and insolent remarks about the honorary secretaries which you have admitted into your article. As one of the number, I certainly do not intend to take further notice of those remarks, but all who are acquainted with Mr. Joy will understand what a loss the experience and intimate knowledge of all the requisites of an orchestra possessed by him would be to a committee, especially under circumstances requiring them to be fortified with every available assistance.

6. The behaviour of the Chorus-Master.—You say "I believe this sixth and last reason to be the long and short of the whole business." "I believe!" Who is I? Where is the editorial "we?" A slip of the pen, Mr. Editor, but one which shows that the whole article is the emanation of some local correspondent, with very imperfect knowledge, and very partial views. Why could he not write in his own name as I do? Then it would be known what his opinions were worth. But to return. Let me begin by stating that I am the only member of the Chorus Committee of the Festival connected with the Leeds Madrigal and Motet Society. I cannot, therefore, consider the remarks made in your paper on this point as otherwise than personal, except on the primâ facie probability of your correspondent being mistaken on this as on all other points. The facts are these: Mr. Burton was elected chorus-master, and accepted the appointment unconditionally. Afterwards a sub-committee was appointed (of whom I was one) to select a chorus. Moreover, subsequent resolutions pointed out to this sub-committee from what sources they were to make their selection. They made their selection, and reported to the Orchestral Committee, adding this proviso, out of consideration to the chorus-master, that if he had any doubts of the efficiency of any one chosen, he might have him or her tested by an independent musician of eminence (Mr. Henry Leslie and Mr. Hullah were mentioned). The suggestion was mine. The cause of it was a knowledge on my part that the members of the Leeds Madrigal and Motet Society (the oldest society in the town) had a natural objection to be tested by the chorus-master, who was confessedly inimical to the Society. Your correspondent (as usual wrong, even when the truth would have served him better) says that "Mr. Burton limited his selection from the Leeds Madrigal and Motet Society (Mr. Spark's) to a very small number." Mr. Burton did nothing of the kind. He said that he only knew a small number, and these he would admit without trial, and that he would admit as many more as came up to his standard. For anything I know, Mr. Burton might have admitted the whole Society. What I contended for was the principle (which I think Mr. Burton might have adopted as the best for himself), that no ground should be given to any one to say that partiality had been shown.

Well, Mr. Burton declined the terms proposed by the sub-committee, and therefore the general committee decided to ignore the acts of those they had deputed to perform a specific duty, and bowed to the dictum of their servant, Mr. Burton; which of course they had a right to do, though it looks, and to me feels rather like an insult to the sub-committee. You say "Mr. Burton acted very properly. What would Costa, Mellon, Benedict, or any other conductor say to a committee if interfered with in the selection of a band or chorus for any great occasion?" I don't know — nor do I care. Mr. Burton was not Costa, or Mellon, or Benedict, or any conductor at all. He was merely a chorus-master, who was bound to take and train as well as he could any chorus put under his care. I don't question his ability. I supported his appointment, and do not doubt that he could have made the Madrigal and Motet society do, as one of the most eminent of living chorus-masters has assured me he could—"any mortal thing."

I am not aware that I have anything further to add except this, which I state most emphatically, that as far as I am concerned (and I believe I can say the same for the other members of the sub-committee), the question has not been one between Mr. Burton and Mr. Spark, or any one else than the committee. Mr. Spark has not, and has never had, any part of my regards in the present question. My object has not been to support a party, but to prevent one party from swamping another. I am aware that this will be met by an incredulous smile by some, and by loud jeers from others; but as I am conscious of good intentions, and a sincere desire of fair play, and as I am sure I cannot be accused of shirking the real hard work of a Festival, I care neither for covert sneers nor vulgar bluster.

I am, Sir, your obedient Servant,

JOHN WM. ATKINSON,

Vice President of the Leeds Madrigal Motet Society, and late Hon. Secretary of the Leeds Musical Festival Committee.

[Is it not singular that, in all these letters and articles about the Leeds Festival, not one allusion should be made to the most important man who had any hand in it—viz., Professor Bennett, the conductor? Ordinary lookers-on might naturally suppose the whole and sole direction to be vested in him; in which case the squabbles between Messrs. Spark and Burton would have been of small consequence. —ED.].

RIGA.—A member of the operatic company, who, on account of his inefficiency and overbearing arrogance, is by no means a favourite, had been rather severely criticised in the local paper. In consequence of this, he waited in the street, and as the editor, Dr. Beckhaus, was walking home on his return from the theatre, came on that gentleman from behind, and ill-treated him so severely that the Doctor has had to keep his bed for several days.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

MLLE. Adelina Patti's second impersonation was looked forward to with the greatest interest and curiosity, and a fuller attendance we do not remember at the Royal Italian Opera on any former occasion than on Saturday, when the young artist was announced for the heroine in Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor. Her two previous performances in the Sonnambula had literally worked up the Opera public to the highest pitch of expectation. We cannot say, however, that these exorbitant expectations were entirely realised. Indeed, with an artist who has such great instincts, and, as far as we are permitted to judge at present, possesses such an intuitive knowledge of character, this was impossible. The character of Amina is far more difficult to embody than Lucia, and requires far greater histrionic powers, as may be easily conceived, when it is remembered that the former was written for Pasta, the empress of lyric tragedy, and the latter for Persiani, the Queen of bravura singing. As a test of the capabilities of the actress, it was consequently instituting an anticlimax, to put Mlle. Patti into Lucia after the Sonnambula. Donizetti's music is charming, and Sir Walter Scott's heroine, somewhat paled indeed in the ineffectual fire of the Italian poet, is sufficiently interesting; but, excepting in the mad scene, the artist has really no self-dependent great situation, since in the finale to the second act the roaring brother and the "cursing tenor" do all in their power by vociferation and gesture to "pluck" all hearing and seeing that away. Mlle. Patti looked the character of Lucy to the life, recalling more, perhaps, than any singer we have seen the exquisite description of the novelist:—"Something there was of feminine softness, perhaps the result of delicate health, or residence in a family where the dispositions of the inmates were fiercer, more active and energetic than her own." That her emotions seemed to have been toned down to this delineation is not at all unlikely, seeing that the fire and energy exhibited by all modern impersonators of Lucia, in the scene where Ashton shows her the forged letter announcing Edgardo's death, and in the great scene where her lover returns suddenly as it were from the grave to denounce her at the moment she has plighted troth to another, are made to yield to overwhelming anguish and despair, which knows no outbreak. Mlle. Patti in Lucia certainly betokened none of the passion and impulsive feeling so remarkable in her Amina. That the latter may be more agreeable to her instincts is not unlikely; but still both parts having been played so differently, may have proceeded from nice and subtle discrimination of character.

For the above reasons, and for these only, we cannot affirm that Mlle. Patti achieved the same triumphant success in Lucia as in La Sonnambula—which may demonstrate to many of her admirers that she belongs more to the Malibran than the Persiani school, which indeed is our own conviction. In reality the two first scenes of Lucy, the one in which the cavatina is introduced, and that with her brother, necessitate all the address, perfect finish, and dazzling brilliancy of fioriture, such as adorned the singing of Persiani and Jenny Lind—and perhaps of them alone—and require the very smallest amount of impulse or passion. Mlle. Patti sang the cavatina—the original one written for Persiani—with much brilliancy, and accomplished in the duet some surprising tours de force, singing an ascending and descending chromatic passage with astonishing ease and completeness, and making several dazzling flights in the highest part of her voice with great effect. So also in the duet with Ashton and in the Malediction scene, the young artist made frequent points, but did not endow the acting or singing with that sustained force to which the public had been accustomed, and which her powerful impersonation of Amina led them to expect. In the mad scene, however, Mlle. Patti came up to the very highest anticipations, and carried the whole house with her by her natural and earnest acting and her really admirable singing. The whole performance thus terminated most satisfactorily, and Mlle. Patti achieved a second triumphant success in her second part. Signor Tiberini was Edgardo, and Signor Graziani, Enrico. Lucia was repeated on Monday.

On Tuesday Mad. Grisi gave the second of her Farewell Performances, when she chose Lucrezia Borgia, in which she was assisted by Signor Tiberini (Gennaro), Signor Ronconi (Duke Alfonso), and Mad. Nantier-Didiée (Maffeo Orsini). Mad. Grisi acted with all her wonted vigour and grandeur as the terrible Duchess of Ferrara, one of her truest and most powerful assumptions. She sang, too, now and then with incredible ease and purity, always exhibiting her immense power and energy, and not unfrequently revealing bright glimpses of her past glories. Signor Tiberini came too directly into comparison with Mario to please universally. His Gennaro, indeed, was less liked than his Fernando, Arturo, Elvino, or Edgardo. Mad. Nantier-Didiée exhibited her usual intelligence and artistic qualities as the dashing, high-spirited young noble, Maffeo Orsini, and was encored in the brindisi. Signor Ronconi's Alfonso was a masterly delineation throughout, and the scene with the duchess in the palace was not to be surpassed for subtlety or real tragic force. His denouncement of the duchess in the poison scene was worthy of Edmund Kean.

Guglielmo Tell was repeated on Thursday, and Sonnambula will be given to night for the third time with Mlle. Patti. On Monday, Signor Mario will make his first appearance this season as Count Almaviva in the Barbiere—certainly one of his most finished and exquisite performances—with Mad. Miolan-Carvalho as Rosina, Signor Ronconi as Figaro, Signor Tagliafico as Don Basilio, and Signor Ciampi—his first appearance at the Royal Italian Opera—as Doctor Bartolo. This indeed will be an interesting representation. R.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—(From "The Times").—Probably since the first institution of the Philharmonic Society its concerts have never enjoyed a higher share of public esteem than now. Just at the time of the involuntary secession of forty members of the band, for years associated with its successes—but no longer able to partake in them, in consequence of an arbitrary arrangement at the Royal Italian Opera, which leaves not a single Monday open during the Philharmonic season—the performances seem to be imbued with new life and vigour. Instead of six concerts, to which the maximum was reduced last season, the old number, "eight," has been restored, and with such encouraging results that next season—1862, the jubilee of the society—the directors are enabled to offer a bonus to their patrons. The following announcement was circulated with the programmes of Monday evening:—

"The subscribers to the Philharmonic Society's Concerts and the public are respectfully informed that it is intended to mark the year 1862 as a peculiar epoch in the annals of the society, that year being its 50th anniversary. The jubilee will be distinguished by offering to the subscribers, after the eighth concert, a complimentary concert, to be held in a locality adapted to the performance, on a large scale, of the colossal works written expressly for the society by Beethoven, Spohr, Mendelssohn, and other great composers."

Thus, as we have frequently maintained, it is possible to find more than one first-class instrumental orchestra in this vast and decidedly musical metropolis. Time out of mind the interests of the Philharmonic Society—the oldest and most respectable institution of its kind in this country—have been consulted by managers of theatrical establishments, and the nights of Philharmonic Concerts invariably held sacred, the members of the band being allowed to send deputies anywhere on such occasions. But things are greatly changed, and before the commencement of the present season, had come to such a pass that fears were entertained for the very existence of the society. The majority of the band were compelled, greatly against their inclination, and manifestly against their interests, to decline the annual engagement proffered them at the accustomed period; and, as it was thought, no alternative remained to the Philharmonic but to change its ordinary night of performance from Monday to Wednesday, or resign its place among the musical institutions of Great Britain. Happily (which has not always been the case) there was a certain spirit of resolution in the actual directorate that rebelled against either alternative. To change the night, it was argued, and with excellent reason, would be suicidal; to dissolve would, under the circumstances, be pusillanimous. The issue of much and serious deliberation was, that, instead of abandoning their evening, the directors persistently retained the Monday, to which, for half a century, subscribers had been accustomed; and, in place of dissolving, increased the number of their concerts. The difficulty about the orchestra was speedily solved. Professor Sterndale Bennett, one of the greatest musicians of our day, was not a likely man to be put in a corner for want of a band. The elements, too, were immediately available; and a new body of instrumentalists was engaged, which, as the execution of the symphonies and overtures this season has triumphantly shown, is in no respect inferior to its predecessor. The concerts began, as usual, with a liberal subscription, which, had the nights of performance been altered, would, in all likelihood, have been diminished at least one-half (such is the force of habit among musical amateurs, as among all other classes of the community); the band had scarcely got to the end of one symphony when it was unanimously praised; and long before the programme had been gone through, it seemed to be utterly forgotten that there had been any difficulties whatever connected with the resumption of the Philharmonic Concerts. Concert after concert has only increased the satisfaction of subscribers, and—it is but justice to Professor Bennett to add—the discipline of the band. Now in the zenith of the musical season, the honoured institution which was the first to reveal to us in England the treasures of instrumental harmony—for which Cherubini, Clementi, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Spohr, expressly composed orchestral symphonies—and which introduced no less a genius than the author of Der Freischütz to our public, holds its head as proudly as at any period since the year in which it was first projected. The concert on Monday night—sixth of the 49th season—was magnificent in every respect; and the audience were enraptured alike with the selection of music and with the excellence of the performance.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—The sixth concert (on Monday night) was one of the best ever given by the society. The symphony of Haydn, in G (letter V) with which it began, was quite a treat, and not at all "rococo," as some have asserted who are themselves more or less "rococo," in an age when certain enthusiasts want us to swallow the music destined for another (the "music of the future"). The second symphony—Beethoven's No. 4 (in B flat)—was a treat in another sense. Both were admirably played, and both heartily enjoyed. The overtures—Mendelssohn's fiery Ruy Blas and Rossini's brilliant Siège de Corinthe—were equally acceptable and equally well played. Professor Bennett may fairly be congratulated on the high position already universally accorded to his new band in musical circles. Spohr's violin concerto No. 7 (in E minor) was capitally played by Mr. Blagrove, who had already a year previous (at one of the concerts of the Musical Society of London) made its great merits known to the public. The vocal music was all excellent, although a trifle lengthy for a concert programme, including six long instrumental pieces. Signor Belletti gave a scene from Euryante, superbly; Mlle. Parepa, the magnificent scene of Spohr, "Si lo sento," magnificently; Miss Lascelles Mozart's ever fresh and melodious "Non piu di fiori" (clarinet obbligato Mr. Williams) as admirably as could be wished; and the three joined in a delicious trio from Cosi fan Tutte. The feature of most interest in the concert, however, first because the least familiar, secondly, because the work of an English composer, thirdly, because performed by an English pianist, fourthly and lastly, because of its intrinsic worth as a production of the highest genius and skill, was Sterndale Bennett's second pianoforte concerto (in E flat), played by Miss Arabella Goddard. Of this work a morning contemporary (The Times) says:—

"The novelty—for that which has not been heard for more than twenty years may fairly be regarded as a novelty—was the pianoforte concerto in E flat, the second of the four which Professor Bennett has published, and of the six he is known to have composed and played in public. This masterpiece—and it is nothing less, though more than a quarter of a century old—sounded as fresh, and spontaneous as if it had been written yesterday, a proof, if proof were wanting, that it is a work of genius, and that nothing but its uncommon difficulty could have prevented it (long ere this) from becoming a stock piece in the pianist's repertory, and as generally popular as it is eminently beautiful. The audience on Monday night listened to movement after movement with marked attention, charmed in an equal measure with the force and energy of the allegro, the expressive grace of the adagio, and the fire and vivacity of the finale, a sort of mouvement de chasse, no less strikingly original than brilliant and animated. Their satisfaction at the end was exhibited in loud and unanimous applause, which did not cease until the performer (Miss Arabella Goddard, whose predilection for the music of Sterndale Bennett—whose champion before the English public she has long felt proud to be—began with her earliest public career, and who played as if her whole soul was in the difficult task she had undertaken) reappeared in the orchestra. We have long regarded the pianoforte concertos of Professor Bennett as the nearest things of their class to the unsurpassable examples bequeathed us be the great masters, and were never more fully confirmed in this belief than on the present occasion, when one of the best of them was revived with such signal success."

We consider the revival of this concerto, after an interval of nearly twenty years, an event sufficiently important to justify us in reproducing one or two other opinions from the contemporary press. The Daily News writes as follows:—

"The chief interest of the evening, however, was excited by the two solo instrumental pieces, which placed in a strong light the genius and talent of an English musician. Sterndale Bennett's concerto in E flat is one of his early compositions, written when he was a young man, and yet it is well entitled to a place among the works of the greatest masters. It is exceedingly difficult, demanding a pianist of the very highest powers; and such a performer it found in Miss Arabella Goddard. The fair pianist evidently played con amore. We never heard her exert herself more strenuously or more successfully. Her whole performance was a display of power which could not have been surpassed by any performer in Europe. The audience listened with breathless attention, followed, at the close, with demonstrations of enthusiasm in which the habitués of the Philharmonic Concerts indulge only on very great occasions. The room rang with applause, which continued long after Miss Goddard had retired from the orchestra, and brought her back to repeat her acknowledgements. Of course the applause was directed partly to the composer, who, however, seemed to take none of it to himself."

Of Miss Arabella Goddard's playing The Morning Post speaks as subjoined:—

"Miss Arabella Goddard's performance of Sterndale Bennett's concerto in E flat was one of those wondrous displays of instrumental execntancy which can only be heard from the greatest artists when the god of music completely possesses them. More perfect pianoforte-playing it were impossible to imagine; unless anything better than unerring mechanism, tone of the richest and most sympathetic kind, and feeling warm and chaste as the first love of girlhood could be conceived. If Miss Arabella Goddard had done no more than "sing" as she did upon her piano the simply beautiful theme of the slow movement of Professor Bennett's concerto, we should be justified in describing her as a transcendently great artist; but this was only part of a performance which was equally great throughout; for the portions which demanded rapidity of finger, force, or playful elegance, were quite as admirably given as the sentimental movement, to which we have specially alluded only because it is so simple, and therefore so dependent upon poetical feeling, the source of all musical beauty, for its effect. Miss Arabella Goddard was unanimously applauded on every possible occasion, and recalled enthusiastically into the orchestra at the termination of her performance."

The above encomiums were thoroughly well earned by the young and richly gifted lady, who never more nobly exhibited her love for genuine art, or more triumphantly asserted her supremacy as a pianist. The enthusiasm of the audience, both for the music of Sterndale Bennett and the playing of Miss Goddard, was of a nature not to be mistaken. It was a success "hors ligne."

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—In the height of the season these admirable concerts—which more than any other help to make winter and spring supportable to the numberless amateurs of good music in our metropolis—are apt to be neglected by those whose task it is to report on public entertainments. In revenge, however, St. James's Hall never fails to be crowded with an intelligent audience whenever a "Monday Popular Concert" occurs. At the last but one, when Mr. Sims Reeves took his benefit, the hall could have accommodated half as many again as were able to obtain seats; and on Monday night, when the name of M. Vieuxtemps was at the head of the bills, a vast audience assembled to bid adieu to the great and truly "classical" violinist whose performances gave such éclat to the earlier months of the present year. In securing the services of the accomplished Belgian artist—one 'of the absolute emperors of the fiddle, who is not only conversant with all the Italian masters from Tartini to Paganini, but has Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Spohr, and Mendelssohn at his fingers' ends—Mr. Arthur Chappell, the indefatigable director of the Monday Popular Concerts, rendered both the musical public and himself an inestimable service. M. Vieuxtemps has performed at almost every concert since January, and with a success always increasing. So thorough and legitimate a master, indeed, was here precisely suited. Nothing being unknown to him in the library of chamber music, and his executive powers being in this respect unlimited, he was just the man for the work—the right man, in short, in the right place; and amateurs will be doubtless pleased to learn that a fresh engagement has been entered into with M. Vieuxtemps to lead the Monday Popular Concerts next season. As the concert of Monday night was in his name, we may take it for granted that the programme was of his selection, in which case he may fairly be complimented. A richer or more varied selection than the following could hardly be desired:—

PART I.—Posthumous Quartet in B flat, No. 13; Beethoven. Song, "Name the glad day;" Dussek. Song, "Dalla sua pace;" Mozart. Sonata, "Il trillo del Diavolo;" Tartini.

PART II.—Märchen (Legend) for violin and pianoforte; Vieuxtemps. Song, "I arise from dreams of thee;" Howard Glover. Song, "Ah! why do we love?" G. A. Macfarren. Trio, in D minor, No. 1; Mendelssohn.

Conductor, Mr. Benedict.

Associated with M. Vieuxtemps were Herr Ries (2d violin), Mr. Webb (viola), and Signor Piatti (violoncello); and, with such accomplished "helps," it was not astonishing that the so-called "posthumous" quartet of Beethoven (which is not "posthumous," the only quartets published after the death of the composer being those in A minor and F major, Ops. 130 and 133) should be given to absolute perfection. It was the first time this colossal work had been heard at the Monday Popular Concerts, where, nevertheless, nearly all the seventeen quartets of Beethoven—to say nothing of his quintets, trios, and sonatas—have been played; and its success was in proportion with its extraordinary merits. The scherzo was encored and repeated; the same compliment being paid to the cavatina, but wisely declined; and this, too, in a work which takes very little short of three-quarters of an hour in performance. M. Vieuxtemps never achieved a more genuine triumph, and had never better cause to be gratified at his success, the medium being one of the profoundest inspirations of the profoundest of instrumental composers. We need not descant upon M. Vieuxtemps' marvellous execution of the Devil's Sonata (so-termed) of Tartini, nor upon the admirable manner in which Mad. Vieuxtemps plays the pianoforte accompaniment; nor is it requisite to say more of the very charming composition at the beginning of Part II., and of Mendelssohn's incomparable trio at the end, than that the pianoforte part in both pieces was magnificently sustained by Miss Arabella Goddard. The enthusiastic applause bestowed upon M. Vieuxtemps was a sign of the estimation in which he is held by the patrons of the Monday Popular Concerts. A more hearty "adieu" could not have been accorded to an artist of high repute. It was possibly the more marked in consequence of its being generally known that this was M. Vieuxtemps' last appearance in London for the season.

A word must suffice for the vocal music. Miss Banks has more than once earned laurels by her intelligent singing in Dussek's very popular canzonet "Name the glad day," and in Macfarren's "Ah, why do we love?" The "Dalla sua pace" of Mr. Sims Reeves has long been noted for its truly Mozartean purity; while Mr. Howard Glover's romantic and beautiful setting of Shelley's "I arise from dreams of thee," when sung with such exquisite feeling and refinement as by this gentleman, is invariably encored, as it was on the present occasion. Mr. Benedict was accompanist, and proved himself, as usual, a "nonpareil" in this department.

For the next performance (the 62nd since the institution of the Monday Popular Concerts), M. Wieniawski is to be violinist, and Herr Nicholas Rubinstein (brother to the well-known Anton Rubinstein) pianist.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The repetition of Handel's Israel in Egypt, on the 24th May, was in every respect as successful as the previous performance. The choruses, one and all, were again marked by wonderful energy and precision, the "Hailstone" chorus again eliciting an encore; the duet, "The Lord is a man of war" (Messrs. Belletti and Santley), and tenor solo, "The enemy said" (Mr. Sims Reeves), being also repeated. However we may condemn encores in general, there are some exceptions with which we can hardly quarrel; and when Mr. Reeves sings the air just named, which is really irresistible. As before, Miss Parepa and Mad. Sainton-Dolby highly distinguished themselves as the principal female vocalists; and although to Miss Banks there fell nothing more than a share in the duet with the first-named lady, still the little she had to do was so well done as to justify unqualified praise. All credit, too, must be given to Mr. Wilbye Cooper for efficiency in the second tenor music.

MR. CHARLES HALLÉ'S BEETHOVEN RECITALS at St. James's Hall have so far proved eminently attractive. The four sonatas introduced at the second "Recital," on the 24th, were those in C minor, No. 1; in F major, No. 2; in D major, No. 3 (all Op. 10); and the sonata (Patetica) in C minor, Op. 13. That the first-named bears more than an occasional resemblance to the celebrated pianoforte sonata in C minor of Mozart, is well known to most connoisseurs; but that there is yet throughout equal evidence of originality, both in thought and treatment, is a fact no less patent. In the D major sonata, however, Beethoven asserts all his grandeur; the contrast between the touching solemnity of the largo, the sprightly character of the minuetto, and vigour of the rondo finale being in every way remarkable. Mr. Charles Hallé's style of performance is so well known as to require no comment from us beyond mentioning that all four sonatas were again played without book. Mr. Santley afforded rest to the instrumentalist and gratification to the audience, by singing "The Shepherd's Lay" of Mendelssohn, and Schubert's song, "As o'er the Alps he ranges," both in his best manner.

M. SAINTON'S SOIREES.—The third of these admirable reunion came off on Wednesday, of all days in the year, the Derby-day, which, nevertheless, seemed to have had no effect on the customary attendance, which was as numerous and elegant as usual. The programme comprised Haydn's quartet in G, Op. 77, No. 1; Beethoven's trio in B flat, Op. 97; Mendelssohn's quartet in E minor; with pianoforte and violin solos, and songs by Signor Gardoni and Miss Marian Moss. M. Sainton was assisted in the quartets by MM. Bezeth, Webb, and Paque, who rendered full justice to the two works, that of Mendelssohn, especially—one of the most original and exciting compositions ever written for the four instruments—creating, even in the bosoms of placid ladies, an emotion not to be concealed. M. Sainton played, for his solo, his own Fantasia Ecossaise, one of the most showy pieces dedicated to the fiddle for a long time, and which was executed with wonderful finish and skill. M. W. Cusins was the pianist, and in addition to his share in Beethoven's trio, performed Chopin's "Berceuse" and Schubert's "Valse Caprice," with great dexterity and neatness. Signor Gardoni sang Beethoven's "Adelaida" with genuine expression, and Miss Marian Moss, despite a cold which severely affected her, got through Schubert's "Ave Maria" most creditably. Herr Wilhelm Ganz accompanied the vocal music.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Elijah was given last night, with Herr Formes as the Prophete.

Reviews.

"Abraham" — an oratorio, the words taken from the old Testament — by BERNARD MOLIQUE, Op. 65. (Ewer and Co.)

The text of Abraham is taken, for the most part without addition or abbreviation, from the Holy Word, in all its native simplicity and sublimity, and in that sober, vigorous language which affords the feelings matter for active, inward thought. The plot — in so far as we may speak of a plot in connection with an oratorio, especially such an oratorio as the present, which is more lyrical than dramatic—embraces the principal events in the history of the Patriarch; his separation from Lot; his invocation to the Lord; his offer to Lot and their quarrel; God's promise to Abraham; Hagar; the flight of Sarah's maid; the promise made by the chief of the three angels of a son to Sarah; the judgement pronounced on Sodom, and its accomplishment; Hagar in the desert, consoled by an angel; the offering up of Isaac, &c.

Herr Molique alone has chosen the words, and, it must be confessed, has executed the task with great skill. No one can fail to approve the mode he has adopted, which is similar to that pursued by Bach and Handel. We ought also to be gratified that a composer of the present day, like the composers of former times, once more takes up the harp of David, in direct opposition to the spirit of the actual age. Not that we are influenced by a bigotted admiration for sacred music, but we always feel particularly gratified when a man of genius and talent, touched by the pinions of the spirit of God, wings his flight, and soars above earthly things, heavenward. To magnify the greatness of God in the eyes of man, is, as it ever has been, the most sublime mission of the art of music. Herr Molique's oratorio preserves its religious character throughout, and this is a great point in its favour.

The short orchestral introduction (there is no overture) begins at once in the right tone, gradually drawing us from the tumult of the world, and leading our thoughts into higher regions. The fact of its preparing the mind for what is to follow proves that the author has well grasped the idea of a musical composition of this kind. For many persons it will not be sufficiently spun-out, but such pregnant brevity is precisely the quality which pleases. The art and skill displayed in the scoring is a foretaste of the composer's knowledge — which is rendered more and more evident through the forty-four pieces — of the character of the various instruments, of the delicacy with which the right instrument is in every case selected, of the profoundly significant grouping, and of the maturely considered employment of the instruments, especially for soft and gentle expression. Perhaps the composer's undeniable partiality for the deeper chords of the viola, violoncello, and corresponding deeper wind instruments, comes out too frequently and too strongly, although it is certainly most allowable where it is introduced, as, for instance, in the recitatives of Abraham, etc. These recitatives, are, in fact, so entirely what they ought to be, namely, the transition of pathetic speech into song, that a really good and feeling singer could produce a deep impression with them alone, especially in parts where the text would appear to offer an opportunity for a short arioso cantabile a tempo. Herr Molique always identifies himself completely with his text, and hence his airs are always the reflection of the fire which beams out from the words into his heart; they always express the sentiments and feelings required by the text and the various situations. Herr Molique collects, as it were, all the rays of the effect about to be expressed into the focus of a burning-glass, out of which the melodies stream forth; his tones are thus the symbols of the inward effect which the words contain: for instance, of Abraham's trust in the Lord; of Hagar's cry for help; of the adoration of God by Abraham; of the comforting of Hagar by the angel; and of the way in which Abraham is encouraged and inspirited by the latter. Here and there, indeed, we hear something less original, or the model set up by the composer in his own mind is, at times, less perceptible than at others.

But Herr Molique's peculiar mastery is displayed in the choruses. Even a less accomplished musician may succeed in producing a beautiful cavatina or a fine arioso, but a chorus written in accordance with the true principles of art requires musical knowledge; this is the conditio sine quâ non. It is here that most of our present composers are wrecked. Choruses written in the sterling style of Handel, Bach, Mozart, Haydn, and Mendelssohn are becoming more and more uncommon. In this, as well as in other respects, Herr Molique has produced very admirable things. When the opera and concert-season are over we may devote some time to an analytical review of Abraham, piece by piece. Meanwhile we must conclude by stating that both the full score and the pianoforte arrangement are before us, and that the manner in which they are brought out is worthy of all praise. We may remark (en passant) that every one is surprised and disappointed at Abraham not being announced as one of the features of the approaching Birmingham Festival. Surely Birmingham is not jealous of Norwich.

"Verdi's celebrated opera, 'Rigoletto'"—edited for the pianoforte (Boosey and Sons).

"No. 13 of "Boosey and Sons' Edition of Standard Operas for Piano Solo." All that was said in favour of the edition of Wagner's Tannhäuser, in our last impression (and that was not a little) is equally applicable to Verdi's Rigoletto, which is just as well, and just as completely done. The introductory description of the plot and music is as interesting as the pianoforte arrangement or "transcription" is faithful, playable, and effective. Not a single piece is omitted; so that a capital "bird's eye view" of the entire opera is at the disposition of any pianist, amateur or professional, endowed with even moderate executive facility. That Rigoletto is Signor Verdi's best opera is a fact admitted by all musicians; that it is not his most popular the more extensive success of Il Trovatore sufficiently proves. The inference to be drawn from this is not encouraging to aspiring composers, even those who look upon the Italian school as the "be all and the end all" of musical excellence. Why is not Rigoletto more popular (as it undoubtedly ought to be) than Il Trovatore? Only because its melodies are more simple, fresh, and truthful in expression; because it has less of the conventional "slang" of Italian art, and more of that genuine dramatic fire and characteristic propriety which distinguish operas of the highest class. It is less popular than Il Trovatore, precisely for the same cause that Rossini's magnificent Guillaume Tell, which arose out of the full maturity of his genius and experience, is less popular than any of his other operas. There is an indolence of mind on the part of our dilettanti—lawgivers to a great extent, in matters of taste, who cannot, or will not, exert their appreciative faculties so far as to carry themselves out of a certain magic circle of ideas. That which closely resembles what they have been in the habit of admiring must perforce be good; that which differs from or exceeds their limited perceptions is, to say the least, "doubtful." They hesitate, are perhaps afraid, to pronounce a verdict. Is it not a grave matter to compromise one's reputation for the possession of a fine taste in things intellectual? Our leading amateurs ought to have more imagination, surer judgment, less conventionalism. If they had, the eternal, meaningless tune-spinning of some modern Italians would not meet with so much favour in their eyes, and the best work of the idol of opera-goers — Signor Verdi — would not be underrated by them, as it unquestionably is.

"Take back the ring"— ballad, words by S. F. B., music by M. A. M. (Cramer, Beale, and Chappell).

"S. F. B" writes smooth verses and sentimental. This is the lay of a middle-aged gentlewoman, who kindly warns off a young adorer that would fain bestow himself upon her "for better or for worse" the rest of his live-long days. But she won't have him, being too conscious of her inability to make him happy. Shade of Ninon de l'Enclos! The music of "M. A. M." is pretty, if not very new.

THE VIENNA CONCERT SEASON.*

THE concert-season, just brought to a close, is declared on all sides to have been one of the most brilliant on record. A glance at the compositions performed proves the existence of zealous and discriminating activity. The critical "Summaries" published in this paper enable our readers to institute a pretty strict comparison between the results of the present season and the seasons for the last eight or ten years; while our remarks, though merely aphoristical, on the internal constitution of our musical bodies, are always productive of some advantage, or, at least, may serve to guide us for the future.

The musical doings in this capital may, as a rule, be divided into five groups. 1—The instrumental concerts more particularly so called, and represented by the Gesellschaft Der Musikfreunde, the Philharmonic Orchestra, the Orchestral Union, and the Euterpe. 2—Concerts which are either entirely, or, at least, for the most part, vocal, and represented by the Singacademie, the Singverein, and the various Männergesang Associations. 3—Chamber-music, represented by the Hellmesberger and Hoffmann quartets. 4—Individual concert-givers, at whose head, this season, stands Joachim. And, lastly, 5—The so called "Academies," benefit concerts, &c.

At their four subscription concerts, the Gesellschaft Der Musikfreunde gave us Beethoven's Mass in D, Schumann's Manfred music, with dialogue, three symphonies (Haydn, Beethoven, and Schubert), a pianoforte concerto, new in Vienna, by Robert Volkmann; a new chorus with orchestra, by Debrois van Bruyk; a march by Schubert (arranged for full band by Liszt); and an overture by Catel. In addition to the usual subscription nights, the Society gave two performances of Schubert's newly-discovered opera, Der häusliche Krieg, besides getting up a "Pupils' Concert" (overture, pianoforte-concerto, airs, songs, and symphony). In connection with the efforts of this Society, we may mention those of the Filial Associations, particularly of the Orchestral Union, on account of the performance (on two special evenings) of four symphonies, two pianoforte concertos, airs, &c.; and also of the Singverein, which gave Schumann's music to Faust (3rd part), and co-operated in Manfred, Der häusliche Krieg, the Mass, &c.

To the independent orchestral association called the Euterpe, we are indebted for four symphonies (Christopher Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, and Schumann), three overtures (Cherubini, Ries, and Langwara), and several solos.

The Philharmonic contributed, at eight concerts, the following:—ten symphonies (three by Beethoven, two each by Mozart and Schumann, and one each by Gade, Haydn, and Rietz); eleven overtures (three by Mendelssohn, two by Cherubini, and one each by Beethoven, Spohr, Schumann, Gade, Rietz, and Wagner); as well as Gade's "Frühlings-Fantasie," Mendelssohn's music, with dialogue, to the Midsummer Night's Dream, airs by Handel, Gluck, Mozart, Méhul, and Spohr; and detached, orchestral, or vocal pieces, by Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Spohr, and Berlioz.

The orchestral concerts given by Herr Tausig, for the purpose of introducing some of Liszt's orchestral compositions, form a peculiar episode of their own.

Vocal music is most worthily represented in the programmes of the Singacademie, with a decided tendency to the sacred style (Mendelssohn's oratorio of St. Paul; Motets by Sebastian and Christian Bach; detached choruses by Palestrina, Lotti, Gabrieli, Hermannus Contractus and Handel, as well as some additional pieces by Mendelssohn and Schumann); while living composers, to wit, Wilhelm Rust, Otto Grimm, and Franz Mair, were not forgotten.

As we have already mentioned, the Singverein performed the Third Part of the music to Faust, besides several compositions by Mendelssohn, Hans Walter, Schumann, and Grädener. The efforts of this society are principally directed, however, to affording valuable assistance to the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde.

Thanks to the Männergesangverein, we heard a performance of Mendelssohn's music to Œdipus at one concert, and a number of choral compositions at another. To the latter kind of works the attention of other Societies, also, such as the Academischer Gesangverein, the Sängerbund, etc., is directed.

In the programmes of the first series of the Hellmesberger Quartets (six concerts), we find Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven (six times), Spohr, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann, and, in the way of novelty, Waldemar Bargiel, Johann Herbeck, Robert Volkmann, and Moritz Käszmayer. In the second series, consisting of four concerts, we had Haydn, Mozart (twice), Beethoven (four times), Spohr, Hummel, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann, and—no novelty. In six concerts, Hofmann's Quartet gave us novelties by Rappoldi, Langwara, and Bibl, besides older works by various composers, from Haydn down to Schumann.

The number of concerts given by individual artists is, this year, tolerably small, even if we reckon among them those of composers, such as Goldmark, Dorn, and Mögele. Among the separate virtuoso exhibitions, in the midst of which Herr Tausig cuts a figure more prominent than pleasing, Mlles. Zadrobilek, Kress, Mösner, Herren De Ahna, Epstein, Bachrich, and Schweida, occupy a very honourable position; Joachim towers above every one else, like a true, thorough, and brilliant artist as he is. When such virtuosity is united to such artistic feeling, the victory achieved by real art over the vain tinsel of mere virtuosoes is, and ever will be, complete and lasting.

It is true that this victory is to be gained only by a continuous struggle, and a conflict nearly always beginning afresh, so that the victor is never secure. It is, however, an undoubted fact that the better school of art has been favourably progressing for some years past, and has now most decidedly got the upper hand. We perceive this in the course pursued by our musical institutions; in the programmes of individual concert givers; and in the behaviour of the public and the critics; nay, even in the pains taken in the composition of what are called "Musical and Elocutionary Academies."* It is true that insipidity and triviality are far from having entirely disappeared from this department of art, but those once exclusive attributes of "mixed" concerts are gradually ceasing to be their most prominent features, and, what is better still, the public no longer find in them their exclusive source of amusement. This change in affairs enabled the managers of the concert given, this season, for the benefit of the Opera Pension Fund, to include in their programme an overture by Weber, airs by Spohr and Mozart, Mendelssohn's Violin-Concerto and finale to Loreley, and Beethoven's C minor Symphony. This enabled the "Concordea," also, to get up a complete representation of the Midsummer Night's Dream, assisted by the resources of the two Imperial theatres. A "Schiller-Academie" gave us pieces by Weber and Lindpaintner. Even the specimens of literary composition at these entertainments are now, as a rule, selected with a greater amount of intelligence, or there is an attempt to find something new and really interesting, such, for instance, as Hebbel's Michel Angelo, Schlesinger's small farces, fragments from Meyerbeer's Dinorah, etc.

A circumstance that has already been remarked is that individual concert-givers scarcely dare any longer present themselves to the public without Beethoven, Chopin, and Schumann. Although, in many instances, this is done rather clumsily, and although it is desirable that Beethoven should be the Omega and not the Alpha in the education of our young professionals, the necessity the artist is under of presenting a programme of sterling worth to his patrons, affords satisfactory testimony of a cultivated taste on the part of the hearer; and the performance of three-and-twenty symphonies, without counting Liszt's Dichtungen —to which we devoted a separate paragraph above—the public performance, we say, of three-and-twenty symphonies, during the course of six months, in a city like Vienna, is really no small advance. It is, as a matter of course, altogether out of the question to compare Vienna, as far as activity in musical affairs is concerned, with many a smaller town in northern or middle Germany. Concentration of thought upon special and limited objects, and total absorption in one well-defined direction, cannot be expected or required of us. People must not insist on Vienna's being Leipsic, Breslau, or any other city where men of great talent pursue their course, with iron consistency, towards some one particular object. On the other hand, Vienna boasts of so many men of such varied talent, while public sensitiveness is so great, public feeling so frank, and public sentiment so fresh, that anything only needs to be awakened into being, to pulsate freely, freshly, and vigorously, following its own path; and though it may sometimes giddily spring aside from it, it speedily returns to where its correct instinct calls it. This instinct warns us more especially against everything wearisome. If this results in our having sometimes not at first appreciated, from a dread of what appears monotonous, many things we subsequently enjoy, we gain a by no means inconsiderable advantage, namely, an ever fresh, quick feeling of appreciation for the essentially vital element in art generally, and, in music more especially, for the light genius of melody.

We should have to plunge into a thorough analysis of particular circumstances and individual institutions, if we attempted to give a detailed account of the continuous progress of musical Vienna. It is not long since we endeavoured to show what a change had taken place here during the last ten years. We shall often probably have occasion to express our opinion of the system of musical associations, and the ends they have in view. Many persons consider logically musical matters among us solely in a musical light, without taking into account their influence on society. We ourselves have, perhaps, frequently arrived at a wrong decision, in consequence of this circumscribed mode of viewing things. We do not hesitate, however, to own our error, when we think we have discovered something better. We endeavour, also, if only as "an exercise for the memory," to gain a clear insight into the connection between human and artistic matters; and when, as last winter, for instance, we see the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde taking the lead, and achieving triumphs with the Mass in D, with Schubert's Opera, with the formation of an orchestra of their own, and with the organisation, which has been commenced, at least, of the Conservatory, we cannot help recollecting the struggle necessitated not for a merely professional change of officials, but for placing the guidance of the Association in the hands of men who could be relied on, and who would work well together. We make this observation in order to mark distinctly the party to which we belong; for parties there must be as long as life and human activity exist, and those persons who cherish a love of art must hold together, unless they would have their cunning opponents enlist on their side the whole body of weak and neutral individuals. We rejoice sincerely at the successes thus achieved; and, while passing over in silence what did not turn out so well, but which was quite immaterial when placed in the balance against so much that was most excellent, we will, in conclusion, express the hope that, at the expiration of another year, we may have it in our power to give an equally favourable account of the "Vienna Concert-Season."

THE ORGAN.*

FOURTEENTH STUDY.—OF THE FOUNDATION STOPS OR REGISTERS.

THE foundation stops or fundamental open-flue pipes were the first stops, and will be the last, used in the construction of the organ. They are all tuned to the pitch of one of their own class, which is an open four-feet pipe of metals called the principal. The pitch to which their scale is tuned determines the pitch of the rest of the organ, and hitherto this pitch has been on an average as much as a tone below the pitch of the orchestra and pianoforte. These open-flue pipes might with propriety be called also flageolets, were it not that this word conveys to the mind the idea of an instrument of a very limited size only. For, in matter of fact, these open pipes are nothing more than flageolets of various sizes turned upside down on the sound-board of the organ, and there supplied with wind from the capacious lungs of the bellows. Of these open pipes, however, all are not for that reason only foundation stops, but only such of them as have their lowest note tuned in unison or in octave with the foundation note of the organ. Then, the lowest note of which is tuned a third, a fifth, a fifteenth, and the like, are therefore not foundation stops, though they are open pipes.

Although all the open-flue pipes may be called soft stops as regards the quality of their tone, yet it must not be supposed that they are all alike as regards the degree of their softness. On the contrary, they may be very distinctly divided, according to their scale, into soft stops of a round and full quality, and soft stops of a thin and delicate quality. When the soft foundation stops of a thin quality are used alone, the organ may be said to have lost half its power at least, and may be compared to a garment which has been stripped of a thick inner-lining; but when those of both qualities are used together, the organ speaks at its full foundation tone. The thinness of the finer or delicate quality disappears in the roundness of the fuller quality, and this latter, which would be especially wan by itself, at least in a great number of the registers, gains by being united with the finer quality a richness and brilliancy of tone, which is quite equal to that of the most vigorous instruments.

The great advantage of the foundation stops is that they can be combined with all the other stops of the organ without doing more than sweeten their tone by giving them that velvety quality, which is just what they want in addition to their own. Substitute for them, no matter which of the other two divisions, either of the loud or mutation stops, that is, and the organ tone becomes harsh and brazen, of a quality which grates painfully on the ear and nerves of the hearer without reaching his heart. In this way a complete rupture would certainly be made between the organ and the traditions of its first builders. They could, undoubtedly, have made the instrument to consist wholly of noisy and metallic qualities of sound, had they so pleased, but they very wisely preferred, as it seems to us, to lay its foundations in a quality of tone, which is both rich and profound at the same time.

There is also this marked difference between the foundation stops, and all other stops of the organ, that they alone can be used independently, and do not require help from the other stops, while all the rest would undoubtedly commit an act of imprudence, if they attempted to launch forth their mighty voice, and make our churches reecho with their sounds, without supporting themselves on the broad and outspread wings of the foundation stops.

All these advantages together have, no doubt, been the reason why the open-flue pipes have been called the foundation stops of the organ. There is no organ which can possibly do without them, and there is no church, of the largest or smallest dimensions, to which they are not suited. In a vast temple their noble harmonics sail around its spacious aisles with a freedom, and elasticity, and a tenderness which are truly admirable; in a small sanctuary they make up by their sweetness and mellowness for a certain amount of hardness of quality and want of roundness, which the more noisy stops of an organ always have in a place which from its limited dimensions has but little resonance.

The foundation stops of the organ are moreover never out of place in any part of the divine office. The author resides far away from Paris on the eastern frontier of France, not far from the banks of the Rhine, and he can assure his readers in Paris that, on these harmonious banks, he has been in the habit of hearing the organ speak with wonderful effect by its foundation stops alone; and that, in the hands of players who are not by any means the best specimens of German organists, he has heard it so speak even and more especially at those solemn moments when the generality of organists, both French and Spanish, believe that a flourish of trumpets and a noisy uproar are absolutely necessary for the sake of variety. But noise is not so necessary, as some seem to think, to express the holy joy of the divine offices. There is, moreover, in the foundation stops a certain keen and soul-stirring note, which takes as near as possible the same place in the music of the church that a solo on the violoncello, or even on the violin, takes in that of the orchestra. In such cases, neither the violin nor the violoncello can for one moment be accused of want of energy; and yet how far are they, for all that, from the power and vigour of even the smallest trumpet stop. But it is, above all, the tender, and I would even dare to say the loving, expression of the two principal parts of the holy sacrifice that is more especially got from the foundation stops. At almost whatever degree of power we seek for their effects, and however refined or feeble, owing to its extreme softness, this degree may be, we still find a something in it, when borrowed from the foundation stops, which is preeminently suited both to the time and to the place. The Germans are more thoroughly convinced of this than the French, but they push their conviction perhaps a little too far when they make use only of sounds of the most extreme thinness at these more solemn moments. They do this with the view of gaining for them the greatest possible expressions of respect and reverence, and these extremely thin sounds do certainly have the effect of a very distant and mysterious music, but at the same time they attempt too much and so defeat their object, because the sounds they make use of to produce this effect, inasmuch as they act too powerfully on the imagination of the worshippers, are found rather to be a cause of distraction, than an aid to devotion.

MISS HELEN M'LEOD gave a Concert at the Hanover Square Rooms, on Tuesday evening. The fair concert-giver was assisted in the vocal department by Mlle. Elvira Behrens, Mr. Tennant, Herr Herrmanns, and Signor Ciabatta; and in the instrumental by Miss Annie Elliott (pianoforte), Herr F. Hager (violin), Herr Lidel (violoncello), and Herr Oberthur (harp). Miss Helen M'Leod, contributed to the programme Balfe's song, "The power of love," Schira's aria, "L'appuntamento," the recitative and aria, "O mie fedeli," from Beatrice di Tenda, besides joining in duets and trios. A unanimous encore followed the air from Bellini's opera, when Miss M'Leod substituted a Scotch song, which she gave with true national voice and gusto. M. Wilhelm Ganz and Mr. Walter Macfarren were the conductors.

M. PAQUE'S CONCERT.—There are few among the bewildering crowd of entertainments now taking place which deserve such conspicuous mention as this, which was given last Monday, at 24 Belgrave Square, by permission of the Marchioness of Downshire. The programme was full of interest, but too long for intact publication. M. Paque is known to all musical audiences as one of the most capable violoncello players amongst us; a position which he has attained by the exertion of great natural gifts, improved and increased by long and attentive study. The chief feature in which M. Paque's playing was exhibited, was a new fantasia from his own pen, and a very ingenious composition it is. He also appeared in a MS. trio by S. W. Waley, two or three minor solo pieces, and a song of Seligmann (sung by Mad. Rieder), with violoncello obbligato played (mirabile dictu) with the back of the bow.* M. Paque was also assisted by Miss Rachel Gray, a young lady evincing great capabilities; Mad. Sainton, who sang Lüder's admirable setting of L'emigré "Irlandais;" Signor Tagliafico; Messrs. Klein, Ould, Cusins; and M. Sainton, who joined in the trio above mentioned, and played his unpublished fantasia on Scotch airs, which has lately attracted much attention in the violin world. Mr. Benedict joined M. Paque in a duet on themes from Robert le Diable, in which the pianoforte part is his own, the alto by M. Batta. The room was crowded by an aristocratic audience.

M. SAINTON'S CONCERTS.—The programme of the third, given on Wednesday week, was as follows:—

PART I.

Quartett in G, Op. 77, No. 1, Haydn. Adelaida, Beethoven. Trio, B flat, Op. 97, Beethoven.

PART II.

Quartett, E minor, Mendelssohn. Pianoforte solos, a La Berceuse, Chopin, b Valse Caprice (d'après) F. Schubert, Liszt. Ave Maria, Schubert. Violin solo, Fantaisie Ecossaise, P. Sainton.

The quartetts were played by MM. Sainton, Bezeth, Webb, and Paque. The Haydn specimen is perhaps the best of all his concerted pieces. The adagio is a rare instance from his pen, for it is full of the intensity of expression that the mode of treatment requires. Mendelssohn's E minor quartett taxes the capabilities of players in the union of delicacy and expression. Each of these masterpieces was played in an unexceptionable manner. In the trio of Beethoven, the capabilities of Mr. W. Cusins were well exhibited. MM. Sainton and Paque were the other performers; the playing of the violinist in the andante being passionately expressive. Two elegant transcriptions by Liszt, of melodies by Chopin and F. Schubert, for pianoforte, by Mr. W. Cusins, and Mr. Sainton's ingenious "Fantasie Ecossaise," played in a masterly manner by the composer, complete the list of instrumental works. Signor Gardoni sang "Adelaida" with wonderful easy and graceful execution; the other piece being Schubert's "Ave Maria," sung by Miss Marian Moss, in a manner exhibiting great natural gifts, improved by zealous study. Herr Wilhelm Ganz accompanied.

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—(Communicated.)—This interesting event is fixed to take place on Tuesday the 27th of August, and three following days, making the twenty-eighth triennial celebration of these famous musical meetings. The proceeds arising from the festivals are applied to the assistance of the funds of the Birmingham General Hospital, one of the largest beneficent institutions of this nature out of London. So great has been the success of the Birmingham Festivals, that since their establishment in 1768, nearly eighty thousand pounds have been realized for the charity. The meetings, under royal patronage, are supported by the nobility and gentry of the Midland counties, who not only act as Vice-presidents, but by their presence in the Town Hall, where the performances are held, manifest the interest they take in the welfare of the hospital. The arrangements are made by a committee, and are always on a scale of grandeur and completeness: the best available vocal and instrumental talent being invariably engaged, and the works performed consisting always of the highest class of sacred and secular music, by the most renowned ancient and modern composers. The last festival was held in 1858, when the Earl of Dartmouth was President. This year that office will be filled by the Earl of Shrewsbury and Talbot.

THE SWISS FEMALE SINGERS.—These admirable interpreters of their national melodies have appeared at St. James's Hall in a new programme, and improve amazingly on further acquaintance. Their voices are not only well harmonised, but they are indebted to sound musical instruction. The choruses are well rendered, and the part singing is almost perfection. The comic solos by Fraulein Johanna Claussen call forth nightly the most enthusiastic applause, and in one of her encores, when we heard her, she sang "The Captain," with English words, in the most captivating manner. Her comic powers are of a high order, and we doubt whether there is at present upon the Swiss stage a vocalist to compete with her. Mlle. Fredericke Kelley is the leading soprano, and she, too, when we had the pleasure of hearing her, was loudly encored in a solo by F. Gumbert, the English words, "Within the leafy grove is heard." The contralto, Mad. Anna Decker Schenk, has a voice of extraordinary compass, and the purity of taste exhibited by all the singers entitles them to unqualified praise. The concluding piece, "The Schoolmaster's Wedding," is the gem of the new programme, the principal parts being sung by Mlle. Johanna Claussen and Frau Decker-Schenk, with great comic power and effect. Everybody should hear the Swiss Female Singers. The entertainment, indeed, is one singularly amusing and delightful, and entirely original into the bargain. Other entertainers have their parallels and companions. There is nothing whatever like the Swiss Female Singers.

OLD SHILDON WESLEYAN CHAPEL. OPENING OF A NEW ORGAN.—On Whit-Tuesday the new organ, recently built for this chapel by Messrs. Forster and Andrews, of Hull, was opened, when the choir gave a selection of chorals, chorusses, &c., interspersed with organ pieces at intervals, by Mr. J. W. Goundry, the organist of the chapel. The solo stops of this instrument are very fine, and were well displayed in Rurch's "Rondo," and variations on "God save the Queen." The cornopean, especially is much admired for its rich and clangy quality of tone. The following is a description of the instrument — or more properly of what it will be when entirely completed:—

GREAT ORGAN, CC TO G IN ALT.

Draw-stops.

1. Open Diapason, metal; 56 pipes, 8 ft. pitch.
2. Stopt diapason, bass, wood; 56 pipes, 8 ft. pitch.
3. Stopt diapason, treble, wood; 56 pipes, 8 ft. pitch.
4. Viola di Gamba, metal; 44 pipes, 8 ft. pitch.
5. Wald flute, wood; 44 pipes, 4 ft. pitch.
6. Principal, metal; 56 pipes, 4 ft pitch.
7. Fifteenth, metal; 56 pipes, 2 ft. pitch.
8. Sesquialtera, metal; 3 ranks, 168 pipes; vacant slide.

SWELL ORGAN, TENOR, C TO G IN ALT.

9. Double diapason, wood and metal; 44 pipes, 16 ft. pitch.
10. Open diapason, metal; 44 pipes, 8 ft. pitch.
11. Salcionel, metal; 44 pipes, 8 ft. pitch; vacant slide.
12. Principal, metal; 44 pipes, 4 ft. pitch.
13. Hautboy, metal; 44 pipes, 8 ft. pitch; vacant slide.
14. Cornopean, metal; 44 pipes, 8 ft. pitch.

PEDAL ORGAN, CCC TO C.

15. Bourdon, wood; 25 pipes, 16ft pitch.
16. Principal, metal; 25 pipes, 8 ft. pitch; vacant slide.

Total pipes, 794.

COUPLERS.

17. Swell to Great.
18. Great to Pedals.

3 Composition Pedals.

Although the sesquialtera is wanting at present, the effect of the full organ is very grand and brilliant, and the tone composition generally such as reflects great credit on the builders.

RATHER A HIGH NOTE.—The critic of the Times, speaking of Mr. Sims Reeves at the Crystal Palace, described him as the best singer that had been heard in Haydn's oratorio — in fact, as the greatest man in Creation.—Punch.

Letters to the Editor.

PADDING.

SIR,—The Saturday Review, a short time since, had a notice on the cheap magazines, which it described as consisting of two tales by two good men, all the rest being mere "padding." I think this padding remark applies to a good many of our benefit concerts both in London and in the provinces, where there is often two clever women and one clever man (or vice versâ), whilst the rest of the company is "mere padding," and could be dispensed with to advantage. I have often observed that this system of making a small party into a big one, by the addition of nonenities, is injurious to art, and converts a charming concert into a dull one; for as nothing less than one solo will do for each of the party, the audience are compelled to sit out some stupidly misconceived and badly-executed composition, when one or more great artists are kicking their heels in the green room, doing nothing, except, perhaps, chuckling at the simplicity of John Bull as personified by the committee who put up with anything that is graciously vouchsafed to them by the London managers.

I am, sir, yours in earnest,

PADDY.

RIFLEMEN NOT AMAZONS.

Sir,—In your impression of the 25th, your correspondent C. Mandel, "expresses surprise at the arrangement of the parts in certain choruses lately published for male voices, and intended for the use of the Rifle Volunteers," which "arrangement is always the same—namely, one tenor for the melody; a second tenor and alto for the harmony; and a bass." Your correspondent asks, why English arrangers have adopted this style? Without presuming to give a definite answer to this question, I might suggest the following:—viz. That in arangements of this kind for a large body of men, like the Volunteers (the greater part of whom sing by ear), you must of necessity give the melody in that scale, or compass, best suited to the majority of voices—which is designated tenor,—in this case the alto part is intended to be sung as actually written; and although above the melody, I can assure your correspondent that a very excellent effect is produced. I have before me a number of songs for "singing on the march" arranged by one of our most eminent musicians, with tenor (melody), alto, tenor, and bass, which I have heard sung at concerts, evening parties, &c., with very good effect by four voices, which (owing to the scarcity of good altos), I consider to be a great boon. The wise man most wisely says that, "There is nothing new under the sun," and if your correspondent will turn to page 47, vol. 3, of "Burney's History of Music," he will see that in the days of good Queen Bess, the melody was given to the tenor voice, in the various editions of the Psalms, and other works then published, i. e. for four voices.

I am, Mr. Editor, faithfully yours,

"TENOR MELODY."

OMEGA SATISFIED.

Omega has nothing further to retract, to reverse, to obviate, to obvert, or to reinstate, and, moreover, was not aware that the letters of those who wrote to the Editor were copied into the MUSICAL WORLD, or he would not have troubled him about the matter.

[We really acted with the best intentions. "Omega" wished for information, and we laid his case before our readers. That is all. If he has anything more to specificate, modify, discharge, disinvolve, reconsider, or pretercept, our columns will be open to him this day month. ED.]

LONDON: SATURDAY, JUNE 8, 1861.

IT is well for the prosperity of the vocal art that such a teacher as Signor Mario is still before the public. It is well, too, for the same cause, that such music as Rossini's Barbiere is not altogether overlooked. Such a singer and such music are indeed constituted to uphold genuine Italian vocalisation, in spite of the degenerate influence of Signor Verdi and modern operatic composers. Let us, however, do Signor Verdi and his labourers in the same vineyard justice.

Rossini wrote for nearly all the most accomplished singers of the age, singers educated in the best schools, trained after the best models, and severely tested before they ventured to confront public opinion. No doubt his own music had no small share in making the singers, more especially as he had a consummate knowledge of the capabilities of the human voice, and never—at all events while he devoted his genius to the Italian stage—would tax its powers to the utmost for the sake of effect. Rossini was, perhaps, more intimately acquainted with the means and resources of every kind of voice than any composer who ever wrote, excepting Mozart. He was himself a first-rate barytone, and, when a boy, was one of the treble singers in the cathedral of his native city. This early teaching, combined with wonderful quickness of observation, enabled him to create music for the singers which, without in the least concealing their powers, allowed them to produce the finest effects. That, nevertheless, his vocal compositions, for the greater part, were adapted to the means of popular singers, is well known; and hence, it cannot be denied that the singers had a certain influence on his music.

When Signor Verdi commenced writing for the stage the vocalists in the legitimate Italian school were extreme rarities. He found vociferators instead of singers, and was compelled to accommodate his music to their capacities. It was suddenly discovered that a good voice alone was wanting to constitute the vocaliser; and Signor Verdi endorsed the discovery by writing compositions which required for their performance the smallest amount of art. Here was a chance for tyros. Why learn singing at all, when it might be so easily dispensed with? Why encounter difficulties, expend time and money, and waste one's best energies in close and severe application, when a reputation might be made by mere strength of lungs and a fortnight's discipline? It is wonderful how the "vociferators" came into vogue, and what influence they exercised upon composers. Signor Verdi, above all, "championed them to the utterance." The school of David, Tacchinardi, Garcia, Rubini, Galli, Tamburini, and others was gradually dying a natural death, and, as an inevitable consequence, Rossini's music, having nobody to interpret it, was falling into disrepute. Fortunately, now and then singers were found who added a desire to attain the highest excellence in their profession to natural aptitude and instinct, and who thus became preservers of the loftiest school of the vocal art. More fortunate still that some such legitimatists should have descended to our own times, and that we still can boast of Mario and Alboni.

The performance of the Barbiere, now being given at Covent Garden, cannot fail to prove entirely gratifying to those who pin their faith to pure Italian music and pure

Italian vocalism. We might search back in vain to the first representation of Rossini's enchanting work for singing more legitimate and more perfect, for acting more easy, gentlemanly, and instinct with comic genius than may be found in Mario's Count Almaviva. The very spirit of Rossini and Beaumarchais are concentrated in his performance. And what a study for the singer! A tenor might learn more from listening to Mario attentively one night, than from a dozen lessons administered by the most erudite professor. Such artists, indeed, have ever proved the best indoctrinators; and it is matter for no small congratulation that after so many years passed in exerting himself to please the public, the great tenor should be enabled to exhibit his admirable talent with almost undiminished powers. The performance of Mario in Count Almaviva will have a two-fold value for singers; it will teach them that the old school cannot be dispensed with, and that the voice may be best preserved by adhering to the best models. No tenor who knows his art is compelled to force his voice in the music of Almaviva, not because it is written less high than Signor Verdi's tenor parts—which certainly is not the case—but because it lies so artfully for the voice, and because the upper notes are never called upon for extra exertion. In many parts of the Count's music the voice is taxed to the highest part of the register—witness the trio "Ah! quel colpo"—but a well-trained organ can take the passages without difficulty, and attack the highest notes without effort. Such is the effect of legitimate vocal music. We strongly recommend every tenor who wishes to procure a lesson in genuine Italian singing of the very highest value to go and hear Mario in Count Almaviva, cautioning him at the same time not to suffer his enjoyment to interfere with his instruction, which we acknowledge to be no easy task. Perhaps the best way would be to hear him twice, the first time for pleasure, the second for information. R.

TEMPORA mutantur et Grisi et Mario. Fifteen years ago it would have seemed strange to be commenting on the prospectus of a forthcoming season at Her Majesty's Theatre, without the stereotyped gratulatory paragraph on the re-engagement of "those universal favourites," Grisi and Mario. Two months back, however—seven years since Grisi took formal leave of the English public, amid enthusiasm unbounded—it appeared no less strange to be commenting on a prospectus of the Royal Italian Opera from which the names of "those universal favourites" were omitted.

Tempora mutantur—et "GRISI" et "MARIO." In 1847, but for the opportune apparition of the Swedish Nightingale, Mr. Lumley would have been compelled to shut up Her Majesty's Theatre and decamp. A formidable opposition had sprung up against him. At the head of this opposition stood Grisi and Mario. Mr. Costa, the famous music-director, had joined the ranks of the seceders, it is true; but it is equally a fact that what gave deadliest force to the opposition was that Grisi and Mario were its life and soul. Mr. Costa might still have waved his conductor's stick over the orchestra of Her Majesty's Theatre, with the vigour, grace, and precision for which he is noted; but Grisi and Mario at the rival establishment, the danger was the same, and Mr. Costa's energy, experience, and so forth, would have gone for little or nothing. At the head of the opposition stood Grisi and Mario; and, as a natural result, Her Majesty's Theatre—notwithstanding its eel-like pertinacity of life, its aristocratic prestige, and the wisdom of its experienced chief, the Argus of impresarios—after a noble struggle, retired from the contest, not dishonoured, but confounded. Twice that contest was renewed—first under Lumley, next under E. T. Smith—the Briareus of impresarios. Twice, after a noble struggle, Her Majesty's Theatre retired from the contest—not dishonoured, but confounded. Grisi and Mario, "those universal favourites," won the battle for the Royal Italian Opera.

Tempora mutantur, et GRISI et MARIO. "Tempora" were manifestly changed, inasmuch as the unexpected secession of "those universal favourites" from the theatre of Mr. Gye—the Abrriagruesus of impresarios—was but a prelude to the unexpected shutting up of the theatre of Mr. E. T. Smith. The Briareus of impresarios was "shut up"—not on account of the secession of Grisi and Mario (which at an earlier period might have explained the occlusion of portals previously patulous), but on account of their acquisition. Briareus put forth two of his hands, and clutched Norma in one of them, and Almaviva in the other. This accomplished, Briareus thought to "shut up" Abrriagruesus; but the sequel proved he had ill reckoned, for Abrriagruesus shut up Briareus. Briareus had acquired Norma; he had acquired Almaviva, and he was straightway "shut up." Thus Grisi and Mario were thrice the cause of shutting up Her Majesty's Theatre: the first and second time because they were at the Royal Italian Opera, the third time because they were not at the Royal Italian Opera.

Tempora mutantur et GRISI et MARIO et ARGUS et BRIAREUS et ABRRIAGRUESUS. Grisi and Mario having "shut up" Briareus, leave him to ruminate on the nature and vicissitudes of things, and tender their services (through Icbatata) to Abrriagruesus, who forthwith (through Icbatata) expresses himself "willin'." Like Barkis, Abrriagruesus was willin'." Now it remains to be seen if, by the acquisition of Norma and Almaviva (through Icbatata), Abrriagruesus will also be compelled to "shut up." Much depends on Patti and "circumstances;" not much on Tiberini; little on the international exhibition; less on Patriossi; least on Norma. What may depend upon Almaviva and "circumstances"—whether much, not much, little, less, least, nothing or everything, depends more upon circumstances than upon Almaviva.

But—tempora mutantur, &c.

To the Editor of the MUSICAL WORLD.

SIR,—It having occurred to me that the Niederrheinisches Musik-Fest may not be an uninteresting topic to some of your readers, I beg to forward you a short account of the present year's celebration.

This festival, which consists of three concerts given on three consecutive evenings, and which is held yearly in Whitsuntide at Cologne, Aix-la-Chapelle, or Dusseldorf, was celebrated this year at Aix-la-Chapelle, under the able direction of Franz Lachner, of Munich. The first concert opened on Sunday, the 19th inst., with Beethoven's Sinfonia Eroica. Nothing could surpass the precision and delicacy with which this noble work was executed. The orchestra, composed of first-class artists from far and near, responded heartily to Herr Lachner's efforts; and the result was what might have been expected. The perfect silence observed during the performance, and the deafening applause which followed the conclusion of each movement, showed how thoroughly the audience appreciated what they heard.

The symphony was followed, after a short pause, by the same composer's Missa Solemnis, in D major (Op. 123).

This colossal work, which took its author more than three years to compose, and was regarded by himself as his most complete composition, is, however, very seldom attempted in Germany, on account of its magnitude and difficulty—obstacles only to be overcome on occasions like the present, when so large a number of practised musicians concentrate their energies towards the same point. The performance of the mass reflected the same credit on the chorus as the symphony had done on the orchestra. The solos were well executed; the obligato for the violin, one of the principal features of the "Benedictus," being played by Herr Joseph Joachim, with that exquisite taste and finish for which he stands alone. With the Mass in D terminated the first concert. The success of the second was equally brilliant. The programme was composed of Mozart's orchestral symphony in C major, and Handel's oratorio of Joshua. The oratorio which formed the second part of the concert was a perfect triumph for all concerned. The choruses, from first to last, were sung with a vigour and accuracy that left it difficult to decide to which the palm was due. Two were unanimously encored—viz., the first chorus in the second part, "Glorreich ist Gott," and the last but one in the 3rd part, "See the conquering Hero comes." Frau Rübsamen-Veith, who had ably sustained the soprano music in the Missa Solemnis on the previous evening, acquitted herself most brilliantly in that of Achsah. Her rendering of the airs, "Horch auf den Vögel Jubelchor!" and "O hätt' ich Jubal's Harf," was irreproachable. The part of Joshua was undertaken by Herr Carl Schneider of Wiesbaden; Othniel and Caleb by Frau Potthoff-Diehl, of Aix-la-Chapelle, and Herr Julius Krause, of Berlin, singers of well-attested capabilities. The theatre, crowded to excess, resounded with applause whenever a halt in the music allowed of it; and every one present seemed to participate heartily in the feeling of enthusiasm with which Handel's splendid composition (if justice be done to it) all who listen to it must be inspired.

The programme for the third concert was as follows:—

PART I.

1. Overture, "Oberon" (Weber).
2. Aria "Mitrane" (composed in 1686), Frau Potthoff-Diehl. (Rossi).
3. Concerto, Pianoforte, and Orchestra, Frau Clara Schumann (Schumann).
4. Aria "Figaro's Hochzeit," by Herr Krause (Mozart).
5. "Sanctus" and "Benedictus" from the Missa Solemnis (Beethoven)

PART II.

1. Prelude and Fugue for Orchestra (F. Lachner).
2. "Hallelujah," cantata for Soprano, "Esther," Frau Rübsamen-Veith (Handel).
3. Concerto, Violin and Orchestra, Herr Joachim (Beethoven).
4. Aria "Euryanthe" Herr Schneider (Weber).
5. Grand chorus: "The Heavens are telling" (Haydn).

The appearance of such artists as Mad. Schumann and Herr Joachim together in this programme was alone sufficient to stamp the character of this final concert. The solos were well chosen and well executed, especially the "Hallelujah" and air from Euryanthe, in which Frau Rübsamen-Veith and Herr Schneider confirmed the good opinion already formed of their abilities. The prelude and fugue, a new composition of Franz Lachner's, was vigorously played, and received with unbounded applause. The concert found a worthy finale in the chorus which closes the first part of Haydn's Creation; orchestra and singers vied with each other in obtaining a perfect performance, and succeeded to the satisfaction of everybody.

Thus ended the 38th Niederrheinisches Musik-Fest; the theatre was filled each night to the ceiling with lovers of the art, gathered together from all parts of Germany. Great credit is due to Franz Wüllner, music director of Aix-la-Chapelle, for the pains he must have taken to bring the chorus up to the mark at which Herr Lachner found them. There were 426 singers and 135 players—561 performers in all.

Cologne, May 28th.

MOSCHELES AT THE MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—The hall was full to overflowing. An illustrious stranger was present—the veteran Moscheles, who has just arrived on a short visit to the city where he passed so large a portion of his brilliant career. It would be interesting if he could be induced to appear once more before a public whom in former days he has so often delighted.—Daily News.

BEETHOVEN RECITALS.—At the fourth, which took place yesterday, Mr. Hallé played the two sonatas (Op. 27), the sonata pastorale (Op. 28), and No. 1 of Op. 31 (in G). These performances are exciting more and more attention.

CONCERTS.—Yesterday Mlle. Valentin, Miss Messent, and Mad. Laura Baxter, held their annual concerts. Herr Molique held his on Thursday evening. Mr. Henry Leslie also gave a concert with his choir on the same evening. Particulars in our next.

MR. DEACON, a pianist who has gained an excellent reputation in Italy, where he resided so many years, has returned to his native country, and has announced his intention of giving three séances of classical music, the first of which takes place to-day, when he will be assisted by several professors of eminence.

A LETTER TO DESMOND RYAN.

(IMPROMPTU.)

On Sundays, after breakfast, Pat,
I read my weekly papers o'er;
The news are new to me, but, drat
It! Usque's heard them all before!

I mind me oft of glorious "Ops."
By men—Pat—who are now no more,
And would much like them at the "Pops,"*
But Usque's heard them all before!

The most notorious works by those "Tone-poets" whom we still deplore,
Are Beethoven's (as who not knows?)—
But Usque's heard them all before!

Among B.'s† works the "posthumous"
Are known the least (or I'm a bore);
And they must be seal'd vols.‡ to us,
'Cause Usque's heard them all before!

Being very sure the populace
The beauties of these works ignore,
I speak of them; but Petipace
Says Usque's heard them all before!

And thou, fair pianist, whose touch
Enchants the tasteful ear galore,
Why play B.'s latest "ops." so much,
When Usque's heard them all before?

Yet worse the critic fares than you;
He can "exaggerate" no more!
He'd join the Wolfenbüttel crew,
But Usque joined them long before!

I've burnt my fourteenth symphony,
My MSS are on the floor;
To get them played, a farce 'twould be,
For Usque's heard them all before!

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

SIGNOR Mario made his first appearance on Monday night with one of those parts in which he stands unrivalled. So brilliant a Count Almaviva as his has not been witnessed by the present generation of opera-goers. Incomparable as an exhibition of vocal skill, it is also a pattern of high-class comedy—natural and refined in an equal measure, easy, elegant, and in every sense attractive. Such a performance is the more to be valued at a time when scarcely a contemporary singer, Italian or non-Italian, can execute the music of Rossini's most dashing hero with the requisite grace and fluency. To these qualities, moreover, rare as they are just now, Signor Mario joins unflagging spirit and a kind of gentlemanly humour as agreeable as it is peculiarly his own. On Monday night—as though, for reasons unnecessary to state, resolved to do his best—he fairly eclipsed his previous achievements. In his very best days he has seldom played Almaviva so unexceptionally well—never, on any occasion with more uniform and sustained excellence. He was received with the old heartiness, and at once—in the beautiful cavatina, "Ecco ridente il Cielo"—rewarded his patrons with a specimen of legitimate Italian art, combining the utmost purity of expression with a style and method altogether faultless. The duet with Figaro—"All' idea di quel metallo"—was, if possible, even better, the florid passages at the end of the quick movement ("A che d'amore") being delivered, "mezza voce," with an evenness, fluency, rapidity, and perfect truth of intonation not to be surpassed. To avoid details, we may add that the rest was of the same stamp; that not one moment of apathy weakened the effect of the performance; and that Almaviva's last solo (in the trio with Rosina and Figaro) was marked by the same careful refinement as his first — the well-known "Zitti zitti, piano piano!" which forms the last movement of the trio, eliciting a loud and general encore. As Signor Mario never sung or acted better, so was he never more liberally applauded. In short, he was to employ the conventional expression, "in his finest voice," and did thorough justice to his admirable talent. Our crowded space will not allow of more than a word or two for the other performers. Mad. Miolan-Carvalho's Rosina showed all that extraordinary vocal facility for which it was so much admired last season; Signor Ciampi's Bartolo, though overstrained and turbulent, was original and painstaking; Signor Tagliafico's Bartolo was an extremely diverting caricature, and Signor Ronconi's Figaro more than ever racy and inimitable—a model Figaro, indeed, upon which a volume might be written. The duet, "Dunque io son" (Mad. Carvalho and Signor Ronconi), "Una voce" (Mad. Carvalho), "Largo al factotum" (Signor Ronconi), "La calunnia" (Signor Tagliafico), and Manca un foglio" (Signor Ciampi), were one and all received with favour; the variations on the "Carnaval," introduced by Mad. Carvalho in the lesson-scene —a marvellous display of "bravura"—created a "sensation;" and even Berta's little air ("Il vecchietto"), given with Mad. Tagliafico's accustomed spirit, was heard with satisfaction. The overture, as a matter of course, was unanimously encored; and the splendid finale to Act I.—long as it is—might have been heard twice through without displeasure. The principal singers were summoned at the end of both acts, and Signor Mario had two separate recalls, In short, it was a "gala night" at the Opera—a genuine triumph of good music.

On Saturday La Sonnambula was given for the third time. On Tuesday the Prophète was repeated. On Thursday, Guillaume Tell, and last night La Sonnambula, again to be repeated on Monday. Thus, we need hardly say, the star of Adelina Patti seems to be greatly in the ascendant. Il Barbiere to-night.

MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—The fourth and last concert, which took place on Wednesday, was not only in every way worthy of its predecessors, but might be looked upon as the triumphant climax to its third season. Never has Mr. Alfred Mellon's band more brilliantly distinguished itself than upon this occasion, and the warm and hearty recognition of its merits at the conclusion of each piece was never more fully deserved. The instrumental selection was particularly rich, comprising three overtures—the least known of Spohr's Der Berggeist, bringing with it almost the charm of novelty, the best-known of Mendelssohn's, the exquisitely poetical Midsummer Night's Dream, of which the execution was perhaps the finest ever heard in London, and Weber's familiar Euryanthe. But beyond these there were other, and still more interesting features in the programme; the most remarkable being Professor Sterndale Bennett's concert in C minor, for pianoforte, No. 3 of the four published. That such a work should have been so long overlooked by our pianists is indeed unaccountable; and now that Miss Arabella Goddard has set the example by playing two of the series within little more than a week, we may possibly have an opportunity of more frequently hearing one or other of the concertos which are in every way worthy of being placed in the same category as the acknowledged masterpieces of the great composers. True, there are but few before the public so thoroughly competent as Miss Arabella Goddard, to whom it is not too high praise to say that anything more refined, expressive, and intellectual than her reading of this concerto was never heard, and the long-continued applause and universal recall, were only compliments due to the merit of so wonderful a performance, to which the delicately subdued and skilfully managed accompaniment of the orchestra lent an additional charm. Of Beethoven's symphonies the "Pastoral" is perhaps the most familiar and best understood, being melodious throughout, and completely suited to the appreciation of all who have any taste or feeling for music. To say that the execution was worthy the composition will not appear too high an eulogium for those who know the materials of which Mr. Alfred Mellon's band is composed, and how thoroughly they are under the control of the accomplished conductor. Although the vocal music necessarily plays a somewhat subordinate part at these concerts, the selection is nevertheless invariably excellent, and the singers of the highest stamp. Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington contributed the recitative and air "Zeffirette lusinghieri," from Mozart's Idomeneo, a very graceful and expressive performance; and Signor Gardoni, "Ah quel plaisir d'être soldat," from Boieldieu's Dame Blanche, which he sang with great spirit and force; and the two artists joined in the duet "Oh, lovely maiden, stay," from "Sphor's Azor und Zemira," which, both on account of the fine music and fine singing, was even more liked than the songs. The last Conversazione is announced for Wednesday, July 3rd.

MUSICAL ART UNION.—A number of artists, among whom figure the names of several of our most eminent professors, have resolved themselves into an association under the above title, for the purpose, as they say, of introducing unknown compositions to the British public. The object is not an unworthy one, and doubtless many works which are ignored by our great societies, or, more properly, are never taken into consideration, or even known at all, if heard well executed, would create a sensation. The risk, however, is imminent, and the Union which depends on novelties alone for success must be composed of the most cohesive and irrefrangible materials to stand for any length of time against old faith and feelings, traditions, custom, and prejudice. But the Art Union does not rely on novelties alone; it purports giving the great works of the great masters, and in a complete and efficient manner. But herein it competes with the old and New Philharmonic, and with the Musical Society of London. The prospectus recently issued gives the names of sixty members for the orchestra, with Mr. Henry Blagrove as first violin, and Mr. Klindworth as conductor. The whole band, indeed, is eminently capable, and in point of numbers exactly realises Beethoven's standard of efficiency. Three concerts are announced for the first series, with a view, no doubt, of seeing to what extent the public will offer their support, and what chance of ultimate success remains to the undertaking. The programme of the first concert, given on Friday evening last week, at the Hanover Square Rooms, included one novelty of the highest pretensions, being a symphony by Herr Anton Rubinstein, entitled "Ocean." This work, we are informed, enjoys a high reputation in the German States and Russia, and has gained for its composer more renown than he has gained for himself as pianist. The design of the symphony is exceedingly poetical. The first movement is intended to portray "the immensity of the ocean;" the adagio, "the depth of the human heart;" the scherzo, "the sports of Neptune and his attendant tritons and nereids;" and the finale, "the voyage of life, and exultant thanksgiving for its happy completion." Without stopping to investigate the causes which induced the composer to attempt to illustrate physics and metaphysics in one musical piece, we may assert that the general idea of the work has been too vast for Herr Rubinstein's comprehension, and that he has failed in consequence. The first movement is by many degrees the best. It has several finely-descriptive passages, and is marked by occasional power in its construction and development. A single hearing, however, does not permit us to pronounce definitely on its merits. The symphony is elaborated to a fault, and simplicity nowhere attracts the ear. The execution was most admirable, and Herr Rubinstein has everything to thank Mr. Blagrove and his assistants for, since it was impossible his "Ocean" could have been presented in a fairer aspect. After the symphony, the next remarkable feature in the programme was Spohr's violin concerto, No. 11, magnificently played by Herr Strauss, who is gradually growing into the very highest repute in this country. The band executed Beethoven's overture, Op. 124, and Rossini's overture to the Siege of Corinth, both splendidly. Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington was the vocalist, and sang Pacini's "Lungi dal caro ben" and variations on "Sul margin d'un rio," both with extreme ease and facility. The rooms were well filled, but not crowded.

NEW PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—At the last concert on Monday, the feature was the Antigone of Sophocles, with Mendelssohn's music. The performance was got up with infinite care and pains, and reflected the utmost credit on Dr. Wylde, the band, chorus, principal singers and reciters. The poem was read by Miss Heraud and Mr. Ryder, and the principal singers were Mr. George Perren, Mr. Richard Seymour, Mr. C. Henry and Herr Formes. Miss Heraud has hardly power enough for such an area as that of St. James's Hall, but her voice is sweet, and its inflections are managed very skilfully. The poem was abridged here and there, but still the verses seemed interminable, and the splendour and beauty of the music could hardly redeem their tediousness. The introduction into a concert-room of these long poems, tragedies, in fact, with music however attractive is, we are convinced, a mistake. No performance could be more complete and admirable than that of Monday evening at St. James's Hall, but still the audience was very much inclined to devote themselves to sleep during the recitations. Should Dr. Wylde contemplate repeating Antigone on any future occasion, we strongly counsel him to reduce the poem at least two thirds, whereby he will increase the attraction of the music ten-fold. The programme, among other things, included Beethoven's sympathy in D, and the overture to Euryanthe, both of which were played magnificently. Herr Formes sang the air "La Calunnia," from the Barbiere with immense effect. A new disposition was made of the orchestra. The chorus was so large as nearly to occupy the whole of the platform, and the band were placed on the ground in front. There was an immense attendance.

MR. HOWARD GLOVER'S CONCERT.—This annual musical "festival," for to such an epithet its extraordinary proportions entitle it, took place as usual at St. James's Hall, on Wednesday morning, in presence of a numerous and brilliant assembly. The occasion was even more interesting than usual, inasmuch as Mr. Howard Glover favoured his patrons with several compositions from his own pen, all of which were good, and two of which were new as well as good. The most important of these was a strikingly original setting of Southey's legendary poem, The old woman of Berkeley, which, for dramatic feeling and poetical treatment of the text, could hardly be surpassed. Mr. Weiss's delivery of this was an intelligent and powerful example of vocal declamation. Mr. Howard Glover himself was the accompanist. The other novelty —a very melodious and expressive ballad, founded upon Shelley's lines, beginning "The fountains mingle with the river"—was preceded by "I arise from dreams of thee," which already enjoys a wide popularity. Shelley's little poem, also entitled "Love's Philosophy," has been set with kindred poetical feeling by Mr. Howard Glover, and the song is one of the most charming and original which has proceeded from the accomplished pen of the composer. Both were given with inimitable point and expression by Mr. Sims Reeves, and created a corresponding sensation. As upwards of fifty pieces were set down in the programme, and the performers were nearly of equal number, to enter into anything like details would be beyond our limits in the present crowded state of our columns. Amongst the vocalists were Mads. Gassier, Catherine Hayes, Lemmens-Sherrington, Parepa, Weiss, Louisa Vinning, Rieder, Sainton-Dolby, Laura Baxter, Palmer, Theresa Jeffreys, Lemaire, Gerard, Eliza Storder (pupil of the concert-giver); Messrs. Sims Reeves, Gardoni, Belletti, Delle Sedie, Morgan, Perren, C. Braham, Gassier, Weiss and Formes. The instrumentalists included Miss Arabella Goddard, Miss Alice Mangold, Miss Fynes, Herr Nicholas Rubinstein, and Mr. Charles Hallé (pianists), Mons. Paque (violoncello), Signor Gilardoni (contrabasso), Messrs. Wieniawski, Molique, Sainton and Strauss (solo violinists); the accompanyists being Messrs. Benedict, Randegger, Cusins, Howard Glover, J. L. Hatton, H. Thomas and Lindsay Sloper. The other contributions from the pen of Mr. Glover were a charming pianoforte solo, "The baby's song" (first time of performance), played by Miss Alice Mangold; "My loved Zelita" (song from Lays of many Lands), by Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington, exquisitely given; and song, "A child sat by the river's side," rendered with infinite expression by Mad. Weiss. One of the most exciting performances of the concert was Mozart's duet in D for two pianofortes, by Miss Arabella Goddard and Mr. Charles Hallé, which, interpreted by two such incomparable artists, we need hardly say, was listened to throughout with breathless attention and created an immense sensation. The duet had been previously introduced at the Monday Popular Concerts, when it was executed by the same players; but numbers heard it for the first time on Wednesday, and we have no doubt every one who heard it would desire to hear it again. The two pianofortes used on the occasion, were supplied by the Messrs. Broadwood, and were among the most remarkable for power and quality of tone ever sent from their establishment. Not to enter into details, we may allude, as among the most attractive features of the selection, to the duet for pianoforte and violin by Herr Nicholas Rubinstein and M. Wieniawski, the pianist proving himself a brilliant and accomplished executant; to Spohr's duet for violins in G, by Herr Molique and Herr Strauss—a superb performance on the part of both artists; to Mad. Sainton-Dolby's singing two new songs, "Rest," and "A hawking song"—perfect both in voice, style and expression; to Mr. Charles Braham's vigorous interpretation of the romance, or "Il balen," it being his first appearance in public as a barytone; to Mlle. Parepa's extremely brilliant singing in Auber's air from "Le Serment;" to M. Sainton's splendid performance of a fantasia of his own composition; to M. and Mad. Gassiers' perfect rendering of Iradier's duet "Jota de los torreros;" to Signor Belletti's air from Balfe's Falstaff—a grand vocal display; to Signor Gardoni's exquisite delivery of the song "Le Chemin du Paradis;" and, among more unpretending performances, to the beautiful duet of Mr. Henry Smart, "The Gondolar," sung by the Misses Brougham with irreproachable taste and feeling. Many more names and pieces might be mentioned, but these must suffice to indicate the quality and character of Mr. Howard Glover's "annual festival."

MISS PALMER'S CONCERT, given at St. James's Hall, on Friday, the 24th ult., was one of the most brilliant affairs of the season. The singers, with the fair concert-giver, were Mr. and Mrs. Sims Reeves, Miss Banks, and Mr. Lewis Thomas; the instrumentalists, Miss Arabella Goddard, Mr. Henry Blagrove, Mr. R. S. Pratten, and Mr. W. Pettit. Miss Palmer exhibited her admirable talent in many styles and two languages. She sang Mercadante's romance, "Il Sogno;" the song, "The Sailor's Wife," composed expressly for her, by Mr. J. L. Hatton; ballad, "I wandered by the brook side;" Dussek's duet, "Thy pardon, dearest treasure," with Mr. Sims Reeves; with Miss Banks and Mr. Thomas, Bishop's trio, "Blow, gentle gales;" with Mrs. Sims Reeves and Miss Banks, the trio from The Devil's Opera, "Good night;" and, with Miss Banks and Mr. Thomas, Mr. Henry Smart's trio, "The Carnival." Miss Palmer, almost more than any singer we know of recent years, has made rapid way in public estimation. This she owes to her intense feeling and earnestness, rather than to the beauty of her voice, which nevertheless has a charm peculiarly her own. Miss Palmer is a true contralto voice, but one which is highly available in the upper register, whereby she is enabled to accomplish songs written for a mezzo-soprano. The singing of the fair artist in Mercadante's romance was irreproachable in every respect; the Italian master himself would have been pleased to have heard her. Not to specify all the young lady's efforts, we may cite as entitled to particular notice, Mr. Hatton's song, Dussek's duet, and the trio from The Devil's Opera, in all of which she was eminently successful. But Miss Palmer did not appear as a singer only on this occasion. She contributed to the programme a serenade, called "Sleep on," written expressly for Mr. Sims Reeves, a very graceful composition, which gave unmistakeable evidence of the tuneful instinct, and which was exquisitely sung by the great tenor. About the other performances we must be brief. Miss Arabella Goddard played Benedict's new fantasia, "Albion," in her most incomparable manner, and joined Mr. Blagrove and Mr. Pettit in Mendelssohn's trio in D (No. 1), for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello—a very admirable performance by all three. We were infinitely pleased to see Mrs. Sims Reeves once more in the concert-room, of which she had been but recently one of the most brilliant ornaments. Mrs. Reeves gave the air, "Qui la voce," from I Puritani, which none could sing with more quiet grace and tender feeling, and Mr. Hatton's "I dream of thee," the very perfection of expressive ballad singing. Mr. Sims Reeves created the usual sensation in "Adelaida," one of the most perfect specimens of vocalisation now to be heard on or off the stage, to which, need we say, the exquisitely delicate accompani mentof Miss Goddard lent additional grace.

STERNDALE BENNETT'S CONCERTO IN C MINOR.—The four concerts to which the Musical Society's public performances are unfortunately limited are anticipated with greater interest than any other events of the busy musical season by all the professionals and amateurs of London, and are remembered with more enduring pleasure. The last of the present series will be looked back upon with more unalloyed satisfaction than any of the others. If the programme contained no new production of Young Germany to pique the curiosity of the listener, each instrumental piece comprised in it was of that supreme and unquestionable excellence which stamps it for immortality, irrespective of the caprices and fashions of the hour. We believe this to be as true of the one specimen of a living composer introduced into the programme as of the other compositions which time and death have hallowed into classicality. For although we do not attempt to draw any comparison between the Englishman and Beethoven, we believe that Dr. Bennett's concerto in C minor, whenever well performed, will be as certain to meet with appreciation, limited in number though its admirers in comparison may be, as the Pastoral Symphony itself. The singular circumstance of two of Dr. Bennett's concertos, after being neglected for so many years, being performed within ten days at our two most important societies, is almost as strange as the marvellous power of the composer as a youth, compared with his subsequent sterility. It is not our province to speculate on the causes of the sudden cessation of Dr. Bennett's career as a composer; it is unfortunately too true that, after having rivalled Mozart and Mendelssohn before his eighteenth year, he has since then, honourable as his present position is, done little to justify the rich promise of his youth. The concerto performed last night is the third in order of composition of the four which have been published from his pen, and while quite as artistically finished and beautiful as the Mozart-like second concerto played at the last Philharmonic concert, it is larger and more individual in style. It was interpreted by Miss Arabella Goddard with such unerring correctness, such singular richness of tone, such exquisite and unaffected feeling, that no terms of praise could do more than mere justice to her remarkable performance. The mere mechanical difficulties are very considerable—for instance, in several passages where the pianist, unassisted by the orchestra, has two parts to play; but even the perfect ease with which all these were mastered was not more admirable than the unobtrusive pathos displayed in that slow movement, which Schumann, in one of his most graceful essays, so fancifully likens to the moonlight wanderings of a somnambulist.—Daily Telegraph.—The great triumph of the evening was Miss A. Goddard's performance of Sterndale Bennett's Concerto in C minor. It was a triumph for the composer, whose chef-d'œuvre we consider this concerto to be; it was a triumph for the fair pianst, whose playing was a marvellous union of every quality that a great performer can possess; and it was a triumph for the orchestra and its conductor, who accompanied with a vigour, precision, and delicacy beyond all praise. The pieces, beautiful in themselves, and charmingly sung by Mad. Sherrington and Signor Gardoni, greatly increased the pleasure given by this excellent concert.—Daily News.

MADAME RIEDER gave a matinée on Thursday, at the Hanover Square Rooms. The singers were Miss Augusta Thomson, Fraulein Mehlhorn, Mesdames Rieder and Lemaire, Signor Gardoni, M. Jules Lefort, Mr. Patey, and Signor Delle Sedie; the instrumentalists, Herr Pauer (pianoforte), M. Sainton (violin), M. Paque (violoncello), and Herr Engel (harmonium). The concert opened classically, with Beethoven's trio in D major, for piano, violin, and violoncello, finely executed by Herr Pauer, M. Sainton, and M. Paque. The singing, in many cases, was admirable; Mad. Rieder in the Carnival de Venise, and Signor Gardoni in the Chemin du Paradis, achieving the principal laurels. Miss Augusta Thomson gave a very brilliant reading of the ballade, "Pouvoir du Chant," from Auber's new opera, La Circassienne; and Fraulein Mehlhorn, a new importation, sang Mozart's "Deh vieni," and Taubert's "Wood-bird Song," very prettily. Signor Delle Sedie, who is now becoming, or striving to become the barytone lion of the season, sang Dr. Malatesta's romance from Don Pasquale, "Bella si come un angelo."

SURREY GARDENS.—A series of twelve concerts, under the somewhat familiar title of "Wednesday Concerts," was inaugurated on Wednesday last in the great Music Hall, and proved eminently successful. The opening programme proved that the director, or directors, was, or were, stimulated by the desire to throw at least a classical halo round the performance by commencing proceedings with Haydn's symphony, in D major, No. 10, which was very admirably executed by a carefully selected and efficient orchestral force under the direction of Prince George Galitzin, whose illustrious name could not fail to add an attraction of its own to the concert, and irresistibly awaken the sympathies of transpontine audiences. Of the Prince as a conductor we have frequently expressed our admiration, and were never more impressed with his powers and instincts for wielding the baton than on Wednesday night, when in Haydn's symphony he made the band literally go like clock-work, and showed himself a thorough proficient in the management of the tempi and the minutest details of the fine work of the glorious old master. There is no mistaking Prince Galitzin's beat. It is decisive, marked and unerring, and the instrumentalists gather double confidence under its safe guidance. The other instrumental feature in which the band distinguished themselves was the Russian Quadrille, by Prince George Galitzin, upon the merits of which we have already descanted when it was performed for the first time at the Russian Concert given at St. James's Hall, and which created no less a sensation on Wednesday than on its first introduction to the public. M. Ole Bull was the solo instrumentalist, and performed Paganini's "Di Tanti Palpiti," and an Adagio, by Mozart, to the infinite delight of the enthusiastic Surrey auditors. The vocal selection was excellent. Herr Formes, the Armstrong gun of the singers, gave Schubert's "Wanderer," and "O ruddier than the cherry," with prodigious power and grand expression, and was encored in both, but each time, Sims Reeves-like, only condescended to return to the platform and reciprocate the compliment with a bow.

Reviews.

"In Paradiso"—song, words by MAD. WOLFENBERGER, music by HENRY HILES (Ashdown and Parry).

"What uncommonly queer people those Newcomes are"—said the Marquis of Farintosh to his friends at White's. "I give you my honour, there was a fellow at Lady Anne's whom they call Clive, who is a painter by trade—his uncle is a preacher, his father is a horse-dealer, and his aunt lets lodgings and cooks the dinner"—(The Newcomes, vol. 2, page 43). What uncommonly queer people are these manufacturers of drawing-room music. We pledge you our honour, dear reader, that here is a song with an Italian title-page, English words, Irish music, a German poet, and publishers who reside in Hanover Square, and let their first floor for an "institute."

"Une Nuit d'Eté"—mélodie impromptu; "Rippling waters"—characteristic piece—by SIDNEY SMITH (Ashdown and Parry).

Why the first of these bagatelles should be styled "impromptu," the second "characteristic," and not the second "impromptu," and the first "characteristic;" or why either should be called both, or both either, it would be hard to decide. Both bear the evidence of careful preparation, and therefore neither can have been improvised; neither has a spark of originality, and therefore both are without claim to be termed "characteristic." What stands for "Rippling waters," might just as well stand for "Nuit d'Eté," and what stands for "Nuit d'Eté" might just as well stand for "Rippling waters." One, it is true, has a French, the other an English title; one is composed "by," the other "par" Sydney Smith; and therein lies the difference. The long and short of the matter is that both are very neatly written "songs without words," by no means too long, and by no means too short.

"The Bay of Biscay"—fantasia—by RICARDO LINTER (Ashdown and Parry).

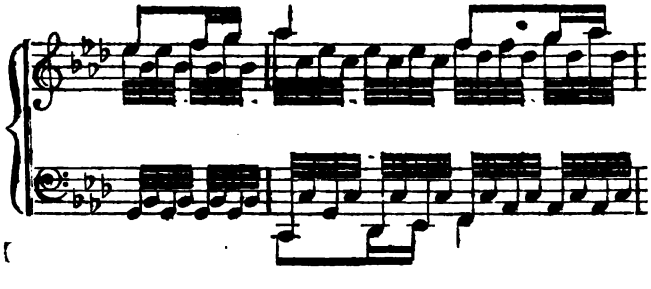
The introduction to this fantasia is an uninteresting jumble of finger-passages. The air, the venerable "Bay of Biscay" (of course), is boldly set, although objection may be taken to the following:—

There is a passage in the first variation which Steibelt, Woelfl, or even Dussek might have (may have?) written:—



The second variation is energetic but somewhat rough-hewn. As a whole, this fantasia is decidedly not without cleverness.

"Midnight"—romance; "Whisperings of the Breeze"—characteristic piece—by JOHN ASPINWALL (Ashdown and Parry).

We object to "Midnight;" we object to "Whisperings of the Breeze;" we object to "characteristic piece." Why such catachrestical titles? Why "characteristic" when there is nothing characterized? Mr. Aspinwall, in his turn (if he has a dictionary), might object that "catachrestical" is a far-fetched synonyme, for for-fetched; and that we had better have written "far-fetched" than "catachrestical." His objection would hold good. Well, then,—why such far-fetched titles? Why "Midnight?" Why "Whisperings?" Why "of the Breeze?" Why not Moonshine? Why not Mutterings? Why not "of the Dale?"—Coleville of the Dale?—who, being "of the Dale," yielded him to Sir John Falstaff. Why not, in short, "much ado about" little melody? This last would precisely suit "Whisperings of the Dale"—we beg pardon, "of the breeze," which is scarcely anything more than an elegant series of arpeggios. Mr. Aspinwall would do better to go in search of a genuine melody than employ such ingenuity and diligence in dressing up a sham one. "Moonshi"—we beg pardon, "Midnight," is just as cleverly written as its companion, and shows strong feeling, too; but, on the other hand, it is sombre, monotonous, and destitute of originality.

Grand Triumphal March—composed by W. H. BIRCH. (Author—Amersham).

"Grand" is a grand word; "triumphal" is a triumphal word; "march" is a plain word. Mr. Birch's composition is neither "grand" nor "triumphal." It is a plain march, and there's an end—no, there is not an end. Mr. Birch's march is very like the old tune of "The Vicar of Bray," which Mr. William Chappell will persist in calling not merely an old tune, but an English tune. (We have no doubt he has arguments; and our columns are always open to arguments.) The trio too (if our memory fails not) is like something of Mendelssohn, and (if our memory fails not) in the same key (F sharp minor); but as we cannot say exactly what piece of Mendelssohn it is like in the same key, we must give Mr. Birch the advantage of a "doubt." Enough that his march is not only a plain march, but a spirited march. That it lacks originality is a pity; but Mr. Birch cannot reasonably be blamed for want of originality. Beethoven was original; but who knows why? He would not, however, notwithstanding his originality, have written down the following:—

"Freundschaft und Liebe"—two solos for piano—by EMIL KUNSTLER. (Chappell & Co.)

Mendelssohn and water. Herr Kunstler must have been haunted by "the first violet" (page 6, line 5, bars 1, 2), and other Mendelssohnian inspirations.

The Operas.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Adelina Patti has killed Guillaume Tell—we mean the success of La Sonnambula has been so great, as to necessitate the withdrawal of Rossini's masterpiece. Well, let us not grumble. We have had Guillaume Tell performed already seven times this season, and are likely to have it performed two or three times more. Ten representations of one opera in a season is of very rare occurrence. The second performance of the Barbiere on Saturday showed Mario again in delightful voice, and warbling the "golden couplets" of Almaviva like a nightingale—a Rossini-ol. Being a subscription night, the theatre was crowded in every part, although the Barbiere is not so great a favourite with the fashionables as the Trovatore—a thing hardly to be accounted for, since Count Almaviva is the very pearl of a gentleman, while Manrico neither musically nor dramatically is gentle in any way. Perhaps the Troubadour is preferred because of the contrast he presents to themselves in placidity and graciousness of bearing. Manrico may have the same fascination for the ladies which the Gypsy Guitarist had some years ago at Norwood. We cannot think, nevertheless, that the music of "Di quella pira" can exercise the same power over sensitive minds as that of "Ecco ridente."

On Monday La Sonnambula again, as attractive as ever, with Mlle. Patti ravishing one half the house, and converting the other half, who had gone to hear her, sceptical as to all the reports about her, and now had to enrol themselves among her most enthusiastic admirers. Signor Tiberini is almost entirely extinguished in the dazzling brightness of the young and ardent prima donna.

The third of Mad. Grisi's "Farewell performances" took place on Tuesday, when the Huguenots was given for the first time this season. We have heard more complete and powerful performances of Meyerbeer's grand work, but Mario's splendid singing, and more than magnificent acting, would have made amends for a thousand times greater drawbacks. His voice had all its pristine beauty and charm—and what voice was ever like it for quality and sympathy of tone?—and he seemed to have gained a renewal or super addition of strength, if we may judge from the force and volume he displayed in the septet in the duel scene. The duet with Valentine (Act 4), however, is Mario's crowning achievement; and here literally he created a furor, and the plaudits rained upon him so thick that he was compelled to appear twice before the curtain—with Mad. Grisi, of course—before it could be appeased. Mad. Grisi, nevertheless, did not allow the great tenor to monopolize all the applause, but won them for Valentine individually, when no Raoul was present. It would be impossible for Mad. Grisi to go through a performance without indicating that power and genius which have long placed her name highest among modern dramatic singers. Valentine, though not vocally suited to her style, is, on the whole, after Norma, Semiramide and Lucrezia (we might name perhaps Anna Bolena), her grandest achievement. Here and there—now unfortunately more than ever—the music is too high for her; but, generally speaking, the part is one in which her means and her talents find ample scope for display. The audience, determined to let no consideration interfere with the current of their sympathies, applauded their old favourite vehemently in every scene, and took no cognisance of shortcomings.

Mad. Miolan-Carvalho makes one of the most brilliant of Queens, and Mad. Nantier-Didiée one of the most effective of pages; while M. Faure sustains the character of St. Bris with dignity and power, and Signor Polonini does all he can to allow the mantle of Signor. Tagliafico to fall becomingly on his shoulders in the part of Nevers. The Marcel of M. Zelger has been eulogised more than once in these pages; but why the part should not have been given to Herr Formes, who reckons it among his most powerful achievements, baffles surmise.

The band and chorus were unusually excellent, and the "Rataplan" chorus, this time, thanks to the correct singing of Signor Lucchesi, who sang the solos, escaped the customary sibillation.

LYCEUM THEATRE.—The performances of Italian opera which for some time past have been advertised to take place at this elegant little theatre—under the direction of Mr. Mapleson, late factotum of Mr. E. T. Smith—commenced on Saturday night. The opera was Il Trovatore, given, so far as the principal singers were concerned, in such a manner as left nothing to desire. This will be readily understood when it is added that Mlle. Titiens was Leonora, Mad. Alboni, Azucena, Signor Giuglini, Manrico, and M. Gassier, Ferrando; while the part of the Conte di Luna was undertaken by a new barytone—Signor Delle Sedie, who created so favourable an impression at one of the recent concerts of the Philharmonic Society. An orchestra of some 45 performers, conducted by Signor Arditi, and a chorus of average strength, materially aided the effect of the representation, which was further enhanced by a "mise en scène" that would have done credit to any theatre.

About the Trovatore itself we need say nothing. By this time it is almost as well known to frequenters of the Opera as the Barbiere di Siviglia or Don Giovanni, and if its popularity should happen to prove as enduring as it has been sudden, the critics of "the future" will be justified in allotting it a place by the side of those undisputed masterpieces—as a work that (if nothing more) has outlived the "fashion" of the period at which it was originally produced. Nor is it requisite to devote a column to the performance of Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini, seeing that the Leonora of the one and the Manrico of the other are, to the musical world of this metropolis, "familiar as household words"—the result of an experience to which the "four seasons" have, almost in an equal measure, contributed. Since the operatic waters were first troubled by Mr. E. T. Smith, it is difficult to state specifically at what precise period of the year Mlle. Titiens has not, from time to time, been singing (magnificently) "Tacea la notte," and Signor Giuglini pouring out his vocal soul, with outstretched arms, to the melting strains of "Ah! si ben mio." No more, then, will be expected from us than a simple record of the fact that on Saturday night Mlle. Titiens—singing and acting her very best—once again triumphantly proclaimed herself the most superb Leonora, without a single exception, that the Anglo-Italian stage has witnessed; that Signor Giuglini never sang the music of Verdi's romantic and inexplicable hero with greater sweetness end expression; and that the efforts of both accomplished artists were never more thoroughly appreciated or more enthusiastically applauded. Far less familiar to the operatic public, but equal and in some respects superior to either, was the Azucena of Mad. Alboni. It has been too persistently maintained that the music given to the Gipsy—"that inauspicious and ghastly woman" (vide English libretto)—can only properly be "screamed;" but it is the privilege of Mad. Alboni to vindicate the reputation of Signor Verdi, by showing that the music of Azucena may be sung—and sung, moreover, with as much ease as if it had proceeded straight from the fluent and graceful pen of Rossini himself. Mad. Alboni, indeed, both sings and declaims the part of Azucena to perfection. Not merely in the unaffectedly melodious phrases of "Stride la vampa," and "Si la stanchezza," does she illustrate the truth, that in the mouth of a genuine mistress of the art of singing every phrase intended for the voice becomes naturally "vocal," but even when (as in the scene where Azucena narrates her adventures to Manrico) each successive phrase is declamatory, she manages so to temper declamation with the element of vocal expression, that her performance never ceases to be purely and absolutely musical. For this reason alone it is calculated to exercise a charm in which that of other artists of the highest rank—not excluding Mad. Viardot, who exhibits with such terrible minuteness all the melodramatic peculiarities of the character—has been more or less wanting. Signor Delle Sedie made a good impression as the Conte di Luna, especially in the romance, "Il balen," which, though robbed of its native simplicity by a slight excess of ornament, he sang otherwise remarkably well, amply meriting the encore that, as a matter of course (when was "Il balen" not encored?), he obtained. The other encores were for the "Miserere" (Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini)—an irreproachable performance in every respect—and "Ah! si ben mio," which Signor Giuglini gave with true and refined expression. A more efficient representative of the subordinate, but by no means unimportant, part of Ferrando than M. Gassier has not been witnessed. At the end of each act the principal singers were recalled.

After the opera the National Anthem was given—the solo verses by Mlle. Titiens and Mad. Alboni. The house was well attended.

On Tuesday Lucrezia Borgia was given with a cast nothing inferior to that of the Trovatore, comprising Mlle. Titiens as Leonora, Mad. Alboni as Maffeo Orsini, Signor Giuglini as Gennaro, and M. Gassier as the Duke. It is not necessary to go through a performance so well known, nor point out its many striking features, such as Mlle. Titien's transcendent singing of the air "M'odi, ah! M'odi;" Alboni's Brindisi, one of the most perfect vocal efforts ever listened to (of course encored); Signor Giuglini's pathetic singing of the tender and graceful music of Gennaro, just suited to his style; and the very admirable singing and acting throughout of M. Gassier. No wonder indeed that the house was crowded in every part; no wonder that the favouritism was divided between the two ladies; and still less a wonder that the audience were enchanted from first to last. Il Trovatore was repeated on Thursday for the second and last time.

This evening Verdi's last opera Un ballo in Maschera is announced with a cast, including the names of Mlle. Titiens, Mad. Gassier, Mad. Lemaire, Signors Giuglini and Delle Sedie and M. Gassier. Next week, therefore, we shall be enabled to state how far Signor Verdi has succeeded in obliterating all recollections of Auber's Gustavus the Third.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—Although the series is now drawing rapidly to a close, there being but two more concerts to complete the present season, the public interest in no way diminishes, nor is there any falling off in the enterprise and judgment which have all along so strongly characterised these entertainments. No sooner has M. Vieuxtemps abdicated the post of leader, which he had so honourably maintained ever since the beginning of the year, than he is succeeded by M. Wieniawski, also a fiddler of the very highest pretensions, further attraction being, moreover, added in the shape of a fresh pianist, M. Nicholas Rubinstein, who made his first appearance here on Monday last, and performed Beethoven's "Sonata appassionata," and was recalled. The programme was selected from the works of Beethoven, and, in addition to the sonata, included the Quintet in C major, Op. 29; the quartet in F major (No. 1, Op. 59); and trio in B flat major, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (Op. 97)—the latter for the first time here, being the sixth and last of Beethoven's pianoforte trios—dedicated to the Archduke Rudolph. M. Wieniaski, who was received with great enthusiasm, was ably seconded by Messrs. Ries, Webb, Hann, and Piatti. Mr. Sims Reeve's singing of the exquisite "Lieder Kreis," and elegant ariettes, "The Savoyard" and "Stolen kiss," produced the accustomed impression.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The seventh concert took place on Monday last, when the following programme was given:—

"PART I.—Sinfonia Eroica (Beethoven); Romanza, "Perchè dell' aure" (Torquato Tasso) (Donizetti); Concerto, violoncello (Kraft); Aria, "Quì la voce" (I Puritani) (Bellini); Overture (Ruler of the Spirits) (Weber).

"PART II.—Sinfonia in A major, No. 2 (composed expressly for the Philharmonic Society) (Mendelssohn); Cavatina, "Largo al factotum" (Il Barbiere di Siviglia) (Rossini); Concerto in C minor, pianoforte (Beethoven); Duet, "Dunque io son" (Il Barbiere di Siviglia) (Rossini); Overture (Figaro) (Mozart). Conductor—Professor Sterndale Bennett."

A magnificent instrumental selection, with one exception, though for some ears somewhat too familiar. The violoncello solo was entirely out of place, and was utterly bad. Signor Pezze, a capital executant, did all he could to render it agreeable to the audience, but to no purpose. The effect of the performance was a decided inclination to somnolency. In fact, Kraft's concerto is a work of little Kraft, by which we do not mean Kraft fils. Had the pianoforte concerto been placed where the violoncello concerto was, and the latter eliminated from the programme, an immense advantage would have been gained. Moreover, the directors departed from their usual routine by the introduction of two concertos into one scheme. The pianoforte concerto was played by Mr. J. F. Barnett with great power and expression, and elicited cheers from all parts of the hall. No success could be more decided or better deserved. The singers were Signora Guerrabella and Signor Delle Sedie. The lady had been heard before in London, but not in so public an arena as the orchestra of the Philharmonic Society. She gave the air from the Puritani with considerable boldness of style and dramatic energy, and evidently made a "hit." Signora Guerrabella's proper theatre, nevertheless, we fancy, would be the stage, where her forcible manner and vigour would find ample scope for display. Signor Delle Sedie gave the romanza from Donizetti's opera with remarkable finish and a command of the upper tones very unusual in a baritone. We did not altogether fancy him in the air from the Barber, nor did the duet from the same opera exhibit both artists in the most attractive light. The last concert is announced to take place on the 24th instant.

MAD. LAURA BAXTER'S CONCERT.—This annual entertainment took place in St. James's Hall, which was crowded in eveys part. According to custom, Mad. Baxter provided an excellern selection of music, vocal and instrumental. Her own performances were, of course, among the special attractions of the prot gramme. Mad. Baxter, by the aid of rich natural endowment and assiduous study, has won for herself a conspicuous position before the public—in sacred music no less than in secular (as her recent performances at the concerts of the Sacred Harmonic Society have shown), taking honourable rank among the most cultivated singers of the day. On the present occasion, she gave ample scope to her talent, wisely eschewing Italian "cavatinas" and "cabalettas," those rocks upon which our native vocalists too often "go to pieces." Mr. Henry Smart's "Estelle," a song of the most elevated beauty, the elegant ballad "By the sad sea waves," from Mr. Benedict's opera, The Brides of Venice, and the simple national melody of "Home, sweet home," were her solo performances. With the character of each of these she proved herself thoroughly conversant, in each awakening the sympathy and eliciting the unanimous plaudits of her audience. "Estelle" (which is almost as long as it is beautiful) was received with the utmost favour, and both the ballads were encored. Mad. Baxter also joined in some concerted pieces, two of which (a trio from the opera of Falstaff, and a duet, "The sailor sighs," the compositions of Mr. Balfe) were particularly admired. In the trio Mad. Baxter was associated with Mlle. Parepa and Mad. Weiss; in the duet (which was encored) she enjoyed the valuable co-operation of Mr. Sims Reeves. The other principal singers were Mlle. Parepa, who gave the laughing song from Auber's Manon L'Escaut, and a brilliant air from Mr. Wallace's Amber Witch (accompanied by the composer), in the last of which she was encored; Mad. Louisa Vinning, whose "Batti, batti" afforded general satisfaction; Miss Eleanor Armstrong, who gave Macfarren's "The beating of my own heart" with excellent effect; Mad. Weiss, who, in selecting Mozart's "Non più di fiori," evinced both ambition and good taste; Mr. Weiss, who was eminently successful in Mr. Wallace's very popular "Bellringer;" Mr. Allan Irving, whose "Della vita" (Mercadante) would have been still more welcome earlier in the evening; and Mr. Sims Reeves, whose "Fra poco," about the unrivalled beauties of which we need say nothing, was redemanded with enthusiasm, and who, in an unaffectedly charming new ballad by Mr. Balfe (accompanied by the composer), called "Fresh as a rose," which he gave with perfect and genuine expression, was similarly honoured—in the first instance judiciously declining, in the last (which he could not well, under the circumstances, avoid) readily accepting the compliment. The instrumentalists were Miss Matilda Baxter, a talented and improving pianist, who played Weber's Invitation à la Valse, and Wallace's fantasia on "Robin Adair" with entire success; and Herr Lidel, who, in addition to a solo on his own instrument, joined Miss Matilda Baxter in a duet by Osborne and De Beriot, with which the concert was auspiciously inaugurated. Besides Messrs. Balfe and Wallace, Messrs. George Lake, Walter Macfarren, and S. Noble assisted as accompanists at the pianoforte, the last-named gentleman, a very admirable organist, giving solos by Handel and Bach at the end of the first and second parts.

Mr. Walter Macfarren's Concerts.—These interesting performances were closed on Tuesday evening with most gratifying success. The very fine pianoforte quintet of Dussek, with its many anticipations of the characteristics, and even the ideas of later composers, began the concert. This admirable specimen of an excellent writer was first revived by Mr. J. W. Davison, at some concerts given by him in conjunction with Mr. G. A. Macfarren—many will recollect them—at Chappell's pianoforte rooms, in 1843; it has been occasionally reproduced since then, but is not half so much heard as its merits entitle it. Miss Banks then sang Mozart's surpassingly beautiful Rondo, "Or che in ciel," and, later in the evening, E. J. Loder's "Invocation to the deep," one of the very best of his charming vocal compositions. A prominent feature in the programme was Beethoven's fantasia, Op. 77, a work exemplifying all the best and strongest characteristics of the master, but which, strange to say, has never till now been played in public in London. To the alternate humour, pathos, fire, playfulness, and tenderness of this eminently interesting piece, no less than to its great mechanical difficulties, Mr. Walter Macfarren did ample justice in his execution, and he has thus the merit, not only of having been the first to present it to the notice of our dilettanti of the highest class of pianoforte music, but of having presented it in such a manner as fully to reveal its measureless beauty. After this, Miss Palmer sang Mr. G. A. Macfarren's setting of Shelley's "I arise from dreams," with such intense feeling, such power of declamation, and such genuine expression, as greatly to surpass even her best performances. A MS. sonata, for pianoforte and violoncello, of Mr. Walter Macfarren, is a work of real power, clear in phraseology, perspicuous in plan, excellently written for both instruments, and highly effective throughout. The composer had the utmost advantage in its performance, in the collaboration of Signor Piatti, who played his very conspicuous part with a zeal that showed he fully felt the pretensions of the composition, and fully determined to impress them on his hearers. In Beethoven's trio in D, with this pre-eminent artist and Mr. Blagrove,—and in three solos of his own,—"May Morn," "Mariana," (a singularly felicitous specimen of his talent,) and "The Mountain Stream"—Mr. Walter Macfarren amply sustained the high ground as a pianist he has taken throughout this series of concerts. After the fantasia of Beethoven, he was unanimously recalled, and at the close of each movement of his own sonata, and at the conclusion of the whole, he was cordially applauded. The Hanover Square Rooms were fully attended, and many of the chief professors now in London were among the audience.

Mlle. Caroline Valentin's Concert.—Mlle. Valentin gave her annual morning concert, as usual, in the Hanover-square Rooms. There was a numerous and fashionable audience, and the programme was one of well-varied attraction, containing an agreeable admixture of the "classical" and "popular" schools. Mlle. Valentin still progresses as a pianist; and that her ambition keeps pace with her talent was evident in her selection of pieces. Beethoven's sonata in F minor, Op. 57, which some enthusiast (not Beethoven) christened Sonata A passionata, is a difficult and honourable task even for the most experienced performer; the finale to Weber's first sonata (Op. 24), in another sense, is not less trying; yet both these famous pieces were essayed by Mlle. Valentin with an ardour that did her credit, and executed with a spirit that showed how thoroughly she was in earnest. Beethoven's melodious and graceful sonata in F. (Op. 24), for piano and violin, was another ordeal to go through, the successful issue of which, however, depended rather on the gift of expression than on that of mechanical facility. In this beautiful duet Mlle. Valentin enjoyed the co-operation of M. Ole Bull, who gave quite a new reading to several passages, and whose subdued playing in the accompaniments evinced a spirit of fairness which was thoroughly appreciated by his associate. A duet for piano and violoncello, by "Goltermann," in which she had the valuable assistance of M. Paque, Chopin's Impromptu in C sharp minor (Op. 66—a posthumous work), and one of M. Stephen Heller's most animated tarantellas, made up the sum total of Mlle. Valentin's contributions to her own programme. Her reading of the pieces by Chopin and Heller proved her sympathy with and thorough knowledge of the music of those composers, as well as her discrimination in choosing the best examples of their respective styles. Thus, Mlle. Valentin cannot be accused of chariness in administering to the entertainment of her patrons, who warmly recognized her indefatigable zeal, and by their repeated applause rendered full justice to her ability. The other instrumental solos were a fantasia on the violoncello by M. Paque, and Paganini's "Di tanti palpiti," on the violin, by M. Ole Bull—each in its way a remarkable exhibition of skill. There was vocal music, and to spare. Among other good things, we may notice Mad. Rieder's "Ombre legère," "Sie ist mein" (Curschmann), by Mlle. Elvira Behrens; "Oft in the stilly night," by Mr. George Perren; a German lied, by Herr Hermanns; an air from Handel, by Miss Rachel Gray (a promising young beginner); and last, not least, two graceful canzonets by the late Signor Gordigiani, sung to perfection by Miss Palmer, who also gave "Swifter far than summer's flight" with a poetical expression deserving of the highest praise. Few singers have made more rapid progress of late years than Miss Palmer, and few by more artistically legitimate means. The accompanists at the pianoforte were Herr Wilhelm Ganz (himself an excellent pianist), M. Gëts, and Mr. Sidney Smith. The entire concert afforded satisfaction—and with reason.

Mr. Hatton's Concert took place at St. James's Hall on Tuesday evening, and was altogether a brilliant and novel affair, The brilliancy may be gathered from the names of the singers and instrumentalists, which comprised, amongst others, Mlle. Parepa, Miss Ransford, Mad. Weiss, Miss Poole, Miss Palmer, Miss Marian Moss, Miss Banks, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Weiss, Mr. Santley, Herr Rubinstein (piano), Mr. Viotti Collins (violin), and Herr Lidel (violoncello). The novelty consisted in the introduction of several new songs and ballads, the composition of the concert-giver. Miss Arabella Goddard had been announced in the programme, but at the last moment, in consequence of indisposition, the fair artist's place had to be supplied by Herr Rubinstein. Mr. Hatton's new contributions included song, "Save father on the Sea," composed for Miss Palmer, and sung by her; ballad, 'I'm conquered by thee," written for Mr. Sims Reeves, sung by him, and encored; Song, "Spirit-rapping," written for Miss Poole, and sung by her; ballad, "Voice of the western wind," composed for Mr. Santley, sung by him, and encored. Mr. Hatton always finds admirers in a mixed audience. His melody is native, and to the manner born; he is a downright John Bull composer, and his songs have a Sirloin smack in them. Hence the enthusiasm his new offerings excited on Tuesday evening, when nine tenths of them were encored, which unfortunately had the effect of prolonging the already too elongated programme beyond all reasonable bounds. We may select the "Adelaida" of Mr. Sims Reeves (accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Hatton, in lieu of Miss Arabella Goddard), Benedict's "Take this lute," by Mlle. Parepa (encored), as the vocal gems of the concert. The hall was not so crowded as from the attraction of the programme might have been anticipated.

M. SAINTON'S SOIREES.—Although these entertainments, from their nature and their excellence, are sure to be attractive, the distinguished violinist does not fail to present special features for consideration. At the second soirée the 16th quartet of Beethoven in A minor was given. The wonders of the posthumous compositions of Beethoven have been somewhat discoursed of by many writers during late years, and we do not intend to travel a road so well worn by the feet of earnest and zealous pilgrims; suffice it to say that the 16th quartet is a representative of them all, presenting sublimity, power, and beauty to the minds of those "who have ears to hear," and is not less characteristic of its time in being a stumbling block to the silly, and a puzzle to all who desire a royal road to the formation of a musical taste. The executants at the entire series have been MM. Sainton, Bezeth, Doyle, and Piatti—a quartet of indubitable excellence—with Mad. Piatti as pianist, who showed great talent, neatness in playing, and a remarkably unaffected manner. Mad. Sainton, we need hardly say, was the vocalist, and revived an air of Handel's disgracefully neglected opera Il Radamasto, which is not only Handel in every bar, but seems (like many others of his songs) to have been written with special reference to Mad. Sainton's genius. The fair artist also sang a new song by Blumenthal, "The days that are no more," of unquestioned excellence, and the well-known and always acceptable "Sleep, dearest, sleep," of Randegger.

At the fourth and last concert, given on Wednesday last, the following programme was given:—Quartet, Op. 41, No. 3 (Schumann); Song, "Der Wanderer" (Schubert); Trio in G minor (Marschner); Quartet in E minor, No. 8 (Beethoven); Solos, Pianoforte, a (S. Heller), b Fantasia (Chopin); Solo, Violoncello "Il Trovatore" (!) (Piatti). The quartets were superbly executed, the adagio and finale of Beethoven's exhibiting the genius of the first violinist in every bar. The trio of Marschner is free from pretension in manner, and is clever enough to surprise any one unacquainted with his instrumental works. M. Hallé's playing was in keeping with the high-class performance of all other artists. Herr Dalle Aste was not able to exhibit his considerable powers of voice and singing to a "proper extent," as he was suffering from cold. We hope to hear him when he recovers. The rooms were full of an audience of connoisseurs.

MESSRS. LOUIS AND ADOLPH RIES gave their evening concert on Wednesday last, at the Hanover Square Rooms, to a crowded audience. Mr. Louis Ries has long distinguished himself as a player of a superior order, and his services as second violin at the Monday Popular Concerts have been of the highest value. Mr. Adolph Ries, though less before the public, is, nevertheless, as a pianoforte player, an artist of acknowledged merit, and the solos he introduced, Chopin's Nocturno, Op. 32, and "Les Arpèges" of Kullak, Op. 89, were both rendered with extreme finish and neatness. Mr. Louis Ries contributed a couple of solos — a reverie and rondino of H. Vieuxtemps,—both charmingly played, and the duo of Thalberg and De Beriot on the Huguenots, combined the talent of the brothers. The remaining instrumental pieces were a trio (MS.) for the pianoforte violin and violoncello, by A. Ries; the grand quintet by F. Ries, and a quintuor of Robert Schumann, to which Messrs. Deichmann, R. Blagrove, W. H. Hann, and E. Vieuxtemps, lent their able assistance. Miss Augusta Thomson sang the air "Pouvoir du chant," from Auber's Circassienne, and M. De Fontanier contributed two songs "Behold the western evening light" (A Ries), and "Le Torrador" (D'Adhéman). The vocalists also joined in two duos from Le Pré aux Clercs, and the duet "Di Cappricci," from L'Italiana in Algeri.

MRS. JOHN HOLMAN ANDREWS, one of our most fashionable professors of the vocal art, gave a soirée at her residence, 50 Bedford Square, on Friday, the 7th, and a matinée on the 8th, being assisted in the two by Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Tennant, Herr Hermanns, and Mr. Sims Reeves as vocalists, Miss Arabella Goddard, M. Sainton, Mad. R. S. Pratten, and M. Paque as instrumentalists. Mrs. Andrews, who has a very charming mezzo soprano voice, and indicates a good school in her singing, did not adventure upon a single solo in either concert, but joined in duets, trios, and quartets with the other singers, therefore betokening a modesty unparalleled in a concert-giver. The great vocal hit of the matinée was Blumenthal's song, "The days that are no more," sung by Mad. Sainton-Dolby; unless it might be "Come into the garden, Maude," by Mr. Sims Reeves. Miss Arabella Goddard played twice on both occasions, at the soirée supplying Heller's solo on Mendelssohn's "Songs' bright pinions," and Benedict's "Albion," both of which were encored, Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith" being substituted for the former, and "Where the Bée sucks," for the latter. At the matinée Miss Goddard joined M. Sainton and M. Paque in a trio by Spohr, and played Liszt's Rigoletto fantasia, in both achieving her customary laurels. To the above encores at the soirée, we must add a solo on the guitar by Mad. Pratten; Blumenthal's serenade, "An Evening Song," by Mr. Tennant; and Bishop's quartet, "Where art thou, beam of light?" sung by Mrs. Holman Andrews, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Tennant, and Herr Hermanns. The rooms were filled on both occasions by a brilliant and fashionable auditory.

MISS MESSENT'S ANNUAL CONCERT was given at the Hanover Square Rooms, on Friday evening, the 7th. The lady's share of the programme comprised the aria, "Deh per questo," from the Clemenza di Tito; the old ballad, "My lodging is on the cauld ground;" and "The piper of Dundee," besides taking part in several concerted Morceaux. In all, the fair concert-giver was greatly successful, and displayed her varied talent to the utmost advantage, coming off with flying colours no less in the beautiful air from Tito, than in the old English ballad and the Scotch song. The singers with Miss Messent were Miss Eyles, Signora Beati, Signor Gardoni, Mr. Charles Braham and M. Jules Lefort; the instrumentalists, M. Nicolas Rubinstein and M. Wieniawski. Mr. Charles Braham, who is just entering on his new career as a barytone, sang the air "Il balen" from the Trovatore with great power of voice and breadth of delivery, and cannot fail to become a decided acquisition to the concert-room, sacred or secular. Signora Beati, a new importation from Milan, made a favourable impression, even with the drawback of extreme timidity. The conductors were Herr Wilhelm Ganz, Mr. George Lake and Mr. Harold Thomas.

A MESMERIC CONCERT was given at Mr. Collard's Concert Rooms on Thursday last. A willing influence was present on that occasion beyond all doubt, for the performers gave gratuitous service. A slight demur arose at the commencement. The music had not been "willed," and without it the artists could not proceed. Whilst voices were thus held in suspense, the fairy fingers of Miss Eleanor Ward played, not the Fairies' Dance of Parish Alvars, but La danse des Sylphes by the Emperor of French harpists, Felix Godefroid. Less than mesmeric influence was sufficient to bring the forgotten copies of music (and that they were forgotten may be excused under circumstances so unusual), and the concert proceeded. One professional gentleman took fright on seeing Dr. E——'s name on the tickets and withdrew, lest by any accident he should fall asleep, and thereby be prevented concluding his engagements for the season. Had Mr. T—— from Yorkshire walked in, or Dr. A—— been present, the whole room might have been in a state of somnambulism; but they were absent, and no power was exerted over a wakeful and fashionable audience but that of the performers. The Exhibition harp of 1851 showed its blue colours, and was touched by the hand of its energetic possessor, whose rich melodious tones would have awakened any sleepers, and destroyed any other magnetic influence by its own. The infirmary, for the benefit of which this concert was given, is doing much good in cases in which ordinary remedies seem to fail, and although mesmerism amongst the happily organised may provoke a smile, on those who require its aid it works marvellously. We are glad that the "willed" artists gave their services so willingly on such an occasion.

The Musical World.

LONDON: SATURDAY, JUNE 15, 1861.

THE destruction by fire of the Surrey Music Hall is one of those dreadful accidents which periodically befall our places of public amusement, and which seem alike to defy precaution and watchfulness. Within a few years we had to chronicle the burning of Covent Garden Theatre and St. Martin's Hall, and have now to add that of the very splendid building in the Surrey Gardens, devoted to music. In the present case, we believe, the cause of the conflagration is distinctly traced; and the smallest care, it would appear, on the part of the workmen who were occupied in repairing the roof, would have prevented the catastrophe. Generally, however, the cause remains concealed, or is only surmised. In the case of the Royal Italian Opera, conjecture was completely baffled; and to this day the burning down of that magnificent theatre continues a mystery. Is there any means of preventing these terrible occurrences? Must it be set down in the book of probabilities that any given theatre in London is doomed to share the fate of the Surrey Music Hall—say, once in twenty years? If this be correct calculation, and that there are twenty theatres in London, every year should have its conflagration, which, fortunately, is not the case, and which, no doubt, is owing to the superior providence of some managers over others, or to a better system of ventilation or fire-prevention adopted in the structure of the buildings. In any case, it behoves those who construct theatres, as well as those who watch over them, as far as lies in their power, specially to provide against accidents by fire. Where such inflammable materials as painted canvass and fragile wood-work are used, and brought into all but immediate contact with flickering jets of gas—as is the case in all theatres, and is unavoidable—it is really wonderful that accidents are so few, and proves that the midnight guardians of the temples must be wakeful at their posts. In the case of Her Majesty's Theatre a large tank of water surmounts the building, which is so arranged that the whole contents may be turned on to the interior of the house in a very few minutes. Such a body of liquid would no doubt extinguish summarily any ordinary fire, and would seem to be all that is required. Whether any other theatre has adopted the same plan we do not know. But we would recommend strongly the adoption of large cisterns, after the manner of that used in the Old Opera, not only in theatres, but in every building devoted to public amusement; in which case a single watchman, by the turn of a single cock, would be enabled to do the work of twenty fire-engines, and in ten times briefer space.

Poor Jullien! The Surrey Music Hall was one of his brightest day dreams. He, who always looked forward to the art enlightenment of the public, saw in the establishment of a music-hall in the somewhat barbaric regions of Walworth, Lambeth, the Boro', and Camberwell, a new field for his enterprise, a new theatre for his ambition, a new arena on which to carry out his boundless speculations for the advancement of music. No missionary with gospel in hand ever went to the Coast of Gold, or remotest Indian isle, to convert misbelievers, with purer intent or more fixed determination than Jullien to the farther side of the Thames, to regenerate the untaught hosts of Surreyland by means of good music. But "the race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong;" and they who deserve most of fortune too often in the end come off the worst. Jullien gave up heart and soul to the establishment of the new Hall—as, indeed, was his nature, his instinct—and in an evil hour embarked in it all the hard and honourable earnings of many years. The Surrey Music Hall was inaugurated with every prospect of success. Soon, however, matters took an adverse change. Ill management, increase of expenditure, disagreement among the shareholders, improvidence of the director, and a brief career of bad luck, brought the speculation to bankruptcy. Jullien lost several thousand pounds, all he had in the world indeed, and, as far as money was concerned, was a ruined man. He bore up manfully, however, against the calamity, and displayed more energy and vigour than ever in stemming the torrent of adversity. It cannot be concealed, nevertheless, that the bankruptcy of the Surrey Music Hall planted the first nail in Jullien's coffin. He not only lost all his worldly estate, but his brightest vision had fled, his dearest hope was gone. And thus the Surrey Music Hall, in its moral ruin, engendered a far deeper calamity than in its physical annihilation. Insurance offices and shareholders may again raise the structure aloft to the skies, and endow it with new beauty and splendour; but what power can restore him who constituted its life and light, and without whom the Hall itself would have had neither locality nor a name!

It is gratifying to know that the building is largely insured, although by no means to the extent of covering the loss. The fears, too, have proved premature that the destruction of the Hall would involve the foregoing of many important concerts already announced, thereby throwing hundreds out of employment. This, we are glad, is provided against. A temporary building, we understand, has been erected, of hoarding, we may suppose, at the end of the supper-room, where the concerts will take place until the hall is rebuilt, and in which some fêtes on a prodigal scale will be given for the benefit of the proprietors. The weather, moreover, could not be more favourable; so that, notwithstanding the terrible disaster which has brought destruction on the hall, the musical season at the Surrey Gardens will not suffer total eclipse.

SIGNOR VERDI is the most fortunate of composers. Just when his prestige seemed to be on the wane, when his popularity appeared to totter beneath the new impetus given to good music; when the Trovatore was beginning to pall upon the public taste, and the Traviata was all but banished from the operatic repertory, comes a new work from his pen, which has already excited the greatest curiosity and interest, not merely on account of the value attached to it as a composition, but because the managers of the two Italian theatres have announced it for performance, and the music has been already made familiar to the visitors of Canterbury and Oxford Halls. Un ballo in Maschera, Signor Verdi's last opera—and, as some say, his best—was one of the special novelties which figured in Mr. Gye's prospectus this season; and, therefore, if priority of announcement constitute a claim, the Royal Italian Opera has the first right of production. The law of copyright, however, as it seems, does not affect the opera being given at another theatre; and as the director of Covent Garden has not been able, as we learn, to obtain the exclusive power of performance for his theatre, Mr. J. H. Mapleson, manager of the Lyceum Italian Opera, has also advertised the Ballo in Maschera for representation, and even takes precedence of Mr. Gye, since the opera is announced in the bills for to-night; whereas the Royal Italian performance does not take place until Thursday. Here, then, we have two impresarii of Italian opera openly contesting for the honour of laying Verdi's latest inspiration before the public, and expending all the resources of their establishments on its production. The Covent Garden cast comprises, in the principal parts, Mesdames Penco, Miolan-Carvalho, and Nantier-Didiée; Sigs. Mario, Graziani Tagliafico, and M. Zelger; that of the Lyceum, Mlle. Titiens, Mesdames Gassier and Lemaire, Sigs. Giulini, Delle Sedie, and M. Gassier; two powerful lists of names, and which demonstrates how worthily considered the opera must be in the minds of the directors.

Sig. Verdi is now, in reality, the hero of the opera, and his old influence is about to be renewed. Once more must the star of Mozart and Rossini grow pale in the dazzling glare of young Italy's composer, and a second Trovatore furor be created. It might be desired, however, that Sig. Verdi had essayed his talent on any other subject than that which had originated one of the most undoubted chefs-d'œuvre of the French school. In selecting Gustavus the Third; or, the Masked Ball, already hallowed by the genius of Auber, the Italian composer acted unwisely; since he brought his music into direct competition with that of one who was a far greater master and a more inspired writer than himself, and could hope to obtain little profit from the comparison. Is it possible that Signor Verdi ever entertained the idea of making the world forget Auber's opera through his own? Perhaps he remembered how Rossini's Barbiere had entirely obliterated that of Paesiello, and fancied his Ballo in Maschera would do the same by Auber's Masked Ball. Or can it be possible that Signor Verdi knows nothing of the opera of Gustave, and had no "compunctious visitings" when the book was presented to him by some enthusiastic music publisher? This, indeed, would constitute his fairest excuse; since, to fancy he could go calmly and hopefully to work after an attentive hearing of Auber's music, is impossible. Nay, is it not more likely that, after listening to the divinely melodious opening chorus, he would have dashed down the libretto in despair, and cried aloud, "This, indeed, is beyond the scope of my inspiration, and I shall not attempt to rival it?"

We do not seek, in these remarks, to disparage or underrate the composer of Rigoletto. We shall be delighted to hear a new opera from his pen, satisfied that from it alone we can hope to obtain anything, now-a-days, veritably original. If Sig. Verdi were deposed, it would only be to make room for some one without a tithe of his inspiration, and no part of his dramatic power. Therefore, if we are to have novelty, let us seek to procure it from a quarter where we are certain to gain something with which we had no previous acquaintance. The general public, after all, are not such fools; and Sig. Verdi's long-ending popularity proves incontestably not only that he possesses qualities which no other composer possesses, but that to him belongs the still rarer quality of interesting and exciting in an eminent degree. And so we, too, as well as the profanum vulgus, will be right glad to hear a new work which has emanated from his fertile pen.

SIR,—The abandonment of the Leeds Festival has undoubtedly caused much local disappointment; and that the matter is not merely one of provincial interest is, I think, fully proved by the space which has been devoted to the subject in your own valuable journal. Your observation respecting Dr. Bennet's position with reference to the Festival is perfectly correct; and I have no doubt that if that distinguished gentleman had interposed so far as to express a decided opinion on the matter in dispute, we should have heard no more of the disagreement between the Committee and Mr. Burton—not (as you write in your P. S. to Mr. J. W. Atkinson's excellent letter) "the squabbles between Messrs. Spark and Burton." It seems to me to be scarcely consistent with ordinary notions of fair play to endeavour to make Mr. Spark responsible for the offences of others. What I mean is simply this—there is no dispute between Mr. Spark and Mr. Burton respecting the Festival. The difference is entirely between Mr. Burton and the Committee; and after Mr. Atkinson's emphatic statement—and he is one of the Hon. Secs. of that Committee—that the question is not one between Mr. Burton and Mr. Spark, I think that the reiterated assertion that it is merely a squabble between Messrs. Spark and Burton should never have been made. Mr. Spark, indeed, offered to make any reasonable concession, if there was anything in dispute between himself and others concerned in the matter. But the same malignant and blighting influence which has more or less dried up the vitality of all other musical enterprise in Leeds, appears to have once more cast its baneful glance over a project which all concerned ought to have furthered to the best of their ability. Mr. Spark is a hard-working man; and after many years' diligent and most successful labours at the head of various musical societies in Leeds (including the Madrigal and Motet, the Philharmonic, the People's Concerts, the Musical Union, &c.), his friends are greatly surprised that you should make the question of a Leeds Festival depend on a supposed dispute between Mr. Burton and him, particularly after Mr. Atkinson has satisfactorily shown that the abandonment of the Festival is due to a variety of circumstances, financial, political, and local; and that the dispute between Mr. Burton and the Committee is only one of those circumstances.

I am, Sir, Your obedient Servant,

CHARLES J. DE MEURON,

Leeds, June 5th, 1861. Trinity College, Dublin.

To the Editor of the "MUSICAL WORLD."

SIR,—In your able strictures upon the new Organ erected by Mr. Nicholson in the Cathedral and Parish Church of Manchester, there are one or two errors which I think it requisite to correct.

You remark that "the clergy of a cathedral who provide the money are entitled to a large share in the discussion." Now, it so happens that Mr. Nicholson's organ is erected on the portion of the church which belongs to the parish, and that its cost has been entirely defrayed by the parishioners; so that the clergy, who did not contribute at all to its erection, had no right whatever to interfere.

I believe your statement as to the "influences by which the existing arrangement" has been brought about are substantially correct; neither London nor local builders were allowed to compete, the order being unconditionally given to Mr. Nicholson.

The writer of the account of the opening of the organ in the Manchester Courier laments that the fine stops of Father Smith's choir organ have not been incorporated in the new instrument. I understand that many of the pipes of this "little gem" are already irretrievably damaged by being trod upon.

Your account of the new organ omits the solo flute in the choir organ; the grand ophicleide described by you as being "on high pressure," is merely on the wind of the pedal organ.

In conclusion, I may say that the organ has occasioned general disappointment, and that your strictures have met with as general approval here. I remain, Sir, Yours, &c.

MUSICUS.

Manchester, June 10th.

MLLE. AGNES BURY, whom it may be recollected was so favourably received at Drury Theatre and at various concerts a few years ago, is now in London. During the last few years Mlle. Bury has obtained great success at the principal theatres and concert-rooms in Berlin, Vienna, and other Teutonic cities. Her beautiful voice, combined with her facilities in singing in the Italian, German and English languages, will make her a great acquisition to the theatre and concert-room.

The VOCAL ASSOCIATION will give their sixth and last Subscription Concert this season, at St. James's Hall, on Wednesday evening next, June 19th, in which they will be assisted by the following artists:—Mlle. Whitty, Mlle. Koch, Signor Belletti, Signor Belart, Signor J. Garcia, and Herr Dalle Aste. Mr. Aptommas, the Harpist, will also appear, after an absence of seven years. The choir of 200 voices will sing several of their most popular madrigals and part songs, under the direction of M. Benedict.

SOCIETY FOR THE ENCOURAGEMENT OF THE FINE ARTS.—The Fifth Conversazione of this Society was held at the Gallery, 9 Conduit Street, on Wednesday evening last. After an interesting reading of several poems by the Rev. Hugh Hutton, a selection of vocal and instrumental music was performed by the following artists:—Miss Agnes Bury, Mr. Walbanck, Mr. Alberto Laurence; violin, Herr Ranch; flute, Master Drew Dean; pianoforte, Mrs. Arthur Willmore. Miss. Agnes Bury has not, we believe, been heard in England since her engagement at Drury Lane some four or five years since. She was well received, as was also Mr. Alberto Laurence, whose fine baritone voice was heard to advantage in a cavatina from Verdi's new opera Un Ballo in Maschero." The music was under the direction of Mr. Alfred Gilbert.

CHRISTY'S MINSTRELS.—The latest novelty added to the entertainments of the Sable Melodists, consists in a travestie of the Bohemian Girl, called the Gipsy Girl, written by Mr. William Brough in his most extravagantly humorous vein. The travestie is singularly ridiculous and highly amusing, and if not the best, is about the most laughable opera burlesque yet produced by the Christy confraternity. Mr. Collins makes up wonderfully for Arline, and displays the most admirable and unusual tact by singing and acting without the least attempt at caricature, whereby the caricature is no end of times greater. This talent is unique, and we remember it in one actor only, Mr. Hammond, whose performance of Othello, in the tavestie of that name, was quite wonderful from its earnestness and absence of all exaggeration. No doubt the burlesque of the Gipsy Girl will bring the Christy's Minstrels a new lease of fame.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.—The indisposition of Mr. F. Robson, and his consequent absence from the Olympic Theatre for five weeks, so seriously affected the amusement of the playgoing world, that the assemblage of a very large audience to witness his reappearance on Monday night was only a natural occurrence. But the enthusiasm with which he was received seemed to take him by surprise, accustomed as he has been for several years to an uninterrupted demonstration of public favour. For several minutes he was not allowed to proceed, but as soon as he began to speak his jokes were caught up, and even anticipated, with that peculiar gusto which always presupposes a long-established sympathy between an artist and his patrons. His acting was as fresh and spontaneous as ever, and there is no reason to suppose that his illness has in the slightest degree affected his native energy and vigour. The piece selected for his reappearance was Mr. J. M. Morton's farce Ticklish Times, which is illustrated by the picturesque costume of the Jacobite days, and contains appropriate parts for Mrs. Emden, Mr. G. Cooke, Mr. Walter Gordon, and other membres of the Olympic Company.

Provincial.

Although late in the day, better late than never. The last concert of the Halifax Philharmonic Society (at Mechanics' Hall) appears in all respects to have been a good one, and (which we can readily believe) to have owed much of its success to the presence of Mr. Frobisher, a gentleman who stands deservedly high with the musical public of the town and neighbourhood, and, indeed, of nearly all the northern counties, and who formerly conducted the Band, till ill health induced him to resign the post to his nephew, Mr. Whitaker, and content himself with the office of leader. The singers were Mrs. Sunderland, Messrs. Carter and Whitehead (of Halifax). A local paper speaks highly of the performance of Beethoven's first symphony:

"The manner in which Beethoven's symphony in C (No. 1) was played fairly took us by surprise. The strings were heard to great advantage, the effect being owing to the degree in which they had been strengthened for the occasion, and also to the presence of Mr. Frobisher, who led the band, and to whose exquisite tone and finished execution on the violin, the Halifax public have of late been too little accustomed. Mr. Whitaker was the conductor, and he discharged his duty with great efficiency."

At MANCHESTER Mr. John Brougham's new drama, Playing with Fire, has had an extraordinary success at the Theatre Royal. The Manchester Examiner of Monday thus writes about it:—

"There is nothing much pleasanter in relation with theatrical matters than seeing an actor and an author 'rolled into one,' except it be the gratification of witnessing his undeniable success in both assumptions of character. Such was our pleasure last evening with Mr. Brougham's comedy entitled 'Playing with Fire,'—brought out on Saturday last, for the first time in this country, after a long and successful run in the United States. It is a comedy in five acts,—not a drama illustrative of character; not one of those incongruities of a past day, made up of false sentiment and coarse satire, but a piece of invention, of ingenuity in the construction, such as we rarely meet with, even in those examples of inventive faculty exhibited by our Parisian friends, from whom modern dramatists are so eager to borrow, and whom critics are so ready to condemn. Playing with Fire is a most appropriate title, for every scene goes off with a sparkle and rush of a sky-rocket. Mistake upon mistake, blunder upon blunder, continue to accumulate, until we are carried along in a whirl of inconsistencies, and the curtain comes down at the conclusion of each act amidst a volley of applause and perfect paroxysms of excitement. We remember nothing in the English drama where this sort of 'fire' is kept up through five long acts; and we venture to think that the only drawback in bringing an audience a second time to enjoy the performance will be the infliction of aches and pains arising from the experience of 'Laughter holding both his sides.'"

We learn from the Liverpool Daily Post accounts of the opening of the new organ at the Parish Church, Wallasey. "The Messrs. Willis of London," writes our contemporary, "constructors of the grand organ in St. George's Hall, have been largely entrusted of late to provide new instruments for churches in Liverpool and its vicinity. We need not be surprised at this, considering the magnificent specimen in St. George's Hall, which their patrons are able to hear so frequently displayed by Mr. Best. On Sunday last, an excellent instrument, just completed for the parish church of Wallasey, was inaugurated with the most gratifying success. The rector of the parish, the Rev. F. Haggitt, preached a sermon in the morning to a very crowded congregation, which might be accepted as a model for a discourse on such an occasion when an opportunity is fairly offered to expatiate upon the office of public praise, and the manner in which this delightful and edifying portion of the service ought to be conducted. The reverend gentleman selected his text from the 150th Psalm, and dwelt very forcibly on the necessity of providing for the hearty utterance by the congregation of those portions of the service they are enjoined to take part in, ably contrasting the dialogue between the minister and clerk—which obtains in so many churches, and the confused muttering response of the people in others—with the due vocal expression which it was the privilege and duty of all to attain in public worship. The preacher was at least able to cite a triumphant example in his favour, for although the services at Wallasey church are choral in the full acceptation of the term, the entire congregation join heartily in all those parts of the ritual which are intended to be sung. No doubt the style of sacred music has a great influence in promoting such a desirable result; too much praise cannot, therefore, be given to Mr. W. T. Best, who, since the completion of the new parish church, has acted as organist, and retains the direction of the music, to the great advantage and gratification of the parish. The organ, heard for the first time on Sunday last, although not one of the largest class, is a powerful and effective instrument, possessing many stops (as they are termed) of great variety and character; amongst which is to be found a 'Vox Humana,' the strange and beautiful tones of which are so much admired by those who have heard the great organs of France and Germany. The effect of the instrument, under Mr. Best's practised fingers, was in itself worthy a pilgrimage to Wallasey, where, we need make no apology for mentioning, one of the most beautiful views in the country is to be seen from the immediate vicinity of the parish church."

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—(Communicated).—The scheme of the performances for this triennial event has, we believe, been arranged by the Committee of Management as follows:—On the first morning, Tuesday, the 27th of August, Mendelssohn's Elijah will inaugurate the meeting. This great oratorio was written for the Festival of 1846, when it was produced under the direction of the lamented composer. On the morning of Wednesday, the 28th of August, it is intended to give Handel's Samson, one of the most dramatic and interesting of his sacred works. Thursday morning, the 29th of August, will, as heretofore, be devoted to a performance of the Messiah. Beethoven's grandest composition, the Missa Solennis in D, has been chosen for the first part of the performance on the morning of Friday, the 30th of August, to which will be added a selection from the stupendous choruses of Handel's Israel in Egypt. The usual Ball to conclude the Festival will be omitted, and there will be four evening Concerts, corresponding with those of the morning. Two of these will consist of oratorios—Haydn's Creation and Handel's Judas Maccabæus. The other two evenings are to be devoted to miscellaneous selections of high-class music. The band and chorus, comprising the élite of the profession, will, it is expected, surpass the admitted superiority of the Birmingham Orchestra on previous occasions, while it is understood that the principal singers will consist of the leading favourites now creating so great a sensation in the metropolis. We hope shortly to refer to these engagements: in the meanwhile, we may announce that Costa will again conduct this grand series of musical performances.

From the Belfast Journal we learn that the Presbyterian Musical Association which was organised a few months ago, has succeeded in securing the services of an eminent conductor in the person of Herr Waldemar Malmene, of the Royal Musical Institution, Berlin, and the Conservatoire Impériale, Paris. Of the candidates who offered their services, Mr. Malmeme was selected by the committee for special trial, and has been unanimously appointed. Although a German by birth, he has for the last seven years been resident in England, in the vicinity of Norwich, in which city he is well known for his musical acquirements. The Victoria Hall being otherwise engaged, the use of the Wesleyan Chapel and School-room, Donegall Square, was granted to the committee; and Herr Malmene performed the following pieces:—Vocal.—"Arm, arm, ye brave"—Handel; "Why do the nations"—Handel; "Pro peccatis" (Stabat Mater)—Rossini;—Pianoforte.—Sonata pathetique—Beethoven; Oberon Fantasia—Weber; Fantasia on a German air—Leybach; Nocturne—Herr Malmene;—Organ.—Agnus Dei—Mozart; Flute Concerto—Rink; Hallelujah (Messiah)—Handel. The execution of the several pieces elicited universal applause. Herr Malmene has a voice of great natural sweetness and expression, which has been subjected to the highest cultivation. His instrumental performances, especially on the pianoforte, were of the most brilliant description, and attested in the highest degree his musical genius. He is himself a composer, and has published several pieces which have taken a high place in the musical world. Nothwithstanding his great acquirements, he is, we understand, only between twenty and thirty years of age. His appointment to the situation in question cannot but be regarded as a most important acquisition to the society and to the entire community.

A correspondent from BURY ST. EDMUNDS writes us that on Tuesday last the Athenæum Choral Society gave their fourth and last concert of the season in the Town-hall, to a fashionable audience, including the leading families of the neighbourhood. The principal artists were Miss Annie Cox, Mr. D. Lambert, Mr. C. B. Dyer, M.A.; Mr. A. Nunn, Mr. Last, and Mr. R. Nunn. It is unnecessary to particularise the various pieces in the programme, as they consisted of the oft-noticed favourites of the London concert-rooms during the season. Everything was received with enthusiastic applause; and the audience seemed delighted with the treat thus procured for them by the committee. Miss Cox was well received in Haydn's canzonet, "My mother bids me bind my hair," and encored in "Sweet spirit, hear my prayer." Mr. Lambert's bass voice was very effective in "The village blacksmith" (Weiss), and the old song, "The Wolf," in which he was deservedly encored. A duet from Lucia di Lammermoor and Parry's "A B C," were capitally sung by Miss Annie Cox and Mr. Lambert. The instrumental solos devolved upon Mr. Dyer and Mr. Nunn, who acquitted themselves admirably.

GLASGOW.—A correspondent writes that the Pyne and Harrison English Opera Company have occupied the stage of the Theatre Royal during the past fortnight, and have been entertaining the public with a selection of favourite operas—a welcome change, for the musical amateurs in our midst, from the ordinary business of the legitimate or illegitimate drama on these boards; the more especially as, from whatever cause, there has been no opportunity afforded them of cultivating acquaintance with the lyric opera—native or foreign—since this same corps visited the city twelve months ago. The operas represented on this occasion have been Lurline, The Rose of Castile, The Black Domino, Maritana, Bianca, &c. These works, however, as well as the capabilities of the company by which they have been supported—familiar as they must be to London amateurs—require no detailed description or criticism at our hands. The operatic company have enjoyed a fair measure of patronage here. They were to conclude their brief sojourn last evening (Friday) with Dinorah, for the benefit of the engaging and popular little prima donna, Louisa. We observe that they now proceed to our neighbours in the Scottish capital, where they commence their campaign musical on Monday first. Although, however, there was no opportunity during last winter for our revelling in the higher walks of the musical art, there was, it must be confessed, no lack whatever of musical entertainment of a miscellaneous character, some of them "got up" by local entrepreneurs and a host of others, chiefly of our amateur nature, by the various volunteer companies of the city. Mars and Apollo stalked lovingly together at these latter concerts of our patriotic youth; and the performance of many of them, which we attended, were, in two words, exceedingly creditable. The past winter, indeed, has been more prolific in general entertainments, public and private, than any former season we can recall to mind. Let us hope that they will have been productive of some good, either by merit or contrast, in cultivating and improving the taste of that portion of our 400,000 of a population which patronises the art of music and its professional votaries. The seventh series of Saturday Evening Concerts was brought to a close a few weeks ago. It proved the most successful in all respects ever experienced by the directors. This fact is all the more worthy of remark, if there be truth in the report we have heard, that similar cheap concerts throughout the kingdom, in England especially, have not been by any means so fortunate. Last week there was an excellent performance of sacred music by the Choral Union within our venerable cathedral, which gave the utmost satisfaction to upwards of 2000 auditors—promoting, no doubt, to some extent, the cause of sacred art, and materially assisting the funds of a noble local charity—the Royal Infirmary—in behalf of which the concert was held. There will now be a lull here, for some time, in matters musical. Very unlike "the great metropolis" at this period of the year, we are just at our dull season, in this regard, so that auditors and critics will now enjoy a brief breathing space.

On Monday last a very interesting ceremony took place at Oxford. Her Grace the Duchess of Marlborough, on the part of the ladies of Oxford, presented a magnificent set of musical instruments to the "City of Oxford Volunteers," in the beautiful grounds attached to St. John's College. Previous to the presentation, THE LONDON GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION performed a selection of favourite part music under the direction of Mr. Land. Dr. Corfe gave his annual commemorative concert in the Sheldonian Theatre on the same day.

AMAZONS OR RIFLEMEN.

SIR,—Your correspondent "Tenor Melody," instead of answering my question, corroborates my assertion, for he expressly says; "In this case, the alto part is intended to be sung as actually written," or, in other words, if language has any meaning, that a woman's part should be sung by men. I thought this practice had died out with the last of the castrati, and most assuredly did not expect it would be revived for the benefit of English Riflemen.

"Tenor Melody" refers me to Burney's History of Music, p. 47, vol. 3. The example there given has nothing to do with the matter, because a melody may be written for any class of voice.

Works written for tenor are not the best adapted for the majority of male voices, because baritones are far more plentiful than tenors. Nearly every man can sing a baritone part, but only a certain number a tenor part. The first tenor is the highest part for adult male voices, and, therefore, we cannot, if we would write correctly, have a higher one in any composition intended to be sung solely by men.

If your correspondent will turn to p. 44 of the German edition of Daniel Schubart's Ideen zu einer Aesthetik der Tonkunst, he will find the original of the following passage: "God and Nature require that soprano and alto parts should be given to women; tenor and bass parts to men. If we disobey this law, our mother, Nature, revenges herself by producing an inharmonious and repulsive impression."—Yours, C. MANDEL.

Vineller Hall, June 12th.

MOZART'S SONGS.

SIR,—May I request information from any of your musical readers respecting the song composed by W. A. Mozart, "Phillis an das Clavier?"—if it is published with English words, and by whom?—yours, &c., AMATEUR.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Of the second and last performance of Elijah this season, a fortnight since, we cannot speak altogether in terms of unreserved praise; many of the choruses were taken too fast, and the double quartet "For he shall give his angels charge" (which seems fated never to be properly heard), little more or less than a scramble. Mlle. Parepa was as effective as ever in the soprano music. To the principal contralto part Mad. Sainton-Dolby's finished style was as usual of inestimable value; while in the air "Woe unto them," Mad. Laura Baxter distinguished herself most honourably, aiding also materially in the concerted music. Nothing could possibly excel Mr. Sims Reeves's singing of the tenor music; the trio airs "If with all your hearts," and "Then shall the righteous," coming in for the largest share of approbation. The Prophet of Herr Formes is too well known a performance to require detailed description now.

BEETHOVEN RECITALS.—At his fifth "recital" (on Friday, the 14th inst., M. Hallé played the sonatas in D minor and E flat, Op. 31; the two sonatas (or sonatinas), Op. 49; and the grand sonata dedicated to Count Waldstein, Op. 53. Yesterday, at his sixth "recital," he introduced the sonata in F, Op. 54; the sonata in F minor ("Appassionata"), Op. 57; the sonata in F sharp, Op. 78; and the sonata (or sonatina) in G, Op. 79. We shall speak at length of these admirable performances, which are the topic in every musical circle, and attract crowds of amateurs to St. James's Hall. Yesterday, Mr. Sims Reeves was the vocalist.

"The worth of Art appears most eminent in Music, since it requires no material, no subject-matter, whose effect must be deducted: it is wholly form and power, and it raises and ennobles whatever it expresses"—Göthe.

Has Five Octaves and Two Foot-boards, is in a French-polished Case, and has a soft, subdued, agreeable quality of tone, designed expressly to suit a Cottage or Small Sitting-room.—BOOSEY and CHING, Manufacturers, 24 Holles Street, Oxford Street, W.

Evans's Ten-Guinea
HARMONIUM
Is in a solid, handsome French-polished Case, and possesses that rich and organ-like quality of tone which particularly distinguishes these Instruments from the French.—BOOSEY and CHING, Manufacturers, 24 Holles Street, Oxford Street, W.

Evans's English
HARMONIUMS,
WITH TWO ROWS OF KEYS,
At 45 and 63 Guineas, without Pedals, and 47 and 130 Guineas, with Pedals,
Although particularly adapted for Churches, are equally effective in the Drawing-room. Not only have the leading members of the profession, including Messrs. Sterndale Bennett, Balfe, Potter, Henry Smart, Best, &c., but the Clergy and the Press have also testified to the very great superiority of EVANS'S HARMONIUMS. These Testimonials may be seen upon reference to Boosey and Ching's Illustrated Catalogue of Harmoniums.
The whole of EVANS'S INSTRUMENTS possess that organ-like quality of tone which has been hitherto unattained by any other manufacturer, and are made throughout in the strongest and most substantial manner by the best "ENGLISH WORKMEN.' They are neither affected by heat nor damp.

A MYSTERIUM.—A man in Berlin had the idea to treat the subject of Tannhäuser in an oratorio. He calls ita "Mysterium." Some people say it is by far not so mysterious as the opera Tannhäuser, by Wagner.—Yankee Leap.

OLD SINGER AND YOUNG ACTRESS.—The celebrated German author Gutzkow does not expect to see a great deal from the step attributed to Mrs. Johan Wagner, viz., to leave the opera, and to become an actress. He says, Mad. Schroeder Devrient, too, who was celebrated for her "acting," thought of having, in her old days, a safe capital by retiring to the drama; but alas! when she spoke on a trial a few prologues, the voice was broken, the reading monotonous, the impression of the whole that of dullness and fatigue: she had to retire—but not to the drama. There is much more chance for a voiceless prima-donna, if she has a real talent for acting, to play the parts of the comical old women, than to perform Lady Macbeth.—Dutch Sheet.

FRENCH CORDON AND ENGLISH HURDY GURDY.—When M. Arago, the great French savant, settled in a French country town to pursue some experiments, the inhabitants, feeling honoured at his selection of the place, actually drew a cordon round his dwelling, and established a sort of friendly police for the sake of preventing his experiments from being disturbed. The clowns of Marylebone, on the other hand, insensible to the fact that every day of Mr. Babbage's labours redounds to the advantage of society and the honour of England, hound on gangs of street musicians to disturb and annoy him, and yet doubtless prate with all the Cockney emphasis about "these 'ear henlightened days, and the march of hintellect." However, Mr. Mansfield may be assured that society is with him, and he may treat such vestry bosh with the same contempt manifested for it by Sir George Lewis.—Punch.

Reviews.

"You still may trust in me," written and composed by MR. AND MRS. ST. LEGER (Addison, Hollier, and Lucas).

Which is the poet, and which the composer? No matter which. Perhaps both lady and gentleman did a little of both, and, mixing their ingredients together, made a species of musical half-and-half, or, as mounseer has it—"haf'naf." No matter: the ballad is a pretty one; both words and music being sentimental without a tinge of the stereotyped drawing-room twaddle. Mr. and Mrs. St. Leger may go on making half-and-half, or, as mounseer has it,—"haf'naf;" we are always ready for a "pull" at their conjointly-concocted beverage.

"The Regalia;" "The Covenanter's Widow's Lament;" "Tammy;" "The Heiress;" "Kitty Reid's House;" favourite Scotch ballads from "Lays of Strathearn"—words by CAROLINE BARONESS NAIRNE; symphonies and accompaniments by the late FINLAY DUN (Paterson and Sons—Edinburgh and Glasgow).

Reprints, by no means without interest.

"Caller Herrin." Favourite Scotch ballad from "Lays of Strathearn"—by CAROLINE BARONESS NAIRNE (Paterson and Sons—Edinburgh and Glasgow).

Another reprint. Who does not know the song of "Caller Herrin?"—who that has eaten herrings from the Frith of Forth? Who does not know Nat. Gow's tune?

"Gow has set you a' a-singin'"—

And will do it again, or we are mistaken. But why set his simple tune to such Brummagem harmony?

"I'm thine for ever." Highland song—words (from the Gaelic) by the late DUNCAN GRANT MACDOUGAL—adaptation by CHARLES JAMES FINLAYSON (Paterson and Sons—Edinburgh and Glasgow).

Fit associate for the "reprints" alluded to above.

"New Lancers Quadrille," on popular English airs—by JOSEPH LOWE (Paterson and Sons—Edinburgh and Glasgow).

Mr. Lowe has melted Mazzinghi's "When a little farm we keep," Bishop's "Chough and crow," Dr. Arne's "When daisies pied," Bishop's "When the wind blows," and Joseph Lowe's "Grand finale and coda," in a crucible, and brought forth a quadrille which cannot be compared, as a work of art, with Benvenuto Cellini's "Perseus."

"Song of Spring." Duet for female voices—by MISS E. THOMSON (Paterson and Sons—Edinburgh and Glasgow).

Pretty and unaffected; vocal and inoffensive.

"The Tweedside Quadrilles"—by WILLIAM HOWARD (Paterson and Sons—Edinburgh and Glasgow).

These quadrilles are inscribed to Mr. William Chambers, of Glenormiston, and comprise, among other airs, "The broom of Cowdenknowes," and among other passages, the subjoined:—

which Boieldieu, in his overture to La Dame Blanche, has harmonized in another fashion.

"Pack clouds away," serenade—words by THOMAS HEYWOOD (1607), with an additional verse by a lady—music by FREDERICK W. HANSON (Paterson and Sons—Edinburgh and Glasgow).

Thomas Heywood (1607) will bear quoting. We quote them, together with the "additional verse by a lady," and leave the reader to find out which is which:—

1st verse.	2nd verse.
Pack clouds away, And welcome day, With night we banish sorrow; Sweet air, blow soft, Mount, larks, aloft, To give my love good morrow. Wings from the wind To please her mind, Notes from the lark I'll borrow. Bird, prune thy wing, Nightingale, sing, To give my love good morrow! Wake from thy rest, Robin red-breast, Sing, birds, in ev'ry furrow; And from each hill Let music thrill, Give my fair love good morrow. Blackbird and thrush, In every bush, Stare linnet and blythe sparrow; Ye pretty elves Among yourselves, Sing my fair love good morrow.	At length 'tis day, Oh! bid me stay, Each thought of thine to follow*; Let one bright glance My soul entrance To give my love good morrow. Thou sun, shine bright And bid the light Spring from her eyes and borrow; The witching dart That won my heart, To give my love good morrow. Ye breezes fresh, Blow from the west†, And wave the corn so yellow‡; Ye white wind-mills On gentle hills, Give my sweet love good morrow. And may no care Her peace impair, Or frown her clear brow furrow; And every thing That hath no sting Give my own love good morrow.

* "Follow" and "morrow," good rhyme
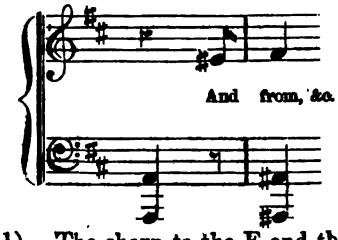
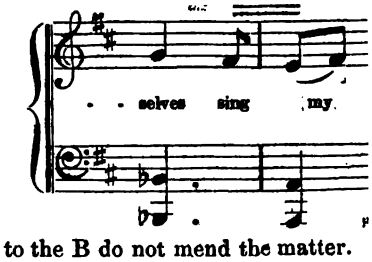
‡ "Yellow" and "morrow," good rhyme.

We presume that, as the words were written in 1607, Mr. Frederick W. Hanson considers fifths consecutive, in similar direction, as the proper sort of thing. At any rate he indulges in them twice—as for example:—



(page 3, line 1). The sharp to the E and the sharps to the A, do not mend the matter. E is E, F is F, and A is A, sharp, flat, or natural, double-sharp, double flat, or double——— no, there is no double-natural. And again, for example:—



The flats to the B do not mend the matter. B is B, A is A, F is F, and E is E—sharp, flat, or natural, double-sharp, double-flat, or double ——— no, there is no double-natural.

"The Katoogastotte Quadrilles," by G. GASTNER (Ceylon).

"Ceylon" is not the name of the publisher, but the name of the region where the "Katoogastotte Quadrilles" are published,—in the Ceylon Pianista, at the Ceylon Examiner press. No matter: the Quadrilles are lively, brilliant, well varied, sparkling, tuneful, rhythmical, danceable, and thoroughly effective—they are quadrilles, in short, which go to prove that the island of Ceylon produces something besides elephants, inasmuch as it has produced a genuine composer of dance-music in the person of G. Gastner, just as it had already produced a genuine composer of vocal music in the person of Gottlieb Cruwell, who, though German by birth is (unfortunately for his friends in all parts of Europe) Cingalese by extradition.

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

July 4, 1861.

IN respect that there is little news this week I have little to write about, but in respect that I must make that little furnish forth a letter I have much to say. The great classical revival on which the management of the Imperial Opera is bent — namely, that of Glück's Alceste, is actively occupying all hands on board that state galleon. Vast preparations are making for the scenery and the ballet, which are to be on a scale worthy the great work they are destined to adorn, or, rather, to fringe. (I trust your reader will understand that fringe is a border or edging used to finish off the materials of vestments, furniture, &c., and that the word is used here in a figurative sense as to garnish.) It is expected that the work will be produced about April next. Whatever is done here they take their time over, as you may see. Nothing is ever produced here in that hasty, scrambling way which is the habit and custom in England. There is too much respect paid to art ever to risk an imperfect or immature result. Yet such is the energy and concentrated working power of the English, that what they do at one heat, as it were, is often as thoroughly done as what is slowly elaborated here, and always with a great advantage in spiritedness. We English have the genius of doing quickly and well, if not to perfection. The French will scheme and labour and study, touch and retouch, organise and drill, with wonderful patience and persistency, as knowing that without such toil perfection cannot be attained. An Englishman will only devote himself in this way when money-making is the work in hand. He would sicken and grow languid over any other task requiring equally prolonged efforts. But I am not lecturing on menology. A dangerous topic it would seem just now when Yankee Munchausens travel, and learned investigators have only small swallows for facts. Marry, one is in danger of being eaten whole to prove that anthropophagy is sometimes practised in a friendly way, and that not only the funeral baked meats may furnish forth the marriage feast, but the deceased relative himself. But this is not music, nor theatres, nor Paris. I might proceed in the same current, however, till I had come to a certain rude lyre (not rude liar, candid printer) with roots for strings, and then I should be within the question. Roots of chords we know of, but cords of roots is another matter! Perhaps Mr. William Chappell will enlighten us and tell us if the ancient Irish harps were not originally strung with potatoes. As it is stated that in the performance of Glück's Alceste it is intended to increase the number of stringed instruments in the orchestra, here will be an opportunity of trying the African substitute for cat-gut. A few fiddles might be fitted up with roots, and perhaps with a long bow they would discourse most excellent music. In the interval (to return to homely fact), before the production of Glück's opera, Mad. Viardot has requested that she might sing in Le Prophète, and her wish has been acceded to. M. Gounod's new opera, La Reine de Saba, is said to be also in rehearsal, but, as yet, only on the piano, with the principal singers. There is also a grand ballet preparing, the composition of Mad. Ferraris. It is to be called L'Etoile de Messine. They have been playing Robert le Diable at the opera, M. Belval, on his return from his congé, having made his first appearance in Bertram.

There has been a row between the management of the Italian Opera and the gentlemen of the orchestra. I don't exactly know what the point at issue is — the quarrels of musical folk have always been somewhat mysterious, — but it is expected that the discord will be resolved, and that there will be no change in the personnel of the orchestra in consequence.

Mlle. Maremon has been re-engaged at the Opéra Comique, to the great contentment of the frequenters. She made her rentrée in Les Diamants de la Couronne. A new part is ready for her in an opera forthcoming, composed by M. Lefébure Wély, to be entitled Les Recruteurs; but she will previously appear in Prince Poniatowski's opera, Au Travers d'un Mur, lately produced on a benefit night at the Théâtre Lyrique, and commented on by me in a recent letter, in that complimentary vein in which I fawn over all that comes from princes and dukes. Some people say I should admire such twaddle, if I had not been previously informed it was by a prince; but they are mistaken. I should require no such previous information; for I should know only a prince could write such twaddle — and get it played.

I have a delicious morsel for that nautical veteran T. P. Cooke, when you come across him. The melodrama of Le Monstre et le Magicien has been revived, after a rest of thirty-five years. You know, of course, that T. P. Cooke played the part of the Monster in Frankenstein, and delighted the Parisians with his great pantomimic powers. A French paper, alluding to this revival, says that the piece was originally written to meet the necessities of "un clown Anglais! and that it is now resuscitated for a "mime Américain." Here is malice. Will not the noble representative of the British tar hitch up his breeches and "shiver his timbers" at the impudence of the Mounseer? But it is undoubted spite at the line subsequently taken by the great pantomimist, who for so many years kept up before the world the ideal of the English sailor and his undoubted capacity to demolish any three Frenchmen.

I broke off my account of the pictures which relate to the musical and dramatic arts in the Salon of 1861, not to weary you with too much of such a catalogue raisonnée. I will resume the subject, and go through a few more numbers. Poor Rachel finds more than one record of her ever memorable outward lineaments, in her public and in her private capacity. M. Gerome exhibits a fine memorial of the great tragic actress. He has painted her in the character of the Muse of Tragedy. She is resting against a fluted column, on the pediment of which are engraved the names of her principal parts. Behind her is a tripod; one hand is dreamily closing about the handle of a dagger; her look is sidelong, and gleams with the threat of some terrible deed. Undoubtedly it is a grandly conceived picture, and, to a great extent, worthy the greatness of the subject. Ah, Rachel! within this somewhat darkened memory there is still a stage whereon thou treadest with all thy majesty and power, making horror graceful, terror fascinating, grief a delicious ecstasy. Some day I too will paint the muse of tragedy. "Anche Io son pittore, M. Gérome." There is another most painful record of the poor frail frame that held in, tant bien que mal, for a few fleeting years, that fiery spirit. It is called "Rachel après sa mort," and is the identical drawing from the photograph taken of Rachel at Cannes immediately after death. It will be remembered that this drawing was the subject of a lawsuit brought by the Felix family against M. Goupit, the publisher, who had exposed it in his window for sale. They contended that without their permission no one had any right to expose for sale this or any other likeness of Rachel, and the law was declared in their favour. It would be a good thing if this were law in this country. What libels of ourselves and of our friends do we see offered to the public! This likeness of Rachel, however, though painful, is carefully and gracefully executed, and will no doubt fetch a large sum of money in a future age, as would a portrait of Shakspeare, the authenticity of which could be equally well attested. There is a portrait of Pierre Dupont, the poet, musician, and popular minstrel. It is a good resemblance, and has a certain strange inspired look about it which is characteristic of the man. M. Layraud, the young artist to whom it is due, wins great credit by this portrait. I cannot say as much for a preposterous unlikeness of Tamberlik in the character of Poliuto. Mad. Viardot is also painted in character with not much more success. She is represented as Orpheus in Glück's Opera, but the head is rather that of Medusa, and seems more like to turn animated beings to stone, than stones to animated beings.

Among the drawings there are the two portraits of Rossini, published with the edition of Semiramis given forth by the publishers of the Ménéstrel — Rossini in Naples 1820, and Rossini in Paris 1860 — the first from an original miniature by Mayer of Vienna, the other from a photograph by Numa Blanc. There is also an admirable drawing in pastel of Paulin Meunier, in Le Courier de Lyon, in the character of the horse dealer, which was played by Mr. Addison. The vigour which is shown in expressing the coarse brutality and slangy swagger assumed by the actor is extraordinary from so feeble a vehicle as pastel. In another letter I will say something of the sculpture room, which contains several artistic celebrities.

You are doubtless aware that Her Majesty's Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1862 at South Kensington addressed letters to MM. Auber, Meyerbeer, and Rossini with a view to obtain three new musical compositions which should represent France, Germany, and Italy, and be associated with a fourth composition standing for England, the representative of which is not yet known.

The commissioners make no demand for the copyright, but merely request the right of performing these compositions on the opening of the Exhibition in a manner befitting the occasion.

With regard to the class of composition required, these are the four pieces proposed:—

1. An anthem about equal in extension to the Coronation Anthem of Handel.
2. A chorale without instrumental accompaniment.
3. A triumphal march.
4. A march for wind instruments.

I believe I am right in stating that the triumphal march was the piece for which Rossini was solicited. The maestro has declined the honour in the following letter addressed to the secretary of the commission:—

"I regret I cannot accept the honour which her Majesty's Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1862 are good enough to do me.

"Were I still a member of the musical world I should make it a duty and a pleasure to prove on this occasion that I am not forgetful of the noble hospitality of England.

"Permit me to hope, sir, that you will kindly receive, and transmit with all my regrets to your colleagues, the expression of my high consideration. "G. ROSSINI."

[NOTE.—MM. Auber and Meyerbeer have both written to the commissioners signifying their assent to compose a musical work for the opening of the Exhibition of 1862.—ED.]

MUSIC IN HOLLAND.

(From a correspondent.)

AMSTERDAM.

A NEW symphony, with chorus, entitled The Emperor Charles V., is now creating some sensation in musical circles in this country, and, consequently, an account of it may be interesting to your readers. It was first performed at a concert given some little time since, in Amsterdam, by the local section of the Society for the Promotion of Musical Art. The programme on the occasion consisted of the above-mentioned symphony, followed by Spohr's oratorio, Der Fall Babylons, neither of which works had ever previously been performed. The composer of the symphony is a Herr W. F. Thooft. It was written in consequence of a prize being offered, by the Society for the Promotion of Musical Art, for a work in which the vocal portion should be symphonically combined with the instrumental. One of the conditions imposed on all competitors for the prize was, therefore, that there should be no separate instrumental portions, as in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony or Mendelssohn's Lobgesang; but that the vocal and instrumental music should, in every instance, go hand in hand. Of course, under such circumstances, an especial book was necessary. Dr. Heye wrote a libretto, entitled Immortality, but only one person set it to music, and his composition was far below the requisite standard of excellence, so that the prize was not awarded at all. In 1857, another libretto was selected. It was entitled The Emperor Charles V., the author being Dr. Wap. Two competitors set it to music, and one of these, W. F. Thooft, carried off the prize of 200 florins.

Although the libretto is, in many instances, admirably adapted for treatment as a symphony, the composer's task was no easy one; since, as a rule, the poem is worked out dramatically, and the music had, therefore, to be as dramatic as possible, and yet to partake of the nature of the symphony. The principal incident is the coronation of the Emperor Charles V., at Bologna, which was as remarkable from the circumstances under which it took place as from the mighty hero who was crowned. After having brought to a fortunate termination two wars, one against France and the other against Turkey, and having reduced Mexico and Peru to subjection to Spanish rule, Charles received at Bologna the Iron Crown, as King of Italy, and, two days subsequently, the Golden Imperial Crown, from the hands of Pope Clement VII. himself. Charles, at this period, was Emperor of Germany, King of Italy and Spain, Lord of the United Netherlands, and a large portion of America, and exercised a sway which, although of short duration, is perfectly unique in the history of modern times. In the first three parts, Charles is celebrated as Sovereign, Warrior, and Protector of the Church, as well as of the Arts and Sciences. The first part consists of two choruses, namely, a chorus of Maltese knights, and a chorus of Dutch, German, and Italian women. The two choruses alternate with each other, and at last combine at the conclusion of this section of the work. The form is kept in strict conformity to the rules of the symphony. The first principal motive is given to the male, and the second to the female, chorus. The two choruses combine in the coda. The orchestra plays a perfectly independent part of its own, and, both in the treatment and carrying out of the principal motive, takes the initiative. By this arrangement, the relation of the chorus to the orchestra is partially a completely novel one, though it does not in the least detract from the due effect of the chorus. Care must, however, be taken that the latter be not too weak. The second part consists of a chorus of Priests, who render their homage to Charles as the defender of the Church. The orchestral introduction is shorter than that in the first part. The instrumentation is remarkable from the fact of the violin parts standing altogether by themselves, and, as far as the chorus and wind instruments are concerned, being treated as a solo. The effect is very good, although such a system should be employed very sparingly. The third part was the most difficult for the musicians. The author of the words presents us with two contrasting elements: Charles as a Warrior, and Charles as a Prince of Peace, the patron of the Arts and Sciences. A fine occasion is thus offered the composer for the symphonic form. The text, however, is very dry and —which is a great fault— too didactic; but the composer has overcome the difficulty, and made the most of the orchestra. The latter pourtrays, in the introduction, the two opposite elements mentioned above. Then comes a bass (solo)—a so-called "speaking part"— which the orchestra illustrates, freely using for the purpose the motives contained in the introduction. The second element, "The Prince of Peace," is represented first by a solo soprano, and afterwards by a quartet, the orchestra acting, so to speak, as accompanyist. In the fourth and last part, the libretto takes a strange turn. Nothing more is heard of the hero of the poem. Casting a prophetic glance into the Future, the Author summons up the Genius of History, who announces the transient nature of all human greatness. Thereupon, we hear, in the final chorus, various nations of the earth, who, while rejecting outward unity gained by means of a single monarchy, embracing the whole globe, declare themselves to be children of one and the same eternal God, and exhort each other to inward unity, resulting from brotherly love. This part of the work is not composed in the form of a symphony, nor does the orchestra assert, to so great a degree as in the previous parts, its independent character. After a short choral-like prelude by the orchestra, we have the soprano solo (the Genius of History), with a recitative or arioso, followed by the final chorus (the Nations or "Peoples"), the ordinary form of a choral-finale, namely, Andante maestro, Allegro molto and Fugato, being adopted. The work was warmly applauded both by the public generally and the "professionals" in particular. The performance was under the personal direction of the composer, who had reason to feel deeply indebted to the orchestra for the admirable manner in which it carried out his intentions. The solos were excellently rendered by Mad. Offermans van Hove (soprano), Mad. Collin-Tobisch (alto), and two clever amateurs. The chorus, on the contrary, although entitled to hearty commendations, was too weak.

Spohr's Fall Babylons went well under the direction of Herr Richard Hol, a very efficient conductor.

You are, of course, aware that there is in Rotterdam a German Operatic Company, which has, from time to time, paid flying visits to this town, as well as the Hague and Utrecht. The Dutch are great admirers of German classical music, and in fact some of the great dramatic masterpieces of German composers are played more frequently here, in the land of dykes, canals, and "schnapps," than in Germany itself. At what German theatre, for instance, has Beethoven's Fidelio been performed sixteen times in one season, Mozart's Don Juan, six, his Figaro's Hochzeit, ten, and his Zauberflöte, six; Weber's Euryanthe, nine; and the same composer's Freischütz, seven? And yet the above works were performed, respectively, the above number of times in Rotterdam. It is true that the foundation of a German Opera there was beset with great difficulties, but they have been successfully overcome.

Up to the spring of 1859, theatrical matters in Rotterdam were in a seemingly hopeless state, and the disunion which prevailed among the principal supporters of the theatre did not tend to improve them. In consequence, however, of the publication of several excellently written articles in the different papers, attention was gradually but surely directed to the subject, and the public became convinced that a complete orchestra and an operatic company were an absolute necessity for the city. In conjunction with Herr de Vries, manager of the theatre here (Amsterdam), certain spirited individuals formed a plan for the purpose of establishing a German operatic, and a Dutch dramatic company for Rotterdam and Utrecht. The plan did not meet with the requisite support, only 20,000 guldens being subscribed to carry it out. Its originators would not, however, allow themselves to be beaten. A fresh committee was appointed, but their efforts would hardly have been crowned with success, had not one of the members hit upon the idea of granting a free admission to each person taking a certain number of shares in the enterprise. By this means, subscriptions were obtained to the amount of 75,000 guldens, which was sufficient to enable the promoters of the scheme to commence active proceedings.

The direction of the opera was confided to a very excellent musician and conductor, Herr Skraup, formerly in Prague. This gentleman has fully justified all the expectations formed of him, and, out of the chaotic medley of artists, vocal and instrumental, unknown to him and to each other, created an admirable working troupe and a first-rate orchestra. The season just past was brought to a triumphal close by a new opera, Meergeuse, from the pen of the worthy conductor. The work was well sung, well played, and warmly applauded.

If your space allows it, perhaps you will insert the following list of operas played during their first season, by the New German Operatic Company in Holland. I think it is something of which the compatriots of Admiral van Tromp, "those Dutch sons of"—guns, as Master Copp does not say, may well be proud:—

STUTTGARDT — (From a Correspondent). After a long period of inactivity, the managers of the Theatre Royal appear to have shaken off their lethargy. Unfortunately, however, they never thought of presenting anything worth hearing or seeing until the public preferred al fresco entertainments, in the fresh and fragrant gardens scattered about the city, to the warm and stifling atmosphere of the play-house. The Stuttgardters have been peculiarly unfortunate this season. Not only have they been the victims, as before remarked, of apathy on the part of the managers, but they have suffered greatly in their amusements from unavoidable causes. Illness has been a prominent trouble-fête. For instance, the first tenor, Herr Sontheim, was obliged to absent himself from his duties from the 18th of March to the 7th of May. This was no trifling loss, for there was no one to replace him, and, consequently, a whole host of operas was at once erased for the time being from the repertory. It is true that Herr Franz Jäger was put forward as Arturo in the Puritani, but the result was by no means an encouraging one. Herr Jäger was several times in the course of the evening very nearly laughed off the stage. The managers did the best they could, however, and selected such operas as Die Beiden Schützen, Figaro's Hochzeit, St. Johannisnacht, Czaar und Zimmermann, Nachtlager in Granada, Teufels Antheil, Liebestrank, &c., in which the tenor can manage to get on pretty well, provided he can act a little. At length Herr Sontheim was sufficiently recovered to appear on the 8th of May, as Edgardo in Lucia di Lammermoor, and thus put an end to the canard which has gone the round of the papers about his having been placed in a lunatic asylum. An equally absurd and unfounded report was circulated to the effect that Herr Pischek had died from the effect of an apoplectic fit. So far from this being the case, Herr Pischek appeared as Figaro in Mozart's chef-d'œuvre, on the 28th of April, and is as well as ever he was. He had merely been for a few days slightly indisposed.—The concert season has just been brought to a close. First and foremost come the Subscription Concerts, which had been heralded with magnificent promises. Among other things, the public was to hear Beethoven's Mass in D, Mozart's Davide penitente, and Schumann's Paradies und Peri. But these promises were not redeemed, and the sole novelty during the entire season was Hiller's Loreley. There was not even an attempt made to produce Beethoven's Mass. Perhaps the reason for this was that the members of the band, who mostly all belong to the orchestra at the Theatre Royal, had not leisure to study a composition of such importance. Mozart's cantata was shelved a few days before the night fixed for the performance, by the indisposition of one of the principal vocalists; and Schumann's work abandoned the very night preceding that of the concert, on account of the illness of Herr Kücken, who, it appears, imagined that he alone could act as conductor, although there were many persons bold enough to assert that either of the two Concert-Meister, under [him, might have supplied his place. Thus the programme, in all its essential characteristics, resembled that of last year. Last year, for instance, we had three symphonies by Beethoven; this year we have had four; that in B flat major, that in A major, the "Pastoral," and the "Eroica;" the last being substituted, at a moment's notice, for Schumann's Paradies und Peri. Last year we had two by Haydn, and we have the same number this; they were that in E flat major, and that in D major. Last year, one by Mozart; this year, two; that in C major with Fugue, and that in G minor. Last year, one by Mendelssohn; and the same number this year; the symphony in A minor. Last year and this we had the same—namely, that in C major—by Franz Schubert. Last year we had one by Schumann, and the same number this year; the symphony selected being that in D minor. In conclusion, instead of a symphony by Spohr, we had, this year, Gade's symphony in B flat major, while Spohr was represented only by the larghetto of his symphony in C minor. The overtures were by Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Mendelssohn, Cherubini, Spontini, Rietz, Gade, and Wagner. In addition to these, there was Mendelssohn's Walpurgisnacht, as well as several pieces from Weber's Oberon, which had not been heard here for a considerable period; and pianoforte sonatas by Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Moscheles. There have not been many other concerts worthy of note, with the exception of some very good ones got up by a private society called the Bürgermuseum. There were, also, two Quartet Soirées given by members of the band at the Opera-house; and the concerts of the Orchesterverein, under the direction of Herr Faist. Vocal music is actively cultivated by a goodly number of societies, and by none more successfully than by the Liederkranz, a union of male voices. Among the mixed associations may be mentioned the Klassischer Kirchenverein, the object of which is to diffuse a taste for the treasures of German sacred compositions. This society, assisted by the orchestra of the opera, and some of the principal singers, performs an oratorio every year in the large Protestant church. Last, not least, comes the so-called Operakranz, under the direction of W. Speidel, teacher at the School of Music. This society executes such sterling operas as Euryanthe, Così fan Tutti, &c., which are rarely, if ever, performed at the Opera-house. Herr Speidel accompanies on the piano.

MAYENCE. — The tenor, Manuel Carrion de Anguiano, has appeared six times very successfully in Il Trovatore, La Sonnambula, Guillaume Tell and Il Barbiere. — Roger has been here, but his engagement did not prove as lucrative as was expected. — At four grand performances, the Liedertafel and the Ladies' Gesangverein have given successively Beethoven's Mass in C major, Mendelssohn's St. Paul, Mozart's David Penitente, and Haydn's Seasons. — After acting for five years as conductor of the above societies, Herr Marpurg has resigned his post, in order to devote his undivided attention to the Opera.

RUDALSTADT. — Judas Iscariot, a biblical drama by Herr F. Röhrig, music by Herr A. Späth, was lately given here with success.

COLOGNE.—The Philharmonic Society of Laibach, founded as long ago as the year 1702, lately elected Herr Ferdinand Hiller an honorary member. This gentleman's oratorio Die Zerstörung Jerusalems was recently performed, two days running, at Laibach, and created a great sensation. It was also given a short time since at Regensburg, and is to form one of the first day's attractions at the approaching festival at Middeburg, in Holland. Herr Hiller has composed a cantata for the grand German Sangerfest, which is soon to take place in Nuremberg.

MR. C. HALLE'S BEETHOVEN RECITALS.

To the Editor of the MUSICAL WORLD.

SIR,—The success which has attended Mr. Charles Hallé's "Beethoven Recitals" may be cited as something unprecedented in the annals of the London concert-room. That one instrumentalist, by executing the works of one composer, relieved only by two or three vocal pieces, should have attracted large and fashionable assemblages throughout a long series of concerts, can only be regarded as a most extraordinary fact, of which we can offer no explanation, knowing, as we do, that amateurs continue to purchase for private use the most wretched kind of pianoforte music, and chiefly patronise the worst of operas. It is really curious, if not completely gratifying, to find the incomparable inspirations of the deaf, surly, old Beethoven thus apparently idolised when he is beyond the reach of human praise—to find a very clever gentleman gaining pecuniary rewards exceedingly pleasant and useful, and honour proportionate to the faithfulness of his expression of the mighty "tone-poet's" ideas, with the recollection fresh in our mind of the neglect and poverty which the living Beethoven experienced, and the consequent conviction that were such a master now in existence he would have to submit to a similar fate. The uncompromising artist, who, when his fame was at the highest, lived in two rooms, surrounded by piles of manuscripts mingled with strachino cheese, half-emptied bottles of doubtful wine, and strongly flavoured by badly-kept meerschaums, who found no small difficulty in paying his landlord, and was always writing "Noten in Nöthen" (to use his own painfully facetious words), we all know was "honoured" not many years ago by a festival to inaugurate his stony effigy at Bonn (his native place)—a monumental fête in which monarchs took part "and deemed their dignity increased"—now seems to have become the idol of the fashionable world of London. Beethoven is the musical god of the day, and Herr Hallé is his prophet. Well, if this be only fashion it is very good fashion, and deserves all possible encouragement, though the reflection will force itself upon us, that if the patronage thus given—and very properly given to executive talent such as Herr Hallé undoubtedly possesses—were extended to the efforts of creative artists; if fashion would recognise and encourage the eternal spirit of poetry which animated Beethoven, and accord to the living that honour with which it appears now only inclined to "soothe the dull cold ear of death," the art of composition would no longer languish as it does, nor great musical illustrators of the age in which we live be forced to wear out their lives in "hoping against hope."

Herr Hallé's greatest performances at his last "recital" were the magnificent sonatas in A, op. 101, and in B flat 106, the latter of which was played some few years back with such brilliant success by Miss Arabella Goddard.* The eminent German pianist surpassed himself on the present occasion, and a finer expression of these prodigious works, which belong to the most original and imaginative productions of the greatest musical inventor that ever lived, whether he be considered with reference to rhythm, harmony, structural design, or fugal counterpoint, a more masterly exposition of the general meaning and exhaustless beauties of these two sonatas, which are unhappily difficult to execute as they are to understand, could not well be conceived. Herr Hallé's success was a triumph not only for himself as a wonderful executant, but for the highest principles of creative art.—Post.

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL (communicated).—We have much pleasure in calling the especial attention of our readers to the complete programme of this important celebration, which appears in our advertising columns. We congratulate the Committee of Management on their success in having secured a combination of vocal talent surpassing anything which has hitherto been brought together, and which cannot fail to add to the reputation the Festivals of Birmingham have so honourably sustained for upwards of half a century. Mlle. Titiens and Mlle. Adelina Patti will both take part in the oratorio music, and may, therefore, be regarded as the novelties of the Festival. In addition to these artists, Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mad. Rudersdorff, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Miss Palmer, Mr. Sims Reeves, Signor Giuglini, Mr. Santley, and Signor Belletti are engaged. We are promised the detailed programme in the course of a few days, when we shall again refer to the subject.

THE NOBLEMEN'S CATCH CLUB.—This club, established in 1761 by a committee of noblemen and gentlemen for the performance of glees and catches, has during the long period of its existence encouraged the composition of catches by offering for competition among its professional members gold medals and other prizes, and it is to this we are indebted for some of the best glees, &c. we now possess. The Catch Club has distributed upwards of 200 prizes, and we find in the long list of competitors the names of Dr. Arne, Battishill, Abel, Dr. Hayes, Clarke, Barthelemon, Dr. Cooke, Webbe, Atterbury, Paxton, Hindle, Stevens, Billington, Dr. Callcott, Danby, Horsley, Elliott, Goss, and a host of others. The Club has not of late years been supported as it deserved; but we are glad to find that amongst the recent "revivals," the Catch Club has not been left uncared for, but that owing to the exertions of the Secretary, Mr. Bradbury, the Duke of Beaufort, the Earl of Westmoreland, Lord Wilton, Lord Wrottesley, and other noblemen, it is now in as flourishing a state as in days gone by. The Club has increased so largely during last season, that in this its 100th year, the Committee determined to celebrate the centenary by offering for competition two prizes—the first a silver goblet, to be given to the best glee for male voices, and the second, five guineas, to the glee second in merit. The various compositions were sent into the Club anonymously, and submitted for selection. After a very interesting competition and three hearings, the centenary cup was awarded to the glee, "Song should breathe of scents and flowers," composed by Mr. William Cummings, who has been also successful in obtaining several glee prizes at other clubs; the second prize to the glee, "If music be the food of love," by Mr. G. Benson. It is satisfactory to know that the decisions met with general approval.

VIENNA.—Marriages between artists and members of the aristocracy are becoming rather frequent. A short time since the Duke Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, Colonel in the Austrian service, led to the altar Mlle. Constance Geigar. According to all reports, the young Duchess is a kind of universal genius. She sang, composed, danced, acted, and played the piano. A few years since, Mlle. Louise Neumann became, by marriage, Countess Schönbron, and Mlle. Gossmann, Baroness Prokesch. Very shortly, Mlle. Bossler, the actress, will be the wife of Baron Bruck, a son of the late Minister.

(For Music).

THE eye which a tender compassion can show,
At tale of cold sorrow with pity o'erflow,
Can draw from the deep-wounded heart ev'ry sting,
And sweet balm of peace in fond sympathy bring:
Which, when old age sits down on this yet placid brow,
Will gaze on me loving and faithful as now,—
This, this, were the glance I would have ever beam,
Around me, while floating Life's changeable stream.

There may live a charm in each bright, glowing flower,
Which courts the sun's lustre, and heeds not the shower;
But give me the blossom that hides in the glade,
Content to bloom on in its emerald shade.
The blossom so tender, e'en the evening's light dew,
Bends its beauteous head, and hides its soft hue;
Gay roses will lavish their sweets on the wind,
The violet's perfume in secret we find.

The Musical World.

LONDON: SATURDAY, JULY 6, 1861.

THE third season of the Monday Popular Concerts, just terminated, must have satisfied the most sceptical, who paid the smallest attention to their progress, of the hold they have taken on the public mind, and the immense influence they have exercised in creating a new taste for music which previously had been restricted to certain classes of the community, if not, indeed, to professional cliques. The performance of a stringed quartet some few years ago, in a miscellaneous concert, would have deterred many from attending who are now attracted by these compositions. He who is accustomed to drink champagne, turns at first with some disgust from the seemingly unpalatable taste of the finest Rudesheimer. Use, however, begets liking, and after awhile the roughness of one wine is preferred to the sweetness of the other. Thus, in starting the Monday Popular Concerts, the director had not only to get rid of an old flavour, but to create a new one. It was a grand thought, but one surrounded with difficulties, and almost hopeless, to indoctrinate the million into a love for classic music. In the first place, they were to be enticed to listen. Attention once gained, they were to be taught by slow degrees to understand what they heard, and appreciation would surely follow. The public is an impatient animal, and will not be swayed nor coerced. It grows restive under opposition, and can only be allured by coaxing to its own good, No doubt the attraction of the Monday Popular Concerts was owing, at first, to the names of the artists, which the director invariably selected from the highest ranks. But those who came to hear the singers and players could not help carrying away the music with them and institute comparisons with what they had heard in other places. In short, they began to think about the matter, to talk about it, to gain knowledge, to grow conscious of a new taste and appreciation, to dispute, to have convictions. In a wonderfully short space of time good music was in the ascendant at St. James's Hall, the true and the beautiful. This was the direct effect of the Monday Popular Concerts on the general mass, or that portion of the British, or London community, which may be represented by the shilling-place payers.

But the effect was no less powerful on the gentler and wealthier classes. We all remember of what materials that class of entertainments called "The London Wednesday Concerts" was composed. The programmes were occasionally rich and well-varied, but there was no system, no regular plan, and artists, at least the most eminent, were allowed to select their own pieces. This was a sin which never could be laid to the charge of the director of the Monday Popular Concerts, and against which, we feel assured, no stand could be made by any power or artifice of management. Artists, singers more particularly, are seldom the best judges of music, and care little for aught save the immediate display of their own talents. They sing or play for the most part without the slightest idea of the composer, and think that all interest is centered in their fingers or their lips. Not so thought the director of the Monday Popular Concerts. He saw that music must be made paramount, and the executants subsidiary. To establish this line of policy, it was necessary to provide the utmost stringency in the regulation of the programmes, from which there could be no departure, and upon which neither vocalist nor instrumentalist would have power to encroach. The selection became in its plan and form as irrefragable as a Lacedemonic statute. Erratic performers, on this or that instrument, were placed in an unusual dilemma, and singers, who doated on native airs, were enforced to try their wings in a brighter and loftier atmosphere. It took some time, as may readily be imagined, to bring about the change which has taken place, for not only were the audience converted, but, in some measure, the artists also. The change, nevertheless, has been effected, and in such a manner as to lead to no fear of a retrogression, or falling backwards.

The Monday Popular Concerts, in short, have opened a new world of enjoyment to the music-loving public of London, and Universal Art stands indebted to them. The best musical performances, by the best artists, at the lowest prices, have created one of the greatest reforms of modern times. A real knowledge of good music has been disseminated among those classes whose tastes it may be assumed were at the lowest ebb, and with a love and knowledge of music must necessarily flow in all those kindly feelings and gentle emotions which tend to refine and enlighten the human mind, to make us better and wiser men. If man be not elevated and purified by sweet and healthy sounds, he must indeed be "Fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils."

OUR readers may, perhaps, take an interest in following, through its different phases, the ascending progress of the diapason during the last two centuries—a progress which has just been summed up in an ingenious piece of workmanship, by M. Emile Pfeiffer, of the firm of Pleyel, Wolf and Co.

Under the form of a vertical instrument, in front of which are nine keys corresponding to nine diapasons, M. Pfeiffer's invention exhibits in four synoptical tables the principal lyric works represented on the French stage from 1680 to 1859.

The first commences with Lully's Armide, sung to a diapason giving 810 vibrations, according to the first scientific experiment made by Sauveur, and quoted by M. Lissajous*, in the notice he read before the Société d'Encouragement.

In a similar manner, if we strike all the keys in succession, we perceive, in an ascending progression, eight principal epochs, corresponding to the first representation of Les Danaïdes (1784—818 vibrations); Richard Cœur de Lion (1785—820 vibrations); Adolphe et Clara (1799—838 vibrations); La Vestale (1807—848 vibrations); Guillaume Tell (1829—860 vibrations); Robert le Diable (1831—865 vibrations); Le Préaux Clercs (1833—868 vibrations); and lastly, Faust (1859—898 vibrations).

In the intervals between these epochs we find exhibited the other master-pieces which have added fresh glory to the French Opera, and which were the productions of Rameau, Glück, Piccini, Berton, Lesueur, Méhul, Cherubini, Della-Maria, Nicolo, Boieldieu, Rossini, Carafa, Auber, Hérold, Halévy, Ambroise Thomas, Verdi, Félicien David, and Gounod, in the chronological order in which they were brought out.

We see that, from 1807 to 1859, the upward progression was greater than before. This necessarily required the reform which the French Commission properly adopted, when they restored the diapason to the elevation at which, within a few vibrations, it stood at the time of the production of Guillaume Tell and Robert le Diable.

We believe that M. Pfeiffer intends to send his work to his Excellency M. Lvoff, Master of the Russian Court, and director of the Imperial private bands, an eminent composer and musician, to whom Russia owed the adoption of the normal diapason, even before it was generally introduced into France.

* It is to this learned natural philosopher that the opera, also, will be indebted for the important improvement which has recently been made in the arrangement of the "float."

"M. GOUNOD'S Faust," says a correspondent from Munich, "has been wonderfully attractive; for people not only heard new music, but, also, saw what they had never seen before, in the shape of a heap of new scenery, sudden transformations, effects of light and shade, dances," &c. &c. Note: — The public at Munich resembles the public everywhere else. For an opera, or even a drama, to succeed—i. e. to please the multitude — it must have its novelty enhanced by mise-en-scène. If the mise-en-scène is attractive in an unusual degree, it is pretty certain that a merely respectable production will achieve a great success. With regard to M. Gounod's Faust, we really cannot consider it anything more than respectable. The French musician displays, as no one will deny, a real talent for composition, a sense of character and dramatic propriety rare among his countrymen, and a certain refinement of taste; but he is, for all that, an eclectic; using, moreover, and imitating his chosen models far too unscrupulously — the much maligned Meyerbeer, of course, in particular. Notwithstanding the encomiums perpetually lavished from certain quarters (even upon M. Gounod's additions to John Sebastian Bach), his compositions have yet to obtain the unanimous acceptance that was prophesied.

THE music-mistress is giving a lesson to the young lady of the house. The mother of the young lady is seated in the room—which opens into the counting-house—to take care that the hard-worked teacher does not waste a minute of the hour. Suddenly she hears the following dialogue :—

Music-Mistress : "F sharp, Miss; F. sharp!"

Young Lady : "But it is F, and not F sharp, in the music."

Music-Mistress : "That is wrong. Take your pencil and make a sharp before the note."

Mama (speaking to Paterfamilias through the open door in the counting-house) : "There, my dear, you hear that? But it is just like you. When you buy music, you take anything that is offered. The publisher leaves out the sharps and flats. Of course! It is so much extra profit!"

Have any of your readers seen the new (and well-covered) editions of ——— and ——— and ———? If so, let them take their pencils, and mark in the omitted flats and sharps.

Beethoven Recitals.—The eighth and last took place yesterday, in St. James's Hall, and was attended by the most crowded audience of the entire series. Mr. Charles Hallé, who was in splendid play, performed on this occasion the Sonatas, Op. 109 (E major), Op. 110 (A flat major), and Op. 111 (C minor). The audience were throughout attentive and enraptured.

Royal Surrey Gardens.—On Wednesday a number of workmen commenced clearing the ruins from the interior of the music hall, preparatory to the rebuilding of a new theatre, which is to possess all the advantages of the former as regards sound, but, in addition, will have a commodious stage, and be so constructed as to enable performances to be given throughout the winter months. On Monday last a variety of entertainments were given for the benefit of the lessees; and during the week Prince George Galitzin conducted a series of instrumental concerts, the programme including several compositions of his own, which were much admired. On Monday next, July 8, Mr. Charles Green contributes a balloon ascent for the benefit of Messrs. Caldwell and Bishop, the Phœnix Gas Company supplying the inflation gratuitously; after which Prince Galitzin will continue his concerts in addition to the other entertainments

Mr. John Francis Barnett's Concert was given on Tuesday week, at St. James's Hall, and attracted a highly fashionable audience. The selection comprised, among lesser pieces, Mozart's Jupiter symphony. Mendelssohn's pianoforte concerto in G minor, and overtures to Medea (Cherubini), and Prometheus (Beethoven). Mr. Barnett has made great progress of late years as a pianoforte player, and is now, indeed—though still young—a powerful and brilliant performer, and enjoys a very high reputation. His performance of Mendelssohn's beautiful and captivating concerto, in G minor, created the utmost enthusiasm, and obtained for him an enthusiastic recall. A greater success, indeed, could not be desired. Mr. Barnett also played Liszt's Illustration du Prophète, which was applauded by the whole room, and a charming caprice of his own, which pleased universally. M. Ole Bull played his own Siciliana e Tarantella. The vocalists were Mad Lemmens-Sherrington, Mad. Weiss, Miss Laura Baxter, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr Weiss. The fine old air of Buononcini, "Per la gloria," was sung admirably by Mr. Weiss, and Purcell's "Come if you dare," splendidly by Mr. Sims Reeves.

Mr. James Lea Summers, the blind pianist, gave a concert at St. James's Hall on Thursday week, in aid of the association for the general welfare of the blind, and was assisted by Mlle. Parepa, Miss Banks, Miss Palmer, Miss Lascelles, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Lewis Thomas, as vocalists, and Mr. Joseph Heine, the blind violinist, as instrumentalist. The concert was given under the most distinguished patronage, and, as a matter of course, attracted a numerous and fashionable attendance.

The Operas.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. — The Ballo in Maschera was given for the second and third time on Saturday and Monday, and on Tuesday Guillaume Tell, for the eighth time, by far the finest performance of the season. So many representations of Rossini's masterpiece argues a decided improvement in the popular taste; and, indeed, but for the sudden appearance of the new comet, Adelina Patti, upon which all operatic gaze is now turned, the representations might have been doubled. The manner in which the opera has been got up, no doubt, has tended to its success, which, now that it is confirmed, cannot fail to do good service to the establishment and enchant the public for years to come.

On Thursday Mlle. Adeline Patti, after having performed Amina and Lucia more times than we can remember, essayed a new character, Violetta in La Traviata, her third in this country. A youthful, interesting appearance, and the fresh voice of girlhood, are indispensable qualifications for the representative of Violetta, and such are possessed by Mlle. Patti. Neither fine acting nor singing would in this particular part avail without the natural advantages we have mentioned; and thus the combination of excellencies displayed by Mlle. Patti — who acted on the present occasion as well as she sang, while physically representing the youth and attractiveness of the unfortunate young heroine of the demi monde, to perfection — is rarely indeed to be met with. Previous performances had not prepared us for the striking display of histrionic genius with which Mlle. Patti delighted the public on Thursday night. Her last scene was truthful and beautiful. She drew "the trembling tear of speechless praise" from many an eye, and no eulogy we might offer could exceed this spontaneous tribute to the histrionic powers of the young artist. If Mlle. Patti played this scene so admirably it may be readily supposed that where brilliant fluency of vocalisation was required she shone with almost incomparable lustre. To select only one instance, her rendering of the cabaletta to the air "Ah! forse lui" was a perfect specimen of bravura singing — bright, silvery, "luminous" in tone, whilst exquisitely finished in execution. The young lady will doubtless repeat the character of Violetto, and we shall thus find opportunities for entering more fully into the merits of a performance which may be described in general terms as something quite hors ligne. Mlle. Patti was supported by Signor Tiberini as Alfredo, and Signor Graziani as Germont. This evening Mlle. Patti is announced to appear for the first time as Zerlina in Don Giovanni.

LYCEUM.—Mr. Mapleson has proved himself a manager of more than ordinary activity in, what may be denominated, his "flying operatic season." The production of so many works, including one novelty, we do not remember at the Italian Opera within the same time. To make the best use of the session, Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini have had far more than their usual share of work; but they never flinched, and played three, sometimes four, times a week, besides singing at the Crystal Palace on Fridays and sundry other concerts morning and evening. Artists of such eminent talents, with so much power of endurance, and so much willingness to sustain the fortunes of an establishment in which they are engaged, are indeed rare, and Mr. Mapleson has been fortunate in securing the services of the incomparable pair. The season closes to-night with Mlle. Titiens' benefit. Whether the undertaking has or has not proved successful, we cannot say. The theatre opened at a bad period, and in such a hurry that there was scarcely time to make up a good subscription, and consequently the performances had to depend almost entirely for support on the general public. The company, though small, was admirable, efficient, indeed, in every particular in respect of such popular operas as the Trovatore, Lucrezia Borgia, Martha, &c., and the dresses and scenery were effective, if not particularly splendid nor always appropriate. That enough, however, had been done for a season which was destined to outlive a few weeks only, everybody will allow. If the Boston moon and its false reflections in the third act of the Ballo in Maschera were calculated to excite risibility, we must suppose that the scene painter was hurried and worried, and that the stage manager had his moon fixed in the wrong part of the heavens. The splendour of the dresses in the Trovatore we may accept as a set-off against the puerilities in the Ballo in Maschera, and the greatest allowance must be made for all shortcomings, the length of the season necessitating single performances taken into account. In short, Mr. Mapleson did wonders, under the circumstances, in giving so many operas so well, and we have no doubt, should the managerial cloak again invest him, that he will do better when time and forethought will have enabled him to shape his course clearer, and to make proper preliminary arrangements for so important an undertaking.

The performances of Martha on Thursday week, Don Giovanni on Tuesday, and Norma on Thursday, do not call for special notice, inasmuch as they were nearly in every respect the same as those of last year at Her Majesty's Theatre. Martha indeed involved no change in the four principal personages. The Huguenots, however, produced on Saturday, requires a few words from us in the way of detail. Meyerbeer's opera can never be uninteresting to the lovers of dramatic music with such an impersonation of the unfortunate Valentine as that of Mlle. Titiens—undoubtedly the most perfect achievement of the gifted Teutonic songstress. Neither the original Valentine of Mlle. Falcon—the lyric Rachel, whose sudden loss of voice robbed the French Opera of its youngest and brightest ornament—nor the next best embodiment of the character (by universal consent)—that of Mlle. Sophie Cruvelli—has been witnessed on the English stage; and although they have seen and applauded the earnest, impassioned, and elaborate essay of Mad. Viardot, and the far more natural assumption of Mad. Grisi, frequenters of the London Italian Opera can recall nothing so nearly realising the superb conception of Meyerbeer—whose music exalts the erring heroine of M. Scribe to the lofty sphere of the "ideal"—as the Valentine of Mlle. Titiens. She has both the physical and the mental requisites, and in some parts of the opera (the great duet with Marcel, in the scene of the Pré aux Clercs, for example) brings out effects of which it is probable Meyerbeer himself never dreamed. Such a Valentine would give life and vigour to a less equally balanced performance than that which took place on Saturday night at the Lyceum. Signor Giuglini's Raoul de Nangis, if not marked by the romantic grace and histrionic power with which Mario invests a part in the delineation of which he has always been unrivalled, has vocal beauties of unquestionable distinction; Signor Vialetti's Marcel is stern, hearty, and vigorous, and M. Gassier's St. Bris as fine as any St. Bris since Tamburini undertook the character at the Royal Italian Opera, in order to strengthen the attractions of the "cast" by the aid of his popular name. These, however, like the Valentine of Mlle. Titiens, and the Urban of Mad. Lemaire, are familiar to the public. Not so the Nevers of Signor Delle Sedie, whose excellent qualities as a singer and real dramatic intelligence, though allowed fewer opportunities than usual for effective display, are not the less to be prized on that account; and not so the Marguerite de Valois of Mlle. Agnes Büry, a German soprano, who appeared in London some years ago, both as a concert singer and at Drury Lane Theatre in the German operatic company conducted by Mr. Jarrett. These were the novelties of the cast, the other subordinate personages being intrusted to more or less competent hands. That the band and chorus, over which Signor Arditi presides so zealously, would be likely, in such a work as the Huguenots, to efface the remembrance of what (even very recently) has been heard elsewhere; or that the comparatively limited resources of the Lyceum boards would admit of even a distant approach to the scenic effect upon which the French operas of Meyerbeer so largely depend, no one anticipated, and therefore no one was disappointed. On the contrary, the patrons of the establishment, glad to obtain the Huguenots at any price, were grateful to the manager for the extraordinary pains he must have bestowed on its preparation. Moreover, a great light cannot be hid under a bushel. If Mlle. Titiens belonged to an Italian "troop" in a barn, the Huguenots would be presented, if only for the sake of so magnificent a Valentine; still more as a matter of course in a theatre, where, at a moment's notice, so strong and efficient a company has been brought together. The alterations in Don Giovanni were Mad. Gassier for Mad. Borghi-Mamo in Zerlina— hardly an improvement; Mlle. Sedlatzek for Mlle. Vaneri in Donna Elvira—a tolerable substitute; M. Gassier for Signor Everardi in Don Giovanni—an acceptable change; and Mr. Patey for Signor Mercuriali in Masetto—a decided amelioration. The general execution of Mozart's opera, however, is therefore by no means so good as the Trovatore, Martha, or the Ballo in Maschera, in spite of Mlle. Titiens' magnificent singing and acting in Donna Anna, Signor Giuglini's exquisite singing in Don Ottavio, and M. Gassier's creditable musical performance of Don Giovanni. In Norma, on Thursday night, Signor Giuglini had at last a night's rest, and Signor Tito Palmieri played Pollio. This artist has received on several occasions certificates of competence at the Crystal Palace and at several metropolitan concert-rooms. All we can say for him just now is, that he sings very small after Signor Mongini.

On Thursday Norma was given, like Don Giovanni, for the only time this season. The loss of Signor Giuglini in any performance at the Lyceum Opera is severely felt; and Mlle. Titiens may be said, without him, to be the sole attraction. Signor Tito Palmieri, who, we believe, made his first appearance as a tenor singer in this country at the Crystal Palace a few months since, and subsequently was heard of at some of the London concerts, sustained the part of Pollio, with considerable effect. Nevertheless the weight of the performance fell on the shoulders of Mlle. Titiens, who, as if put upon her best mettle, sang and acted the part of the High Priestess with more than usual grandeur and magnificence, and created an immense sensation. Norma is certainly one of those characters in which the great Teutonic songstress impresses us the more the oftener she plays it. To-night Mlle. Titiens takes her benefit, with a selection from different operas, which brings the season to a termination.

"Lyceum Theatre, Thursday, July 4th, 1861.

"A number of artists, including some of the very first of the day, having by the unexpected close of Her Majesty's Theatre been left without a fitting arena for the display of their talents, and no established Impresario having shown any inclination to speculate in a second Italian Opera, without which "opposition," as it is termed, the public can never feel certain of getting even one Italian Opera of first-class excellence, and the general belief that London is populous enough to support simultaneously two Grand Operatic Theatres, are facts which will, perhaps, suffice to explain my sudden appearance before the public in the capacity of manager of the Royal Italian Opera; and if the shortness of the time allowed me for making very extensive arrangements, and the smallness of the Lyceum Theatre (the only one to be had at the moment), be duly considered, I trust it will be admitted that the best has been done to justify the confidence reposed in me by the nobility and gentry at the commencement of my somewhat hazardous enterprise, to satisfy all the kind patrons who have so liberally supported me throughout a campaign which, although necessarily brief, has been marked by the brilliantly successful production, for the first time in England, of an entirely new work, Signor Verdi's Un Ballo in Maschera, in addition to the performances of the following most popular operas of the day:—Il Trovatore, Lucrezia Borgia, Martha, Les Huguenots, Norma, and Don Giovanni, the sterling merits of the representation of each having been unanimously recognised by the London press.

"My expenses have, of course, been very heavy; but I am happy to say that the patronage I have met with has enabled me to discharge every pecuniary obligation.

"In taking leave, for the present, of my kind patrons, I should state that it is my intention soon to renew my managerial efforts on a wider field; and thus, with hope for the future, no less than gratitude for the past, I most respectfully say, Farewell!

"J. H. MAPLESON."

MR. BENEDICT'S CONCERT.—Always on a grand scale, Mr. Benedict's annual entertainment was this year even more varied and interesting than usual. So great were the attractions that the attendance was larger than on any previous occasion we are able to remember at a morning concert, whether within the handsome precincts of St. James's Hall, or elsewhere, where rank and fashion are accustomed to assemble. The feast of harmony prepared by Mr. Benedict was on a truly eclectic scale, and combined specimens of almost all the musical delicacies of the season. The programme, moreover, was so cleverly made out that a constant variety was provided, and to have experienced a moment's "ennui" at any period of the afternoon was simply out of the question. Every taste was consulted, and this without a single departure from the high standard of excellence that has always been a sine qua non at Mr. Benedict's concerts. The first part of the programme was, without hyperbole, a casket of gems, many of "purest ray serene." To criticise it would be a thankless task, inasmuch as it contained absolutely nothing to find fault with. "Papataci" (L'Italiana in Algeri) is a trio buffo of which even the composer of Il Barbiere need never be otherwise than proud — and this was allotted to Signors Belart, Delle Sedie, and Belletti. The overture, called The Ruler of the Spirits, is one of Weber's most imaginative orchestral preludes; and this was set down for a band first-rate both in number and efficiency (Mr. Benedict — the favourite pupil of Weber, as all the world of music is aware — does well to produce the compositions of his illustrious master at every one of his annual concerts). "Nobil Signor" (Les Huguenots) ranks deservedly among the most graceful of Meyerbeer's songs; and how Mad. Lemaire can sing it need not be told. The "Andante with variations," for two pianofortes, is one of those compositions which present Robert Schumann under his most amiable and engaging aspect; and this was entrusted to players no less practised and conscientious than Miss Arabella Goddard and Mr. Benedict. "A lonely Arab maid" (Oberon) is as plaintive as the overture abovementioned is a vigorous inspiration of Weber's genius, and that it loses nothing in the Italian version, when Mad. Alboni is the singer, was proved last year at Her Majesty's Theatre, where, Italian though she be, the Germans themselves apostrophised her as the "pearl of Fatimas." Signor Bottesini, the most wonderful performer on the double-bass that his own prolific country can claim, is also an ingenious composer—an assertion which his duet for violin and violoncello would alone justify; and had it been a question of importance to bring its merits advantageously to light, that could scarcely have been accomplished more effectually than by placing the small fiddle over the left shoulder of M. Wieniawski and the big fiddle between the knees of Signor Piatti. Mr. Benedict's cavatina, "Quand tout d'un coup"—from an opera (Les Nonnes de Robert) so obstinately kept in the dark that people begin to regard it as a myth—would, had not its beauties already been acknowledged, have enjoyed the fairest chance of appreciation, with Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington (the "Maid Marian of the period") to impersonate the Page. "Giorno d'orrore" (Semiramide), by Mlle Titiens (or, according to the orthography of the police reports—which is possibly correct, "Tietjens") and Mad. Alboni!—why, Rossini himself would have rubbed his hands with satisfaction. Then that eccentric though clever, clever though eccentric, M. Ole Bull!—what more striking contrast than his "fantasia" for violin, "without accompaniments," could have been imagined, whether to the duet that preceded, or to the variations —"Il dolce canto" (Rode's air)—that followed it, and which Mad. Alboni so affably declined to sing again? To conclude, the pianoforte solo, constructed upon Arne's delicious air, "Where the bee sucks," is entitled to a place by the side of the most elegant fantasias of the modern school—a fantasia in which science and melody are agreeably combined; and with this Miss Arabella Goddard, by frequent performance in public, has completely identified herself, as she did on the present occasion. These are the particulars of the first part, a concert in itself—more than enough, indeed to satisfy the musical appetite of any reasonable amateur.

The second part was wholly devoted to Mr. Benedict's "lyrical legend" of Undine, which achieved such brilliant success at the Norwich Festival in September last, and won no less favour from a London audience when reproduced in St. James's Hall at the second "Farewell Concert" by Mad. Clara Novello. A third hearing, under favour of a really admirable performance—fully confirmed the good opinions elicited by the first and second. Undine is in its way a masterpiece, a fairy legend, treated in the congenial and sympathetic spirit of Weber and of Mendelssohn—a work, in short, that could only have proceeded from the pen of a musician of refined taste and poetical feeling. Undine, the water-nymph; Hildebrand, her earthly lover; Bertalda, Hildebrand's affianced bride; and last, not least, Kuhleborn, Undine's fellow sprite and sturdy champion, are each and all endowed with a marked individuality in Mr. Benedict's music, which, in addition to this dramatic faithfulness, has the no less essential charm of abstract beauty. We need not give a catalogue raisonné of the various pieces, that agreeable task having already been twice undertaken; nor, happily, is it requisite, the cantata having attained an amount of popularity that renders its most conspicuous features tolerably familiar to the musical public. Enough that Mad. Titiens represented Undine, Mad. Sainton Dolby Bertalda, and Messrs. Weiss and Sims Reeves (the originals at the Norwich Festival) Hildebrand and Kuhleborn. A more efficient cast could not have been devised. All sang their very best. The members of the band, by the evident pains they took with the overture and the richly scored accompaniments, showed how much they esteemed and respected the composer; and the chorus, though in many instances hardly as effective as might have been wished, were no less zealous and anxious than the rest. The pieces which created the liveliest sensation and obtained the most applause were the song, with chorus, "Mark the waves that rippling play" (Mad. Titiens); the scena, "From worldly cares and toils afar" (Mr. Sims Reeves); and the instrumental march, brilliantly executed by the orchestra. At the conclusion Mr. Benedict received a well-deserved tribute from the whole of the audience, which was heartily responded to by the members of the band and chorus.

There was still a third part to come, consisting of a capital selection, almost exclusively vocal, from the works of various composers, ancient and modern, and including no less than two and twenty pieces. All we can find room for is a strong word of praise for the irreproachable style in which Rossini's "Tantum Ergo," a thoroughly melodious piece of sacred music (composed for the church of San Francesco, at Bologna), was delivered by Signors Gardoni, Belart, and Belletti; and a line to record that Mr. Benedict played an Andante et Rondeau, for pianoforte with orchestral accompaniments, a composition of distinguished merit, the execution of which, as might have been anticipated, was in the highest degree effective. This should (and doubtless will) be heard elsewhere. The other pieces were divided among the singers above enumerated, and — as if these had not been sufficient to form an operatic, much more a concert "troop"—Mlle. Parepa, Signor Giuglini, Herr Formes, Mr. Santley, Mlle. George, &c., as "reserves." The conductors were Signor Arditi, Herr W. Ganz, Mr. Lindsay Sloper, and Mr. Benedict himself.

CONCERT AT DUDLEY HOUSE.—On Thursday afternoon a concert was given, for a charitable purpose, by permission of the Earl of Dudley, at his residence in Park-lane. We subjoin the programme:—

PART I.— Duo, Theme and variations, pianoforte and violoncello, Messrs. Goldschmidt and Piatti, Mendelssohn; Air "Without the swain's" (Susanna), Mad. Goldschmidt, Handell; Romanza, "M'appari tutt' amor" (Martha), Signor Giuglini, Flotow; Ave Maria of Schubert, transcribed for the violoncello; and Tarantella — violoncello, Signor Piatti, Piatti; Rondo, for voice and violin obbligato, from "Il re Pastore," Mad. Goldschmidt and Herr Deichmann, Mozart.

PART II.— Duet, "Son geloso" (La Sonnambula), Mad. Goldschmidt and Signor Giuglini, Bellini; Romanza (Don Pasquale), and "Bravo, bravo! il mio Belcore" (L'Elisir d'Amore), Signor Belletti, Donizetti; Gavotte and Musette (danses), and Allegro, pianoforte, Mr. Goldschmidt, J. S. Bach; Trio, "Fatal momento" (Robert le Diable), Mad. Goldschmidt, and Signori Belletti and Giuglini, Meyerbeer; Cradle Song, violin, Herr Deichmann, Reber; "John Anderson my Jo," Scotch ballad, and Echo Song, Norwegian Melody, Mad. Goldschmidt.

The concert took place in the ball-room of Dudley House, and the company belonged almost exclusively to the highest classes. Mad. Goldschmidt-Lind was, of course, the "bright particular star." Those who remember this wonderful artist when the magic of her name sufficed to draw crowds, night after night, to Her Majesty's Theatre, and fill "to suffocation," as the phrase goes, any concert-room in the United Kingdom, will doubtless be anxious to know whether her extraordinary powers have deteriorated under the combined influences of time and that easy, comfortable social position which renders professional exertion unnecessary. For their information, we may state at once that Mad. Goldschmidt-Lind, who is an artist by nature no less than education, sings as finely as ever. We can see no difference. The splendid voice and transcendent skill which years ago enchanted the musical world, were again triumphantly displayed on the present occasion; and never in the whole course of her artistic career, did Mad. Lind distinguish herself more honourably. All her efforts were received with enthusiastic applause, such as is rarely heard at fashionable "morning" concerts, and such irresistible demand for repetition followed her magnificent execution of the air from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore." The "M'appari tutto Amor" of Signor Giuglini, and the "Bravo il mio Belcore" of Signor Belletti, also narrowly escaped the same compliment, while the admirable performances of Herr Otto Goldschmidt, who played on this occasion like a consummate master, and of the other artists who took part in the concert, were rewarded with demonstrations of the most flattering kind. The proceeds of this entertainment will, we have every reason to believe, prove highly beneficial to the "Society of Female Artists," in whose behalf it was given.—Morning Post.

SIGNOR PIATTI'S ANNUAL CONCERT took place at Campden House, Kensington, on Saturday morning, and, the weather being propitious, attracted a brilliant and fashionable assembly to the magnificent mansion and elegantly laid-out grounds of Mr. F. Wolley. The artists with the great violoncellist were Mesdames Lemmens-Sherrington, Sainton-Dolby, and F. Lablache, Signors Gardoni, Belart, Solieri, Delle Sedie and F. Lablache, and Mr. Santley, vocalists; Mad. Piatti (pianoforte), MM. Sainton and Bezeth (violin), and Herr Strauss (viola). Signor Piatti's performances comprised Schumann's Quintet for pianoforte, two violins, viola, and violoncello, executed by Mad. Piatti, MM. Sainton, Bezeth, Herr Strauss, and Signor Piatti—a remarkable performance of a remarkable work, in which Herr Strauss's viola playing constituted a distinctive feature; his own fantasia on the Trovatore; M. Rubinstein's "Deux Morceaux Caracteristiques," for piano and violin, in which Signor Piatti enjoyed the assistance of Madame Piatti; and again, another of his own solo compositions, "Nocturne and Tarantella." How the prince of violoncello players executed his share of these works we need not say. Signor Piatti is not only beyond comparison the most consummate violoncellist of the age, but one of the greatest living performers on any instrument. He is, indeed, the Paganini of his time, and stands alone. This pianist may be approximated in comparison to that pianist, and one fiddler may be said to be as good as another; but nobody ever thinks of comparing any violoncellist to Signor Piatti. Unfortunately, his instrument is not so effective, nor so popular, as the pianoforte or violin; and consequently, however high his reputation may be, the public are not attracted so readily to his performances as to those of players who might be his inferiors on these instruments. Of the programme we need not speak at length. Mad. Piatti, besides playing her pianoforte pieces, proved herself a vocal artist of no mean pretensions, joining Mad. Sainton-Dolby in the duet "Della Mosa," from the Prophète. It was gratifying, too, to hear once in the concert-room those talented singers, Signor and Mad. F. Lablache, who by their performances added in no small degree to the attractions. The concert was given under the most distinguished patronage.

MR. E. SILAS, the well-known pianist and composer, gave a concert at the Hanover Square Rooms on Wednesday evening. The programme was one of the most novel of the season, and contained five of the compositions, vocal and instrumental, of the concert-giver, out of eleven pieces. There were — trio, in C major, Op. 46, for piano, violin, and violoncello; "Tarantella" and transcription of a Russian song by Glinka — solos for the pianoforte; song, "Oh! would I were yon silver moonbeam;" and song, "The voice of the Fountain." The remainder of the selection was exceedingly interesting, and included the first movement of Bach's Concerto in D minor, for pianoforte, with accompaniment of two violins, tenor, violoncello, and contra-basso; Hummel's "Introduction and Rondo" for two pianos (No. 5 of the posthumous works); and Schubert's Grand Quintet, Op. 114, for pianoforte, violin tenor, violoncello, and contra-basso; the executants being with Mr. Silas, MM. Wieniawski, Pollitzer, Wiener, Webb, Paque, and Reynolds. M. Silas's trio of these pieces seemed to excite the greatest attention, The Scherzo was admired for its quaintness and originality, and the andante for its grace and melodic flow. The execution of the whole trio by MM. Silas, Wieniawski and Paque was unimpeachable. The room was exceedingly full.

SOCIETY FOR THE ENCOURAGEMENT OF THE FINE ARTS.—The conversazioni held under the auspices of this society have been among the most agreeable réunions of the season—thanks to the indefatigable exertions of Mr. H. Ottley, the hon secretary. The last conversazione took place in the French Gallery, 120, Pall-mall, which, in addition to the usual collection of works by distinguished French artists, was decorated with eight large pictures painted by Mr. W. Bell Scott, illustrative of the history of the English border, the series commencing with the building of the wall of Severus, and ending with the completion of the railway bridge over the Tyne. The concert, however, conducted by Mr. Alfred Gilbert was the feature of the evening. Herr Formes sang Sarastror's aria, "Qui sdegno" and "The wanderer," in which he was unanimously encored, and accompanied himself in another German Lied by Hölzel. M. Ole Bull delighted the audience by one of his Paganini solos, and a pianist from America, Mr. J. H. Donewitz, exhibited very considerable powers in two solos by Lïzt. Virginia Gabriel's ballad, "The forsaken," sung by Mad. Gilbert, was warmly applauded. The other artistes were Mlle. Anna Whitty, Miss Susanna Cole, Miss Palmer, and Miss Fosbroke. The formal business of the evening consisted in Mr. Hurlstone taking the chair, and Mr. H. Ottley, the hon. secretary, reading the report of the award of prizes, which was as follows:—Historical painting: Mr. Marcus Stone, "Claudio and Hero," in the Royal Academy.—Landscape: Mr. M'Callum, "Spring—Burnham Wood." Royal Academy.—Genre: Mr. Calderon, "La Demande en Marriage." Royal Academy.—Water Colours (Two Prizes): Mr. S. Read, "Interior of St. Augustin's, at Antwerp." Old Water-colour Society:—Mr. E. H. Warren, "Rest in the cool and shady Wood." New Water Colour Society.—Sculpture: Mr. G. Halse, "The Tarpeian Rock." Sculpture in bronze. R.A.—Architecture: Mr. A. W. Blomfield. Design for "Mission-house," now erecting in Bedfordbury, Westminster, in the Architectural Exhibition.—In Poetry, no award.—In Music, the special committee will report in time for the first meeting of the ensuing session. The room was elegantly arranged.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR. — At the last concert on Tuesday evening, the 18th, Mr. Leslie's cantata of Holyrood was performed, the accompaniments arranged for pianoforte and harmonium instead of the orchestra. Such an imperfect "make-shift," however, in no way deteriorated from the zealous efforts of the singers—Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Palmer, Messrs. Wilbye Cooper and Weiss, to whom the solo parts were allotted, nor from the vigour, precision, and delicacy of the choir, which has attained such a degree of perfection under Mr. Leslie's vigilant superintendence. The second part of the programme was exclusively sacred. One of J. S. Bach's chorales, the "Pater noster" of Meyerbeer, and Mendelssohn's sublime setting of the Psalm, "Judge me, O God" (an unsurpassable example of eight-part choral-singing), each excited a marked sensation. Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington was no less successful in "Let the bright seraphim" (trumpet Mr. Ward); Mr. Wilbye Cooper sang Rossini's "Cujus animam," and Miss Palmer "But the Lord is mindful of His own;" while the melodious quartet from Mr. Leslie's Immanuel gave four of the most practised members of the choir — Miss Fosbroke, Mrs. Dixon, Messrs. Walker and C. Henry, an opportunity of exhibiting their acquirements. Nothing, we need hardly say, could be more efficient than Mr. Leslie's conducting.

CHORAL FESTIVAL AT WALTHAM ABBEY CHURCH.—The 801st anniversary of the consecration of Harold's noble abbey church at Waltham was celebrated by a grand choral festival. The church, it will be remembered, was recently restored at great expense. Since the last anniversary the east end has been rebuilt from the design of Mr. W. Burges; and several memorial windows lately presented, as well as three windows at the east end, designed by Mr. E. Jones and executed by Messrs. Powell and Sons, were placed in the church on this occasion. The services were at 12, 4, and 7.30, and the attendance was very large, notwithstanding the threatening state of the weather. Nearly all the leading gentry of the neighbourhood were present, and the inhabitants of the town made the day a holiday. The music was very grand, and the choir were those of the Chapel Royal, St. Paul's Cathedral, Westminster Abbey, and the Temple, including Messrs. H. Buckland, Barnby, Fielding, Lawler, and T. Distin. Mr. Cumming (Temple) conducted, and Mr. J. Chalk presided at the organ. In the morning the service for the Queen's accession was used, the service being Dr. Cooke's in C, the psalms, Beethoven's in C, and Russell's in G; the anthems, "O, where shall wisdom be found?" (Boyce), and "God is gone up" (Croft). In the afternoon the service was Attwood's in D; the anthems, "God is our hope and strength" (Greene), and "Blessed be Thou" (Kent). Mr. Chalk played Mendelssohn's organ sonata, 4, the Coronation Anthem, Bach's pedal fugue in G minor, &c., on the organ. The morning sermon was preached by the Rev. J. A. Hessey, D.C.L., head master of Merchant Taylor's School, prebendary of St. Paul's, and preacher at Gray's Inn, who delivered an admirable discourse from Psalm xxiv. 3, 4, 5; and that in the afternoon was preached by the Rev. T. Robinson, D.D., Master of the Temple, and Canon of Rochester, from Isaiah lxiv. 3. The Revs. J. Francis (incumbent), John Harman (of St. James's, Enfield), R. C. Meadows, and R. P. Hart took part in the service. The collections were liberal, and it is to be hoped that ere long the whole work of restoration will be effected.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS. — The third season was concluded on Monday night by one of the most brilliant and successful concerts ever given in the St. James's Hall, which was crowded "to suffocation" in every part. The concert being for the director's benefit, the programme was chiefly framed of those pieces which have proved the most attractive and popular. For instance, "The Harmonious Blacksmith," of which, when Miss Arabella Goddard is the executant, the most blasé audience seem never to tire, was included in the programme, and produced, of course, its usual effect. Again, the selection from the harpsichord lessons of the prolific Domenico Scarlatti, in which Mr. Charles Hallé has frequently exhibited his dexterity of fingering, was also there; and in Bach's characteristic prelude, sarabande, and gavotte for the violoncello, Signor Piatti again charmed all his hearers. In the vocal music the same principle was adopted; Dussek's resuscitated song, "Name the glad day," was rendered by Miss Banks, who has shown a very commendable predilection for this charming composition of the famous Bohemian pianiste, and whose refined version of it is above reproach. Mr. Santley sang three of his most favourite airs. The unusual circumstance of the first-class pianistes appearing on the same evening was happily turned to account by the performance of Mozart's duet in D major, each movement of which masterly and charming work was interpreted by Miss Arabella Goddard and Mr. Charles Hallé to absolute perfection, the four hands of the executants seeming to obey the directing impulse of a single will. Such a performance, indeed, was calculated to astonish as well as enchant; and in all probability (may we not say "assuredly?") could not be heard in any other part of the world. The two quartets were Haydn's in D, Op. 63—quite as genial and pleasing as any of his compositions for stringed instruments, while much more piquant and brilliant than most of them—and one of the wrongly-styled "posthumous" of Beethoven's, that in E flat, Op. 127, No. 12. To both of these MM. Wieniawski, Ries, Webb, and Piatti did full justice, the distinguished violinist playing more finely, we thought, than he has yet done since his recent arrival, and particularly distinguishing himself in the quaint last movement of the older work. Both he and Miss Arabella Goddard played a Sonata in G major by Dussek with so much animation and brilliancy, and such perfect mastery, as to create a furor. The sonata had never hitherto been publicly performed, indeed; but it proves to be be quite as replete with original and graceful thoughts as that in B flat, which has, in the course of the Monday Popular Concerts, been restored to new life. The introduction of Dussek's compositions is not the least of the obligations we owe to the director; and we can quite understand the gratification he feels in the consideration of the great and almost unanticipated success which has followed his earnest endeavours to place the best chamber music within the reach of all classes of the community. It was in the outset a bold experiment to institute such an undertaking, but, like all thoroughly well-conducted enterprises based upon a recognition of the intelligence of the people, the Monday Popular Concerts have now become an established success.

GIUSEPPE STANZIERI.—This young composer, whose sad and premature decease was lately announced, was born at Naples, where his father was engaged in the manufacture of pianos. Lablache was one of the first to encourage the natural talent manifested by Giuseppe at an early age. Subsequently Giuseppe went to Vienna, where his reputation was increased. He next proceeded to Paris, where the infantine prodigy grew up to be a man, but without casting off the figure and delicate appearance of childhood. Several illnesses, one of which would have been sufficient to carry him off, combined to attack this feeble being. The only circumstance that softened the pain of his last moments was the fact of his dying totally delirious, asking for his coat to go out, and, after he had received the last sacrament, protesting that to do so was the most pleasing thing imaginable, and that, in future, he would confess every Sunday. It was in this state of joyous fever, so to speak, that he unconsciously breathed his last. —Revue et Gazette Musicale.

MADAME SAINTON-DOLBY'S NEW SONG, "THE DAYS THAT ARE NO MORE."

(Poetry by TENNYSON.)

Composed expressly for Madame Sainton-Dolby by JACQUES BLUMENTHAL.

"Who does not know the Poet Laureate's exquisite lines, beginning:

'Tears, idle tears, I know not what they mean;
Tears from the depth of some divine despair
Rise in the heart, and gather to the eyes,' &c.

That M. Blumenthal, though a Dutchman, loves the poetry of Tennyson, may be gathered from the true sympathetic manner in which he has set his beautiful verses to music. The popularity of this little song is already attested."—Musical World.

NEW SONG. By CLEMENT WHITE. "THE WOODLAND FLOWER,"

The Musical World says:—"Mr. Clement White possesses the enviable gift of tune. There is no denying it. He has proved it in half a hundred songs and more, and as successfully as on any previous occasion (unless we may except his charming canzonet, 'Hail, gentle flower'), in the engaging little song before us. The words, being not so well known as those of the Laureate, will bear quoting:—

'She's like the fair flower in the woodland that blows,
More fair than the lilly, more sweet than the rose;
And vainly the pride of the garden may vie
With the smile on her cheek and the light in her eye.
Oh, Fortune! to me such a joy wouldst thou give,
I'd wear that wild flower in my heart while I live.'"

Evans's Ten-Guinea

HARMONIUM

Is in a solid, handsome French-polished Case, and possesses that rich and organ-like quality of tone which particularly distinguishes these Instruments from the French.—BOOSEY and CHING, Manufacturers, 24 Holles Street, Oxford Street, W.

Evans's English

HARMONIUMS,

WITH TWO ROWS OF KEYS,

At 45 and 63 Guineas, without Pedals, and 47 and 130 Guineas, with Pedals,

Although particularly adapted for Churches, are equally effective in the Drawing-room. Not only have the leading members of the profession, including Messrs. Sterndale Bennett, Balfe, Potter, Henry Smart, Best, &c., but the Clergy and the Press have also testified to the very great superiority of EVANS'S HARMONIUMS. These Testimonials may be seen upon reference to Boosey and Ching's Illustrated Catalogue of Harmoniums.

The whole of EVANS'S INSTRUMENTS possess that organ-like quality of tone which has been hitherto unattained by any other manufacturer, and are made throughout in the strongest and most substantial manner by the best "ENGLISH WORKMEN." They are neither affected by heat nor damp.

"'Tis Christmas Time." Song. Words by J. ALFRED LANGFORD, Esq.; music by J. ALEXANDER. (ROBERT COCKS and Co.)

A downright merry and appropriate Christmas ditty, quite refreshing under this present July sun,—just, too, as (if astronomers can be credited) we have been enveloped in the misty extremity of the tail of a comet, which may or may not be the comet of Charles V., and which, as Pope Pius IX. does not seem inclined to abdicate, like that famous and imperial bigot, we should rather take to be some other member of the family of wandering meteors. The music set to the healthy words of J. Alfred Langford, Esq. would deserve as much praise for correctness (if not for grace) as the song of Mr. Alfred B. Barrington, but for the following trip—which even the learned Mr. E. Eves will allow to be consecutive octaves, between melody and bass, in a similar direction.

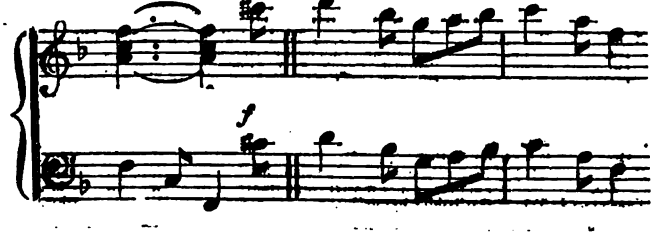
"Peebles to the Play." Cantata. Words by JAMES BALLANTYNE; music composed and adapted by WILLIAM HOWARD. (All Music-sellers.)

There seems to be a good deal of "adapting," but very little of "composing" in this cantata. Should not the C's sharp in the subjoined be rather D's flat?—

And will the learned Mr. E. Eves defend the D in the bass of the subjoined?—

And does Mr. Eves like the C's sharp in the subjoined?—



And what can be said of the subjoined, with its bare fifth () and rising flat seventh ()?—

And is not the subjoined (more or less) vague?—

And is not the subjoined (more or less) clumsy?—

Will the learned Mr. Eves, moreover, allow that there are consecutive octaves, &c., between treble and bass where the asterisks occur? And is not the subjoined (more or less) slipshod?—

And is not the subjoined (more or less) to be pitied for its F-sharplessness?—

The new version of "Peebles to the Play" is otherwise not to be dispraised, seeing that it is chiefly built upon old melodies of recognised worth and character,—honest tunes and quaint, like "Greysteil," for example.*

"Our Hielandmen." Words by M. N. BURTON, adapted to a favourite Scottish air by WILLIAM HOWARD. (Paterson and Sons, Edinburgh and Glasgow.)

All about "Sir Colin" and his "Hielandmen" at the Alma and before Sebastopol, &c. "Wha?" asks Mr. M. N. Burton,—

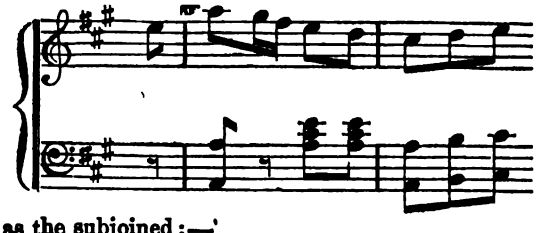
"Wha dares to say our Hielandmen
Are no as brave and true as when," &c.

"Wha," indeed? Assuredly "naebodie." But were not the Irish also, and the Welch also, and even the English also—("Is there no one to say a word for poor Old England?")—at the Alma and before Sebastopol. The "bluid" of all the races was shed in the cause.

"The Scottish Rifle Volunteers' Quadrilles," on popular Scottish melodies, by Mr. KIRKPATRICK, composer of the "Galloway Quadrilles." (Paterson and Sons, Edinburgh and Glasgow.)

We do not remember to have seen the "Galloway Quadrilles," but we cannot say we like the "Scottish Rifle Volunteers' Quadrilles," in which the Scottish airs are treated with Hibernian want of ceremony: they are, moreover, written in a more or less (rather more than less) slipshod style, and abound in such instances as the subjoined:—

(Mr. Kirkpatrick is incessantly leaving his chords of the six-four thus unprovided for); and as the subjoined:—



and as the subjoined:—

* "Greysteil is the name of a metrical romance of great antiquity in Scotland. It was sung at the courts of James III. and IV. by Blind Harry, and other minstrels (1460—1513). This is seen by payments in the Lord High Treasurer's accounts. One entry is as follows:—'April 10, 1496: Item: To twa fithelaris that sang Greysteil to the King, 9*s.*' The air, which has been recovered, is wild and peculiar. Being little known, it has been thought interesting to present, on this occasion, a tune which was a favourite of the old Scottish kings from the time of James I., the illustrious author of 'Peebles to the Play.'"—Author.

(which is but meagre two-part writing); and as the subjoined:—

which is the worst of all.

"Hope is shining still." Song. Words by EDWIN HENRY BARRINGTON; music by ALFRED B. BARRINGTON. (Oetzmann and Co.)

A graceful and highly-finished little song, the evident work of an accomplished musician. The words, too (which we are sorry our crowded space will not allow us to quote), are as graceful and finished as the music.

"The Rifle Grey." New Volunteer Song; words by CAPTAIN C. F. SHAND, of the Edinburgh Rifle Volunteers; adapted by R. ROY PATERSON. (Paterson and Sons, Edinburgh and Glasgow.)

More Rifle-music. Vigorous captain-like words (commander's), set to the old tune of "Weel may the keel row," which Mr. William Chappell has, no doubt, somewhere proved to be English.

"Fantaisie for the Pianoforte on Auber's Opera of 'Le Domino Noir,'" by RICARDO LINTER. (C. Lonsdale.)

Mr. Linter has taken the "Aragonaise" and the subject of the last entr'acte in Auber's enchanting opera, and applied the customary leeches with such success that they come forth from the operation saignés blancs (bled white).

"Barcarola, nell' Opera 'Marino Faliero,' Capriccio per Pianoforte, by FRANCESCO FERRARIS, Op. 20. (C. Lonsdale.)

"Or che in cielo alta è la notte" is one of the most genuine melodies of Donizetti. Signor Ferraris has stretched it out into a fantasy which, though somewhat trivial and snuff-boxy, is neat, showy, and symmetrically shaped. No one should attempt it, however, unless mistress (we cannot imagine a pianist of the sterner sex engaged on such lady-like music) of the "shake."

"Forty-four Exercises and Scales for the Pianoforte," by CHARLES M'KORKELL. (Addison, Hollier, and Lucas.)

These Exercises are intended "to develop the hands, to illustrate new and peculiar modes of fingering, and to prepare the student for all the legitimate difficulties of the modern style of performance." A very useful work; but Mr. M'Korkell must not forget that our pianists of late have been modernising J. S. Bach, Mozart, Dussek, and Beethoven.

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

July 10, 1861.

It is never so long that we are without a performance of Guillaume Tell at the Imperial Opera as we have been since the secession and departure of the Sisters Marchisio. It has been, however, resumed this week, and a certain extra interest accrues to the revival from its introducing Mad. Vandenheuvel-Duprez for the first time on the great lyrical stage of her country, in the part of Mathilde, although that part has long been her rightful appanage. The duo with Arnold is sung by her with great perfection of execution, as also the air "Sombres Forêts," considered here as the touchstone of all ambitious songstresses. The only novelty at present immediately threatening at this establishment is the ballet I spoke of in my last, L'Etoile de Messine. An Italian choregraphist, as French euphemism dubs that humble servant of Thalia, the ballet-master, one Pascal Bozzi, has just alighted on the asphalte trottoir of Paris with his kit and pumps, and hastened to the stage door in the Rue de la Grange Batelière, to assume the direction of the forthcoming work. The inventor of this ballet, so far as ballets demand invention, is M. Paul Foucher, who in like manner invented Paquita, and the music is by Count Gabrielli, a great friend of "Carlotta" (and therefore of Sir Kay).

At the Opéra Comique M. Jourdan is eking out his last performances, and Mad. Faure-Lefebvre with Mlle. Marimon have, in Joconde and Les Diamants de la Couronne, contributed to the attractions of the bill. The new opera by M. Lefébure-Wély I mentioned as being about to be put into rehearsal, Les Recruteurs, will, it is said, introduce to Paris a young tenor, M. Capoul, one of the laureates or prizemen of the Conservatoire. The ambition of this young artist soars high, and at one time there was some thought of bringing him out at the Imperial Opera.

The Théâtre Lyrique is preparing for its winter campaign. The commencement of the forthcoming season, it is said, will bring into the world an opera, in three acts, by M. Semet, and another, of similar calibre, by M. Grisar. But we are promised after this a production which will be an event in the artistic world. This is no other than the much-talked of grand opera by MM. St. Georges and Halévy, entitled Noé. It was originally intended for the Imperial Opera, but the authors lacking breath for so lofty an ascent, bivouac, as it were, at the Grands Mulets, where they are likely to meet with a more genial reception than higher up. The work was to have been called Le Déluge. The subject is not too ambitious, apparently, for the genius of a Frenchman. The fall of empires, the crash of worlds, cataclysms of all kinds and sizes, are the daily diet of his portentous muse. Happy nation! to be so gifted, or to imagine it. Mad. Pauline Viardot is to have the principal part in Noé.

The last two Sundays of the month now just elapsed have been signalised by the annual meetings of the Orphéon at the Cirque Napoléon, under the presidency of the Prefect of the Seine. There are two of these meetings regularly every year, and they usually attract a large concourse of persons, to the number of some three or four thousand. The number of singers is from fourteen to fifteen hundred. The programme is the same for both days, and therefore the first is to be regarded rather in the light of a rehearsal. At any rate the performance of the second day is always infinitely more smooth and perfect. The programme on this occasion may perhaps interest your readers, and so I will give it. The proceedings invariably commence by the ceremony of crowning the bust of Wilhem the founder of the Orphéon societies. This is followed by the hymn Domine salvum fac imperatorem, first in unison and then in harmony. The selection commenced with a choral hymn, "Prière à la Madeleine," by M. Jules Cohen. A chorus for four male voices came next, by M. Th. Gouvy, "Le réveil du cœur." Then a full chorus, "La prière à Marie," by M. Gounod. Weber's chorus of "the Black Hunters," and Mendelssohn's chorus of "The singer of the woods," completed the first part. A full chorus, "La fête des fleurs," by Constantio Fesca (16th century), opened the second part, followed by a chorus for male voices by M. Bazin, "Les matelots de l'Adriatique." The next piece was a full chorus by M. E. Savary, "La brigantine," a piece, by the way, which gained the gold medal at the Orphéon competition last year. M. Ambroise Thomas' chorus for four male voices, "France! France!" and the chorus from La Muette de Portici, "O Dieu puissant," brought the second part to an end, with the exception of the chorus "Vive l'Empereur," by M. Gounod, which always closes each performance as the Salvum fac precedes it.

While I think of it, let me remark that in publishing the letter which Rossini returned in answer to the request of the Commissioners for the opening ceremony, all the English papers have given a wrong translation of one expression in it, and yours among the number, though very unpardonably, for I executed the translation you had and executed it correctly; but your printer, or reader, or whoever it is who is responsible for the depraved lections so frequently given of my correspondence, chose to make me err with the rest of the mistranslators. The phrase I allude to stands in the original thus: "Si j'étais encore de ce monde musical," which is an elegant adaptation of the common expression, "I am no longer of this world." Rossini, who has retired from the world of music to enjoy, while living, his posthumous fame, and be a posterity to himself, says, "were I yet of this world of music," speaking as the manes of the departed composer. But you blockheads have passed over this finesse and stamped it out with a clodhopping commonplace, "were I still of the musical world;" and the world for once was astonished to see half-a-dozen sentences from the pen of Rossini without a token of the delicate, tricksy spirit which is still alive within him, though he be not of this musical world, having had the sense to remember the Horatian injunction:—Solve senescentem equum.

Having no more to add concerning musical doings in Paris, I will just cast a retrospective eye on the theatrical events of the week. M. Augier's comedy of Les Effrontés, which I see, by a capital summing-up of its purport and pretensions in the Times, has been played by the French company now in London, has been at length withdrawn from the bills. This comedy has had a long run, which it owed to its allusions to a certain financial Prometheus,—now bound to the rock of retribution, and having his liver torn, and his biliary functions otherwise put out of order, by the eagles of Napoleonic justice—rather than to its merits. It has, in fact, been as much abused as it has been run after—a perplexing sort of popularity, but by no means uncommon in this not over clean-feeding world. M. Augier's comedy is succeeded by the revival of Les Comédiens, by Casimir Delavigne. Time, no doubt, has blunted the keen edge of the satire in this admirable comedy, but it is still admirable for the elegance of its verses, and the liveliness of the witty sallies with which it abounds. I am sorry to hear that Samson, now the oldest member of the Comédie Française, is about to retire; and yet a great artist should not tarry on the scene of his triumphs after his vigour has deserted him, and the maturity of his talents is turning to what maturity always does turn to. It is an act of courage, no doubt, to wrench oneself away at the right time, and we are so little inclined to give heed to the warnings of our decline, that we cannot always of ourselves decide on the fitting moment; but a great artist ought to have the requisite courage, and if he have a true friend, he will not be at a loss to discover the right moment to exercise it. Farren lingered on the stage till he was pitied, if not ridiculed. Macready retired in time—gracefully so. The Vaudeville has produced two novelties, Ma Sœur Misette, by MM. Varin and Michel Delaporte, and Un Mariage de Paris, a comedy in three acts, by MM. About and De Najac. The latter has had a considerable amount of success, and is said to be amusing. I have not seen it yet, but shall take an early opportunity, and will, if worthy of it, send a short notice. At the Palais Royal, a new piece, Le Songe d'une Nuit d'Eté, has not been very successful, though its existence will be protracted for some time.

While on theatrical ground, let me record an act of patronage towards the dramatic art exercised by the State here, which might be well imitated in England. The "Association des Artistes Dramatiques" has just received an annual grant of 6000 francs, or 240*l*.

It is announced that M. Ambroise Thomas, who seems to have a spite against the memory of our great bard, is about a grand opera on the subject of Hamlet. The book is by MM. Jules Barbier and Michel Carré—experienced librettists, no doubt; but one shudders to think what French librettists will do with the melancholy Prince of Denmark. "Angels and ministers of grace, defend us!" One is not much more comfortable at the prospect of a similar task being undertaken by an Englishman for an English composer, although the book-maker be the profound critic and racy poet, John Oxenford, and the composer be the—(I leave you to put the appropriate epithets)—George Alexander Macfarren. I could never reconcile myself to the soliloquies being turned to scenas. But it is a noble theme! only Shakspeare should have done the libretto himself, and Beethoven with Mozart—for the ghost scene and the Ophelia part—the music. Addio for the present.

Letters to the Editor.

MUSIC AND THE EXHIBITION OF 1862.

SIR,—Last April I addressed you a letter on the above important subject, which I was induced to do by observing in the report of the Sacred Harmonic Society the unwarranted manner in which the committee of that body gave their opinion to the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1862, "that no satisfactory issue would be likely to follow the proposed attempt to recognise music at the forthcoming Exhibition, particularly if it was intended to undertake musical performances concurrently with the Exhibition." Such a statement from any other source than the Sacred Harmonic Society would call for no notice; but when the gentlemen of the Committee appeal to their experience of twenty-five years in musical matters as the grounds of this opinion, it is time for all who have the advance of music at heart, to inquire how music in connection with the Exhibition of 1862 may be made a success?

In the first instance, I think that whatever musical performances take place in conjunction with the approaching Exhibition should be of a national character, and a national musical institution should head the movement, so as to avoid any appearance of personal speculating or clique aggrandisement. The institutions naturally suggesting themselves are the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal Society of British Musicians. The former being devoted to instruction, would not, I think, be qualified for the undertaking. The second, combining within itself the highest musical talent of the country, first-rate business capacity, a thorough knowledge of the works of the great masters, the matériel for conducting great musical performances, being under Royal Charter, and having enjoyed royal patronage for more than three quarters of a century, all tend to render the Royal Society of British Musicians the proper leaders in this most important national work. This society can call upon all the first musical talent of the nation to assist them to do for music what is being done by the Exhibition for the sister arts, painting and sculpture, and art generally; and where is the musician, instrumental or vocal, who would not gladly come forward and assist in such a cause. While there is a Royal Society, national musical performances should take place, and as no society would be strong enough, in itself, to give important concerts, they can call in extraneous aid, the same as the Sacred Harmonic Society did for the Handel Festival, in this way giving the whole undertaking an international character.

If we admit that the profession and public supported the Royal Society in the undertaking, the question arises, where can they give the concerts? The want of space already felt for the regular requirements, in the Exhibition building, precludes the possibility of erecting a suitable orchestra, to say nothing of accommodating an immense audience—for which a clear space, at least, equal to the transept of the Crystal Palace would be the smallest area required, and as every available foot will, no doubt, be occupied for the display of objects of art and industry, the idea of concerts in the Exhibition building must at once be abandoned; I may also say that all the great performances at Sydenham, although by large numbers, have not produced anything like the effect that was anticipated, owing to the insurmountable acoustical imperfections of the building; and the same defects will, doubtless, be found to exist in the new Exhibition building at Kensington.

I, therefore, return to my original proposition, as stated in my letter you so kindly inserted in your journal of the 27th April—in which I proposed that a separate concert-room should be built, contiguous to the main Exhibition, and of dimensions to accommodate large orchestras and monster audiences. I hear whispers that some such scheme is on foot, and really being attempted, but musical matters are always such secrets, and such strange rumours are constantly afloat, that it is difficult to know what to believe; but as we hear—vid Paris—that Her Majesty's Commissioners have addressed letters to MM. Auber, Meyerbeer, and Rossini, inviting them to compose certain works to be performed at the opening of the Exhibition, to represent their respective countries "in a manner befitting the occasion"—perhaps there may be some truth in the report. I see the works are to consist of an anthem, a chorale, and two marches. The idea of M. Auber composing an anthem as representing French music is, I think, to say the least, peculiar. Meyerbeer will be sure to compose a good chorale, his "Pater Noster" shows his capabilities in this line. Italy is without a representative at present, Rossini having declined. England's champion will, no doubt, be Dr. W. Sterndale Bennett—though his name is not yet mentioned—a musician and composer of the highest genius in all styles. The performance of these works should, I think, be intrusted to the Royal Society, their band includes every first-class performer of the day, Professor Bennett being the conductor, a proper interpretation of the works would be certain. I would suggest, as a means of carrying out the choral portion of the compositions, that a selection of voices should be made from the Sacred Harmonic Society, the Vocal Association and Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir.

Now, as a comparatively small portion of the public will be present at the opening of the Exhibition, this important performance of music will only be heard by a select few; the mass of the English public, and the visitors from all parts of the world, might as well be in Kamscatka, for all they will know of one of the most interesting features of the Exhibition. Now, if my views were carried into execution, by the erection of a temporary concert hall, there could be a number of performances of these works, and every visitor who might make a short stay in London would be able to attend one of these concerts, with no other trouble than that of paying for his ticket.

I have no doubt that most of the eminent musical societies of London and the provinces would be glad to avail themselves of such an arena for the display of their harmonious powers. The names of the following societies at once occur to my mind:—The Royal Society of British Musicians, the Sacred Harmonic Society, the Jubilee Concert of the Old Philharmonic Society, the Musical Society of London, the New Philharmonic Society, the Vocal Association, Opera Concerts, Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir, the Yorkshire Choral Union, the Bradford Choral Society, &c. &c., and, looking at the profitable results of the Handel Festival, a portion of the receipts of the proposed concerts might be devoted to defraying the cost of the building, a second portion to the expenses of the performances, and a third might be set apart for musical encouragement or charities. The provincial societies would most likely visit London in a body under ordinary circumstances, and would, no doubt, gladly give a concert or two each during their stay, if a suitable building were available.

In conclusion, I would earnestly call the attention of the musical public to the position the question of "Music at the Exhibition of 1862" has assumed since my letter to you last April, and, as one of them, should like to know what is really being done. Are there to be performances of music, or are there not? If there are, what is the nature of the works to be performed, who is to do them, who is to have the arrangement and management, and where is the building to be erected, &c.? These are questions of vital importance, which demand immediate attention. Whispers, evasive answers, and the like, are all that can be obtained from persons whom, one would suppose, would know all about the matter, but who, I think, know no more than I do, but, for reasons of their own, pretend to be very astute and profound. In the meantime, the first announcement of what we are doing in London comes from Paris. All this makes one feel uneasy, and is not the genuine English mode of conducting public matters, particularly when the object of them is to elevate the public taste by the promotion of musical art, acknowledged by the greatest moralists to be the most refined of all recreation.

Apologising for the length of this letter, but which, I think, the importance of the subject will warrant, I am, yours obediently,

MUSICUS.

P.S.—I hope that my inquiries will meet with a reply from some of your readers who may be more conversant with the matter than I am. M.

MOZART'S SONG.

SIR,—I have looked with some interest for a reply to your correspondent's (Amateur) inquiry, "if the German song by Mozart, 'Phillis an das Clavier,' was published in England with English words?" The original composition being in my possession, and the obbligato pianoforte part being much admired by professors of eminence to whom I have shown it as an unknown musical gem of the composer of "Il mio tesoro"—I have recently adapted words, "The Song of Felicia,"—and as it will very shortly be published, I trust it may be the means of bringing it to the notice of amateurs, professionals, and the musical public generally.—Yours respectfully, Manchester, July 9th. R. ANDREWS.

SIR,—"OMEGA" has not yet seen an answer to his enquiry in the MUSICAL WORLD, although certainly more than four weeks have elapsed since his last letter was mentioned. If the Editor is able to give the necessary information, 'Omega' will be glad to have his opinion without further delay."

["Omega" must either be halt or dumb, if not indeed deaf, or he would have seen our second reply to his second communication. Let him first digest that (if he be not blind); then, should he have anything to rescind, reimburse, scatter, readumbrate, expunge, or preterspecify, our columns will be open to him this day seven weeks. PALMER LISLE NOT PALMER.

SIR,—Observing in the notice of the "Society for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts" contained in the last number of the MUSICAL WORLD, that my name appears as "Miss Palmer," instead of Miss Palmer Lisle; I beg to point out this error, and should feel obliged if you could kindly notice or correct in your next number.

I remain, Sir, yours obediently,

1, Hastings-street, July 10, 1861. J. PALMER LISLE.

ROYAL CREMORNE GARDENS.—Two private fêtes, on a grand scale, are announced to take place at these gardens on the 18th and 24th of the present month, for which great preparations are said to be in progress, in aid of the funds for the Distressed Spitalfields' Weavers and the Spitalfields' Emigration Committee. A peculiar and most attractive feature at these entertainments is expected to be the presence of a considerable number of the younger branches of the nobility and gentry, for whose special enjoyment a short succession of amusements, of an hour, or an hour-and-a-half's duration, is to be organised, commencing and terminating at an early hour. These will include the inflation and starting of a number of balloons — conjuring — the wonderful birds of Mlle. Vandermeersch — the stereorama — ballet divertissement — and a dance on the platform, &c. Admission to these fêtes to be by tickets in exchange for vouchers, to be obtained of the ladies patronesses, of whom an official list is published. It is to be hoped that a considerable benefit will accrue to the charities in whose behalf these entertainments have been set on foot.

GAELIC JACOBITE SONGS.—These, as far as they are known, are more uniformly plaintive and melancholy than their southern compeers. Comparatively little is known of them. Their language renders them a sealed book to three fourths of their countrymen. Learned antiquaries understanding Erse are not many, and even these have not thought it worth their while to collect the scattered fragments of a rude literature which is no longer understand by the classes who purchase and read books. A few of them have been made known to the general public through the translations of the Ettrick Shepherd and others; and where these have not been caricatured and marred by the ill taste of the translator in rendering them into the broken and imperfect jargon of a Highlander's first attempt to speak English, are creditable to the passion of the Celtic music, and to the zeal of the people in behalf of their native princes. But they form a very small portion of the collections that have hitherto been made. It is likely that many hundreds as good, if not better, than those that are thus preserved, have, for these reasons, been irrecoverably lost. If so, the muse of Jacobitism, Highland as she is, must go down to posterity in a Lowland dress.—Charles Mackay.

PICTURES OF ITALIAN SCENERY BY PROFESSOR AGRICOLA.—There is a series of pictures by Professor Agricola now on view in a room connected with St. James's Hall, which is well worth a visit. The views embrace a few of the most celebrated and classic scenes in Italy. One represents the famous waterfalls and extremely picturesque cascades at Tivoli, with the tower nestling in the clefts of the rocks, or perched on the crests of the hills. In a second we have the Grotto at the Convent of the Capuchins in the Gulf of Salerno, and the town of Amalfi. A third presents us with a sunset view of the Colosseum at Rome, as seen from the Farnese Gardens, on the ruins of the Golden House of Nero. The artist has grappled still more boldly with the difficulties of sunset in a view of the Bay of Baia, seen from the Pausilippo, with all the little islands in the full blaze of the setting sun. In strong contrast with this is the Roadstead and Lighthouse of Leghorn, by moonlight. Another striking picture is the Ruins of the Baths of the Emperor Tiberius, on the coast of Capri. "Evviva Italia!" is the title of a pleasing little picture of an incident of the Garibaldian occupation of Rome in 1849. There are besides some interesting studies and drawings. The chief merit of these pictures is their accuracy. This is a quality in which English pictures of Italian scenery are too often deficient. The travelling artist usually stocks his portfolio with innumerable hasty sketches, and when he returns home and selects one of these for a picture, he finds he is compelled to draw largely upon his imagination. Some of our best artists are really culpably reckless in this particular, and will, for the sake of "improving the composition," introduce objects quite foreign to the particular scene they pretend to represent as they find it. Professor Agricola's pictures, on the contrary, bear unmistakable evidence of having been painted on the spot. In other respects this artist's works are strikingly English. They have just that amount of minute characterization without sacrifice of breadth at which our landscape painters aim. They also evince an English feeling for colour and the effects of atmosphere, with, however, all the phenomena of the climate represented. In fine, Signor Agricola is certainly a conscientious and deserving artist, and his gallery may be visited with both pleasure and profit.

PARIS.—From an occasional Correspondent.—The new Théâtre Lyrique will be completely finished in the month of September, M. Réty will enter on possession in the month of December. The edifice will be inaugurated by a piece in three acts from the pen of Grisar, after which will be produced the grand opera, entitled Noé, by MM. E. Halévy and St. Georges.—At the meeting of June 27th, the Corps Législatif passed, by a majority of 179 to 38, the bill for the construction of the new Grand Opera on the site of the old Rue Basse-du-Rempart.—A festival of the Orpheonistes will take place, next September, in the Palais de l'Industrie, under the direction of M. S. Delsporte. More than six thousand singers, representing the "Orphéons" of fifty departments, have signified their intention of taking part in the proceedings. The general committee of patronage of the Orphéons and Choral Societies of France, with M. Larabit, Member of the Senate, as, President, will superintend the artistic portion of the solemnity, for which MM. Meyerbeer, Auber, Halévy, Ambroise Thomas Richard Wagner, and Kücken, have written choruses.

VIENNA.—Prince Constantine Czartoryski has written to the directors of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde that, as the state of his health requires him to leave Vienna for a time, he resigns his position as member and president of the Society. The directors have resolved, however, to keep the office of president open, until the period, which they hope will not be far distant, when the prince's health shall be completely restored, and enable him to resume his duties.

LEIPSIC.—The members of the orchestra at the theatre have presented Signor Orsini, conductor of the Italian Operatic Company, which lately gave a series of performances here, a gilt silver vase, as a testimony of their sincere admiration.

DARMSTADT.—M. Offenbach's Orphée aux Enfers has been produced here with great success.

ZURICH.—The Musical Festival has been indefinitely postponed, on account of the great fire in Glarus.

COLOGNE.—A blind young lady, Mlle. Aveline Büchner, sang the soprano music at a performance of Beethoven's Mass in C major, lately given in the Cathedral. She sings with great correctness and feeling, and produced a very favourable impression.

SPA.—The concert season commenced on the 1st July. Mad. Clara Schumann was the first celebrity on the list. Among the other artists engaged are Mads. Escudier-Kastner, Marimon, MM. Servais, Sivori, Louis Brassin, Dupuis, Delabarre, &c. A "Drawing-room' opera, by Julius Beer, a nephew of Meyerbeer, will be produced in the course of the season.—The theatre will open on the 15th instant.

LONDON: SATURDAY, JULY 13, 1861.

WE are no more wanting in courage than we are wanting in reviewers; and if our reviewers occasionally stumble, our courage never quails. The following polite communication may explain what we are unable to explain without it:—

July 8th, 1861.

DEAR EDITOR M. W.—If you have the requisite courage, put the enclosed in your next number. Truly yours,

VERAX.

"To the Editor and Readers of the MUSICAL WORLD.

"WANTED TO KNOW where are the consecutive fifths referred to in the second musical example on page 419 of the last number, viz.:—

"It is the opinion of some that the critic does not know a fifth from a sixth."

The reviewer who reviewed Mr. F. W. Hanson's song has been dismissed. Poor fellow! it was his first fault; but justice must have weight. He has written an apology—to no purpose; and henceforth, though we love him well, let him be no reviewer of ours. His case is a hard one, and his review may have proceeded from over-zeal. Besides, he mayn't like sixths, especially convertible sixths—sixths that may be converted into fifths. For example, A and E (sharp, flat, or natural) make a fifth; while if the A sharp in the second bar were written (as it might be written—and, for the sake of our ex-reviewer, we wish it had been written) B flat, then B flat and F (sharp, flat, or natural) would have made another fifth. We can easily imagine our poor reviewer, confused by the heap of "new music for review" that lay before him, seeing the progression in his mind's eye, and hearing it in his mind's ear thus:—

He did not say (poor man!) that there were consecutive perfect fifths in the same direction, but consecutive fifths in the same direction; and allowing the metamorphosis of A sharp into B flat, to mend his case (which is hardly asking too much), he would then be able to put forth a tenable plea for mercy. He might even insist, with the late Dr. Alfred Day, that there is no A sharp in the key of D, the chromatic scale of which—taking D (tonic), E (supertonic), and A (dominant), as roots that generate, by harmonics, the notes of which it is composed—would be written thus:— and so defy his calumniators. But, in that case, peradventure, another disciple of the Daylight system might protest that there is also no E sharp in the key of D, which would convert our ex-reviewer's first fifth into a sixth:—

Thus, what he had gained by the metamorphosis of A into B he would lose by the metamorphosis of E into F. We fear, alas! that his condition is a hopeless one; and unless he can command sufficient interest to be admitted into the staff of the Superfine Review, or to help "One who pays" (Mr. Punch's new and surprisingly erudite contributor) with the musical part of his alarmingly independent criticisms, he must throw aside his pen, and criticise no more. This would be a pity. Mr. F. W. Hanson is not likely to extend a hand of compassion, and submit an additional song or two for his inspection; for that gentleman, in the progression which has led to such disastrous results, was simply bent upon modulating from D major into B minor, and, therefore, had a plain right both to his E sharp and his A sharp. Besides, listen to a graver and less dapper pro*test*ant than the veracious "Verax":—

To the Editor of the MUSICAL WORLD.

SIR,—I have often had occasion to think highly of your reviews of music, for they have often made revelations of a theoretical ignorance which is disreputable in this age of musical enlightenment; but when I met with the review of a song by F. W. Hanson, in the present number (July 6), I thought the reviewer was rendering himself liable to be placed in the same list with the peccant concoctors who weekly expose their shortcomings in music manufacturing. The reviewer states that Mr. Hanson indulges in consecutive fifths twice, and gives the extracts. The first contains no fifth at all, but sixths (unless the music is misprinted). "The sharps to the E and to the A do not mend the matter," says the reviewer; indeed, if the sharps were there, there would be no fifths at all!

Digitized by Google

because the motion would be oblique; no question of fifths arising. As it is, the intervals are sixths and not fifths. Again, the intervals in the second extract are covered fifths, and not direct. This is, of course, bad harmony, but they are stated to be consecutive fifths, which they are decidedly not; and the absurdity about B is B, A is A, &c., &c., "does not mend the matter," because from B♭ to F♯ above is decidedly a sixth, making with the fifth next to it an instance of indirect or covered fifths. I consider correctness is strictly necessary in these reviews on account of the influence which adverse notices must have upon the music, and also on account of the number of amateurs whose want of theoretical knowledge these faulty assertions might easily mislead. The first example I have mentioned is, if not a misprint, very foolish, because there are no fifths, but sixths, and the other, although bad harmony, is rightly noticed, the fifths are covered and not direct. — Yours, respectfully, E. EVES.

Mr. E. Eves discusses the matter sombrely, and we believe, if the unfortunate ex-reviewer were his own godson, he would have no mercy on his sins. Nevertheless, the admitted covered fifths, which, though not "direct," we find even uglier than uncovered fifths, should be accepted in some degree as extenuation. At any rate we appeal to the tenderer feelings of Messrs. Hanson, "Verax," and Eves. None of us are infallible—"nemo mortalium omnibus horis sapit"—not even Messrs. "Verax" and Eves (evidently not Mr. Hanson—"covered fifths" to wit); and, as we are not wise at all hours, we ought, in very meekness, to forgive those who are foolish even twenty-four hours a day—more especially an unhappy reviewer, who if he cannot find a post in the Superfine Review, must starve (which would be a pity).

THE Baroness Vigier (Mlle. Sophie Cruvelli) has not deserted that art to which she was indebted for so many and such brilliant triumphs. Although the stage lost her in the very midst of her greatest successes, she continues to cherish a passionate attachment for that attractive branch of music (the lyric) of which she was so admirable an exponent. The Baroness Vigier no longer sings in public, however, except in the cause of charity. At Nice, where, conjointly with her Baron, she possesses a nice baronial mansion, and where she resided last winter, the Baroness has sung, on very many occasions, in the salons of the élite of the official and fashionable world. All who have had the good fortune to hear her agree that they never listened to a more admirable or more captivating voice. There was one piece, more especially, which the Baroness Vigier executed with marvellous art and spirit. This consists of variations composed by herself (Sophie a composer!) on a well-known Tyrolienne. The Variations are exceedingly showy, and replete with daring traits (as original as herself), forming, in short, a thorough course of florid vocal study, illustrative of the entire system of this gifted daughter of three mothers (Melpomene, Thalia, and Euterpe), so early snatched away from the admiration of the eager eye-and-ear-devouring public.

Yielding to very urgent and obstinately iterated solicitations, the Baroness Vigier has at last condescended to smile with self-satisfied beneficence on the immediate publication of these, her flighty, eccentric, and most musically unmelancholy variations, which will appear in a moon-shot, or thereabouts, —at any rate by the time that Luna has changed her present aspect (which is the likeness of the appearance of a nail-paring) for something more glabritous and spherical. There is not a mad soprano or contralto (amateur or professional) but will be dying to make speedy and close acquaintance with this original emanation from an original and impetuous brain; and ere long (our ears upon it!) the Variations of Sophie Cruvelli will resound from the piano of every drawing-room, and from the stage of every theatre.

WHEN we see so frequently the highest ladies in the land unreluctantly lending the light of their names, and no doubt their presence, to musical performances, we cannot but believe that the art of singing and playing is considered of the utmost value in aristocratic circles; else it would be strange to see Duchesses, Marchionesses, Countesses, and lesser ladies take an interest in music they never seem to take in any other art. An exhibition of a painting or piece of sculpture is never recommended by a long string of fashionable names. On the other hand, Signor This, or Herr That—foreigners, as a rule, are more extensively patronised by the nobility than natives—seldom announces a concert without an alluring catalogue of the best-bred patrons and patronesses adorning his programme. Are we to suppose that teachers of music and singing are the especial pets of lords and ladies? Mr. Aptommas's Concert was under the immediate favour of two Duchesses, one Most Honorable Marchioness, one Right Honorable Countess, one Right Honorable Viscountess, and several Ladies plain (not by any means plain ladies). Was the programme worthy such high countenance (beginning, as it did, with Weber's Concert-stück,—not for the piano with orchestra, but for the harp without orchestra)?

A PARAGRAPH which appeared in a recent number of the Neué Berliner Musik-zeitung—a canard de première souche—relates one of those wonderful stories of Englishmen and English doings so industriously circulated, and so eagerly swallowed by the gobe-mouches of the Continent, that we cannot resist translating it for the amusement of our readers:—

"A Monster-Concert of a peculiar character was lately given at the Sydenham Crystal Palace. The entertainment consisted of Haydn's Creation, sung by 2000 vocalists. The place of the orchestra was filled by 200 pianos, played by 400 pianists. The effect, we are informed, at first astonished the audience, but eventually became insupportably monotonous. That such a piece of absurdity should be tolerated in England, where oratorio music is held in such high honour, is to us totally incomprehensible."

Has not the correspondent of the paper in question been making merry at the expense of his too easy editor and too credulous compatriots? Who knows? The Prussians believe in anything—except in their own fallibility.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—At a general meeting of the Philharmonic Society on Monday last, the following gentlemen were elected directors for the ensuing season:—Messrs. Anderson, Cusins, Ferrari, Williams, Wilson, Turle, and M'Murdie.

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—The committee have succeeded in engaging Mlle. Titiens, Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mad. Rudersdorff, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Miss Palmer, Mr. Sims Reeves, Signor Giuglini, Mr. Santley, Signor Belletti, and, last not least (though little'st), Mlle. Adelina Patti—an array of vocal talent which has never been surpassed at any previous music meeting; besides Miss Arabella Goddard ("a host in herself"—to adventure an original phrase), for the solo-instrumental department.

MLLE. PATTI AT THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL.—If our information is not incorrect, the terms accorded by the committee of the Birmingham Festival for Mlle. Patti's assistance at four concerts are 500 guineas.

The Operas.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The performance of Don Giovanni on Saturday night derived especial interest from the appearance of Mlle. Adelina Patti in the character of Zerlina—the happiest of her efforts, and the greatest of her triumphs. Mlle. Patti is gifted by nature with the requisites for succeeding in this captivating part. In her pretty peasant attire she was all that painter could imagine in the Spanish country girl; her grace and simplicity, and the very sound of her fresh, youthful voice, completing the illusion. Her acting, too, was perfect. She was neither, as most of our Zerlinas are, the fine lady masquerading in homely garb, nor the vulgar hoyden according to Piccolomini's notion of the character, but the rustic a little idealised, such as we could fancy, though we have never seen in actual life. Everything she did was so entirely the result of impulse, so artless and unpremeditated, the minutest details were so consistent and characteristic, as to leave the audience convinced that nothing less than an actress of nature's own making was before them. In previous essays she had shown both natural gifts and artistic acquirements, particularly in her very truthful and charming Amina, but in no instance to such a degree of perfection as in Zerlina, in which part, moreover, she appears to greatest advantage as a singer. Hitherto she has shone chiefly—though by no means exclusively—in pieces demanding great compass of voice, brilliant execution, and variety of florid embellishment. The music of Zerlina neither requires nor admits of such means of effect. The melodies are simple, and made up of few notes; but who would tolerate fioriture in "La, ci darem la mano," "Batti, Batti," or "Vedrai carino?" Yet to sing such things as these, according to the design of the composer, is the severest trial to which the vocal artist can be exposed. And through this trial our young prima donna passed triumphantly. Her fidelity to Mozart's text—with one single exception, a not very appropriate ornament at the close of "Vedrai carino"—was scrupulous; while she gave an exquisite charm to everything she sang by the sweet and sympathetic quality of her voice, her pure intonation, graceful phrasing, and truth of expression. How could Masetto, poor simple clown, resist the force of such blandishments? As for the audience, they were as much captivated as Masetto, for the house rang with cheers and acclamations. In the music of this part, too, Mlle. Patti showed her skill in the art of delivering the light, rapid, parlante recitative of the Italian comic stage—an art in danger of being lost now that this kind of musical dialogue is going out of use, and giving way to ponderous recitative, accompanied by the whole weight of the orchestra, of the modern school. Zerlina's lively prattle was as clear and intelligible as if she were simply talking without musical notes at all. We do not know what has been Mlle. Patti's musical education, but in this and every other respect it has evidently been excellent. She has yet, we understand, to appear in two other parts before the end of the season—Martha and Dinorah. Each of these will doubtless reveal some new quality which she has not yet enjoyed an opportunity of exhibiting.

Of the present performance of Don Giovanni at Covent-garden—now that so charming a Zerlina is added to the cast—we have no hesitation in saying that it is one of the most efficient we remember. If M. Faure is not the very best Don Giovanni we have ever seen, he is very nearly being so; of Grisi we can only say with pain (though we would not wish it otherwise) that we have witnessed for the last time a performance that can never be forgotten; Mad. Csillag has shown, for the first time in this country, what a part Donna Elvira really is in the hands of a great performer; Herr Formes' Leporello is a remarkable achievement, the reading new yet impossible to observe its consistency and effect without being convinced that it is also true; not less remarkable is the dramatic genius shown by Ronconi, in giving to the hitherto insignificant part of Masetto an importance of which it has never been supposed capable. But of all this, and of the mise en scène, of the ball, of Mlle. Salvioni of the orchestra, of the chorus, of the conductor, we spoke when Don Giovanni was played a short time since, with Mad. Penco as Donna Anna, and Mad. Miolan Carvalho as Zerlina.

On Monday Don Giovanni was repeated (with Mad. Tiberini Ortolani as Elvira), thus accomplishing the sixth of Mad. Grisi's "Farewell" appearances. Again was Mlle. Patti in high favour, and again was the house crowded to the roof. The result, too, is felicitous, inasmuch as vice Leonora (Trovatore) we shall have Donna Anna (Monday next) for the eighth and last "Farewell," which but for the inestimable "benefit" (date not yet announced) would be the veritable "last of the lasts." The seventh "Farewell" came off on Tuesday with the Huguenots (Mad. Tiberini Ortolani, as the Queen) the rest as before, except that perhaps Mario was still greater than before.

On Wednesday the Traviata was given for the second time, confirming in every respect the high opinion pronounced last week on Mlle. Patti's Violetta. No performance on Thursday. To-night, Martha. Martha, Mlle. Patti; Lionel, Signor Mario.

LYCEUM.—The season closed on Saturday with a miscellaneous performance for the benefit of Mlle. Titiens, comprising the introduction and "Casta diva" from Norma; the second and third acts of the Ballo in Maschera; the grand scena of Leonora from Fidelio; and the duet between Raoul and Valentine, from the fourth act of the Huguenots. The principal parts in the four operas were sustained with wonderful power and endurance by the heroine of the evening. The great effect of the performance was created in the "Casta Diva," which Mlle. Titiens sang with such combined magnificence and brilliancy as to excite the audience to the highest pitch of enthusiasm. When the fair artist came on to a universal recall, a shower of bouquets rained on the stage from every part of the theatre, and made so capacious an arm-full that even Mlle. Titiens was constrained to leave some behind her. To some, however, the singing of Mlle. Titiens in the scena from Fidelio even transcended that in Norma; while others preferred the overwhelming passion and devotion in the Huguenots. For ourselves we liked all, since all was grand, superb, and magnificently impulsive. Of course Signor Giuglini was the Raoul in the Huguenots; but the Pollio in Norma was undertaken by a stranger, Signor Tito Palmieri, who exhibited a powerful voice and no lack of energy. The characters in the Ballo in Maschera was as before.

Concerts.

HERR LIDEL, the violoncellist, gave a concert at the Hanover Square Rooms on Tuesday evening, the 2nd inst., under the most distinguished patronage, including that of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge, the Princess Mary, the Duchess of Beaufort, the Dowager Duchess of Beaufort, the Marchioness of Waterford, and countesses and ladies in numbers. The dish presented before his aristocratic guests by Herr Lidel was a good dish, vocal and instrumental, and contained sundry tit-bits which were eagerly swallowed by the hungry hearers. The one classical morsel contained in the programme—one is enough at a light feast—was Mendelssohn's grand duo in D, op. 58, for pianoforte and violoncello, in which Herr Lidel enjoyed the invaluable collaboration of Miss Arabella Goddard; and, both artists playing their best, the performance was consummate, and was thoroughly appreciated by the aristocrats, who applauded liberally, and would not surcease until pianist and violoncellist both returned to the platform, and exchanged compliments with them. Herr Lidel also played, with Signor Regondi, Bohrer's duo concertante, for concertina and violoncello—finely executed on both sides—and Goltermann's concerto in A minor, for violoncello solus, which found many admirers. Besides the duet of Mendelssohn, with Herr Lidel, Miss Arabella Goddard performed Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith," which of course obtained its inevitable encore, when the fair pianist substituted Thalberg's "Last rose of summer." Miss Banks, Mad. Laura Baxter, Mr. George Perren, and Mr. Santley, were the singers, and Mr. Francesco Berger conductor.

MADAME DE VAUCHERAN'S CONCERT.—Among the many resident lady pianists with which London abounds, the least meritorious and talented is by no means Mad. de Vaucheran who is also as ambitious as she is clever, which was proved on Wednesday evening, on the occasion of her annual concert, at the Hanover Square Rooms, by her selecting Beethoven's Kreutzer sonata for her initiative essay. The violinist the fair pianist made choice of to co-operate with in Beethoven's great work was one Herr Hegar, from the Conservatoire at Leipzig, a player cunning at his strings and apt, but not so cunning nor so apt as to absorb all praise, or divert applause from the lady who, we must say, deserved the lion's share, and obtained it, delighting all who were within the sphere of her influence, by the neatness of her mechanism and her genuine feeling. Mad. de Vaucheran also played, with Herr Carl Oberthür, a duet for harp and piano, the composition of Herr Oberthür, with even greater effect than the Kreutzer sonata; not, we take it, because the duet is better or more effective than the sonata, but because the audience were more intimately acquainted with Herr Oberthür than with Beethoven. Herr Hegar did not confine himself to the sonata, but played Signor Alard's fantasia on Linda di Chamouni with infinite suppleness of finger, and very correct intonation, altogether a performance calculated to please greatly his aristocratic hearers. The harp solo on "The last rose of summer" by Herr Oberthür, was most admirable, exquisite indeed, and created an unmistakeable sensation. The vocal music was supplied by Mlle. Jenny Baur (or Bauer), Mad. (or Mrs.) Alexander Newton, Miss Alice Dodd, Miss Millar, Messrs. Trelawny, Cobham, Edward Southwell, Fourness Rolfe, and Wallworth, and Signor Gustavo Garcia. Miss Alice Dodd, a young and timid girl, with a very pleasing voice and simple manner, made a decided impression in Dussek's canzonet, "Name the glad day." We shall be glad when we hear the day named for her next appearance in public. Mad. Alexander Newton was encored in "Lo I hear the gentle lark," which she sang with unusual brilliancy, Mr. J. Ward accompanying her on the concertina, vice the flute, to perfection. The concert was given under the golden shade, or light, of a Duke, a Duchess, and sundry Right-honourables, which no doubt enhanced the attraction, and helped to swell the number of the visitors. Mr. Alfred Gilbert officiated as conductor.

HERR MAURICE NABICH, the eminent trombone player, whom, if we mistake not, Jullien imported into this country some five years since, gave his third annual concert at the lower room at Willis's, St. James's, on Thursday morning last. The trombone, although an inestimable adjunct to the orchestra, is not an instrument, however well played, that people covet greatly to hear. When Herr Nabich plays, and executes the most difficult passages with unparalleled ease, the hearer is astonished; but when playing an andante or slow melody, however perfectly or gracefully done, no feeling of delight is excited, because the quality of tone given out by the trombone is somewhat ponderous, and by no means intended to convey expression, except of the nigger kind. Herr Nabich, nevertheless, has a high reputation, and having provided an attractive programme, with such co-efficients as Miss Medora Collins, Mad. Sedlatzek, Herr de Becker, Mr. George Perren, and Signor Guglielmo (vocalists), Mr. Viotti Collins (violin), Mr. George Collins (violoncello), Mr. Sidney Smith (pianoforte), and Herr Progatzky (double bass), instrumentalists, managed to fill the room. Herr Nabich was not sparing of his play. He performed two pieces of his own composition—solo "Souvenir de Bellini," and variations for trombone, accompanied by stringed instruments; a solo by Bergson, and Schubert's "Adieu," arranged for two voices and violin, by Prince George Galitzin, Mr. Viotti Collins taking the fiddle part, Herr de Becker the first voice, and Herr Nabich playing the second voice on the trombone. Further, Mr. Viotti Collins played a solo on the violin, Mr. Sidney Smith a solo on the pianoforte, Mr. George Collins a solo on the violoncello, and Herr Progatzky a solo on the double bass. The last performance was the least effective. We may dismiss the vocal music without a note or comment, except to say that the singing was creditable, if not striking. Mr. Sidney Smith conducted.

THE HARP MATINÉE OF MR. APTOMMAS was given at Messrs. Collards' Pianoforte and Concert Rooms, Grosvenor Street, on Monday afternoon, under most gracious and noble patronage. The concert, indeed, was worthy of such high countenance. The concert-giver played, for the first time, Weber's Concert-Stück, which, though written for the piano, and losing much of its force and effect by its transference from the ivory to the gut, was a brilliant and telling performance; its success being greatly enhanced by the inimitable manner in which Mr. Benedict accompanied the harpist on the pianoforte. This arrangement of Weber's popular work for harp and piano we can recommend to all harpists in search of good music well arranged for the instrument. Mr. Aptommas also played a new valse de concert, and a solo on American melodies, of his own composition; and joined Mr. John Thomas, another distinguished harpist, in two duets for the harps, both brilliantly played. The instrumental performances were not restricted to the harp, Messrs. Osborne and Kuhe, pianists of fame both, playing a grand duet for two pianos on the Etoile du Nord, composed by Mr. Osborne, in first-rate style. The singers were Miss Messent, Mad. Clara M. Brinkerhoff, Signor Gardoni, and Signor Gustavo Garcia. Mad. Brinkerhoff, we have been informed, was some time since editress of the New York Musical World, but, having a good voice, and preferring singing to literature, has followed the vocal profession from choice. We know nothing of the literary talents of the lady, but can bear witness to a voice of good quality, which practice cannot fail to render highly efficient. Mad. Brinkerhoff sang the scena, "O des amans le plus fidèle," from Méhul's Ariodant, and a romanza by Signor Alary, both of which would have been sufficiently trying to the most experienced singer; but indicated fine natural capabilities, not yet under the best control, and good expression. Miss Messent sang Donizetti's "Fatal Goffredo"—a pet song of hers, and Mr. Benedict's ballad, "Scenes of my youth," both excellently; and Signor Gardoni a new romance, "I mourn thine absence," with great charm of voice. Mr. Benedict conducted.

MR. DEACON'S CONCERTS.—The third and last of Mr. Deacon's séances of classical and instrumental music was given on Thursday week at Collards' Concert-rooms, in Grosvenor Street. Like the previous performances, it was attended by a numerous and fashionable audience. It consisted of Mendelssohn's quartet in E minor, Mozart's sonata in D, No. 10, for piano and violin, played by Mr. Deacon and M. Sainton; Beethoven's sonata in A flat, Op. 26, played by Mr. Deacon; and Spohr's quintet for the piano and stringed instruments. Mr. Deacon is a sound musician and an accomplished pianist; and these séances, consisting of music judiciously chosen and admirably performed, were both interesting and instructive to the amateurs who attended them.

THE MATINÉE MUSICALE OF SIGNOR GIULIO REGONDI (Monday, July 1) had so many points of excellence to recommend it, that it was no wonder the Hanover-square Rooms were filled in every part. The concertina, although now greatly admired, may not be the most imposing of instruments. That Signor Regondi, however, is the most accomplished living player on the concertina cannot be denied, and hence his name alone is a special cause of attraction. Indeed, there are many who would rather hear a solo on the concertina from Signor Regondi than a solo on the piano or violin from almost any pianist or fiddler; and we shall not quarrel with them. But Signor Regondi does not confine himself to the concertina. One of his most extraordinary and masterly achievements at his last concert was the performance of the overture to Semiramide on the guitar! Nay, reader, do not smile. At least believe it was achieved, and set it down as no less wonderful and perilous a feat than Blondin's ascent on the tight rope (which is always more or less slack). Rossini himself would have been delighted and surprised to hear his brilliant orchestral prelude "transcribed" for six strings and two hands, and played to such perfection. But all to nothing the most acceptable performance of Signor Regondi was the new concerto for the concertina in D, written expressly for him by Herr Molique—the second he has composed for his gifted protégé—with accompaniments of stringed instruments, and "harmonium" to represent "wind." This piece had all the value of a grand concerto for pianoforte or violin—the music being admirably written for the solo instruments (one by no means easy to write for). The accompaniments were ingenious, constantly varied, and always effective, the composition, considered in the mere light of abstract music, a chef-d'œuvre, and the execution by Signor Regondi inimitable. Quite a sensation was excited by this extraordinary work and extraordinary performance. Signor Regondi also played to perfection two solos for the guitar, and a solo (on the Huguenots) for the concertina, all his own composition, and all more or less interesting. The attractions, however, did not rest solely with the concert-giver. Miss Arabella Goddard played Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith," and was rapturously encored; Mr. Boleyne Reeves performed solos on the harp; Herr Lidel a solo on the violoncello; Signor Gardoni sang "Adelaida" (delightfully); Mad. Catherine Hayes gave Virginia, Gabriel's song, "The Forsaken" (most expressively); Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington and Signor Gardoni the lovely duet, "O lovely maiden, stay," from Spohr's Azor and Zelmira. Moreover, Signor Gustavo Garcia sang the romance, "Pour faire son souvenir," from L'Etoile du Nord, and Donizetti's barcarole, "Una barchetta in Mar." Herr Randegger was the accompanist at the pianoforte.

The Soirée Musicale of Herr Wilhelm Ganz (Monday evening, July 8th, at 15, Queen Anne Street, Cavendish Square), was, for a non-orchestral entertainment, one of unusual excellence. It opened with Beethoven's sonata for pianoforte and violin, in F major, Op. 24, exceedingly well played, as was assured, Herr Ganz and Herr Deichmann being the executants. This classical opening led to a well-varied anti-classical selection, in which the following artists, besides the two already named, took part:—Miss Augusta Thomson, Miss Matilda Bradshaw, Miss Eleanora Wilkinson, Mad. Rieder, Miss Messent, Sig. Gardoni, Mr. Weiss, Mr. Alberto Laurence, and Mr. Lindsay Sloper. It will be at once supposed that, where singers prevailed, vocal music was in the ascendant. And indeed Herr Ganz modestly appropriated to himself, in addition to the sonata of Beethoven, but four "transcriptions" of his own composition, and a Grand Duo for two pianofortes, also of his own composition, which he played, with Mr. Lindsay Sloper, with remarkable effect. One of the "transcriptions,"—"Santa Lucia,"—was encored. In the vocal music, we find nothing to record, beyond the fact that Miss Matilda Bradshaw, in the aria "In questo semplice," showed a nice quality of voice, and sang well. Messrs. Lindsay Sloper and Wilhelm Ganz accompanied.

MISS GRACE ALLEYNE gave a Matinée at Messrs. Collards' Rooms, Grosvenor Street, on Thursday, and was assisted by Miss Palmer, Miss Matilda Bradshaw, Alice Dodd, Messrs. George Perren, Alberto Laurence, and C. H. Saunders, as vocalists, and Herr Wilhelm Ganz (pianoforte), Herr Goffrie (violin), and M. Paque (violoncello), as instrumentalists. Miss Alleyne contributed the scena "Softly sighs," from Der Freischutz, and a new scena, composed for her by Mr. F. Lanza, entitled "Victory," and sang both with much force and brilliancy. Among the other vocal performances we may specify Miss Alice Dodd's "Name the glad day" (Dussek's charming canzonet), and "The harp that once through Tara's halls;" Miss Palmer's song, "Save my father on the sea;" and Mr. Alberto Laurence's aria, "Eri tu che macchiavi" (from the Ballo in Maschera), as worthy of mention. Herr Wilhelm Ganz, M. Goffrie, and M. Paque played solos on their respective instruments with eminent success. The attendance was tolerably large. Conductors—Herr Wilhelm Ganz, Mr. F. Lanza, and M. Emile Berger.

SWISS FEMALE SINGERS.—The entertainments have undergone a complete transformation, and the selection now given is entirely new. The performances of Mlle. Johanna Claussen and Mad. Decker-Schenk still constitute the principal attraction. The first-named lady introduces in the new programme a comic song, and being encored nightly gives "The dashing white Sergeant," in English, with immense effect. Now that the Swiss Singers are about to take their leave everybody is more than anxious to hear them. They have given already nearly two hundred concerts in London, and yet their attraction shows no diminution—an unmistakeable proof of their excellence.

EGYPTIAN HALL, PICCADILLY.—The first season of Mr. Frederick Penna's "Highways and Byways of Song" was brought to a brilliant close on Saturday evening last, when the room was literally crammed with a fashionable audience. Mr. Penna's singing of Loder's ballad, "The three ages of Love," produced the customary sensation, and was enthusiastically redemanded. Between the parts of the entertainment, Mad. Penna performed Beethoven's Sonata Pathétique, and the attention with which it was listened to proves the advancing taste of the public for works of this class.

BRESLAU.—Herr Ernest Formes is engaged at the Opera.

HAMBURGH.—Herr Neswadba enters on the office of conductor at the Stadt-theater on the 15th August.

STUTTGARDT.—During the present season, there have been seventy-eight performances of opera and ballet at the opera-house. The number of operas and ballets was forty-eight. Six of these were revivals, and three were new. There were forty-seven performances of operas by German, ten of operas by French, and ten of operas by Italian composers.

DIVORCE COURT.

KNAPP v. KNAPP AND HORNBLOW.

VERDICT, with decree nisi, for the petitioner, a dairyman, of Broad Blunsden, Wilts. It appeared, in evidence, that "the neighbours expressed their opinion of the conduct of Mrs. Knapp by what is called 'rough music,' making a noise, outside the house, with marrowbones and cleavers."—Times, June 14th, 1861.

"Come, lovers of music, and feel, with me,
For this ill-starred feminine yokel,
Who may have an ear for harmony,
Whether instrumental or vocal.

"Ah, ye, by street organists awfully tried,
Can fancy, whatever your station,
'Rough music' without, and a Hornblow inside,
A distracting combination!"

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

THE third concert by the pupils this year was rendered interesting by being made the occasion of presenting prize medals to the students who evinced the greatest progress at the Midsummer examination. This custom of awarding prizes constituted a prominent feature in the discipline of the Academy during the first ten years of its existence; and was to be commended in so far as it encouraged the diligence of the students and distinguished those who merited to be singled from among their fellows. But all good customs may be abused, and so may have been this one, from the too great indulgence exercised by the good-natured judges, which may have induced a too general and too profuse distribution of the prizes. We rejoice, however, at its revival, fully believing that, if carried out with discretion, it must have beneficial results.

The programme comprised two compositions of Academy students—an overture by F. Westlake, and a concerted vocal piece by G. Thomas; and one of a former disciple of the institution—an ode by Mr. W: C. Hay, of Shrewsbury. Mr. Westlake's overture was less happy in its themes than in the clearness of its construction and instrumentation. It is a clever and interesting work, and promises still better things for the future. Mr. Thomas's piece was the introduction to the opera of Fair Rosamond. It was more tuneful than the preceding, but more trite, and less well written. It must, however, be mentioned as a creditable production. The ode scarcely reached the standard of music to be selected for academic concerts, but it was not wanting in merit. The instrumental soloists were Miss Bayly, who gave an animated performance of Weber's Concertstück, and Miss Jenkins, who played the pianoforte part in Hummel's Military Septet in a finished manner. Most prominent among the vocalists was Miss Henderson, whose singing of Beethoven's "Ah, perfido!" was superior to what we have a right to expect from a student, and greatly strengthened the expectations previously formed of this young lady's talent. Next deserving of mention, and in the following order, were Miss Westbroke, Miss Bromley, Miss Armytage, Miss Robinson, Miss Flewitt, Miss Spence, Mr. Wallace Wells, Mr. Rudkin, and Mr. Wheeler. We must commend the execution of a part-song of R. Kreutzer, for female voices, by all the ladies of the institution. This is a class of performance in which the Academy students should especially excel; and while we allow all due credit on the present occasion, we look for a still greater approach to perfection in vocal part music from a choir in which every voice is cultivated, and every singer has some general knowledge of the art.

The prizes were distributed at the close of the concert by Sir George Clerk, the venerable chairman of the committee of management, who has been officially concerned in the Academy ever since its foundation. He was not very felicitous, either in the matter or the manner, of a somewhat lengthy speech with which he preluded the duty he had to fulfil. Its chief purport was to announce that the medals were awarded, less for brilliant display of talent in any one branch of study, than for diligence and assiduity in all the departments in which each student had been engaged during the past twelvemonth.

The speaker lost the desirable opportunity, however, which the occasion afforded, of representing to the public the great and beneficial influence the Academy has had upon the immense progress the art it inculcates has made in England since the institution was established, and how it is thus to be regarded as of true national importance; representing how at this moment nearly all the most responsible and conspicuous positions in the musical profession are filled by former pupils of the Academy; how the principal of the Academy itself is an academician; how the Cambridge musical professor is an academician; how the conductor of the Philharmonic is an academician; how the conductor of the Bach Society and its founder is an academician; how the conductor of the New Philharmonic is an academician; how the chief violoncello and double bass, and violin, and horn, and trumpet, at the Italian Opera, the Sacred Harmonic, and the provincial festivals, have all been educated in the Academy; how the chief violin, and violin and violoncello of the Philharmonic owe the development of their talent to the same school; how the principal contralto of the day was wholly reared in the Academy; how the manager of the English Opera, the long-established tenor singer, was taught within the same walls; how the composer of the most successful opera of the season was nurtured in the same soil; how the most popular writer of pianoforte music in England is a musician of Academy growth; how in this department of composition the successful members of the Academy are too manifold for mention, and those who have obtained European distinction are among the best acknowledged representatives of the creative branch of the art now living; how (besides these honoured names of Professor Bennett, Dr. Wylde, Messrs. Lucas, Howell, Doyle, C. Harper, T. Harper, H. Blagrove, R. Blagrove, Pettit, Harrison, Macfarren, Mudie, Brinley Richards, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, &c.) there stand at present prominently before the public, as singers, Miss Banks, Miss Palmer, Mad. Baxter, and Miss Freeman (the favourite contralto of the East Riding); as pianists, Messrs. Holmes, Walter Macfarren, Cusins, J. F. Barnett, H. Thomas and Miss Kate Loder (no—she has retired with her well won laurels); as violinists, Messrs. E. W. Thomas of Liverpool, Seymour of Manchester, Watson of London, and many others; as harpists, Mr. J. Thomas, better esteemed on the continent than here, and in all classes of the profession many more excellent musicians than we as journalists can be expected to call to mind, but whom the revered chairman of the institution must, in his parental capacity, well remember; he lost the opportunity, too, of representing that as teachers, Messrs. Dorrell, Jewson, C. and R. Barnett of London, and Isaac and Jones of Liverpool, might be accidentally cited from among countless others, in testimony of the undeniable benefit the Academy has conferred on the country, by improving the general state of musical instruction, and carrying a pure and intelligent system of education in this branch of art into every class of the community. Here has been a remarkably long sentence, for the length whereof we would apologise to our readers, but that as the experienced chairman of the institution did not avail himself of the opportunity in his public address of representing its several heads to the audience of the concert, and through them to the world at large, we may conclude he deemed it unimportant to the interest of the establishment that these facts should be promulgated, and it would therefore be disrespectful to Sir George Clerk to extend their enumeration beyond one single sentence. We are of opinion, nevertheless, that now, when the town is rife with misrepresentations respecting—or rather, disrespecting—the chartered musical seminary of the United Kingdom and its doings, it was a serious loss to have cast away the fitting opportunity of placing the true pretensions of the Academy before the consideration of the public; and to have done so we are of opinion would have been infinitely more to the purpose which the respected chairman had in view than some words of eleemosynary appeal he indiscreetly let fall, the bad taste of which was even surpassed by the bad policy. The speaker lost, moreover, the still more important opportunity—which is perhaps as much more to be regretted—of holding up to the students of the Academy, and particularly to the recipients of the prizes, the names of their predecessors in the institution whose artistic exertions have made these names famous—of holding up such names as examples for ceaseless emulation. The Academy which has produced the musicians we have hastily mentioned has a character to support, and it is the duty of the present and future students to be the supporters of this character; they are as scions of an illustrious ancestry, the honour of whose forefathers descends upon them, and this it behoves them to transmit to their successors bright and unsullied as it reaches them, nay, enhanced by the new lustre their individual acts may shed upon it.

The prizes were allotted to Miss Cecilia Westbroke, Miss Mary Anne Walsh, to Mr. Samuel Weekes (an Academy student of the second generation, his father, an esteemed musician at Plymouth, having been educated in the institution), and Mr. Antony Williams (son of the long-established clarionet player). Each one of these was loudly cheered by the other students and by the audience as they successively came down from their places in the orchestra to receive their medals, and we doubt not that their example, even more than the general éclat of the occasion, will prove a powerful incentive to the exertions to their fellow-pupils.

The concert was given on Saturday last at the Hanover Square Rooms, which were less crowded than might have been expected on the occasion of so interesting an event.

GREAT ORGAN IN THE CATHEDRAL AT HALBERSTADT.

THE following is the distribution of the various component parts of the instrument as it now stands:—

A. GREAT ORGAN.

1. Principal 16-foot, of pure English pewter, from C to G, of wood, inside the organ.
2. Octave, metal, 8 feet.
3. Octave, metal, 4 feet.
4. Octave, metal, 2 feet.
5. Quint, ⅔ feet.
6. Bourdon, metal, beginning with C.
7. Mixture, sixfold, pewter, 2 feet.
8. Sharp, 4 ranks, 2 feet, pewter.
9. Cornet, 4 ranks, pewter.
10. Goathorn-sloped, metal, 8 feet.
11. Stopped diapason, 8 feet.
12. Nasard, 5⅓ feet.
13. Stopped diapason, 4 feet.
14. Trumpet, 16 feet.
15. Trumpet, 8 feet, the pewter is of 9 pennyweights.

B. SECOND MANUAL.

1. Principal, of English pewter, 8 feet.
2. Octave, metal, 4 feet.
3. Octave, metal, 2 feet.
4. Quint, metal, 2⅔ feet.
5. Mixture, 5 ranks, pewter, 2 feet.
6. Cymbal, 3 ranks, 1 foot.
7. Hollow flute, oak, 8 feet.
8. Viol da Gamba, pewter, 8 feet.
9. Flute, oak, 4 feet.
10. Stopped diapason, metal, 8 feet.
11. Quint, 10-foot metal, from C to A, wood.
12. Great stopped diapason, metal, 16 feet.
13. Hautboy, 8 feet.

C. THIRD (LOWER) MANUAL.

1. Principal, pewter, 8 feet.
2. Octave, metal, 4 feet.
3. Octave, pewter, 2 feet.
4. Mixture, 4 ranks.
5. Cornet, 3 rows.
6. Dulciana, 8 feet.
7. Taper flute, metal, 4 feet.
8. Nasard, 2⅔ feet.
9. Stopped diapason, wood, 8 feet.
10. Bourdon, oak, 16 feet.
11. Vox Angelica, 8 feet.

D. FOURTH (UPPER) MANUAL.

1. Principal, metal, 4 feet.
2. Terpodion, pewter, 8 feet.
3. Harmonica, common Barliston 8 feet.
4. Flauto [illegible], wood, bored, 8 feet.
5. Flauto traverso, wood, bored, 4 feet.
6. Pretty-stopped diapason, wood, 16 feet.
7. Pretty-stopped diapason, wood, 8 feet.
8. Physharmonica, 8 feet.

E. PEDAL.

1. Principal, English pewter, 16 feet.
2. Octave, wood, 8 feet.
3. Octave, metal, 4 feet.
4. Mixture, 4 ranks, pewter, 4 feet.
5. Cornet, 5 ranks, pewter.
6. Violin, wood, 16 feet.
7. Violoncello, 8 feet.
8. Subbass, 16 feet.
9. Subbass (both of wood, the one open, the other stopped), 16 feet.
10. Nasard, metal, 5⅓ feet.
11. Great tierce, 6⅖ feet.
12. Stopped diapason, wood, 8 feet.
13. Great Nasard, oak, 10⅔ feet.
14. Double-stopped bass, wood, 32 feet.
15. Trumpet, 4 feet.
16. Trumpet, 8 feet.
17. Trombone, 16 feet.
18. Contra-trombone, 32 feet.

F. ACCESSORY STOPS, ETC.

1. Coupler to the lower keyboard.
2. Coupler to the upper keyboard.
3. Coupler to the pedal.
4. Valves for the great organ.
5. Valves for the second manual.
6. Valves for the third manual.
7. Valves for the fourth manual.
8. Valves for the great pedal wind-chest.
9. Valves to the small pedal wind-chest.
10. Carillon of the manual.
11. Cymbal.
12. Evacuant.

In all 80 stops. There are 10 pairs of bellows; 4 for the manual, 4 for the pedal, and 2 for the pneumatic machine. The crescendo and decrescendo are easily effected, by pressing down a piece of iron—like the pedals in pianos—placed above the pedal keyboard. Those admirers and judges of organs who may visit this place, and desire to convince themselves of the grandeur of the instrument, as well as of the faithfulness of my description, can apply to Herr Ferd. Baake, who will cheerfully show the magnificent instrument to all strangers, whether professional or amateurs.

MADAME SAINTON-DOLBY'S NEW SONG,
"THE DAYS THAT ARE NO MORE."
(Poetry by TENNYSON.)
Composed expressly for Madame Sainton-Dolby by JACQUES BLUMENTHAL.
"Who does not know the Poet Laureate's exquisite lines, beginning:
'Tears, idle tears, I know not what they mean;
Tears from the depth of some divine despair
Rise in the heart, and gather to the eyes,' &c.
That M. Blumenthal, though a Dutchman, loves the poetry of Tennyson, may be gathered from the true sympathetic manner in which he has set his beautiful verses to music. The popularity of this little song is already attested."—Musical World.

NEW SONG. By CLEMENT WHITE.
"THE WOODLAND FLOWER,"
The Musical World says:—"Mr. Clement White possesses the enviable gift of tune. There is no denying it. He has proved it in half a hundred songs and more, and as successfully as on any previous occasion (unless we may except his charming cantonet, 'Hail, gentle flower'), in the engaging little song before us. The words, being not so well known as those of the Laureate, will bear quoting:—
'She's like the fair flower in the woodland that blows,
More fair than the lilly, more sweet than the rose;
And vainly the pride of the garden may vie
With the smile on her cheek and the light in her eye,
Oh, Fortune! to me such a joy wouldst thou give,
I'd wear that wild flower in my heart while I live.'"
Duncan Davison and Co., 244 Regent Street, W.

Antwerp.—There is to be a brilliant musical festival in this city on the 19th of August. The first part of the programme will comprise Beethoven's Sinfonia Eroica and Mendelssohn's Walpurgisnacht. Native art is to be represented by a Christmas song for eight voices by Orlando Lassus. There are to be solos as well, and the whole is to wind up with Handel's magnificent "Hallelujah." At present the chorus consists of 100 female and 200 male members, besides 60 children. The orchestra numbers 450 performers. Mlle. Artôt will sing two solos in the Walpurgisnacht, and Herr Joachim will play Beethoven's Violin-concerto.

Munich.—Glück's Orfeo is in active rehearsal, and is to be produced almost immediately.

"La Circassienne"—opera, by D. F. E. AUBER—(Addison, Hollier and Lucas).

(Concluded.)

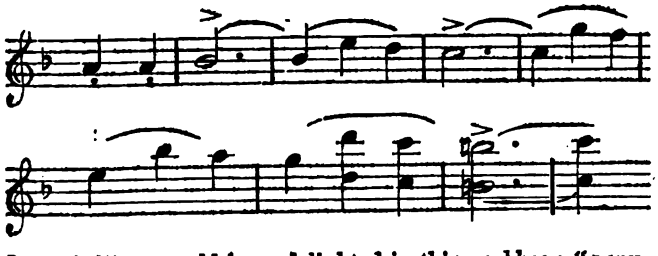
The themes which, in part or in whole, were quoted from the first book of Favourite Airs ("arranged," after his manner, by Mr. W. H. CALLCOTT) in our last number, afford a tolerably good idea of the melodic invention by which this last opera of Auber is distinguished. The second book opens with an air ("Je tremble et je veux") which now and then reminds us of the opening chorus of Gustave, besides being in the same key (G major). It is extremely graceful throughout. The next piece—a duet ("Si l'amour fut coupable"), is of a more ordinary character. The third—a prayer ("Pour eux aux cieux")—seems beautiful, in spite of one very queer progression:—

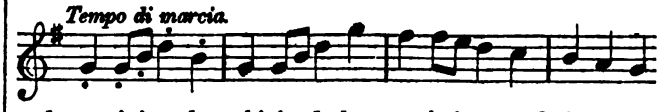
The fourth number—an air ("Reviens mon bien suprême")—beginning thus (we cite only the melody)—

is pretty, sparkling, effective, and thoroughly Auberish (the last in itself a recommendation). Then comes an air with chorus ("Pauvres nouvelles"), embodying a captivating waltz-theme, from which we borrow the second melodic section:—



Poor Jullien would have delighted in this, and have "popularised" it in his hearty and incomparable way. He might, indeed, have written it, for it is quite in the manner of his own best waltzes. An air ("Isabelle la cruelle"), which follows this, is cheerful and brilliant; but the piece that comes after it—a chorus ("L'esclave fidèle"), commencing thus:—

is doubly welcome, as another bit of genuine "Auber." The last piece—a duet with chorus, opening thus:—



and containing the subjoined characteristic second theme:—

is vigorous and spirited from end to end.

So much for the two books of Favourite Airs—by the standard of which of course our readers, lacking implicit faith in the "arranger," will not judge Auber's new work, but merely accept them for what they are worth, as easy and convenient adaptations for the school and drawing-room.

Besides the above, we have still more of the Circassienne to dispose of. This may be done briefly. M. ASCHER contributes a brilliant, showy "Fantaisie-caprice," addressed to virtuosi proper, into which some of the most sterling melodies (the waltz, as a matter of course, included) are ingeniously and effectively woven. This is decidedly one of its composer's most successful concert-pieces. J. STRAUSS (whoever that gentleman may be) has "dished up" a set of "Quadrilles" from the liveliest tunes to be singled out, which, if we are not greatly mistaken, is destined to be frequently heard in our fashionable (and non-fashionable) drawing-rooms, as accompaniment to that healthy and stimulating practice of Terpsichore's art to which our young ladies (and our young gentlemen) from high to low are so immoderately inclined. The same felicitously named contributor has done further service in the same cause by a "Valse brillante," based upon the air, "A nous les delices des cieux," with the waltz-theme alluded to in the present number as "trio;" while M. PAUL HENRION has followed his example in a "Polka brillante," &c., in which more than one of the best melodies enacts a bustling and lively part. Lastly (we suppose only for the present), M. LE CHARPENTIER treats us to a "Petite fantaisie," in which three of the "motivi" successively appear in a sufficiently alluring guise. And this "Petite Fantaisie" is numbered "Op. 238!" Shade of Czerny!—why dost thou not return, and out of the ghost-music in The Corsican Brothers fashion thine Op. 1115?"

"Sweet Summer"—duet for soprano and contralto—words and music by JAMES LEA SUMMERS—(Addison Hollier, and Lucas).

A short time since, if memory serves us, we spoke very favourably of some pianoforte pieces by Mr. Summers. The duet before us may be praised even more unreservedly. Not only is the melody sweet and flowing, the "voicing" good, and the accompaniment both correct and elegant; it has, in addition to these desirable qualifications, a strong poetical feeling—which is fully borne out, on the other hand, by the unaffectedly earnest lines to which the music is set.

"Cecilia Polka"—by J. STEELE (Smith and Whinkup).

We have an idea that this polka has already been reviewed. Nevertheless we are not sorry, if that be the case, to repeat

Digitized by Google

(what we must have said at first) that it is a very excellent polka. Why, by the way, does Mr. Steele omit—at the repetition (page 5)—what is really the best passage in the whole, viz., the passage with the florid bass, which so effectively varies the second theme (page 2)?

"Pilgrim's Chorus from 'Tännhauser'"—as a duet for the pianoforte—by THEODORE MAUS—(Ashdown and Parry).

We doubt if Herr Richard Wagner—who abominates "hammer-music" (pianoforte music)—would be greatly pleased with the essentially key-boardish variations in arpeggios which Herr Maus (pronounce Mouse) has allotted to the right-hand performer, as accompaniment to the severer and simpler strain of the Musician of the Zukunft. We, for our own part, see no harm in it.

"This is the Birthday of my Love"—part-song for four voices—by ARTHUR HENRY BROWN, organist of Brentwood, Essex (J. H. Jewell).

The words to this really new, and for the most part thoroughly well-written part-song, are so healthy that we mutt quote them:—

"This is the birth-day of my love,
Then banish care and sorrow;
To-day shall mirth and pleasure reign,
Though grief should come to-morrow.

"My Love draws near with airy tread,
And glances shy and sweet:
Sing, little birds, above her head;
Bloom, flowers, beneath her feet.

"The happy earth is once a year
Dreat out in Spring's array;
But when my lady walks abroad,
With me 'tis ever May.
"This is the birthday," &c.

The name of the poet is Sir J. Bland Burgess; the date of the poem, A.D. 1780. We wish there were more of such simple, unstudied verse, for our part-song composers in A.D. 1861.

"Our Sister May"—Ballad—Words by G. MONTAGUE DAVIS, Esq., B.A.—Music by W. H. EAYRES (Robert W. Ollivier).

Though the melody is somewhat hacknied in character this song is by no means wanting in true expression. The words, too, are excellent of their kind. Here we have an example of a ballad containing nothing new either from poet or musician, and yet nothing to blame, because nothing that is not graceful and well written.

"The Star of Home"—Ballad—Words by CHARLES SWAIN—Music by B. HOME (Home and Addison, Manchester; Home and Son, Liverpool; Addison, Hollier and Lucas, London).

Mutato nomine, and what is said of the joint productions of Messrs. Montague Davis and Eayres will exactly apply to the joint production of Messrs. Swain and Home.

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent).

MADAME VIARDOT has been playing Fides in Le Prophète, with M. Gueymard; and her receptions have been in the highest degree warm. Some critics complain, however, that her voice is much the worse for wear, and that her efforts to give it the semblance of undiminished amplitude and power betray her into exaggeration and that sort of fruitless exertion which is popularly known as "great cry and little wool." There has been an artistic "splicing match" at the Grand Opera. The distinguished danseuse, Mlle. Zina Richards, has performed the most important step of her career—a lifelong pas de deux—with a M. Merante, member of the same establishment.

In the absence of Parisian news I will give you a few scraps of foreign fact and humour. Of course you have your eyes on the approaching music-feast in that charming little nest of mediævalism, the ancient city of Nuremberg. The fine old primitive race who inhabit the town and its environs have opened their hospitable many-gabled houses to the singers about to flock thither, and to whom they offer, with the generosity of a bygone time, free commons and quarters, and free carriage to boot, to the Tonhalle (not townhall), an immense music-hall extemporised for the occasion, and capable of containing 15,000 persons. The timber carcase alone has cost the Nurembergers 17,000 florins, and the total amount spent hitherto on the festival is reckoned at 47,000 florins. The committee had sent a polite invitation to the King of Bavaria to be present on this grand occasion; but that sovereign sent back an equally polite refusal, or rather excuse, pretending that the care of his health summoned him elsewhere, namely to the baths of Scheveninjen. What a plague ails the potentates of Europe, that they are all so anxious about their healths! Are they freshening themselves up against some approaching tustle? Is the battle of Armageddon at hand? Is it—Cumming? But to return to Nuremberg. It was announced in several journals that M. Franz Lachner would have the chief directorship of the festival. But now this is contradicted, and it is said there will be no chief director, but that every composer will direct the execution of his own work.—At Breslau there is an Academy of Music which, having reached the other day its hundredth year, celebrated the event in a very proper manner by performing Israel in Egypt, with which people there are not quite so familiar as we are. The impression this great work produced was all the more profound. On the same occasion Mendelssohn's 114th Psalm was executed.—Apropos of Germans and their music, their popular poet, Müller von der Werra, has just founded an organ (i. e. journal) to represent the interests of the Lieder-tafeln (vocal associations), after the example of the French Orphéon.

There is to be a festival, as you doubtless know, at Antwerp, on the 19th of the current month. Already more than a hundred ladies and two hundred gentlemen have signified their willingness to assist in the chorus; and sixty church choristers (boys) will be joined to them; so that, with the orchestra, the number of performers will reach 450. The violinist, Joachim, will take part in the performances, as also will the vocalist Mlle. Artot.

Since the above was written for the art world of Paris, the Conservatoire Imperial de Musique et de Declamation has been awarding its prizes to the successful competitors in a series of grand ordeals which by annual custom the pupils trained under its auspices undergo. What concerns you chiefly being any artists of promise whom this great educational establishment may have given to the world of music, I will commence with that branch. In singing, therefore, I will state at once that the first prize had among the men two claimants, M. Caron, a pupil of M. Laget, and M. Morère, a pupil of M. Révial; and among the women one only was found worthy of it, namely, Mlle. Marie Ciso, a pupil of M. Révial. The lady named last, to whom also was awarded the prize for Opéra Comique—the trial piece having been La Part du Diable—made a very strong impression on the judges. She is, in the first place, pretty, and elegant in her appearance and deportment. As to her vocal qualifications they are accuracy of intonation, gracefulness of expression, and careful finish in every detail. Her voice, however, trembles in the execution of passages, as though from fatigue, and knowing critics say that the "pose" of her voice is not all that might be desired. She is a good actress, and shows great taste in her dress, which goes a long way towards prepossessing an audience. But Mlle. Ciso can hardly be regarded in the light of a mere pupil, being already an artist of some experience. She is, no doubt, destined to take a prominent rank in her profession. Of the two male prize men I have named, the first, M. Caron, is a barytone verging on the tenor. He is well versed in the resources of his art, and sings with animation. His face is good, too, as regards expression. M. Morère is a tenor with a pleasant quality of voice, what you may call a pretty voice, sings with taste, and exhibits undoubted marks of talent. Another lady was deemed deserving of the first prize for opéra comique, besides the one I have mentioned — Mlle. Balbi. She appeared in a fragment of Le Caïd. Her personal appearance is engaging, and her manner graceful — both in the highest degree, which, no less than a sweet voice ("soft and low"), are excellent things in woman. The latter excellence specially distinguished by the poet Mlle. Balbi hath; and, moreover, she sings true, with unexceptionable judgment, and her notes are of a pearly quality. As an actress she is also fully up to the mark. The second prize for women in this department had three claimants, Mlle. Reboux, who, in the part of Gertrude in the Maître de Chapelle, sang and played delightfully; Mlle. Rolin, who showed herself in Les Porcherons a graceful and expressive singer, if not much of an actress; and though last, most emphatically not least, Mlle. Simon, who played in the Etoile du Nord, and perfectly astonished her audience by her self-possession. She has good qualities, but betrays too much effort. The first man's prize for opéra comique was won in a canter by M. Capoul, the same who I have told you was engaged to appear at the Salle Favart. He approved himself a charming actor, and has a tenor voice of clear and resonant quality, and with that power of touching the feelings which the French mean when they talk of an organe sympathique. Evidently a fine career is open to this gentleman. The second prize man was M. Gerézer, a barytone of agreeable quality, very intelligent, with good expression, but with a good deal of hard work before him if he wishes to make the most of his abilities. So much for what was chiefly interesting in the vocal competition. Come we to the instrumental contest, merely the main results of which will suffice. The first man's prize for pianoforte playing was taken by M. Bernard, a pupil of M. Laurent, and G. M. Lavignac, instructed by M. Marmontel; the second man's prize was awarded to M. Emmanuel, another pupil of the master just named. Mlles. Lechesne and Blanc, pupils of M. Lecouppey, and Mlle. Peschel, pupil of M. Henri Herz, received the first woman's prize, and Mlles. Bessaignet, pupil of Mad. Farranc, and Deshoys, pupil of Mad. Coche, the second. Violoncello: first prize—Rabaud, pupil of M. Franchomme; second—Loys, pupil of ditto. Violin: first prize—Willaume, pupil of M. Massart, Mlle. Castellan, pupil of M. Alard, and Jacob, pupil of M. Massart; second prize—Lelong, pupil of M. Sauzay.

I shall not trouble you with any of the particulars of the competitions for declamation. All the candidates were lamentably mediocre, and there is no promise this year in the land of any future celebrity of the dramatic sort; or, if there be, the Conservatoire has not had the rearing of the germ. A son of the celebrated Beauvallet obtained an honourable mention. He is good-looking and lively, but as yet has no pretension to be considered in the light of an actor. The ladies were the best, but it is a superiority worth little enough.

MUSIC AT BERLIN.

(From our own Correspondent.)

This week I write to tell you that I have almost nothing to say. There is no subject of importance to engross the musical mind, and my letter will be a thing of shreds and patches — a collection of inconsiderate trifles. The only thing to recommend it will be its shortness.

At this period, critics and correspondents are driven to their wit's ends. Some of them have not far to go, it is true; but still the fact is not a pleasant one, particularly if — Oh, that I should mention such a mercenary consideration! — they are paid by the article, and not regularly engaged. They have really nothing on which to employ their pens. The Muses are now enjoying their annual siesta, and, with the "dead season," the demon of ennui glides through the streets and permeates every place of resort. People pack up their traps, and rush off to some watering-place, or pitch their tent in some country spot as far as possible from Berlin, which appears to be an enviable place of residence in the winter months alone. Even to the visitor, Berlin, despite its many attractions, does not at present appear in a very favourable light. The theatres royal are closed, and if a stranger would visit any of the localities worth seeing in the environs, he can do so only by running the chance of being choked, suffocated, and blinded by whirlwinds of dust and sand, which would not disgrace the Great Desert itself.

Among the places of amusement still open, I may mention the Friedrich-Wilhelmstädtisches Theater, at which M. Offenbach's operas are being performed. Then, too, there is Kroll's Theatre, where the "star" in the ascendant for the moment is a certain Herr Wack, who possesses a tolerable baritone, and has been favourably received in Auber's Zampa. Another of Auber's operas, Le Serment, has been revived at the above establishment. It was first introduced to a Berlin audience, years ago, at the old Königstädtisches Theater, but has never been performed since. The mode in which it was given the other evening was very far from perfect.— Herr Gustav Bock, the well-known musical publisher, lately had the Knight's Cross of the Order of Wasa bestowed upon him by the King of Sweden, and his Majesty of Prussia has just granted him the permission to wear it.—While visiting, a short time ago, the cemetery in which Ludwig Rellstab is buried, I saw the monument erected over his grave. It is six feet high, with a granite tablet, on which is the admirable medallion of the deceased, by Hagen, while beneath it is the inscription:—"Lud. Heinrich Rellstab, born the 13th April 1799, died the 28th November 1860."— According to report, the Royal Opera-house will re-open on the 2nd August with Carl M. Weber's Oberon. It strikes me, however, from what I have heard from several persons, generally well-informed on such matters, that report is incorrect. —I have now fairly exhausted my budget of news. It is the time of year, and not your Correspondent, who is to blame for the dearth of intelligence. Till next week—or perhaps till a yet more remote period—

Vale.

A LETTER ABOUT CHOPIN.*

My Dear Sir,—I have read with lively interest the letters which M. Barbedette has devoted to Chopin and his works. The striking points in the man and the musician are faithfully reproduced. M. Barbedette admires Chopin, and, what is more, loves him. Being imbued with two such sentiments, he might be expected to perform his task well, and he has done so. His articles are sure to be appreciated by the professors of the piano and the students who habitually read the Ménéstrel, in which they find some admirable instruction. It was no easy matter to analyse the music of Chopin, for every one of his works is a complex production in the composite style; the plan and outline being far from apparent. I do not mean by this to say that Chopin's works are deficient in inspiration, that his style is strained and laboured, or that his nature was not true and impulsive; but that same nature of his contained so many elements! A sentiment of elegance and delicate refinement amounting to coquetry; ingenuous frankness, full of abandon; capricious fits of gaiety and folly; accents of profound grief; an elevated and believing soul; a weakly and voluptuous temperament; a sickly sensibility; a fine and exquisite mind, are all mixed up and confounded in Chopin, forming a unity at once admirable and eccentric. This is a fact which M. Barbedette has clearly perceived, and he has introduced into his analysis a number of reflections very remarkable for their justice.

As you perceive, my dear Editor, I do not take up my pen for the purpose of criticising a criticism. Such a course would be all the less becoming in me, as I myself am a critic, and it would be easy to inflict upon me just retaliation. I wish, with your permission and that of M. Barbedette, merely to point out an omission in the latter's articles; though, after all, it is not an omission, since the fact I desire to submit to your notice is mentioned,—only sufficient stress is not laid upon it. M. Barbedette, when referring to Chopin, has spoken at great length of the love of one's native country. This noble sentiment has inspired him to write two noble and touching pages, which must still be in the minds of all your readers. Let us examine how far this sentiment affected Chopin. "He did not study," says M. Barbedette "to be a national musician. Like all true national poets, he sang, without fixed design and without preconcerted plan, whatever his inspiration dictated most spontaneously; and thus it is that in his songs there springs up, without care and without effort, the most idealised form of national genius." A few lines further on, M. Barbedette adds: "After having become a Parisian, Chopin did not cease to keep up his relations with his native land, though absent from it. We follow the trace of this in the numerous melodies which circulate under his name in Poland,—melodies which he adapted to certain patriotic songs of his country, and which he sent there as pledges that he still recollected it."

I stop at this last sentence. The portion which I have underlined expresses an undoubted fact; as to the other, I have, I confess, some trouble in comprehending the meaning which Mr. Barbedette attaches to it.

For my part, I know (and I will proceed to tell you how I know it) that Chopin composed a number of songs, and not melodies adapted to patriotic songs, but original songs, which have become popular in Poland; it is a singular thing, too, that his country which sings them is ignorant that he was the author, or, at least, was ignorant of it before his death. I know that, during the latter years of his life, Chopin fondly entertained the idea of collecting and publishing his songs, as well as a collection of national airs. This I can certify. Alas! his plan, like so many plans formed by men, men of genius as well as simple mortals, here below, was never realised.

M. Barbedette is well acquainted with his Chopin; he is deeply versed in most of what he said and did; let him allow me to instruct him fully concerning the circumstance I have mentioned above. I was an old acquaintance of Chopin, when he took up his residence, for a lengthened period, in the Square d'Orléans, where I have lived during twenty years. We met very frequently, and not without interchanging kindly words, as well as, sometimes, criticisms and opinions on art and artists. Chopin was too much a man of the world, and possessed too much good taste to offend the feelings of persons who had musical sympathies different from his own. He first of all established the points of contact, and then, with infinite cleverness, seasoned with a slight dash of epigram, maintained a system of reservation on the disputed points. Frequently, when you thought you had him at your mercy, he escaped from you; he glided from your grasp, with incomparable address — nay, I will even say, grace. He was like his own music. It was necessary to know him intimately before you could appreciate him, just as, in order to appreciate all the worth of his music, you had to make it a subject of profound study. It was no easy thing to approach the man, any more than his music. There was something of the sensitive plant in one and in the other. I speak according to my own impressions.

One evening, Chopin and myself met in the foyer of the Italian Opera. This was somewhere in 1847 or 1848. He told me there was an empty stall in the orchestra next to his own, and advised me to take it. I did so. Il Matrimonio was being performed. I do not know why I had fancied Chopin could not like such music, because, in the first place, it was Italian, and then because it was so easy, so simple, so flowing in style, so limpid, and so natural, that it struck me as diametrically opposed to his. He, on his part, imagined that it could not please me. Judge, my dear Editor, what must have been the surprise of both of us when we discovered that we were both enthusiastically fond of it! Our mutual suspicion greatly amused us.

"Ah! what a master-piece," said Chopin. "What an adorable composer is this Cimarosa! How he imparts a value to the slightest trifles, to the simplest modulations! What grace! What fertility! What riches! Did you remark the minor phrase in the finale of the first act? It is the only one in the entire act. How full of charm is that phrase in A minor!"

"How pleased I am to hear you speak thus," I observed. "I thought—"

"And what great delight I experienced," he replied, "at finding you feel and admire such a work."

After the performance, we proceeded towards our respective dwellings in the Rue St. Lazare. We walked slowly; he leaned upon my arm, and we spoke without the least restraint. The ice between us was broken. He communicated to me his most inward thoughts concerning the old masters, and certain composers of the day as well.

"How right you are," he remarked, "to undertake the defence of so-and-so! but—"

There was a "but;" if it was a criticism, it implied, also, an eulogium.

"Chopin," I said to him, "will you allow me to express a desire, although it may, perhaps, be very indiscreet?"

"What is it?"

"Would you consent to give me your biography? We live in the same house. I would come to your apartments two or three successive mornings. I would take down from your dictation all you choose to tell me concerning your masters, your studies, your compositions, your travels—"

"My travels?" he observed, interrupting me. "I am always travelling. I am only at Paris en passant."

He then related the following anecdote in reference to his passport:—Some weeks previous to the Revolution of 1830, he was in Poland, where he had long charmed the Russians and his own countrymen by his double talent as a composer and a virtuoso. Suddenly he was seized with a desire to travel. He intended to go through Italy, but, while he was at Vienna, the news of the insurrection of several provinces in the Peninsula caused him to change his route, if not his resolution. He asked for a passport for London. The desire, however, of seeing Paris, and the still greater desire of seeing our musical celebrities there (above all, Cherubini), induced him to visit France; so he had the words "Passant par Paris" added on his passport.

"You see, he continued, "that I am here only as a bird of passage. No matter; I shall be delighted to render you acquainted with my biography, and you may be assured of one fact: several persons have made the same request, but I have always refused them."

It was settled that I should go and see him the next day but one. The moment I entered his room, he said,—

"Since you are about to become my historian, I must inform you that people do not know half the works I have composed."

He then went on to tell me of the number of songs and national airs he had written, and which his countrymen sang without being aware these compositions were his. As you may easily fancy, my dear Editor, such an announcement made a deep impression on me, and I carefully entered it among my notes.

At the period of which I am speaking, Chopin did not exactly know his age, for I find in my notes that he was born at Zelazowo-Wala, about 1810. "It is impossible for us," I wrote, "to give more exactly the date of his birth. He himself could only fix approximatively the day on which he first saw the light, by a watch sent him, in 1820, by Mad. Catalani, and on which were engraved the words, "Given by Mad. Catalani to young Frederick Chopin, aged ten years."—This, by the way, leads us to suppose that, in his boyhood, he was a little prodigy, a fact, however, of which he did not boast.—To return to Chopin's age. M. Barbedette asserts that he was born on the 1st March, 1810. M. Fétis, in the new edition of his Biographie universelle des Musiciens, fixes on the 8th March in the same year as the correct date.

However this may be, I wrote Chopin's biography from his own dictation. I kept it in my portfolio until after his decease, which took place on the 17th October 1849, M. de Lamennais, who had become the chief editor of a republican paper—La Tribune, as far as I can remember—asked me for the manuscript, that he might publish it in his journal. I gave it him. The journal, however, suddenly stopped, and I took the biography to the Opinion Publique, in which it appeared, on the 23rd November ensuing, without the author's name. I trust that M. Barbedette will excuse me if the supposition I am about to make is incorrect, but I have reason to believe that my sketch of Chopin met his eye, for independently of the somewhat vague manner in which the popular songs are mentioned, I find in the articles of Le Ménestrel certain details, especially that about the passport, of which other biographers have said nothing.

M. Barbedette has judged Chopin correctly. Chopin's nature was most rare and exquisite, but it moved in a restricted sphere. Even in the works of Weber we feel the horizon diminished around us; we experience somewhat of the oppression caused by the sight of lofty mountains, where great and dazzling effects follow deep shadows and fantastic apparitions. Except Beethoven and Rossini, despite the peculiar shades of difference in their genius, there are scarcely any composers who breathe and flourish in the full height of the sun. Chopin leads us into a region full of melancholy and mystery. But we cannot remain there long; we experience a feeling of suffocation; we gasp for air. Persons suffering from some diseases seek out shaded and solitary walks: an extensive view causes them to turn giddy.

Frankfort.—The magnets of the Italian Operatic Company at present here—writes the Theater-Bilden aus dem Frankfurter Theaterleben—are the two sisters Marchisio, who possess all the qualities requisite to enable them to shine as stars of the first magnitude. We felt convinced of this after seeing them in the Trovatore and Norma. It seems as though nature had endowed them with voices especially adapted for the modern opera of the Italians, who in nearly all their productions require two singers like the sisters Marchisio, namely, a soprano of great compass and perfectly cultivated, such as that which Mlle. Carlotta possesses, and a real mezzo-soprano, like that of Mlle. Barbara. In the Trovatore, Mlle. Carlotta sustained the part of Leonora, and Mlle. Barbara that of Azucena. The former represented Leonora exactly as the poet conceived the character. Adhering closely to its poetical features, she displayed deep feeling and noble passion, both enhanced by vigour and geniality, as well as by a happy union of the tone and the thought. The dramatic nature of the music and action was manifested in so artistic a manner, that the audience admired the genius of the artist as much when she was singing the tender bravura airs, as when she was rendering the tragic scene. Everything she did was marked by the same truth and intensity, not to speak of the vocal excellence. That such a performance, apart from its vocal power, should entrance the public, was inevitable. It was generally acknowledged that Mlle. Carlotta bore a strong resemblance to Sophia Cruvelli, one of the greatest favourites who ever visited Frankfort. The part of Azucena, in the hands of Mlle. Barbara Marchisio, was every way admirable. However great this lady may be as a singer, she struck us as being greater as an actress. Whatever romantic and tragic effects could be lavished on the character, were fully at the command of this fair singer, with her magnificent voice and her magnificent passion. Especially grand were the two pictures Azucena draws of the death she beheld her mother suffer at the blazing stake, and to which she herself is doomed. Her plastic and dramatic power was, in this instance, almost worthy of Rachel herself. Mlle. Barbara represented, too, as far as the part would allow, triumphant maternal love, with such force and feeling, that the audience fancied they had another Ristori before their eyes.

The Norma of Mlle. Carlotta Marchisio was, if possible, more significant, or rather more artistic, than her Leonora. There is something overpowering in the picture of Norma, as pourtrayed by this lady, and its component parts, mighty passion, glowing revenge, and fond, warm love, stand out prominently, while the singing is always suited to the emotion which has to be expressed. In addition to this, the touching voice of the singer, uniting in itself every charm, her uncommon power of moderating its strength, her splendid execution, and the intensity of her portamento, were all so harmoniously combined, that the audience stood entranced. In the first and third acts, especially in the last finale, the artist was really inimitable, and also in the "Casta diva" scene, which she rendered with poetic fervour. In the great scene of the second act, on the contrary, she allowed the actress to stand forth with greater prominence than the vocalist, and here we had an opportunity of noting two qualities in which most singers are deficient, namely, harmony and symmetry. She threw an especial charm into the duet with Adalgisa. The irresistible and magic influence she still exercises upon Pollio in the hour of separation, and the power of maternal love in the scene where Norma is about to kill her children—were all worthy the highest praise. It is scarcely necessary to state that the applause was enthusiastic, and all but unprecedented. Mlle. Barbara Marchisio was an Adalgisa par excellence, rich in poetic fervour, as a priestess, worthy of Norma, and yet displaying scarcely aught but innocence, mildness, and devotion. Every one was delighted with the sweetness and natural charm of her superb voice, which, however, when the situation requires it, can rise so easily to the highest dramatic power, just as though it were mere child's play. The duets, "Mira Norma," and "Si fin all' ore," sung by the two sisters, were never given with more unity or greater perfection.

The performance of Il Barbiere di Siviglia was interesting, from the fact that the finest singer took the smallest part—Marcelina; but, thanks to her eminent talent, Mlle. Carlotta did great things with very little. Mlle. Barbara, on the other hand, displayed in the character of Rosina such wealth of vocal power, that we really envied it. Her singing of Rossini's music was a triumph of art. The grand air, "Una voce poco fa," in the first act, was in itself a charming genre picture, and the fair artist expressed in it, with brilliant tones, all the humour, with an irony that Rossini could conceive. For the lesson scene at the piano, the grand duet from Rossini's Mathilda di Shabran was selected — a sparkling composition, rendered by the sisters with a degree of artistic unity and excellence such as is possessed only by the most gifted Italian bravura singers. The two fair vocalists were here enabled to display every grace, every art in the bravura style. The whole impersonation of Rosina was admirably kept up by Mlle. Barbara, and we were at a loss whether to admire the vivacity and significance of her acting, or her grand and magnificent vocalisation. When we reflect that Mlle. Barbara is as great in serious as in comic opera, the reader may form an idea of the high position she occupies in the domain of art.

Blondin at the Crystal Palace.—M. Blondin has fairly outdone himself. His last performance took place in the central transept, where a stage had been erected, and a short rope stretched from tressels placed about eight feet from the ground. At three o'clock M. Blondin appeared, first as a galley slave heavily shackled, with his feet in baskets; next he appeared in huge wooden shoes, and then entered upon stilts (being evidently much more embarrassed in these appendages when on terra firma than when elevated on his elastic cord). In these different incumbrances he danced, leaped, threw summersaults, and bounded with the most astonishing ease and in the most graceful manner. The stilt performance was very clever, especially the descent and ascent of the steep incline of the rope—a feat both hazardous and exhausting. His exploits with a chair were, perhaps, the most pleasing of all. The ease and certainty with which he maintained himself on it in every variety of position, sometimes the chair being poised on the rope by only a single leg, elicited great applause. But as a violinist and drummer, with his musical performances he outdid everything else. He actually led the band in Guillaume Tell with his violin while turning summersaults backwards and forwards, without missing a note, and with as much apparent ease as if he had been at his place in the orchestra. Unfortunately, while playing his antics as well as his music, his bow caught in the rope, and, being unable at the moment to extricate it, he dashed his violin to the ground with a force that broke it into fragments. He then kept up a deafening roar with his drum while continuing his evolutions, and the applause might be said to positively shake the building. Without his pole he then danced a hornpipe and cut Catherine wheels backwards and forwards, without using his hands, and then, bowing to the company, ran off. In a few minutes he appeared on his platform near the roof, and at once began to travel his perilous path. He tied his pole on to the rope, and then suspended himself by one foot. Having put on his sack and blindfolded himself, he proceeded back again, and made several slips, which elicited screams from the fairer portion of his spectators. This closed the performance, which appeared to afford universal satisfaction. The upper series of fountains played for a short time, and the band of the Coldstream Guards, together with that of the company, played during the afternoon. This is said to be the only performance of Blondin on the low rope, but from the evident delight it afforded to all who witnessed it, and as the weather evidently deterred many from being present, we think a repetition of the exhibition would prove acceptable and advantageous

MUSIC AT SOUTHEND.

(From a stray Correspondent.)

My Dear World,—No doubt you will be surprised to hear from me, in this unaristocratic quartier. The fact of it is, I was beginning to get very tired of the gaieties of London, and sighed for green lanes and sea breezes. Hearing that Southend was a very retired place, famous for these desiderata, I arrived here on the 27th, and on coming down into the coffee-room on Monday morn, I perceived by a programme that a concert was to take place in the hotel I was staying at. Now, as my bedroom was quite close to the concert-room, I thought the best thing I could do was to go to the concert, particularly as some novelties were announced, and some favourites were to sing. A very charming selection of music it was, and, strange to say, all the pieces were given in the order advertised. The concert was held by Mr. P. Van Noorden, who was the factotum of the evening, for he played, he sung, and he conducted, and I must do him the justice to say he did all well—indeed, I may say very well. The novelties were Louise Stella, a very pretty girl, with a charmingly fresh mezzo soprano voice. She sung three times during the concert, with much taste, feeling, and expression. Her rendering of Benedict's "By the sad sea waves" showed that she was well taught, and she gave the quaint old English ballad, "The Bailiff's Daughter of Islington," in such an effective style that it narrowly escaped being encored. M. Frank Elmore, a young tenor, with a nice voice, was very successful in Cumming's "Love me little, love me long," and Reichardt's "Thou art so near, and yet so far," the latter being encored. Now for the favourites. The first certainly is Mrs. Alexander Newton, who sung Bellini's "Qui la voce," and a pretty song by Van Noorden (which was encored), called "On the hills." I must not omit to mention that the concert concluded with "God save the Queen," and that Mrs. A. Newton sung some novel and brilliant fioriture, which astounded the Southend folks. Miss M. Van Noorden's sympathetic contralto was heard to great advantage in various concerted pieces, and in a German song, "Von meinen bergen," which was very graceful. Mr. P. Van Noorden, in the "Little fat man" and John Parry's "Matrimony," exhibited the real vis comica, the accompaniments being also admirably played. During the concerts, Herr Jona Greebe gave two solos on the violin, displaying the most brilliant execution.

The Musical World.

LONDON: SATURDAY, AUGUST 3, 1861.

THE curious intangible germ of a project for "representing" music at the great art-congress of next year, which was shadowed out in the unsigned and non-official document to which we gave publicity last week, has now grown into enough of substance to bear handling and examination. We can now see, at least, what is intended, and —perhaps rather less plainly—on what agencies the projectors rely for success.

From perfectly official sources we derive the following particulars. On Mr. Benedict, it seems, first descended the idea that music ought to be "represented" next year in some grander and more permanently interesting fashion than as a mere adjunct to such an inaugurative ceremony as we all remember in 1851. The musical attempt then made was, beyond doubt, a disgrace to the country. Bad as it was, however, it was, perhaps, good enough for its place in that day's gala. Had it been as admirable as it was lamentably the reverse, no one would have cared, and certainly not one-tenth part of the assembled multitude could even have heard. This, thinks Mr. Benedict—and thus far thinks rightly—is not worthy treatment of such an art as music. He would have a great musical "congress of all nations," having its special objects and attractions, and altogether independent of any mere pro-sessional parades or ceremonies, whether opening or closing. To carry out this scheme he would seek the assistance of all the professional and amateur skill as embodied in all the important musical societies of the kingdom; furthermore, he would invite the attendance of the most celebrated choral and instrumental associations of France and Germany; and, in order to back these latter invitations with extra, and probably requisite, strength, he would solicit the zealous co-operation of the courts of France and Germany, in the shape of such stimulants as continental governments are supposed to apply to affairs of art. These various corps of musicians being assembled, Mr. Benedict proposes to employ them, sometimes collectively in performances of vast calibre, but chiefly separately —that is, allotting to each society so disposed a certain number of concerts. Calculating that these performances will be greatly successful in a money point of view — (and, in order to make them at once more convenient to visitors at the exhibition, and less likely to trench on existing interests, they are to take place between four and seven o'clock in the afternoon) — he winds up his project with the stipulation that all clear profits shall be paid into the hands of trustees, to be by them applied to some large and important object bearing on the progress of art, — be this the foundation of a national opera, a new academy of music, or as then seems best. This proposal Mr. Benedict communicated in extenso to some of the royal commissioners, by whom it is understood to have been "very favourably received," but who, nevertheless, did not promise it any active or material furtherance.

Meanwhile, as the idea got wind, it became evident that, for concerts of the proposed magnitude, a suitable building would be necessary; and so comes to Mr. Benedict's assistance Mr. Paraire, an architect very favourably known, it seems, as the constructor of Weston's and the Oxford Music Halls, and the Britannia Theatre at Hoxton. This gentleman having prepared the plans for a vast room capable of accommodating 10,000 auditors and an orchestra of 600 performers, a preliminary meeting was held by way of launching the scheme. At this gathering, however, nothing could be done, we believe, beyond appointing a provisional committee, and resolving that a fresh application should be made to the commissioners on the subject. Circular invitations having been previously issued to the principal musical associations of London, a second meeting was held yesterday at the Architectural Society's rooms, Conduit Street, Mr. Benedict being in the chair, supported by Mr. Paraire, the architect, as secretary and general expositor of the project. The meeting was fairly, but not fully attended, probably because either time was lacking for sufficient notice, or because musicians, as a body, are somewhat tired of grand projects to which such phrases as "the progress of art," and "the advancement of music," are continually tacked, and as continually end in no more than the words which constitute them. Though not large, however, the meeting was sufficiently important, considering the musical interests there represented, to have given all the desired impetus to the scheme, had its metal, when sounded, given back that ring of the true coinage which belongs to a real success. This, however, was not to be. Notwithstanding Mr. Benedict's very able statement of all the musical advantages that ought to, and probably, under sufficient auspices, would arise from the scheme he contemplated, and despite all the explanatory statistics of the architect, the general feeling of the assembly certainly appeared to be that of indifference, not to say disfavour,—a result much increased, no doubt, by the unpromising terms of the reply (then read) of the royal commissioners to the formal application addressed to them. Certain routine business, indeed, such as confirming previous minutes, appointing a provisional committee, &c., was transacted, but the general result permits no doubt that if this scheme for an "International Concert Room" is really to bear fruit, it must be supported from first to last on a basis greatly wider than that now contemplated.

A few words, perhaps, will suffice to point out the prominent objections to the existing plan. In the first place, it is intended to hire from the Commissioners a sufficient plot of ground contiguous to the Exhibition building; and on this is to be erected a vast temporary room, at a cost of 20,000*l*. To raise this sum it is proposed to seek "guarantees" (subscriptions they should be called) from individuals and musical associations, who are expected to receive, by way of value, tickets of admission in proportion to the amounts subscribed. Musical societies, furthermore, are to be invited to give concerts at their own risk; the pecuniary bait being the tickets available for their subscribers in virtue of the aforesaid "guarantee," and the profit extractable from the general public after paying, 1st, all their own musical expenses; 2nd, the ground-rent exacted by the commissioners; 3rd, the rent of the building; and 4th, the tax which, according to the scheme, is "for the advancement of art," to be levied on all receipts. Now, not to mention that some societies — the Philharmonic and the Musical Society of London, for example — are, perhaps, legally disqualified for such speculations, or, certainly, would not undertake them, the chances of loss, arising from vast necessary expenses, the pinchers of public amusements at the time, and the hours specified (when visitors are more likely to hunger for dinner than music), are so infinitely great, we imagine, that no other association would venture to face them. Without the certainty of such performances, then, there will be no "guarantees;" without such guarantees there will be no 20,000*l.*; and without this last, we need scarcely add, there will be no International Concert Room.

Another objection that forcibly presents itself, is the waste of energy that the whole scheme implies. Would it not be a pity to raise and expend 20,000*l.* on a concert-room which, on the most extravagant supposition, could not exist longer than the continuance of the Exhibition itself? Surely something much better than this can be done with time, talent, and money. London is the only large city in the world which does not possess a really fine Music-Hall. Considering that six months sufficed to complete the present Royal Italian Theatre from its foundations, there may yet be time, before the season of the Exhibition, to give to the metropolis a permanent concert-room worthy of its wealth and musical importance. The finest site in London can easily be procured, the opportunity is ripe and tempting, and support from all musical associations of importance is certain. Energy and capital only are needed, and just these two things it is now gravely proposed to waste on as delusive and unbusinesslike a scheme as we ever remember!

If, however, nothing else stood in the way, there yet remains that which, to our thinking, is the gravest of all objections to the scheme, so far as "the progress of art" is concerned. The whole thing has commenced at the wrong end. No matter how suggested to them, the proposition should have emanated from the Royal Commissioners. They — if the thing were fit to be done at all — should have included music in the friendly contest of the world's arts. They should have supplied the building and everything necessary to its purposes, and should have sought from the musical associations of the kingdom the advice and assistance necessary for the occasion. So commenced, the scheme would have had a national importance, and, as certainly, a national success. For the great societies of England to enter on this matter as private speculators, and as beggars to the office of the commissioners for that public recognition which will be almost certainly refused, is merely, for themselves, to accept ruinous losses, and, for the art of music, to invite one more of those snubbings from high places to which it has been already sufficiently exposed.

IN the operatic regions of Paris reigns an almost complete lull, and our becalmed correspondent whistles in vain for a breeze, the results of which, were it even a shipwreck, might give employment to his eager pen. In vain his gaze seeks the furthest verge of the horizon — not a sail, not a menacing cloud. Slowly the twilight deepens into the transparent gloom of a summer night, and all is silent, still, and dim. Of course the clocks then all, in every variety of hoarse and solemn accent, strike twelve — the witching hour of night; and he, in common with all good citizens, prepares to court the embraces of sleep. The fitness of this pretty figure is unpleasantly compromised, by the way, in the fact that Morpheus is of the male gender. Obviously there is a female divinity who bestows her blandishments on the sterner sex, and Morphine is she hight (the name is given both to the narcotic principle of opium and to the sleeping partner of mortality). But where are we?—well nigh lost in the labyrinth of thought, at the centre of which, like another Rosamond, dwells embowered the pleasant mistress with a grim brother! But see that angry flush upon the swart cheek of night. Thus flamed Cleopatra's dark visage when she smote the poor messenger from faithless Antony. What ails the starry queen? Has that shrew Aurora—not the rosy-fingered goddess, but the well-matched wife of that rude old fellow Boreas—blousy usurper of that pretty name—has she been at her old tricks again, leaving the marks of her vile temper on the tingling cheeks of the august daughter of Chaos? Ah, no! Now we see, as the ruddy flashes mount higher and higher, and the glow over her features spreads wider and brighter, it is the wild excitement of pain and horror. She has been startled by the cry of fire, and is all of a flush and tremble, thinking of the terrible night when that scoundrel Erostratus burnt her out of the temple of Diana*—heaven knows how many years ago, but she never sees a fire now but she gets quite red and flurried at the recollection. She lost a deal of property there (the Sun had not started his insurance office) — a beautiful chariot among other things, and a veil all bespangled with stars, and a wreath of splendid poppies. Hark! the shuffling and tramping of many hundred feet, the condensed sounds of many excited voices forming one hollow murmur, with occasionally a shriller cry leaping out of it, the measured banging of the fire-engines—the rhythm growing excitedly quicker and quicker, like oar-strokes in a rowing match. "Où est l'incendie?" cries voice after voice; but the question does not always imply the intention of rushing thither; for attendance at a fire in Paris is a privilege which must be paid for by hard labour. To approach the scene too early is to book oneself for a place in the chaine of living beings who pass the water-buckets from hand to hand, by which the engines are supplied from the nearest fountain. The fire-plug and hose are unknown, yet are our neighbours somehow more handy in quenching fires than we—thanks to the well-organised corps of sapeurs-pompiers. But we forget to say where the fire took place. It was at the warehouse in the Rue Richer, in which the scenery of the Imperial Opera House is stored — that is, the scenes not immediately in demand for the current pieces. The fire broke out at about half-past twelve; and we may imagine, with such inflammable materials to work its will on, how rapidly it blazed up and how difficult it was to control. It was three hours before it was got under, and three of the adjoining houses had meanwhile become involved in its fury and seriously injured. The account of the damage from this lamentable accident makes up a stern and sad reckoning. A hundred and three scenes perished, vanishing, like veritable dissolving views, into thin air.

* There was a famous statue of Nox in the temple of Diana at Ephesus.

We leave others to supply the quotation, de rigueur, about "cloud-capt towers," and proceed at the cue, "not a wrack behind," with an unpoetical report of the losses in question. There was destroyed, besides this chief annihilation of valuable art-work, 1000 mètres of new cloth or canvas, and 5000 mètres of old, together with the carriages used in conveying the scenes backwards and forwards, and the store of timber and carpenters' tools used in constructing the wooden frames. The money value of this whole loss was estimated at from 700,000fr. to 750,000fr. Add to this the value of the structure itself, now scarcely more than a huge heap of blackened embers, the cost of building which was rated at 150,000fr. Among the operas, &c. which will have to be provided with new scenery are Semiramis, Tannhäuser (?) la Sylphide, la Juive, Orfa, la Reine de Chypre, and la Magicienne. It was providential that the scenery for the stock of operas now in current use happened to be all in the Rue de Pelletier, so that the ordinary course of business will suffer no interruption. Fortunately, too, the new scenery got ready for Alceste escaped, having been only the day before transferred to the stage of the Opera to be adjusted to its fittings. A dancing room adjoining the principal building has alone been saved from destruction. Notwithstanding these deductions, however, the loss is tremendously heavy. How the fire arose is not known, and is never likely to be, for the ruin is too complete to bear any traces of its origin. Must we lay this, together with so many disasters and horrors which have tumbled upon us of late, to the account of the comet? The number of theatrical conflagrations is, however, quite peculiar, and would seem to be the work of some fanatic sect of incendiaries, resolved, under the influence of the old Puritan spirit, to cure this corroding ulcer of society by actual cautery. If there be any purifying power in fire, as the ancients held, most of our theatrical establishments must be immaculate enough by this time. Drury Lane burnt twice; Covent Garden twice; the English Opera-house once; the Olympic once; Astley's three times; the Surrey once. More examples still may be got out of London alone, and on the Continent they swarm.

MUSIC AT THE INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

Is music to be represented at the Exhibition of 1862 — and if so, by whom, and in what manner? This is a question repeatedly discussed in musical circles; and already we hear of more than one scheme in contemplation. It is proposed, I am informed, to erect a temporary building in the neighbourhood of the Exhibition — application having been made to Her Majesty's Commissioners "for the use of the vacant site at the back of the Conservatory of the Royal Horticultural Society's Gardens," and plans of the intended work submitted. To provide a building for such purposes under such exceptional conditions would, as a matter of course, entail a very considerable expenditure; and unless some zealous amateur, with means proportionate to his enthusiasm, should consent to incur the risk, it may be asked where is the money to be obtained? The projected Concert-hall is intended (I am told) to accommodate an audience of 12,000 persons, together with an orchestra of 500 singers and players — or, if necessary, more; and the outlay has been estimated at 20,000*l.*, or thereabouts. But granted the 20,000*l.*;—when that is exhausted, what have we got to show for it? Only an empty structure, the rest, including the entire arrangements for the musical performances, remaining still to be accounted for. Here lies the difficulty; for unless our vocal and instrumental artists, whose services are likely to be in unusual request at such a busy period, can be induced to accord them in this instance gratuitously, while at the same time our established societies—who will naturally use redoubled efforts to attract the multitude of strangers (preferring honour to profit)—step forward with heroic self-denial in aid of a gigantic opposition to their own immediate interests, even another 20,000*l.* will form, I imagine, but an item in the additional responsibilities that must accrue.

A Musician.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

In spite of the unpropitious weather, Mr. Manns' benefit concert attracted a large audience to the Crystal Palace. Few directors of musical entertainments deserve more unqualified praise than this gentleman. Placed in a position where many would be content to present to an ever-changing public the ad captandum dance tunes which serve to amuse the saunterers through the Palace, Mr. Manns determined to raise the standard of music, and educate the taste of his hearers. In his constant search after novelty, he has furnished a greater variety of music, of every school, than can be heard at any other concert-room in England. Though no disciples of the school of Wagner, we are quite willing to acknowledge our conductor's enterprise in bringing forward works which are not to be heard elsewhere; and if Mr. Manns has a certain sly weakness for the "Music of the Future," he never fails to recognise the masterpieces of the past. The Saturday orchestral concerts have been so admirably organised, the programmes are chosen with such discrimination, and the execution is so uniformly careful and accurate, that they have long been looked upon with peculiar interest. Seldom has so much been achieved with such scanty means—the orchestra being on a comparatively small scale, and the solo performers by no means hors ligne. It must be a genuine attraction that induces musical men to journey from London to Sydenham on a foggy afternoon of November, and yet they undertake the expedition week after week. At his benefit concert, Mr. Manns, appealing to a larger public than that to which we have referred, enlisted the services of some of the most distinguished vocalists of the day. It is to be regretted that one work of mark—Mozart's Schauspie direktor, for instance, with which Mr. Manns graced his benefit last year—was not brought out; yet the multitude of disconnected pieces of which the programme was composed evidently gave satisfaction to the audience, and it is therefore useless to complain. Mlle. Tietjens is decidedly the chief favourite at the Crystal Palace, and it is but just to add that she exerted herself to the utmost to deserve the enthusiastic applause which each of her performances excited. Mlle. Tietjens was encored both in Gounod's adaptation for voice, violin, piano, and harmonium of one of Bach's preludes, and in Arditi's "Il Bacio," but in both cases declined the honour. She was, however, compelled to repeat with Mr. Santley the never-unwelcome "Crudel perchè," and the quick movement of the duet from I Martiri, in which the conversion to Christianity received an unexpected dramatic effect from the thunderstorm which formed a sudden accompaniment to the piece. Mlle. Guerrabella was also compelled to return to the platform after her dramatic and skilful performance of "Qui la voce." Mad. Caradori, Signor Giuglini, Signor Palmieri, Mr. Santley, and Signor Delle Sedie were the other vocalists; and M. Ole Bull diverted the audience with some of his extraordinary performances. Among the most interesting features of the concert were two new and graceful songs by Mr. Manns. The first, "O moon of night!" was sung by Signor Palmieri. The second—"If I might but gaze, Zuleika"—admirably rendered by Mr. Santley, is even more deserving of praise, the melody being very elegant and appropriate to the words, and the accompaniments both original and effective.

A new clarionet player—M. Croner, from the Opera at Lisbon—merits a paragraph apart. This gentleman, who introduced an air, with variations, of his own composition, is in every respect an admirable performer. His tone is full, sweet, and musical, his execution fluent and masterly, his taste irreproachable. He played the theme with genuine expression, and the variations with an ease, aplomb, and brilliancy that left nothing to desire. His success was decided, and loud and general applause greeted him as he quitted the orchestra.

Herr Formes sang a volkslied by Pastor Gluck, accompanied by himself with fine expression and complete success. The overtures to Ruy Blas and Oberon, and the Sestel from Don Giovanni, were among the "bull" pieces.

The "Grisi Farewell" at the Crystal Palace (on Wednesday afternoon) was as successful as could have been desired. The weather was propitious, the attraction unique, the programme appropriate; the artists were one and all zealous to do their best, and the audience just as unanimously disposed to appreciate. The great transept, filled with thousands of well-dressed visitors occupying reserved seats which covered almost the entire area, presented much the same aspect as at the Handel Commemorations. The great orchestra, compressed and enclosed for the occasion, accommodated about 300 performers, vocal and instrumental, selected from among the best our very musical metropolis can furnish. The decorations fully came up to what was anticipated; and everything revealed a sincere desire on the part of those under whose control the arrangements for this not inaptly termed "festival" had been prepared to do honour to its heroine. As this was absolutely Grisi's last appearance before a London audience, it may not be out of place to cite the programme in extenso:—

PART I. Overture, "Masaniello," Auber; Duo, "Marinaro in Quardia Sta," Rossini; Aria, "Minacci Pur" (L'Assedie di Corinto), Rossini; Duo, "Un Tenore Core" (Roberto Devereux), Donizetti. Mad. Grisi and Sig. Mario:—Aria, "Ah! mon fils," Meyerbeer; Duo, "Non m'Inganno" (Otello), Rossini; Aria, "Oh! mio Fernando" (La Favorita), Donizetti. Mad. Grisi:—Grand Finale (Mosè in Egitto), Rossini.

PART II.—Overture, "La Gazza Ladra," Rossini; Romanza (Il Ballo in Maschera), Verdi; Aria, "Ernani involami," Verdi; Duo, "Ebben a te Ferisci" (Semiramide), Rossini. Mad. Grisi and Mad. Didiée:—Ballad, "Good bye, Sweetheart," Hatton; Duo (L'Elisir d'Amore), Donizetti; Aria, "O luce di quest' anima" Donizetti; Aria, "Robert, toi que j'aime" (Roberto), Meyerbeer: Finale, "La Carita," Rossini.—Mesdames Grisi, Rudersdorff, Didiée, and Chorus.

The duet, "Marinaro," &c., was sung by Signor Neri Baraldi and M. Tagliafico; the air from the Siege of Corinth by Signor Tiberini; "Ah! mon fils," by Mad. Nantier Didiée; the duet from Otello by Signori Tamberlik and Ronconi; the romance from Verdi's new opera (encored) by Signor Graziani; "Ernani involami" by Mad. Penco; the cavatina from Linda di Chamouni by Mad. Ortolani Tiberini; Mr. Hatton's English ballad (encored) by Signor Mario; the duet from L'Elisir by Mad. Penco and Signor Ronconi; and the romance from Meyerbeer's Robert by Mad. Rudersdorff. Mr. Costa conducted, and the overture to La Gazza Ladra was played twice. The pieces set down for Grisi herself—admirable without exception as were the performances we have enumerated—naturally absorbed the largest share of attention, and were listened to with an interest doubtless rendered all the more intense by the conviction that they would never be heard again in the same place from the same lips. That the programme might have comprised more of the "Grisi" element,—or at least have contained one of those solos ("Casta Diva," "Com' è bello," "Bel raggio," or "Di piacer," for example) which the English public are accustomed to associate with a voice that has charmed them oftener and more completely than any other during the last quarter of a century—seemed to be the general impression. Nevertheless, what was vouchsafed went straight to the hearts of the audience as it came straight from the heart of the singer, who was welcomed with acclamations and applauded with enthusiasm. The most genuine excitement was evidently created by the grand duet (with Mad. Didiée) from Semiramide—an opera in which the genius of Grisi, both as a singer and actress, shone perhaps most conspicuously, although not one of those most frequently brought forward in the latest stage of her career. The melodious "andante" was delivered with the serene and ineffable expression with which we are all acquainted, but now marked with an under-current of tenderness that gave peculiar significance to the opening words—which might have been construed, that the deep regret at parting was more than half alleviated by the knowledge of its being fairly divided between the songstress and her hearers, and that thus the "giorno d'orrore" was also one to remember with some degree of satisfaction ("di contento"). No sooner was the loud and prolonged applause that followed at the end of the duet hushed into silence than the eloquent tones of Signor Mario, in the English ballad, "Good bye, sweetheart," conveyed, in earnest though homely language, what, on the other hand, the audience might have felt inclined to say, had it been etiquette to speak. After "La Carità," in which the last notes of the universal favourite were heard, hats and handkerchiefs waved, hands applauded and voices cheered tumultuously. It was a hearty leave-taking on both sides—a demonstration of sympathy, in short, befitting the occasion. To add another word would be superfluous. Finis coronat opus!

"Giorno d'orrore,

Between 11,000 and 12,000 were present at the concert.

A GLANCE AT THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL.

(From the "Birmingham Journal.")

IN less than a month from this time, Birmingham will be again in the throes of one of those triennial convulsions which may be regarded as epochs in our history, and thanks to which the old "hardware village" is enabled, notwithstanding much musical remissness in the intervals, to maintain its place at the head of the musical towns of the kingdom. At such a season all other interests give place to those of music, and the noble charity in whose cause it is enlisted. International politics dwindle to the level of Town Council discussions; Government finance gives the pas to the pecuniary prospects of the Festival. Louis Napoleon's intentions inspire less apprehension than those of the weather, and even Garibaldi cannot "hold a candle," as the lion of the hour, to Costa or Giuglini. Music becomes the all-absorbing topic, or better still, the fashion; our streets are enlivened with the throng of gaily-clad pilgrims from all parts of the country, eager to offer up homage at the shrine of St. Cecilia—accommodated for the nonce with a local habitation within the stately walls of our Townhall; the echoes of our public places, like Prospero's isle, are "full of noises, sounds, and sweet airs, that give delight and hurt not," and even the comparative tranquillity of our drawing-rooms and firesides is disturbed for a time, both before and after the great event, by anticipations and reminiscences "most musical and most melancholy," of the more catching melodies of Handel, Haydn, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Mozart. At such a time, the most practical-minded, art-contemning, anti-musical among us, succumb to harmonious influences; sober mercantile men, bitten by the musical tarantella, deliver their parting injunctions at home in a sort of operatic recitative; walk to office to the measure of the "Israelites' March," or the more fanciful one in the Midsummer Night's Dream, and intersperse their more prosaic calculations with snatches from yesterday's oratorio or this evening's concert. Railway carriage and omnibus coteries, abandoning for a time the more familiar themes of trade and harvest, Town Council squabbles, and sectarian splits, become eloquent on the relative merits of the new "Amina" coming in, and the old "Diva" going out, the golden voice of the great Italian tenor, and the dramatic power and execution of the no less popular English Orpheus; the melodious richness of The Messiah, the massive grandeur of Israel in Egypt, and the dramatic feeling, poetry, and refinement of the Elijah; the experience and skill of the orchestral Field Marshal, and the extent and discipline of the choral battalions under his control. Our very shops put on a new attire for the occasion, and besides the general gala appearance of hosiers, silk mercers, and jewellers, the windows of every stationer and bookseller bristle like Hyde Park on a review-day, with ranks of crotchets and quavers, clad in the smartest and brightest of uniforms, and glittering with gold epaulettes and regimental facings. Busy Birmingham, for a wonder, seems ashamed to be industrious, utilitarian pursuits are either proscribed in toto, or only furtively connived at in out-of-the-way corners and dusky workshops, where the superficial glance of the Festival visitor will not detect them. After all, there is nothing in our every-day avocations so utterly incompatable with musical pursuits as some sour-minded critics would have us believe. The burr of machinery, the clink of hammer and anvil, the deep groaning of bellows, and the well-timed puff of the throbbing steam engine, are not such very bad accompaniments to the tuneful ymn of industry which floats up through our factory windows far above the cloud-capped chimneys and grimy atmosphere of this human hive; and the musical appropriateness of such elements has ere now suggested itself to other composers besides the ingenious contrivers of the anvil chorus in the Trovatore and the spinning quartet in Martha. Indeed, so far back as the days of Handel, we seem to have heard of a certain "Harmonious Blacksmith," of whom Miss Arabella Goddard can discourse on her digits most eloquently, and whose locus in quo we are prepared to maintain against all comers is shown by conclusive internal evidence to have been not many yards wide of our venerable Bull Ring.

We must not linger, however, in the regions of speculation, with such bulky and pressing claims upon our attention as the detailed Festival scheme now before us advances. Its great extent—exceeding in nearly every respect the proportions of former Festival projects—renders a constant recapitulation of its leading features not only permissible, but absolutely necessary, to enable the reader to form anything like an adequate idea of its pretensions. Not only have we a larger executive corps, a more generally brilliant company of principals, and a greater number of performances than has been the rule of former Festivals to keep in view, but the selection of works for performance is of a more ponderous and onerous character for all concerned. The relatively light and lively characteristics of miscellaneous concerts are restricted now to two evenings, the number of the evenings increased to four, and the remaining two devoted to massive oratorio music as taxing to the intelligence and emotional sensibility of the listener as to the physical power of the executants. Under such circumstances we shall need no apology for occasionally treading in old footmarks in our endeavour to present the reader with a tolerably comprehensive though summary aperçu of the Festival scheme for 1861.

The first anxiety of musicians and connoisseurs will naturally be directed to the constitution of the band and chorus, on whose efficiency, even more than on that of the principals, so much of the musical success of the undertaking depends. For the excellence of the band, especially since the bâton has been in Costa's hands, the Birmingham Festivals are permitted to boast a pre-eminence over every other provincial music meeting in England. The orchestra of 1858, comprising 146 instrumental performers selected with the greatest care from the Metropolis, was one of the very best ever assembled in Birmingham, and in making their arrangements for 1861 the Festival Committee could not have had a better standard in view. The result of their efforts and deliberations will be best conveyed by the following summary of the instrumental resources announced in the scheme just published :—First violins (principals, Sainton and Blagrove), 28; second violins (principal, Willy), 26 ; violas or tenors (principal, Doyle), 18 ; violoncellos (principal, Lucas), 17 ; double basses (principal, Howell), 17 ; flutes (Pratten De Folly, Nicholson, and Tilley), 4; oboes (Barrett and Nicholson), 4; clarionets (Lazarus), 4; bassoons (Hausser), 4; trumpets (Harper), 2; cornets (Barlow), 2; horns (C. Harper), 4; trombones (Hawkes), 3 ; ophicleide (Hughes), 1; serpents, 2; drums, double (Chipp), side, and triangle and bass, 3; harp (Grust), 1; organ (Mr. Stimpson), 1; total, 142. As usual, a large proportion of this goodly army, though serving in the ranks, are competent generals and approved champions in their respective departments, to illustrate which we need only cite the names composing one section of the orchestra, that of first violins, to which the following goodly list belongs:— Sainton, Blagrove, Belgemann, Browne, Burnett, Carrodus, Chipp, E. Clementi, V. Collins, Dando, Day, Deichmann, Goffric, Hall, H. W. Hill, Jacquin, Kreutzer, Love, Madand, Pollitzer, Ries, Seymour, Thirlwall, Sheather, Thomas, Watson, Watson, jun., and Zerbini. The constitution of the other sections, we need only remark, is on a par with that of the first violins, and with Costa directing, no more need be said to establish the unsurpassable excellence of the framework upon which our Festival scheme reposes. The bricks and mortar of the undertaking are represented by a choral body of 334 performers, more than in 1858, distributed as follows:—Sopranos, 83; contraltos, 19; altos, 61; tenors, 83; and basses, 88; representing, with the band before enumerated, a sum total of 476 performers in the orchestra. Among the chorus, obtained principally from local sources, and especially from the ranks of that zealous and useful association, the Festival Choral Society, there are no less than sixty amateur volunteers from the Amateur Harmonic Society—a compact little band whom many of our readers will agree with us in thinking quite as picturesque, and infinitely more serviceable to society than their gallant namesakes of military fame. For the efficiency of the two great sections of the choral body just specified, Mr. Stockley and Mr. A. J. Sutton are respectively responsible, and it may be safely asserted that the interest of that important department of the Festival could not be in better hands. Since the commencement of the year both gentlemen have been assiduously employed in drilling the choral forces under their respective commands, and even now that all the elements of the chorus are coalesced and the rehearsals conducted in common, not the least trying part of the work of preparation has to be gone through. In the list of principals we have the capital and crowning grace of this colossal undertaking—so far at least as execution goes—Mlle. Titiens, Mads. Rudersdorff, Lemmens-Sherrington, and Mlle. Adelina Patti, constitute a truly imposing array of soprani; and the list of voci bianchi is fittingly closed with the names of those admirable contralti, Mad. Sainton-Dolby and Miss Palmer. As tenors, we have our own Sims Reeves, the golden-throated Giuglini, and the conscientious, equable, and experienced Montem Smith. Mr. Santley and Signor Belletti, with opposite characteristics and voices that have little but excellence in common, sustain, Atlas-like, a world of responsibilities in dividing between them the bass and baritone music of so ponderous a programme; but our long experience of the latter, and the high reputation of both, assure us of their entire competency for the Herculean task they have undertaken. We would gladly linger over the many delightful associations conjured up by the names we have just mentioned, and that of Miss Arabella Goddard, and indulge our sanguine anticipations as to the pleasure which the fair Patti—the only stranger of the party—is destined to afford us, but we must hasten on to other branches of our theme.

(To be concluded in our next.)

Letters to the Editor.

THE APPOINTMENT OF ORGANISTS TO YOUR CATHEDRALS.

Sir,—May I ask if you, or any of the numerous readers of the Musical World, can inform me whether it is correct that the Musical Professor of the University of Oxford is trying to have all these appointments placed in his own hands? I am told he has already nominated the organist to one (if not two) of our cathedrals. The worthy Professor is certainly not a Mendelssohn, a Sterndale Bennett, or Sir Henry Bishop; he may have composed a few short anthems, but I believe no musical work of any importance. He does not examine the candidates for the musical degree at Oxford, but has requested some other gentleman. I think it ought to be understood by the musical profession whether the dean and chapter of each cathedral intend placing the most important musical appointment in England into the hands of the Musical Professor of Oxford, whose High Church views would endanger the true Evangelical music of our Protestant Church.

Yours truly,

July 28th, 1861. Alpha.

MUS. DOC. DEGREE.

Sir,—In reply to your correspondent who asks for information respecting the degree of Doctor of Music, I would beg to inform him that it is usual first of all in our English universities to obtain the degree of Mus. Bac., and at the expiration of five years he may then go in for the Doctor's. I believe the "cheapest" and most convenient way is to go to Dublin, where it is not very difficult to take both degrees at once. This is frequently done by those who have been plucked at home, or by timid individuals who have not sufficient pluck to try at home. With us it is not sufficient to write a long exercise in five or eight real parts, with instrumental accompaniments, but when this work is approved a severe examination of six or eight hours' duration takes place. The latter part has been added within the last few years. The exercise may be performed, and the degree obtained, on the first degree day after the examination.

Yours truly,

July 29th, 1861. Mus. Bac.

COST OF DOCTORS' DEGREES.

Sir,—In reply to the letter of "Open," in your last number, respecting the fees, qualifications, &c. necessary to secure the title of Doctor of Music, I believe I am correct in stating that the fees at Cambridge, Dublin, and Oxford Universities for the accumulated degrees of Mus. Bac. and Mus. Doc., amount to about 35*l.*, and that the cost of performing the musical exercise with other expenses, is rarely under 45*l.*, so that the sum total may be taken at 80*l.*

At Dublin University it is necessary, I am informed, to pass an examination in Arts (Latin, Greek, Mathematics, Geography, &c.) before the candidate can matriculate, or, in other words, become an enrolled member of college; but this proceeding is omitted at both Cambridge and Oxford, though at all three of these chief Universities, paper and viva voce examinations in the science and history of music are now insisted upon.

A candidate for the degree of Mus. Doc. must write a work (of pretty tolerable length) which may include solos, duets, &c. for various voices, but must contain choruses in eight real parts, the whole work being scored for a full band, with a separate organ accompaniment. The work, if approved by the Professor, is usually performed in some suitable hall attached to the University, and in a style chiefly depending on the ambition of the composer, or, more properly speaking, on the length of his purse.

Further information and details upon the whole matter will be found in a Cambridge, Dublin, or Oxford calendar, which can be obtained of any bookseller.

August 1st, 1861. DECISO.

NATURALS, SHARPS, AND DOUBLE-FLATS AGAIN.

DEAR MUS. WORLD,—You have allowed Master Eves and "An Amateur" to have their last words, pray now let me have mine.

You justified Mr. Benedict's D♮ in your second extract from the "Wreath," on the ground that D♮ belongs to the chromatic scale of E, and Cx does not. I objected that, if so, Mr. B. ought, according to your own showing, to have written F♮ instead of E♯, in the same chord; and you now attempt to justify that E♯ by saying that it belongs to the key of B! Of course we who have so plagued you in this affair are sadly ignorant as theorists, &c., but we perhaps have a little common sense, in the name of which I beg to ask what can be thought of the theory which, "discuting" on any particular chord in a musical composition, deduces the notation of two of its component notes from two different keys? As you have given some symptoms of wishing to shift your ground, and say that the passage is in B (which would account in your way for both the D♮ and the E♯), I must pin you to your own original justification of the D♮ from the scale of E, in which key, moreover, it is quite clear that the whole passage stands.

Truly yours,

July 29th, 1861. VERAX.

["Verax" should wear spectacles; or employ an ear trumpet; or read the controversy originated by the "fifths" of our ex-reviewer—which, turning out "sixths," were the cause of turning out our ex-reviewer, over and over again, from end to end, until he understands it, and owns that he is altogether in the wrong, and that we, as usual, are altogether in the right.—PETIPACE.]

GRISI AND LORD JOHN.

DEAR WORLD,—I could not resist sending you the enclosed morceau from the Halifax Guardian of Saturday. You would do the state service if you will lay the lash on. The author is a bad fellow.

Yours, &c.

July 30th. AN OLD READER.

RETIREMENT OF LORD. J. RUSSELL.

This week two celebrated characters have retired from very prominent public positions in England. On Tuesday Lord J. Russell made his parting bow to the electors of London, whom he has represented for twenty years; and to the House of Commons, where he was a leader for about the same period. On Wednesday, Giulietta Grisi made her final curtsey before the footlights of the Italian Opera House. Except that the two events occur in the same week, there does not, at first sight, seem to be much analogy between them. The career of an opera singer who, though in the parlance of the House she has been "divine," is still by Act of Parliament of the genus "vagabond," is sufficiently apart from that of the gentlemen who make Acts of Parliament. But there are similarities in the personal history of Giulietta and Lord John. Both have persisted in outliving their fame. Both have delayed the period of resignation until retirement has become a welcome relief rather than a painful regret. Never since the greater gods in Parliament and goddesses of song obtained niches in the edifice of history, have there been equals in fame and good fortune to the ex-premier and ex-prima donna who have combined to make the last week in July illustrious by their farewells. There have been greater singers than Grisi. There have been more eminent statesmen than Lord John Russell. It would be a burlesque of the epithet, indeed, to apply it in the same sense to Lord John as to Sir Robert Peel. But Lord John has enjoyed more, in his life-time, of the fickle element of popular favour. And he has used that element, as Grisi is said to have done in all her engagements with managers, to keep down, as much as possible, all rivals. Sir Robert Peel felt the full force of this party littleness during his whole lifetime, and it was not till death removed him above its power that his superior greatness was acknowledged.

["An old Reader" is too exacting. We have no "lash" for such ingenious, and we must say pleasant, transgressors. Perhaps "An old Reader" would like seven years more of "Giulietta" on the boards? We should less repine at seven years more of "Johnny" in the Commons.—PETIPACE.]

LYCEUM THEATRE.—A dramatic performance and concert were given at this theatre on Wednesday last, for the benefit of the band fund, 1st Middlesex Artillery. The first piece was A New Way to Pay Old Debts, in which Mr. George Taunton enacted the part of Sir Giles Overreach. His conception of the part was correct, but he lacked a knowledge of stage business and dramatic power. Upon being called for at the end of the piece, he addressed a humorous speech to the audience, with which they seemed highly pleased; but we cannot help expressing our opinion that this elocutionary display was entirely out of place. The rest of the characters were very well sustained. The concert commenced with the duet from Rigoletto, "Deh non Parlare," which was pleasingly rendered by Miss Augusta Thomson and Mr. Alberto Lawrence, Mr. Lawrence being vociferously encored, later in the evening, upon singing Mendelssohn's "I'm a roamer." The conductor, Herr W. Ganz, played very artistically his own arrangement of "Santa Lucia," and Mr. Thomas Harper's trumpet solo was loudly encored. Miss Thomson also narrowly escaped an encore after singing Arditi's "Il Bacio." The band of the corps performed several pieces during the evening, and the performances concluded with the farce, Founded on Facts. The house was well attended, and, unlike most affairs of the kind, the arrangements were complete in every respect.

IVREA, NEAR MILAN.—(From a very enthusiastic and rare Correspondent.)—If the word triumph may be applied in affairs of the theatre without fear of ridicule, it never was more apropos than in the present case to express the success obtained last evening by the tenor Castellani, upon the occasion of his benefit. Over and above the opera (Chi dura vince) we heard a new singer, Mlle. Glenister, in the cavatina of Lucia, and a duet from Verdi's Masniadieri. This last piece was sung by the young lady and the before-named tenor. Mlle. Glenister was by all the auditors judged to be "unica" in her style, and those who have heard Persiani assure us that the young singer is not in the least inferior to that artist, and they maintain that in point of art it would be impossible to do more,—taste, execution, intonation, perfect,—all you find in her; and I confess that I do not remember having heard a singer who so nearly approaches Bosio. Besides her singing she has a certain ingenious expression which alone infuses an irresistible grace into all she does. The demonstrations in favour of Mlle. Glenister were innumerable, and surpassed every limit. When she had finished her work she went to a box, in which she had scarcely appeared when the public commenced anew to applaud her. The opera went off well. Mlle. Lotteri sang with more than common ability, as did also the baritone (Pieri), and the buffo (Turaboschi). The tenor (Castellani) was clamorously applauded, and most deservedly, in all he sang. Besides the opera, Signor Castellani sang the Romanza "spirto gentil," after which he was several times recalled. The duet from Il Masniadieri with Mlle. Glenister was also very successful, and the singers were called repeatedly before the curtain. Mlle. Glenister is an English girl, about eighteen years of age.

MADAME SAINTON-DOLBY'S NEW SONG,

"THE DAYS THAT ARE NO MORE."

(Poetry by TENNYSON.)

Composed expressly for Madame Sainton-Dolby by JACQUES BLUMENTHAL.

"Who does not know the Poet Laureate's exquisite lines, beginning:

'Tears, idle tears, I know not what they mean;
Tears from the depth of some divine despair
Rise in the heart, and gather to the eyes,' &c.

That M. Blumenthal, though a Dutchman, loves the poetry of Tennyson, may be gathered from the true sympathetic manner in which he has set his beautiful verses to music. The popularity of this little song is already attested."—Musical World.

EVANS'S

COTTAGE HARMONIUM

At SIX GUINEAS,

Has Five Octaves and Two Foot-boards, is in a French-polished Case, and has a soft, subdued, agreeable quality of tone, designed expressly to suit a Cottage or Small Sitting-room.—BOOSEY and CHING, Manufacturers, 24 Holles Street, Oxford Street, W.

Evans's Ten-Guinea HARMONIUM

Is in a solid, handsome French-polished Case, and possesses that rich and organ-like quality of tone which particularly distinguishes these Instruments from the French.—BOOSEY and CHING, Manufacturers, 24 Holles Street, Oxford Street, W.

Evans's English HARMONIUMS,

WITH TWO ROWS OF KEYS,

At 45 and 63 Guineas, without Pedals, and 47 and 130 Guineas, with Pedals,

Although particularly adapted for Churches, are equally effective in the Drawing-room. Not only have the leading members of the profession, including Messrs. Sterndale Bennett, Balfe, Potter, Henry Smart, Best, &c., but the Clergy and the Press have also testified to the very great superiority of EVANS'S HARMONIUMS. These Testimonials may be seen upon reference to Boosey and Ching's Illustrated Catalogue of Harmoniums.

The whole of EVANS'S INSTRUMENTS possess that organ-like quality of tone which has been hitherto unattained by any other manufacturer, and are made throughout in the strongest and most substantial manner by the best "ENGLISH WORKMEN.' They are neither affected by heat nor damp.

BOOSEY AND CHING,

MANUFACTURERS, 24 HOLLES STREET, OXFORD STREET, W.

ASHDOWN and PARRY (successors to Wessel and Co.) beg to inform the Profession that they forward Parcels on Sale upon receipt of references in town. Returns to be made at Midsummer and Christmas.

Reviews.

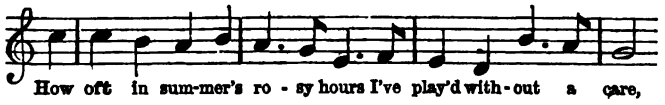
"L'Amante e l'Eco"—parole di C. A. Clericetti, melodia di Maurizio Lardelli (Addison, Hollier, and Lucas).

This graceful romance (composed for Signor Mario) would be all the more welcome, without the pompous and unmeaning flourish of instrumental symphony with which it is prefaced. The "melodia" (the name attached to it by the composer, by the way) is essentially Italian, though not over original, as may be seen by the subjoined extract:—

Nevertheless, as we have hinted, it is graceful—to which we may add, eminently vocal.

"The Angel Mother"—ballad—words by H. St. Leger, music by S. Jannette St. Leger (Cramer, Beale, and Chappell).

The couple St. Leger have surpassed themselves and each other in this ballad. We know not which may claim the preference, words or music. Suffice it, the words fit the music to a note, and the music fits the words to a syllable. If ever a little domestic quarrel should arise between a happy pair, we recommend this ballad to be sung by "man," and accompanied by "wife"—or versâ vice, whichever way the genius lies. We will answer for it, they will kiss, and make it up. There is a strong Balfishness in both melody and accompaniment, which is of itself a recommendation to the crowd of amateur vocalists. Look how the melody begins:—



And then glance at the accompaniment:—

"The Harp of God"—by the Rev. Edward Young, M.A. of Trinity College, Cambridge (James Nisbet and Co.).

This little book consists of "twelve letters on liturgical music, its import, present state, and reformation." If it contains nothing essentially new, it is interesting, marked in an equal degree with unaffected piety and strong common sense, and, for these and other reasons, in short, well worth perusing.

"A Manual of Psalm Tunes," harmonised in three parts—edited by John James Scargill, B.A. (J. Alfred Novello).

Mr. Scargill has done his work thoroughly well. Whether a new collection of old psalm-tunes was required may be a matter of doubt; but that such a one as this can do no harm, if it effects little absolute good, is not at all a matter of doubt. There are 146 tunes in all, for the most part soberly and correctly harmonised. As a specimen, however, let us cite Mr. Scargill's "Fazeley:"— to which exceptions might be taken (by sticklers for pure three-part harmony) at the chords distinguished by asterisks, and perhaps at the last bar but one, where a fourth part unceremoniously rushes in. Mr. Scargill has also dressed up "Freasley," to which exceptions might be taken (as for instance):—

but which we have not space to cite in extenso.

"Un Ballo in Maschera"—fantasie pour piano, par Harold Thomas (Cramer, Beale, and Co.).—

Mr. Thomas has joined together in this piece the air, "Morro, ma prima in grazia:"—

the mazurka:—

and the chorus (stretto) of the first finale:—

transposing, to suit his purpose. He has produced a fantasia both effective and pleasing. Mr. Thomas's title-page is, as usual, a mixture of languages. At the head we find "A son ami, W. H. Acraman (Hastings);" and at the bottom, "By the same composer," followed up with a host of pieces.

Galop de 'Rigoletto'"—par Réné Favarger (Cramer Beale, and Co.).

The galop in the ball scene of Rigoletto is one of Signor Verdi's most lively and vigorous dance-pieces. The trio, which may be recalled by a few notes from the melody,— is worthy of the late Herr Johann Strauss. M. Favarger has "transcribed" it uncommonly well.

'Fantaisie sur 'Rigoletto'"—pour piano, par Réné Favarger (Cramer, Beale, and Chappell).

In this fantasia—which (in consequence, perhaps, of its containing more of M. Favarger, and less of Signor Verdi) is hardly, though not precisely without merit, so successful a performance as the galop—the celebrated quartet of the last scene (as usual) plays a conspicuous part.

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Aug. 8.

The terpsichorean outbreak, which was mentioned by me the other day as having taken place at the Grand Opera, in the shape of an entire evening devoted to the more or less graceful shaking of toes, has been renewed. Friday last another dance-feast was held, and the same three ballets repeated pour tout potage as the evening's performance, notwithstanding a terrible onslaught made on the Imperial establishment for so extravagant a breach of good taste by the good old knight, Jules Janin, whose strokes are as heavy and lance as keen as ever they were in the days when honours worth regarding and smiles worth basking under were the reward of brave deeds. All unabashed, Mad. Zina Mérante (late Richards), Mad. Ferraris and Mad. Marie Petipa (no connection with "Petipace") reigned in triple sovereignty over the stalls, and the precedent seems now fairly established. A jockey club might well be a constant resource for the management when prima donnas pout or tenors are troublesome. M. Faure has returned, and is shortly to make his appearance. It was said he would lead off in Guillaume Tell, but the departure of M. Gueymard on his congé renders this impossible. The Trouvère (Trovatore), or la Favorite, will, therefore, be the opera, at least most likely, for nothing is fixed yet. One thing seems sure, however, and that is that the prince-composer Poniatowski's masterwork, Pierre de Medicis, will have a turn. Every dog has his day; à fortiori, princes who condescend to the muse, as King Cophetua stooped to the beggar-maid, may have their night. With all my heart, so my attendance be dispensed with: "I care not greatly for 'prince-ish music' that may be heard." Julien de Medicis will be played by M. Faure.

At the Opéra Comique, Roger still swims gaily down the stream of popular favour—a stream that for him has yet had no shallows nor back currents. With nothing fresher than Haydée and the Dame Blanche, he fills the theatre nightly; and so thoroughly is he in a vein of triumph, that he may well think twice of his journey to St. Petersburg, notwithstanding the barbaric pomp there awaiting him. The new operas by Messrs. Bazin and Lefebure-Wély, which long since I intimated were in preparation, will naturally not see the light till the popular tenor has thoroughly brushed off the bloom of his re-appearance.

The Théâtre Lyrique is making itself wondrously smart externally. The whole exterior has been ornamented and decorated afresh from the base to the roof. The allegorical piece which adorns the front is not yet quite completed. The subject is the city of Paris represented as a bountiful dame-protectress of the fine arts. Grouped around her are figures representing Music and the most illustrious masters of harmony. It was originally intended that both the native composers who had contributed to the glory of France, and those of foreign origin to whom she had offered shelter and protection on the various lyrical stages of the capital, should be included. This notion had been suggested by M. Hector Berlioz, but has been reserved for separate treatment. It is now the subject of the painting with which the ceiling is adorned. This ceiling, by the way, is talked of as a remarkable specimen of good taste in architectural ornamentation.

The comedians of the Emperor have been waking up the grand old shade of Sophocles. The Ædipus Tyrannus, rendered into French verse by M. Jules Lacroix, has been revived, but this time without the music which had been composed for it by M. Edouard Membrée. The assistance of an orchestra is only slightly invoked, to mark the divisions between the chorus and the action of the drama, and to accompany the entrances and exits of the principal personages. The omission of the music has caused regret among the musical part of the public; but the general audiences of the Théâtre Français, being more literary than musical, prefer, no doubt, the strophes of Sophocles interpreted by M. Jules Lacroix to the strains of M. Membrée. The two veterans, MM. Samson and Provost, are at present away, sea-bathing. Mlle. Augustine Brohan—one of the theatrical sheets here says—has also taken leave of the public for an interval. She is a great sufferer with her eyes—a retribution, perhaps, for the sufferings they may have inflicted on others. Her labours as a sociétaire, another practice of her art, under, or rather over, the glare of the footlights, have no doubt aggravated her complaint, and she is, it is said, seriously anxious about her sight. The misery and mischief caused by the footlights of the stage should lead to some improved way of lighting the actors. I think I saw somewhere that this had been done in a German theatre. Mlle. Augustine Brohan has been advised to consult an oculist at Prague, who is said to have accomplished wonderful cures. As some compensation for the loss of the sprightly comedienne, the director has re-engaged Mlle. Pauline Granger.

There is nothing particularly interesting to record of the rest of the theatrical world. The most conspicuous stage performance, as well as the most noisy, is a military spectacle at the Cirque, the subject of which is the taking of Pekin. There is a good deal of fun in the dialogue of this production, of which one of the authors is M. Dennery, and in it there is a wonderful ballet, executed by four danseuses, whose performances are more than wonderful. At the Gaité there has been an amusing absurdity called Une Ombrelle compromise par un Parapluie: and I believe that is all that is done of any importance in the dramatic way.

I will wind up with a few unconsidered trifles of foreign news. The directorship of the Imperial Chapel of Russia has been lately vacant; M. Alexis Lvoff having resigned the post on account of his advanced age. It has been filled up by M. Bachmeteff, a councillor of state and a distinguished musical amateur. In consideration of M. Lvoff's long and valuable services, and the part he has had in raising the choir of the Imperial Chapel to its high state of efficiency (acknowledged throughout Europe), the Emperor has allowed him to keep his honorary titles of Senator and Court Master (Hofmeister), together with the emoluments thereunto appended. M. Lvoff's chief services to the Imperial Chapel are as follows:—Firstly, the collecting and harmonising of the Chants of the Greek Church—a work of vast extent, forming thirteen volumes. Secondly, the musical instruction of 300 pupils (chapel-masters) for the execution of these ecclesiastical chants. Thirdly, the formation of a capital of nearly 50,000 roubles for the widows and orphans of the choristers. Fourthly, M. Lvoff has enriched the library of the chapel by about one hundred pieces of church music of his own composition. As concerning Russian professors of music, a famous "lion pianist" of that empire (Lion Anton Rubinstein) has fallen among thieves during his sojourn at Lucerne. He has, it would seem, been robbed of 2000 silver roubles and a gold watch. Satisfied with this experience of the hospitality of the hardy Swiss, he, hardy Russ, shook the Alpine snow from his feet, and betook himself to the modest sea-port of Ostend, where he is as likely to be robbed as ever, but where he will not be insulted with boastful talk about the strict honesty and guileless innocence of the inhabitants. man novelist of celebrity, has been appointed to the stewardship of the theatre at Stuttgard, in place of Baron Gall.

I have heard that one hundred and twenty-six choral societies will attend the great festival of Orphéons, to be held next month. I am now run dry, and till I am fed again with rivulets from the yet sealed springs of futurity—fare thee well.

THE GRAND VOCAL FESTIVAL IN NUREMBERG.*

The idea of getting up a Grand Vocal Festival for all Germany was, at the present day, a very natural result of the wish entertained by every educated person to behold the various members of the German family united in one great whole. Everything that serves to express this feeling, or that can nourish and strengthen the spirit which yearns for a United Fatherland is warmly welcomed and everywhere adopted and promoted most lovingly and zealously.

Viewed in this light, the Vocal Festival in Nuremberg was, from the immense interest it excited, a healthy sign of the times. No one could well expect the Festival to prove any very great event for art, although it called forth a few choral compositions, of more than ordinary merit, for male voices, and this certainly enriched that branch of writing. It was to be foreseen that the artistic would be outbalanced by the national element; but why should Music not consider it an honour to be the interpretress of the noblest sentiments and feelings of love for our Fatherland, and of a yearning after the union and power of the entire German people? That kind of music which gushes directly from the human breast — we allude to vocal music — is that most nearly allied to the soul, whence alone it derives its true expression, and on which it exercises the profoundest reaction. To sum up in a few words the grand result of the Festival, we assert with joy that its principal object, namely, the enthusiastic expression of German nationality by German poetry and German song, was most triumphantly achieved.

That the masses of executants who met on the occasion, the thousands of spectators and listeners who flocked from all parts, the festive movements of the entire population of the town and its environs; and furthermore, material facts, such as the magnificence of Nuremberg itself, the grandeur of the processions, and the fineness of the weather, which was, without exception, most propitious—that all this, we say, should co-operate powerfully in bringing about the satisfactory general result, was natural. Each element in the Festival enhanced the other, and music formed only the central point of a display of national feeling, such as—for the unrestrained intercourse of all classes, and the good-humoured enjoyment of a vast multitude giving themselves up to the present moment, and able to rejoice in their existence for the sake of that existence itself—is to be found only among the members of our own race in South Germany.

For the celebration of a national festival, Nuremberg is in the highest degree appropriate. We were struck with astonishment, as, amid loud expressions of welcome and the flourish of trumpets, we arrived at the railway station on Saturday, the 20th July, while this pearl of German cities unfolded before our eyes its architectural magnificence, which has not its equal in Germany, or, in its peculiar way, in Europe; and which, moreover, on this occasion, was bravely decked out in festive array, carrying us back in imagination to the time when the imperial city of Nuremberg received the German Kaisers, and welcomed them with brilliant state. On the 20th July last, however, Music was the guest for whom the grand old city, the mother of all German art, had put on her gala robes. All the public edifices, as well as all the private houses, the palaces, and the most modest residences, were decorated, from the ground floor to the gable points, with flowers and foliage, displaying a true artistic feeling, the prevalence of which caused the beautiful forms of the various buildings to stand out with more than ordinary prominence. From the house-tops to about a man's height from the pavement, hung thousands of long flags, which, by their broad stripes of black and gold, announced the signification of the Festival, while a large number of other flags with the Bavarian colours waved amongst them, frequently bringing out, in a highly ingenious manner, as at the Rathhaus, for instance, the architectural outlines by an infinity of smaller flags.

And yet no flags or colours were requisite to stamp Nuremberg as a German city, for not only is each world-famous and venerable church, but every house as well, a monument of German architectural art. This applies not to the buildings of former ages alone, for down to the present day the Nuremberg architects, with Heideloff at their head, have continued the taste for the German style, and carried it out in a most admirable manner. The broad streets, nowhere laid out in informal straight lines, offer, in their windings, such picturesque and surprising views, with the vast expanse of sky visible above, since in all the principal thoroughfares there is ample space between the opposite rows of houses, that there is no other city in which the old and beautiful combines so harmoniously with the new and beautiful.

Let our readers picture these streets alive with thousands of human beings who made way for the interminable line of the Vocal Societies, on their road from the Rathhaus to the Music Hall, situate outside the Lauffer Gate, allowing them to pass through their closely packed ranks, in the most admirable order, without pressure or obstruction, but simply greeting, with loud hurrahs, now this, now that Society, from the most distant parts of their Fatherland; let our readers picture to themselves the lofty houses, nearly all four stories high, with their projecting windows and balconies, and fair blooming forms at every casement, while joy reigned on every countenance; while handkerchiefs, flags, and nosegays were waved in welcome; while, through the multitude, the procession of five thousand vigorous, light-hearted men and youths advanced, bearing aloft their magnificent flags, heavy with gold and glowing with painting and embroidery, followed by the proud recipients of the prizes awarded by the various Societies, some with goblets of silver or gold, or ivory or wood delicately carved; others with gigantic old German drinking-horns, medals, and broad scarves, and while, in addition, the military music re-echoed twice as merrily as usual, from the fact of its celebrating Peace, and its greatest blessings: Art, and the love of our Fatherland,—let our readers picture to themselves all this, and they will gain some idea of the Festival, although they will still fall short of the reality, as displayed to those who were actually present; for thoroughly to appreciate the day's proceedings, a person must himself have witnessed that light-hearted, frank, unrestrained enjoyment, in which our Southern brothers breathe and live.

Passing through the Lauffer Gate, which, with its tower of gigantic circumference, is one of the finest monuments of the fortifications of the Middle Ages, the procession pursued its course to the Maxplatz, where the Music Hall was erected. The Platz is situated about ten minutes' walk outside the city, and, with its unusually fine clumps of old trees, its large lawns, and broad walks, produces somewhat the effect of a London park. A better locality for a National Festival can scarcely be imagined. Around the Music Hall were booths and temporary eating-houses, lighted up in the evening by countless variegated lamps.

The principal ornament of the Platz, the colossal Music Hall, peered forth through the picturesque groups of lofty trees. The front (the broadest side), with a high portico between two towers, built in the finest style of old German architecture, was a fine sight, agreeably surprising, or rather astounding, the visitor by the loftiness and grandeur of its proportions, as well as by the artistic taste with which it had been carried out, particularly when we remember of what material the whole edifice consisted, and the short time in which it was run up. The reader may form an idea of the capacity of this gigantic hall from the following figures:—It is 390 feet long, 180 feet broad, and in the nave 54 feet high, and comprehends, therefore, a space of 70,000 square feet. The internal arrangements and decorations were most sensible and tasty. In this case again, the most pleasing ornaments were the banners of the various Societies, which hung down from the gallery which had been built solely to receive them. From a round stone basin, decked with flowers, in the centre of the Hall, arose a cooling fountain, worked by a steam-engine at the side of the building. This magnificent Hall was planned by the building board of the Festival Committee, under the presidency of Herr Solger, one of the city architects, and carried out by Herr Schellhorn.

It was not till nine o'clock in the evening that the singers were located upon the broad stage, which of itself formed a large hall. The building was completely filled, admission to the gallery boxes opposite the stage and on each side of the structure, being attained by payment, while the pit was occupied by the inhabitants of the city and their families, who had been invited to attend the solemn opening of the Festival. These highly estimable individuals had the most undeniable right to the invitation, since they had hospitably received in their homes somewhere about five thousand singers. From twelve to fifteen thousand persons were present on the occasion, so the reader will be able to gain some notion of the thunders of applause which broke forth, from time to time, under the most varied forms of expression.

The most conspicuous pieces to welcome and greet the visitors were a fine "Festival March," by Vincenz Lachner; the "Singers' Welcome" of the Augsburg Liedertafel (words by Hertle, music by Fray, members of the above Society); and the instrumental introduction to Arndt's "Vaterlandslied," by F. Lux, of Mayence.

The plan pursued for the two days, the 21st and 22nd July, was: Rehearsal at seven o'clock a.m., the grand performance at four p.m., and separate performances of various Associations at eight o'clock in the evening.

The prices of admission (12 florins for all the performances and two rehearsals; and from 4 to 8 florins for each day, according to the places) were altogether too high. The consequence was that the boxes opposite the orchestra and on each side of the building were but scantily attended the first day, and downright empty the second.

Passing over the speeches delivered at the first grand performance, we will proceed to notice the first eight of the sixteen new compositions executed by the general chorus under the personal supervision of the composers, of whom the only ones absent were Duke Ernest of Gotha, A. Methfessel, Kücken, and Kalliwoda.

MUSIC IN CASSEL.

DURING the first half of the winter season, we had, in addition to other musical performances, four Subscription-Concerts, given by the Elector's Court Orchestra.

At these concerts we heard, in the way of orchestral works, a symphony by Mozart (C minor); one by Spohr (No. 3, C minor); one by Beethoven (No. 4, B flat major); an overture by Mendelssohn; "Schöne Melusine," Schumann; Overture, Scherzo and finale, Gade; "Im Hoch land;" G. Goltermann, Roquette's "Waldmeister's Brautfahrt;" C. Reinecke, "Dame Kobold;" and Schumann's overture to Manfred. Of grand vocal compositions, with orchestra, we had, at the fourth concert, Gade's Comala, thus cast: Comala, Mad. Rübsamen-Veith; Fingal, Herr Rubsamen; Dersagrena, Mlle. Erharrt; and Melicoma, Mad. Rathmann.

Of our local instrumentalists, only Herren Graff and Wipplinger played anything. They were highly successful in De Beriot's Violin Concerto (No. 9, Herr Graff), and Rode (No. 8, E minor).

Among our visitors, Herr Alfred Jaell and Herr Carl Reinecke, Capellmeister, from Leipsig, distinguished themselves as pianists. The first performed Beethoven's Concerto in C minor, according to his own conception of it, with great success, as was to be expected from such a virtuoso. His solo performances, especially his performance of the Tannhäuser March by Luzt, were enthusiastically applauded. Herr Reinecke is less dazzling, but will carry by storm a smaller though more select public. His rendering of Mozart's magnificent Pianoforte Concerto in D major, which is new here, will never be forgotten by lovers of music. Of the solo pieces, Hiller's "Marcia graciosa," which is so peculiarly suited to Reinecke's style, obtained the greatest success. His playing, like the work itself, was distinguished for its clearness, delicacy, and freedom from anything like affectation. At the same concert his overture to Dame Kobold was performed with unanimous approbation.

Herr Jean Becker, the admirable violinist, created even a greater sensation than he produced last year. He selected Rubinstein's enormously difficult but unthankful Violin-Concerto, overcoming with playful ease the terrific difficulties it contains. This work is remarkable for several interesting features and highly original matises, but it is too much spun out, and affects the ear too disagreeably by instances of glaring harshness, for us to venture on predicting for it speedy popularity. Herr Becker performed also Tartoni's "Tairfels-Sonata" and Paganini's "I Palpiti" so perfectly in every respect that, at the conclusion of the last piece, the enthusiasm of the public knew no bounds. He was honoured by being called on six times, and a silver laurel wreath was presented to him by the orchestra.

At the same concert Hiller's songs, "Lebenslust," and "Die Lerchen," for soprano and four male voices, pleased the audience so much that the latter song was loudly encored. Dorn's Mädchen an den Mond" also had to be repeated. All these songs were given by Mad. Rübsamen-Veith with a degree of excellence we should like to see enjoyed by the songs of every good composer.

At the fourth concert, Mad. Kapp-Young made her appearance as a vocalist. This lady possesses a well-trained voice of extensive compass, and can also boast of an advantage becoming more uncommon every day, but on that account the more valuable, namely, a thorough musical and general education. She sang the grand air of Vitellia, from Titus, and three songs by Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer and Molique. She appeared successfully, moreover, in opera, and is engaged, from the 1st August, for first dramatic vocal parts, at the Court theatre.

Of the orchestral works, Galtermann's overture, "Waldmeister's Braut-fahrt" was well received, not as being anything extraordinary, but as the work of a thorough musician. Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale, certainly require only to be repeated in order to become established favourites.

We cannot pass over in silence the concert on Good Friday, if only because it is the single concert of sacred music of which Cassel can boast during the entire year. It consisted, on the present occasion, of Spohr's "Vater Unser," and Mozart's Requiem, both which were most creditably given by the Gesang-Verein and some of the soloists from the Opera House. Great praise is due to our youthful vocalist, Mlle. Erharrt, for her excellent execution of the soprano part in the two works.

BERLIN.—After a six weeks' vacation, the Royal Opera House opened, on the 2nd instant, with Donizetti's Favorita. At Kroll's Theatre, Lortzing's Undine has been drawing excellent houses for some time past.—Signor Lorini, who has just arrived from Russia, has again concluded an engagement with the manager of the Victoria Theatre for Italian Opera next winter. Mr. Balfe is also here. According to report, he has come to consult the celebrated oculist, Dr. Gräfe.—A proof of the advantage to be derived from Signor Garcia's "Larynx-Speculum" has just been afforded by the first operation performed with its aid. Dr. Bruns, of Tubingen, by means of a curved knife, six inches long, with two blades, has cut away a polypus growing far down the larynx of a lady related to him. The lady had lost her voice for three years, but it is now quite restored.

BRUNSWICK.—A very interesting performance was lately given, under the direction of Herr Franz Abt, by the Männergesangverein and the Singacademie, in the old Egidien Kirche, which has been fitted up especially for concerts. The most successful pieces were Mendelssohn's eight-part setting of the 43rd Psalm, and Hauptmann's "Salve Regina." The female chorus sang likewise a very pleasing hymn by Blumenstengel, while the male chorus gave Schubert's "Nachtgesang im Walde," and Abt's "Nineta."—The opera re-opened, after the vacation, with Mehul's Joseph.

WIESBADEN.—The fortuitous presence of several artistic celebrities rendered the fourth concert given by the managers of the baths a very brilliant one. Mad. Bürde-Ney sang airs from Oberon and Ernani; and Herr Wachtel, airs from Die Zauberflöte and Ernani. Herr Didio played fantasias for the violoncello; Herr Ferdinand Hiller Mozart's Concerto in D minor; and Herr Ludwig Strauss, compositions by Vieuxtemps and Strauss. Altogether the concert was a great success.

HOMBURG.—Mlle. Marimont, of the Grand Opera in Paris, Mad. Rosa Escudier-Kastner, Herr Beck, M. Vieuxtemps, and a host of other artists of repute, have been singing and playing at the concerts here.

SCHWERIN.—Herr Flotow is engaged on a new opera, the words by Herr Dingelstadt.

BADEN-BADEN.—Herr Batta, the violoncellist, has received the Order of the Red Eagle from the hands of the King of Prussia himself.

NUREMBERG.—The principal propositions submitted by Herr Müller von der Warra, the Thuringian song writer, to the Festal Committee, were as follows:—I. The singers of Germany, by their representatives, resolve on founding a Vocal Union of all Germany, the object of which shall be—1. The promotion of German national song, by all possible means, both at home and abroad. 2. The introduction of needful reforms. 3. The foundation of an Arndt-Zelter Fund, for the purpose of assisting the families of deceased song-writers and song composers of acknowledged merit. 4. The promotion of intellectual and social intercourse by means of a paper, already established, and entitled Die Sängerhalle. 5. The adoption of a universal decoration for German singers, to be worn in addition to the respective decorations of the various Societies. 6. The building of a Vocal Walhalla in some city, such as Nuremberg, Coburg, or Frankfort-on-the Maine, in the heart of Germany.—II. The representatives of German song, at present stopping in Nuremberg, resolve,—That a German Vocal Festival shall take place every two years, and that the next such Festival shall be held in Frankfort-on-the-Maine or Heidelberg.

ST. PETERSBURGH.—On account of his advanced age, General Alexis Lvoff has tendered his resignation, as Director of the Imperial Chapel, to the Czar, who has accepted it; but at the same time ordered, in consideration of the great services rendered by the general to art, and more especially to Russian art, during the five-and-twenty years he has held office, since it is to his exertions that Russia is indebted for the fact that the Imperial Chapel has been raised to the rank of a first-class art-institution, that he shall enjoy for life the honorary title of "Senator and Mâitre de la Cour," together with the emoluments thereto attached. The Privy Councillor, Bachmétieff, has been appointed the general's successor.

SALZBURG.—Herr Eckert, lately Capellmeister at the Imperial Opera House, Vienna, has accepted a similar appointment at the cathedral here.

Letters to the Editor.

EVERARDI v. GASSIER.

Monday.

Sir,—In one of your notices of the Lyceum, some time since, you say, "M. Gassier for Signor Everardi, in Don Giovanni—an acceptable change." This must surely be a mistake. Were you able to afford sufficient space, I could give you innumerable extracts from your criticisms of last year, in all of which you affirmed that Signor Everardi was the very best "Don" that had appeared on the stage since the great Tamburini. This, Sir, was perfectly true. Everardi was young, handsome, and, moreover, a gentleman; his voice, too, was superb, as every one acknowledged at the time. M. Gassier is a clever artist, without a doubt, and most useful in such parts as Ferrando, in the Trovatore; but I recollect, that when he and Everardi played the Don on alternate nights, you invariably stated that the performance of the latter threw that of the former completely into the shade. I trust, therefore, that in justice to Signor Everardi, you will devote a line (this letter being necessarily too long for insertion) to correction of the error in Saturday's number. In my opinion Signor Everardi was even better in this most difficult of characters than is M. Faure. For Everardi has certainly the finer voice, whilst his acting was not inferior to the Frenchman's.

Being on the subject of opera singers, I cannot refrain from suggesting, that some of the praise lavished on Mad. Carvalho, whose voice is weak and often sharp, would be much better bestowed on Mad. Tiberini, who never sings out of tune, and who, as far as regards style and facility of execution, unquestionably reminds one more of the ever-to-be-regretted Mad. Bosio, than any other soprano at present in London.—I am, &c.,

Ernest Jones.

P.S. Rumour asserts that this is Mad. Carvalho's last season at Covent Garden, because Mlle. Patti will take her place. If this be so, I trust Mr. Gye will retain the services of Mad. Tiberini, who, I feel certain, would be equally good as Gilda in Rigoletto, or as Oscar in the Ballo in Maschera.

Hercules Chambers, Stock Exchange.

[Chacun à son gout. Some like sprats, others buzzards, others phenicopters. Our correspondent evidently likes M. Everard and Mad. Tiberini, and evidently does not like Mad. Carvalho. For our own part we like Patti, and do not object to snipes and rhubarb. Can our correspondent inform us whether a son, a daughter, or twins, was, or were, ever born to Roderick Random and Narcissa? Also, which is the nearest road from Shoreditch to Fez, and what is the other name for Hercules?—Petipace.]

HONOUR TO MUSICIANS.

Sir,—Besides being invariably interesting to artists and amateurs, the "gossip" of the Musical World about "Music and Theatres in Paris" very frequently furnishes exclusive information on subjects connected with operatic, dramatic, and concert sayings and doings in that gay capital which, no doubt, leads to its being perused with avidity by numbers of your other constant readers as well as by myself. In your publication of the 20th ult., the article devoted to that species of matters possessed an unusual attraction for me, because it contained some paragraphs relating to honours conferred on distinguished members of the musical profession in Turkey and in France, to which were added some remarks in a peculiarly facetious vein by the writer, in which he recommended that the example set by the new Sultan, Abdul Assiz, and the practice which prevails in France, of conferring titular rank on composers of eminence, as was illustrated by the letter from the son of Hérold, the author of Zampa, &c.—might be most usefully followed in this country. The names of some of our native composers, whose reputations are already European, are given in one of the paragraphs to which I now refer, which the writer says, with great justice, are fully deserving of being honoured with knighthood—a rank that has already been doled out very sparingly to other ornaments of the profession whose claims to it were not more satisfactorily established. As I have argued seriously, and at some length, on this very subject, at the commencement of the present session of Parliament, in a pamphlet which I then published, under the title of "A Plea for the Unrepresented," I am happy to find that in a humorous sense my sentiments are reciprocated in the pages of a publication which is known as an influential organ of the musical profession. I beg your acceptance of a copy of my modest brochure, and request that you will, at your earliest convenience, give it a perusal. You will find, on doing so, that I have not only advocated the necessity of having honours conferred on distinguished composers, but that I have contended generally in favour of the fine arts, literature, the drama, &c., whose prominent living celebrities I am anxious should share in a portion of those gifts and decorations which have been so lavishly bestowed on men of mark belonging to the military, naval, and legal professions. I have gone even further. I have endeavoured to show the necessity that exists for the incorporation of the members of the professions in question, and that it would be more advantageous to the interests of civilisation, and more conducive to the advancement of social, commercial, educational, and national progress to have the franchise extended to the bodies I have mentioned, in order that their vast and daily increasing importance and interests might be properly advocated in the House of Commons, than to have "college" interests already so strong in the legislature increased by the London and Scottish Universities being represented in Parliament.

Luigi C. Mosca.

TO SHIRLEY BROOKS, ESQ.

(Author of Aspen Court, The Gordian Knot, and The Silver Cord—three romances of life and manners).

Sir,—Who was the old Spanish lady at Paraguay that gave Roderick Random a valuable neck-lack of diamonds and amethysts, set alternately, with which he subsequently invested Narcissa? and what were the transactions at any given time between the said Roderick Random and the said old Spanish lady of Paraguay, who gave him the valuable neck-lack? An immediate answer will oblige.

P.S. Capstaff's Radices is a prime authority. If not at hand, you may consult Pottwick, Ryb, and Buttery. Ryb's Clencher (not to be confounded with Smollett's Clinker) is an epitome of Capstaff's first, third, and fifth capituli. Hurt's Thunder may be glanced at, although in the twenty-third capitulum Hurt upholds (with considerable force) two anti-Capstaffian paradoxes, which, obtaining for a period, had nigh squashed Ryb. In the fifth edition of Thunder, however, Hurt handsomely withdrew his paradoxes, and Ryb was reimposed as Capstaff's trustworthiest commentator. Ryb is becoming rare. Hurt calls him, in the appendix to Thunder, "Spare-Rib."

HIS EYES.*

By E. Willis Fletcher.

(For Music.)

When wandering through the sunny meadows,
Flower gathering side by side,
A feeling oft comes o'er me stealing,
That he will some day call me Bride.
Together when we've read sweet love-tales,
I've felt the blush on my cheek rise;
He's never told me that he loves me,
But his heart's betrayer is his eyes.

Those eyes of his, so deep—expressive,
E'er burning with the student's pride;
Oh! how he's talked of nature's beauties,
As gathering flowers side by side!
When sorrowing o'er fair Juliet's sufferings,
To hide his secret hard he tries;
His actions are well studied—acted,
But his heart's unveiled by his eyes.
Those eyes that make the blushes rise—
Those deep and dark, those tell-tale eyes!

OMEGA.—We shall be happy to publish any suggestion from "Omega," provided they are unaccompanied by personalities. We believe, however, the whole scheme has fallen through, and that there is virtually an end of it.

AN OCCASIONAL CORRESPONDENT.—An article was already in type when our correspondent's letter arrived.

CATCHCATCHCATCHCATCH.—"Not by no means." The paragraph was as follows:—"Existence continues to smoulder on in certain institutions more pertinaciously, we fancy, in this England of ours than in any other country. Useful old libraries where no one studies — museums frequented by no visitors — Gresham lectures delivered to congregations of six listeners, or thereabouts — what melancholy monuments of the beneficence of our forefathers and the uncertain good of endowments and 'mortifications' (as the Scotch call legacies) are these!—The history of extant clubs, lingering on without much trace of the original link or idea, would not be a bad theme for any one having a taste for dowager literature and anecdote. We have been led into this vein of retrospect by observing chronicled in the papers the first meeting for the season of 'The Catch Club.' Time was when this festive gathering had a distinct influence upon English music and English composers. Perhaps, even in these days, a new glee may every now and then be heard there. But when the last new 'Catch?' This farcical music, admitting of quaint humour without vulgarity, and giving scope to ingenuity if not science, is among our most peculiar natural productions; but it seems to have died 'out of sound, out of mind,' almost as completely as the old hackney-coach or the old watchman!"

LONDON: SATURDAY, AUGUST 17, 1861.

IT is with unfeigned regret we have this week to chronicle a serious loss to the Vocal Art, in the death of Catherine Hayes. The celebrated Irish songstress expired on Sunday last, at Sydenham, after a very brief illness. Catherine Hayes was only forty years of age, and in the zenith of her fame and full command of her powers. She dies universally lamented. In social life, a more amiable lady never existed. She was a true-hearted Irishwoman, and was ever ready, with her voice or her purse, to assist the distressed. She was idolised by her immediate friends; and her loss will be deeply deplored by all who happened to come within the circle of her acquaintance. As a public character, she was equally respected for the strict decorum of her life, and admired for the powers and versatility of her talents. No singer, in short, ever left a fairer name behind her, or more emphatically merited the name of an "artist."

A brief sketch of the life and career of so popular a personage cannot fail to interest our readers. Catherine Hayes was born in Limerick about the year 1820. Her first instructions in music were derived from an accomplished lady amateur, who having heard her sing when a child, was so charmed with her voice and facility, that she assisted her as far as she was able to a knowledge of the pianoforte and singing. To the Hon. and Right Reverend E. Knox, Bishop of Limerick, however, Catherine Hayes was indebted for her first step towards a public life. The Bishop, having heard her sing by accident, invited her to the See House, and she soon became the star of a series of musical reunions, chiefly given for her instruction by her kind patron. The progress made by the young lady was so extraordinary that the Bishop at once perceived her talents might be turned to the best account — that is, made instrumental to the world's delight—and, having consulted his own friends and those of his protégée,—with feelings and opinions very different from those of the Bishop or Bishops who wished to dissuade Jenny Lind from appearing on the stage,—sent her to Dublin, and placed her under the care of Signor Antonio Sapio, the most eminent vocal professor in the Irish metropolis. Catherine Hayes arrived in Dublin on the 1st of April, 1839, and, so great was the confidence reposed in her by her teacher, made her first appearance in public on the 3rd of May following, in the large room of the Rotunda. Nor was he disappointed. The success of the débutante, at first somewhat marred by extreme nervousness, was in the end triumphant, and from that day may be dated the artistic career of Catherine Hayes. Her success, however, did not stimulate her to immediate action. She remained under the tuition of Signor Sapio until August 1842, and in the October of the same year went to Paris, and studied diligently and zealously for some months with Signor Emmanuel Garcia, the brother of Malibran, As, nevertheless. she was bent on making the lyric stage her profession, she was advised at once to proceed to Italy, as the only theatre for obtaining dramatic requirements indispensable for success in that calling. She accordingly proceeded to Milan, and placed herself under the instruction of Signor Felice Ronconi, brother of the celebrated barytone. While at Milan, our heroine was introduced to the once celebrated Mad. Grassini, aunt to Grisi, who was so pleased and surprised at her talents, that she wrote to Provini, manager of the Italian Opera at Marseilles, and procured her an engagement. Her début took place on the 10th of May, 1845, in I Puritani. The ordeal was a terrible one, as may be imagined; but, after a long struggle to overcome timidity, the singer recovered her powers, and made quite a furor. Her second and third appearances were in Lucia and Mosé in Egitto. She returned to Milan, and, although she was offered an engagement at the Grand Opera, Paris, and some of the minor Italian theatres, she declined all proposals, convinced that she was still but a novice, and gave her undivided attention to study under the direction of Signor Ronconi. Signor Morelli, director of the La Scala Theatre, however, having heard her at a private soirée, tendered her an engagement, which, after some hesitation, she accepted; and, only three months after her début, she appeared at the then first lyric theatre in Europe, as Linda, in Linda di Chamouni, a character in which she subsequently achieved perhaps her brightest laurels. The success of her first night at the Scala may be estimated by the fact of her being recalled twelve times in the course of the performance. Her second appearance was in Otello, and her graceful and delicate portraiture of the "gentle Desdemona," won for her the designation of "La Parla del Teatro." During the remainder of her stay at Milan, including the autumn season of 1845 and the carnival of 1846, Catherine Hayes won "golden opinions from all sorts of people," and was quite the pet of the Milanese aristocracy. From Milan she proceeded to Vienna, to fulfil an engagement there; and thence went to Venice, where she appeared on the first night of the carnival, 1847, in a new opera, entitled Albergo di Romano, composed expressly for her by a young Italian nobleman. We need not follow the artist with any further minuteness in her career on the continent. Her progress through the Italian states for the two subsequent years was marked by the most undeviating success. In 1849 Catherine Hayes came to London, and appeared at the Royal Italian Opera, in Linda di Chamouni. The greatest curiosity was manifested about the Hibernian cantatrice, who perhaps was never so closely scrutinised, so severely judged. The general verdict, however, was in the highest degree satisfactory, and Catherine Hayes became one of the reigning favourites in an establishment which boasted of such high names as those of Grisi, Persiani, Alboni, Mario, Tamburini, and Lablache. In 1851 Catherine Hayes visited the New World, and after enchanting the musical public of the United States, ventured to entrust herself to the rugged courtesies of the semi-barbaric tribes of California, whom she appears to have tamed by her song, and almost to have converted to civilisation. Her tour in these remote regions being incredibly successful, induced her to extend it to the Sandwich Isles, to Australia, and to British India, in all of which places she reaped abundant harvests, and returned to England in 1856, having amassed a handsome fortune. In the November of that year she made her rentrée at M. Jullien's Concerts at Her Majesty's Theatre, and afterwards made tournées in the provinces, awaking the old sensation in England and Scotland, and more than ever exciting the applause of her enthusiastic admirers in "Ould Ireland." In 1857 she married Mr. Bushnell, who had had the direction of her professional affairs throughout her transatlantic trip. The marriage, however, was soon dissolved by death, and Mrs. Bushnell became a widow before she had been twelve months a wife. The remainder of her artistic career up to the time of her decease was occupied in provincial tours and engagements at the metropolitan concerts.

The vocal powers of Catherine Hayes were not of the highest order. Her voice was a true soprano, with more than an average share of the middle voice, which enabled her to sing music beyond the means of ordinary sopranos. The tone was brilliant and telling, rather than clear and sweet, being slightly veiled, or clouded, and not possessing that purity of quality we might point to in many native and foreign cantatrice. This voice, however, the artist had disciplined to so high a degree of perfection as to enable her to produce effects out of the power of far more gifted singers. Catherine Hayes was a great mistress of expression, and this, with her innate delicacy and high susceptibilities, threw such a charm round her ballad singing as to render it irresistible. With such means and impulses, it is not difficult to account for the prodigious success she achieved in Ireland when interpreting the national ballads of the country, into which she appeared to throw her whole soul, and which she delivered with so much earnestness and reality as to savour, at least in sober English ears, of exaggeration. No doubt with a more captivating and sweeter organ all this eagerness for display would not have been required—most probably not manifested; and in this, as in everything else connected with her singing, Catherine Hayes exhibited the consummate artist, as she knew exactly how far she was deficient, and in what she could prevail. Her influence over the feelings of the Irish was absolutely magical, and no other singer of our own times had the same power to arouse them to such ecstacy and admiration. She held, indeed, the key to the hearts of her countrymen, and could open and shut them as she listed. As a bravura singer, we are inclined to rate Catherine Hayes higher than as a ballad singer. Indeed, her art appeared to us invariably to predominate over her natural gifts, and while that which was simple seemed to be forced, her ornamental displays were often in the highest degree satisfactory. At all events, in whatever light we may be inclined to view her, it cannot be denied that a real singer has gone from us, and as such the loss of Catherine Hayes is to be seriously lamented.

IF Lesueur, the Frenchman, is talked about and little known, Robert Schumann, the German, is talked about and as little understood. The career of this composer cannot be better described than in his own words; we avail ourselves, therefore, in this dull (though bright and hot) season of a memorial which he addressed, in 1840, to the University of Jena, when soliciting his diploma as an advocate:—

"I was born at Zwickau, on the 8th June, 1810. My father, who was a bookseller, rendered his name familiar to the public by several literary works. I received a most careful and most affectionate education. From my very infancy I was passionately fond of music, and I recollect that, without any previous training, I composed, at the age of eleven, choral and instrumental works. My father, who had resolved to push me forward, had some interviews concerning me with Karl Maria von Weber, at Dresden, but they resulted in nothing. It was thus that I entered college, without, however, ceasing to pursue my musical studies with ardour.

"In 1828 I attended the Leipsic University, in order to follow the course of philosophy there. In 1829 I left for Heidelberg, being more especially attracted by the reputation which Thibaut enjoyed as a theorist. It was at Heidelberg that I began to devote myself exclusively to the study of music, in which I was considerably assisted by my tolerably developed skill as a pianist. In 1830 I went back to Leipsic, and having gone through, under the direction of M. Horn, a course of composition, published my first works. The critics treated me with kindness. Being protected by some little fortune against the adverse circumstances which ordinarily fall to the lot of young artists, I was enabled to confine myself to the study of the highest class of composition. About this time there prevailed in Europe a certain agitation, which extended to the arts. I conceived the idea of founding, in conjunction with a few artists and writers (among whom I may mention my friend, Louis Schunke, snatched from us in his prime), a new musical gazette. It appeared in April 1834, and was successful. In the following year the editorship passed completely into my hands.

"Although my energies were thus divided, my productive activity did not prove too onerous a burden, and in my new position, I had the good fortune to become connected with most contemporary artists and composers. My connection increased from year to year, and enabled me to take under my ægis those youthful aspirants who manifested talent. My paper contributed greatly to the reputation of Chopin, Clara Wieck, D'Henselt, &c.

"The only notable facts I have to record, in connection with my career, are the flattering marks of distinction bestowed on me by the musical societies of Rotterdam and Stuttgard, as well as the Euterpe of Leipsic, all of which named me an honorary member. Up to the present time (1840) I have published twenty-two musical compositions, of which some have been played by Liszt, Clara Wieck, Henselt and others. Some of them bear my pseudonyms of Florestan and Eusebius. Most of the critical notices on instrumental music in the New Gazette are mine; they are signed either with my real name or with that of Florestan or Eusebius."

Schumann's musical taste received its principal impulse from Moscheles, with whom, when a very young man, he became acquainted, in 1822, at Carlsbad, whither he had accompanied his father, and where he had frequent opportunities of hearing the celebrated pianist, for whom he entertained a feeling of enthusiastic admiration. Retaining a lively impression of what he heard, Schumann was soon able to perform Moscheles' variations on "Alexander's March." Thus he was, even now, more or less a pianist, although it was not till 1830 that he received his first serious lessons on the piano from Frederick Wieck, in Leipsic. In Schumann's opinion, these lessons were not attended with sufficiently prompt results, and he conceived the unfortunate notion of subjecting his fingers to all sorts of unnatural exercises, for the purpose of rendering them free and supple. He shut himself up for weeks together, and worked on the piano like a madman. In consequence of this stubborn perseverance, he ended by losing the use of the third finger of the right hand, and subsequently of the entire hand. From this time forward he busied himself only with composition.

In 1836 he fell in love with Clara Wieck. The lady's father having refused him her hand, Schumann appealed to the law; and it was not till 1840 that he was enabled to marry. It was in the same year that he wrote his finest collections of Lieder, among which Ops. 25, 36, and 40 occupy a prominent position. From the year 1841 Schumann devoted himself more especially to the composition of instrumental works, among which may be specified the Symphony in B flat, Op. 38; three quartets for stringed instruments, Op. 41; the quintet, Op. 44; and the quartet, Op. 47, for piano. From 1843 down to the month of September 1844 (when he left for Dresden), he was attached to the Conservatory at Leipsic. Paradise and the Peri, also, Schumann's most ambitious composition, dates from 1843. In January, 1844, he set out upon a professional tour in Russia, with his wife (Clara Wieck). He returned in June, when he gave up the editorship of the New Leipsic Gazette to Dr. Brendel. In 1846 he composed his Symphony in C, Op. 61; his trio, Op. 80, belongs to 1847; and in 1848 his opera of Genoveva was completed. In 1848, too, Schumann founded the Choral Society at Dresden, although he had previously conducted the Liedertafel since 1847. In the autumn of 1850 he was appointed conductor at Düsseldorf, where he remained till 1853. In the commencement of the spring of 1854 his intellectual powers began to be deranged, in consequence of excessive work; and, on the 4th of March, it was necessary to convey him to a maison de santé at Endenich, near Bonn. In the autumn of 1855 some hopes were entertained of his recovery; but he died on the 29th July, 1856, and was buried at Bonn.

The musical world lost in Schumann a man of earnest intention, if not a great musical composer. It was he (whatever may be said to the contrary) who, with Chopin and Liszt, was the first to sow the seeds from which sprang the school of the "Music of the Future." He was equally the creator, the representative, and the propagator of the so-called "romantic school," which has caused art to make an infinity of grimaces and contortions. The future will prove whether those who have entered on the path which Schumann opened have taken the right or the wrong direction.

"ONE WHO PAYS,"

POSSIBLY A CRITIC.

Mr. Gye has been out tenor-fishing during the recess; and, after trying somewhere near the margin of Zurich's fair waters and other spots which are at times frequented by fine fish, he has landed a fine specimen, a Signor Tiberini, who may have sprung, for aught I know, from the banks of the Tiber. Leaving critics to determine whether or no he really be a tenor pur sang, and capable of giving out the ut de poitrine, I am content to recollect that he has pleased me as a singer, and as an actor has evinced himself well grounded in his art. If he have not the grace and sweetness of Mario and Rubini, the energy of Tamberlik, or sustained notes of Giuglini, he has enough charms of his own to make his voice worth hearing; and as a perfect tenor is rather a rare fish, I think we may congratulate the active Mr. Gye on having made so good a catch.

One who Pays.

[Possible, says Aristotle, is that — the contrary whereof is possible; and the like whereof is possible; and than which some harder thing is possible; and the beginning whereof is possible; and the end whereof is possible; and the usual consequent whereof is possible; and part whereof is possible; and part of the whole that is possible; and the general if a particular; and a particular if the general; and of relatives, of one the other; and the beginning whereof is possible to those whom we may compel or persuade; and whatever we desire. Therefore it is possible that Signor Tiberini may have "charms," and "One who pays" detect them. It is also possible that Poerio "sprang" from the banks of the Po, and Signor Arnoruotafórbici from those of the Arno. But (as Ariosto sings) —

"A le mortal grandezze un certo fine
Ha Dio prescritto."

"One who pays" must not, therefore, be too hard upon his brother critics, who may be as honest, if not as pungent, as himself.

Petipace.

The Boudoir Opera Company, consisting of Miss F. Thirlwell, Mad. Winter, Signor Borrani, and Mr. Melchor Winter, have been giving their operatic selections during the week with success at Whitchurch, Market Drayton, and Eccleshall.

The Female Swiss Singers commence their provincial tour on Monday, August 26th, at the conclusion of their engagement at the Royal Cremorne Gardens. They are engaged to sing at two grand fêtes at the Horticultural Gardens, Barnard Castle, Durham, on Tuesday, 27th instant.

Mrs. Anna Maria Tree, relict of the late Cornelius Tree, and mother of Mrs. Bradshaw, Mrs. Charles Kean, and Mrs. Chapman, died on the 25th ult., at No. 5, Randolph Road, Maida Hill, aged ninety-one.

Miss Charlotte Cushman, the eminent actress, was one of the passengers in the Persia, which arrived in Liverpool last week. From the present state of theatricals in the United States, we may look for other importations of the dramatic talent from amongst our transatlantic friends.

Honour to Auber.—The distribution of prizes to the pupils of the Conservatoire de Musique of Paris took place on Thursday. Count Walewski presided and announced that the Emperor, to mark his sense of the progress made, had conferred the cross of Grand Officer of the Legion of Honour on the illustrious director, M. Auber. The secretary, M. de Beauchêne, was also presented with the cross of the Legion of Honour.

Mr. Alfred Mellon's Concerts. — The promenade concerts last summer in Floral-Hall succeeded so well as to justify a renewal of the experiment. This time, however, the glass building, owing to circumstances unnecessary to mention, not being available, a substitute has been found in the interior of the Royal Italian Opera; and it must be confessed that for all musical purposes the change is infinitely for the better. The theatre presents much the same appearance as at the famous and much-regretted concerts with which Jullien used to enliven the dreary winter months. The grand tier of private boxes is now a balcony, as at the performances of English opera, and the pit is boarded over to a level with the stage, so as to form a gigantic promenade, of which the orchestra is a central and most imposing object. The lighting and decorations being in every respect efficient, the whole looks as brilliant and animated as could be desired. If any one can make such entertainment answer in the meridian of summer it is assuredly Mr. Alfred Mellon, who not only knows how to "cater" for the public, but is a recognized and universal favourite. This was shown by the enthusiastic welcome he received on appearing in the orchestra. That so cordial a greeting was not misplaced became speedily manifest. A grander performance of the overture to Der Freischütz, with which the concert began, was probably never heard. Every amateur is aware that when Mr. Alfred Mellon holds the conductor's stick the band is pretty sure to be a good one. Accomplished a director as he is — and it would be difficult to find his superior — his talent would be of small avail without the requisite material to work upon. No one is more firmly convinced of this than Mr. Mellon himself; and as these are his own concerts the appointment of the instrumental performers devolves exclusively upon himself. The result is one of the most superb orchestras ever assembled together in London or elsewhere. Weber's magnificent overture (which was followed by a storm of applause, and an "encore" very prudently declined) would alone have demonstrated this. A little later in the evening, nevertheless, the fact was established beyond the possibility of doubt by Mendelssohn's admirable symphony in A major (the so-called "Italian"), the execution of which was, from beginning to end, irreproachable. Movement after movement, played with unerring perfection, and with no less point and vigour than correctness, excited the interest of the hearers to such a degree that they would willingly have listened to the entire symphony again; and indeed, had the popular conductor been one of those who readily accept encores, the irresistible Saltarello which brings it to a termination, might have been repeated without the chance of a dissentient voice. Mr. Mellon's audiences, however, are proverbial for good taste, and "nothing if not musical."

The overture and symphony were the "classical" features of the programme, the prevalent character of which was "miscellaneous." For, example, there were two instrumental solos, besides the "obbligato" for the cornet à pistons (Mr. Levy), in Jullien's melodious "Prima Donna" Waltz, which every one was heartily delighted to have revived. The first of these solos was a "Valse Caprice" (whatever that may precisely signify) on the French horn, by M. Paquis, a very skilful player, who has more than once been heard with satisfaction at the concerts given in the Crystal Palace, under the superintendence of the inexhaustible Herr Manns. The second was a pot-pourri, for the oboe, on themes from La Traviata, the performer (and composer) being M. Lavigne, one of the most showy, tasteful, and expert executants of the present period. This last was a success, "hors-ligne," and very deservedly so. The orchestral "Selection" was a capital one, from La Favorita, compiled by Mr. Alfred Mellon, and exhibiting to the highest advantage the solo-playing of Messrs. Pratten (flute), Hughes (ophicleide), H. Hill (violin), G. Collins (violoncello), and Levy (cornet)—all professors of acknowledged and distinguished ability. The dance pieces (in addition to the "Prima Donna") included the spirited Royal Dramatic College Quadrille by Mr. Alfred Mellon (followed by "Rule Britannia" and "God Save the Queen"), at the conclusion of the first part, and the Whirlwind Galop of Mr. H. W. Goodban, which effectively closed the second.

The vocal music embraced both choral and solo pieces. Two hundred members of the National Choral Society, directed by Mr. G. W. Martin, were stationed in the gallery, and (at the outset, much to the surprise of the audience, unacquainted with the locality which had been assigned to them) gave the "Last Rose of Summer," Mr. Martin's Choral March ("Forward, still Forward!"), and a part-song by Spofforth, in the best possible style. The solo singing was first-rate, the vocalists being Mlle. Parepa and Madame Laura Baxter. With Verdi's "Ernani involami" Mlle. Parepa surpassed any of her previous efforts in clearness, taste and brilliancy, and with the familiar "Bravura" (Mad. Bosio's favourite) from Auber's Serment created so lively a sensation that a repetition of the last movement was inevitable. Equally fortunate was Mad. Laura Baxter, whose execution of the contralto air of the female goatherd from Dinorah ("Fanciulle che il core") was in no way inferior to that of Mad. Nantier Didiée herself (for whom Meyerbeer composed it), and who gave the simple ballad of "Home, sweet Home" with such unaffected and genuine expression that it was unanimously redemanded, the last verse being repeated as a matter of course.

The audience had every reason to be pleased with the entertainment provided for them, and Mr. Mellon with the liberal applause elicited by every piece in the programme, and especially with the marked attention and applause bestowed upon the overture of Weber and the symphony of Mendelssohn, which, to one who has the real interests of music so much at heart, must have been peculiarly gratifying.

Signor Ciabatta's Matinee.—This very spirited and elegant affair came off on Saturday, June 22nd, at the residence of Mrs. Washington Hibbert, Dover Street, Piccadilly, under the patronage of their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge, and the Princess Mary, with a long list of the élite of the aristocracy. With the exception of a pianoforte solo by Signor Andreoli, and a solo on the violoncello by Signor Piatti, the entire programme was devoted to vocal music, which engaged the talents of Mlle. Titiens, Mlle. Parepa, Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mad. Gassier, Mad. Lemaire, Signors Gardoni, Solieri, Belletti, Burdini, and Ciabatta, Mr. Swift, Mr. Tennant, M. Jules Lefort, and M. Gassier. Signor Ciabatta was somewhat chary of his services on the occasion, supplying one solo only, the air of Renato from the Ballo in Maschera, "Eri tu che macchiavi," which he gave with such fine expression and good taste as greatly to please his high-born listeners, whose ears doubtless were thirsty for another draught from the same harmonious source. Besides the aria, Signor Ciabatta joined Signor Solieri in Gabussi's duet, "Prima che l'Alba;" Mads. Gassier and Lemaire, Signor Gardoni, and M. Gassier, in the popular quintet, "E scherzo ed e follia," from the Ballo in Maschera, which was encored; Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington in Benedict's duet, "I Montanari;" and Signors Solieri and Belletti in the famous trio "Pappataci" from the Italiana in Algeri. Mlle. Titiens' grand display was the aria "Non mi dir," from Don Giovanni, which after her no living songstress that we know durst encounter with safety. The great Teutonic vocalist also sang a romanza by Mariani, entitled, "Ho piantato una rosa." The rest of the programme was composed of old pieces, which, nevertheless, afforded unqualified delight to the noble assembly who filled the splendid rooms of the fair hostess.

Enfield.—In consequence of many persons being unable to gain admission to the concert held last month in the National School Room, and in order to clear off the small debt still due for the organ bought for the Royal Small Arms Factory, the officers gave another concert in the British School Rooms, on Tuesday last, for which they secured the services of the Royal Artillery Band, and the valuable co-operation of Mr. Tennant, the popular tenor. Mr. Beale, a talented pianist and organist, also assisted. In addition to the above, Mrs. Fraser Baddeley, one of the most accomplished amateur vocalists of the day, kindly consented to sing. Miss Sale, also an amateur, played a solo on the pianoforte, and the Choral Society of the Royal Small Arms Factory executed several morceaux in a remarkably promising manner. The chief honours of the evening fell to the share of Mrs. Baddeley, the fair amateur, whose charming manner of giving the ballad of "Coming through the rye," merited the warm applause it received, and who, besides joining Mr. Tennant in a duet from the Trovatore, "Se mami ancor," sung, with the chorus, among other pieces, Bishop's always welcome "Chough and crow." Mr. Tennant was in excellent voice, and sang Blumenthal's "Evening song" with so much taste and expression that he was forced to repeat it. Various other pieces were given during the evening. Mr. Abel played some airs on an instrument entituled the Zither; Mr. Beale, an effective pianoforte solo; the fine band of the Royal Artillery the overtures to Semiramide and Guillaume Tell, as well as a galop and polonaise with vocal accompaniment, and the chorus of the Royal Small Arms Factory — the young girls belonging to it being, by the by, most becomingly dressed in white frocks and pink trimmings — gave the "Last rose of summer," arranged by Balfe, and Mendelssohn's "Spring delights," in capital style. Altogether the concert gave great satisfaction, and too much praise cannot be given to Mrs. Baddeley for her earnest endeavours to promote the healthy amusements of the members of the "Royal Small Arms Factory."

Norwich.—(From a Correspondent.)—The Norwich Choral Society gave their second subscription concert in St. Andrew's Hall, on Thursday evening week, when was performed Handel's oratorio, Judas Maccabæus, with Mr. Perry's accompaniments, to a crowded audience. The principal singers were Miss Eleonora Wilkinson, Miss Belden, Miss Wells, Mr. Perren, and Mr. Lambert, who were assisted by a full orchestral band and a chorus of three hundred voices. Mr. Harcourt was organist, Mr. Henry Blagrove leader, and Mr. Hill conductor. Miss Wilkinson sang with genuine expression. Mr. Perren sang, "How vain is man!" and "Sound an alarm," so as to leave nothing to be desired. Miss Wells' singing of "So rapid thy course is," and "Father of heaven," was characterised by excellent taste. Mr. Lambert gave, "Arm! arm! ye brave," and "The Lord worketh wonders," most admirably. Of the choruses it is impossible to speak in terms of too high praise. Than "O, Father, whose almighty power," "Hear us, O Lord," and "Fall'n is the foe," nothing could have been finer. Upon the whole this may be considered one of the best concerts ever given by the Choral Society.

THE GREAT THEATRE AT MOSCOW.

(From The Russians at Home — by Sutherland Edwards.)

One morning in the winter of 1853, during a rehearsal, the theatre at Moscow caught fire, and, with the exception of the outer walls, was burnt to the ground. During the year 1854 there was no "Great Theatre;" but in the spring of 1855 the masons and bricklayers set vigorously to work, and the whole theatre, with all its decorations, was completed in a year and four months. It is true that the builders raised our Covent Garden from its ruins in less than half that time, and that the entire Winter Palace in St. Petersburg was erected in a twelvemonth; but to finish the Moscow Theatre, the most finished that exists, in a year and four months (including a winter of nearly six months, during which it is impossible for bricklayers to work), was a very creditable performance.

M. Cavos, the architect of the new theatre, had already been engaged to remedy some fault in the construction of the St. Petersburg Opera House, which caused the singers to be heard to great disadvantage, and which had always existed. This theatre was first erected in Catherine's reign. It was reconstructed, and, having been burned down, reconstructed again by Alexander I. At last the Emperor Nicholas called in M. Cavos, who had been mentioned as the man of the situation. M. Cavos pulled down the interior and rebuilt it, when it was found that not only was the theatre admirable for sonority, but that the stage was wider, and the salle more spacious, and altogether handsomer than before.

At Moscow, then, M. Cavos had, to a great extent, to do what he had already done at St. Petersburg, only that at the Moscow theatre the space was greater and the reconstruction more thorough. There, as at the St. Petersburg Theatre, the acoustic problem has been solved most satisfactorily. Not the slightest sound is lost, there is not the least tendency to an echo, and you can hear equally well in all parts of the house.

There are five rows of boxes at the Moscow Opera House, besides an amphiteatre and a gallery, or "paradis," which occupies the whole of the top tier. There are sixteen boxes on the pit tier, thirty on the grand tier, or bel étage, and twenty on each of the amphitheatres tiers. Every box in the theatre has a room, or "cabinet," attached to it; those on the bel étage have "cabinets," which are so many little drawing-rooms, furnished with sofas, mirrors, and damask hangings. The usual allowance of chairs for each box is six, but there is plenty of room for ten or twelve persons, or even more, according to our Western notions of theatrical comfort. Each person taking a box is as much the proprietor of it for the evening as if it were his ordinary residence. It holds as many as you like to put into it; and, of course, for this very reason it is a proof of very bad taste to fill it.

The Emperor has two boxes at the Moscow Theatre — one for gala nights in the middle of the bel étage, very magnificent, and reaching to the tier above; the other a comparatively quiet affair on the right of the stage, but, at the same time, the most richly-decorated proscenium-box ever seen. Adjoining the latter is a lofty and splendidly furnished drawing-room leading to a retiring-room. These apartments, to which there is a special staircase and entrance, are always prepared for the Emperor when he is in Moscow. Opposite the ordinary Imperial box is one set apart for the Ministers of State.

For the general public there are on the ground floor about five hundred stalls. Each stall is a separate arm-chair, in which you can enjoy as much space as you would desire in any drawing-room. There is a passage down the middle of the "stalls" — as in the pit of Her Majesty's, only wider—and there is a passage all round them; so that at any period of the evening you can walk quietly to or from your place without incommoding either yourself or your neighbour.

The price of stalls is regulated by their proximity to the stage, and also by the attractiveness of the performances. When the Italians are playing, the chairs in the front rows let for six roubles (about a pound), the back rows for five and four roubles. A bureau for the sale of tickets, attached to the theatre, is open all day and during the performances, but no money is taken at the doors; nor, on entering the theatre, are you required to give up your ticket, or even, as a rule, to show it. Each ticket entitles the holder to a seat, and in order that there may be abundance of room for some two thousand persons no such thing as "standing room" is recognised. If you do not know the way to your place, there are plenty of attendants to point it out to you; and it is for the place you pay, not for the mere admission. The Russians take their servants with them to the theatre, and in the winter the wide corridors on each tier are full of them. They mount guard at the back of the boxes, perhaps criticising the music or, more probably by far, the audience, and waiting in readiness to call the carriage at the first nod, and to untie the sheet in which are inclosed the furs and goloshes that their masters and mistresses will put on before venturing from the vestibule down the steps of the portico to their covered sledge.

It may be mentioned that behind the stalls there are rows of seats with partitions (like the stalls at Her Majesty's Theatre). They let for about half the price of the stalls—two or three roubles during the performances of the Italians, and three-quarters of a rouble afterwards—and correspond to our pit.

The general appearance of the interior is brilliant and imposing. A great deal of gold is employed in the ornamentation, but it is distributed with taste. The panels of the boxes are white, ribbed with a delicate light blue, and are adorned with a gold scrollwork, the borders being pure white. The two proscenium boxes seem built of gold; but they are very lofty, and have a light and elegant appearance, in spite of the richness of the decoration. All the hangings are of crimson damask silk.

But the most remarkable thing about the interior of this theatre has yet to be mentioned.

In the construction of boxes the architect has had the happy idea of combining the Italian with the French style. The retiring-rooms represented the Italian boxes, the boxes themselves the French ones. The crimson hangings adorn and partly conceal the former, which are thus made to resemble the private boxes at an Italian Opera House; while the latter unite and form one large balcony, like the French balcon, or the dress-circle of an English theatre. During the performance the inhabitants of the boxes come forward, and the ladies' toilettes are seen to advantage, as in the French theatres. During the entr'acte they retire to their miniature drawing-rooms, or loges à l'Italienne, as M. Cavos calls them, and receive their friends in the Italian style.

It is like going out of your real domestic drawing-room into the balcony to see some show, and then returning inside when the show is at an end.

The drop-scene, an admirable painting by Duzi, a Venetian, the colour of which harmonises perfectly with the decorations of the theatre, represents the triumphal entry of Prince Pojarsky and Minin, the cattle-dealer of Nijni Novgorod, into the Kremlin, after the liberation of Moscow from the Poles 1612. Minin and Pojarsky are seen on horseback approaching the Holy Gate, and surrounded by groups of enthusiastic peasants and citizens. The women are dressed in kakosniks and sarafans, like the Russian wet nurses in the present day, and the men in caftans and girdles, the unchanged and apparently unchangeable costume of the Russian peasant. Prince Pojarsky, too, wears the Oriental costume habitual to the boyars until the time of Peter. The picture is very dramatic, and it has the advantage of recalling one of the most popular eras in Russian history.

The lighting of the theatre is effected by means of one enormous central chandelier, which burns oil, and ninety candelabra, each of which bears seven wax tapers. The candelabra are equally distributed along the five rows of boxes, but on ordinary occasions only those of the bel étage are made us of. When, however, the Emperor appears in state the whole theatre is lighted up, and the brilliant effect of the illumination is heightened by the number of diamonds displayed by the ladies of the Court. No one is admitted except by invitation, and all the men have to appear in uniform.

A LETTER FROM A FRIEND IN GLASGOW TO A FRIEND IN LONDON.

As I saw fair Flora with old Bob Ridley by the sad sea waves in the Strand, Je pense a toi. She wore a wreath of roses in the evening dew, but she never told her love so early in the morning—Le calme du Matin. He never said he loved—Nel Silenzio. We met in the days when we went gipsying, and we parted down among the dead men—Ah! che la morte.

Aunt Sally and Uncle Tom took an express galop all among the barley to the haunt of the fairies. I saw them on their winding way galop on gaily down in a flowery vale, far o'er hill and dale, 'till they seemed to be well through the wood—A una fonte afflitto. However, the mountain stream rolling in foaming billows over the dark blue waters, with its warblings at eve, whispered they are not lost, but gone before—Alla gioja ed il piacer. King Pippin said to Alice Gray, "As we have been friends together, now place your hand in mine, dear, and together let us stray, for then you'll remember me, and perhaps we may be happy yet—Oh! tu m'ami." She replied, "I'm Queen of a fairy band; oh, no, we never mention:" but the king, God bless him! interrupting her, while on yonder rock reclining, addressed her as friend of my soul, and pressed for the kiss, dear maid, adding, "Oh, whisper what thou feelest," calling her his rosebud, the fairest of the fair, Queen of hearts. She screamed, "Oh, dear, what can the matter be!—Thou art so near. Twere vain to tell thee all I feel!" and soothingly said, "Hush! ye pretty warbling choir. Take heed, whisper low—somebody's coming;" 'till at length, with one struggle more, "She sweetly o'er my senses stealing," said, "Of what is the old man thinking? Thine is my heart. Nothing more—Tutto e sciolto." The king, seeing her fading away, said, "Come, rest in this bosom. Why are you weeping? Galatea, dry thy tears—Fra poco a me." Alas, those chimes! sounds so joyful at close of day, warn me Time around his dial stealing, and I must be peaceful slumbering; so take this cup of sparkling wine, and in memoriam let the toast be dear woman; for assuredly the best of all good company is woman's love. Her last words at parting were, "Cheer up, Sam! Have faith in one another. Fear not, but trust in Providence. Nil desperandum. My heart's in the Highlands, so for the sake of these I pray thee let me have a place in thy memory, for I am on by the spur of valour goaded. Mrs. Macdonald and Lucy Neale have lang Syne gone to Les soupirs; so farewell, but whenever. Yours,

AD LIBITUM.

P.S.—In Katey's letter they tell me thou'rt the favoured guest,

VOLTI SUBITO.

BRUSSELS.—The first prize of 10,000 francs, offered by the Government for the best cantata, has not been awarded to any one; but half the second of 5,000 francs has been carried off by M. Duport, of Lüttich, and half by M. Vaudervelpen, of Malines. M. Van Hoye, of the latter town, was honourably mentioned.

MADAME SAINTON-DOLBY'S NEW SONG,
"THE DAYS THAT ARE NO MORE."
(Poetry by TENNYSON.)
Composed expressly for Madame Sainton-Dolby by JACQUES BLUMENTHAL.
"Who does not know the Poet Laureate's exquisite lines, beginning:

'Tears, idle tears, I know not what they mean;
Tears from the depth of some divine despair
Rise in the heart, and gather to the eyes,' &c.

That M. Blumenthal, though a Dutchman, loves the poetry of Tennyson, may be gathered from the true sympathetic manner in which he has set his beautiful verses to music. The popularity of this little song is already attested."—Musical World.

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

THE emperor of the skies and the emperor of this patch of the earth's surface known by the ancients as Cisalpine Gaul, have had equally their day, and a right glorious overwhelming and sudorific day (pro diebus) it has been. Phœbus, Apollo, and Napoleon III. have been distributing their favours in like abundance — the one in the shape of degrees of heat, and the other degrees of rank and honour. As is usual on the festive day of the Napoleons a grand distribution of crosses of honour has taken place, and the world of art has had its full share in the sparkling shower. The practice of acknowledging and glorifying merit other than military or financial, is one so deserving of imitation by ourselves that it will be useful to pass in review the individuals who have been chosen for this honour, and to show that though haply the title of here and there one to such distinction may be disputable, assiduous and zealous devotion to pursuits of an intellectual character is sure to lead here, if not to substantial profit, at least to a clear and prominent place in the sunshine of the world's regard and consideration. First, then, M. Lebrun, the venerable (born in 1785) author of Marie Stuart (an adaptation of Schiller's play), already of the Academy, of which he is one of the oldest members and a senator, has been raised to the rank of Commander of the Legion of Honour; and M. de Pongerille, also a member and Director of the Academy, has obtained a like promotion. Among those who have been called to the rank of officer, are Messieurs Lionville, Lamé, and Duhamel, all three distinguished members of the Academy of Sciences; M. Gatteaux, a skilful engraver of long renown; M. Jouffroy, a sculptor of celebrity; M. Auguste Maquet, the well-known author and fellow labourer with Alexandre Dumas, who, by the way, has remained a simple knight of the order since 1833; and M. Paulin Lymairac, a political writer, once of the Patrie, now editor of Le Pays, fond of bespluttering with his pen all who with him climb the hill of fame, and no less happy if he can drop a blot of the same muddy liquid upon the glory of England. Among the knights newly-made of this order who have distinguished themselves in an art, or arts, of some sort, are the following: M. Nadaud, the well-known song-writer and song composer, sometimes called the Béranger of the boudoir, but having little in common with the genius of the great national songster; M. Ravina, whom I need not characterize to you, but who, it is reasonable to suppose, is rather decorated for his skill as an executant than his merit as a composer; M. Offenbach, of whom it is equally unnecessary to speak, and the motive for whose decoration is equally open to speculation; M. Tilmant, the well-known director of the orchestra at the Opéra Comique; M. Valerio, draughtsman, engraver, and lithographer; M. Brune, historical painter; Jobbé Duval, painter likewise; M. Gustave Dové, painter and draughtsman, known in England by his illustrations of the Juif Errant; M. Deboy, sculptor; M. Auguste Blanchard, engraver; M. Ruprich Robert, architect; M. Pigny, architect; M. Masset, ex-tenor of the Grand Opéra and Opéra Comique, now professor at the school of St. Denis—no voice, but considerable talent. The men of letters who have been enrolled as Knights of the Legion of Honour are, M. Avenel (Denis Louis Martial), born in 1789, formerly councillor of state to Jerome, when King of Westphalia, since a political writer in the newspapers; M. Emmanuel Gonzales, the author of many romances not exactly shining by their literary merits, and two or three dramatic pieces equally harmless and forgotten; M. Louis Enault, an excellent and charming writer; M. Charles Vergé, a political writer, as most people would require to be told; Henri de Pène, dramatic critic, he who fought the duel with the subaltern officer by whom he had been challenged for some satirical remarks on the class sous officier, and marvellously survived after being pinked through the liver, a very fearless critic, as may be supposed, and having been decorated by the Minister of the Interior instead of the Minister of State, is understood to owe his honours as much to his personal character as to his literary ability; M. Ernest Breton, an antiquary well known in the class to which he belongs; M. Eugène Labiche, a comic writer for the stage, remarkable for the originality and breadth of his humour, and who works as laboriously at his vocation as though he were not the fortunate recipient of 2000*l.* per annum; M. Edward Poussier, the author of the piece called La Famille de Puyméne, but who can hardly be indebted to that production for his cross of honour; M. Carmondre, a veteran dramatic author, whose proverbs are better known than his acted plays, and whose continued existence many will be surprised to hear; M. Charles Potron, a dramatist, who, had he not written once or twice with Scribe, might have lived unnoticed and unhonoured; M. Leon Guillard, dramatist and keeper of the Archives of the Théâtre Française, where he also performs the duty of reader; M. Charles Reyband, a journalist; M. Pacini, a member of the commission for examining plays; M. Emile Chasler, reviewer; M. Chauvet Charolais, ex-naval officer and recently a journalist; M. Escudier, he of the Pays, proprietor and editor of the France Musicale, too well known to yourself and your readers to need further notice; M. Maussgint, chief editor of the Moniteur du Calonclos, a devoted adherent to the present order of things; M. Merson, editor of L'Union Bretonne; M. le Comte Clement de Ris, a distinguished critic of the fine arts and contributor to the Moniteur.

Panlen et Circeuses was the order of the day last week, and while tickets for comestible provisions were distributed to the poor, the theatres were thrown gratuitously open to the multitude. It is usual on these occasions to give pieces acknowledged as popular favourites, and often the most hacknied of the repertoire proper to each house. But, at the same time, an eye is had to the moral purpose of the work. At the Grand Opera, Robert le Diable was performed; and at the Opéra Comique, La Dame Blanche and Les Rendezvous Bourgeois. At the Vaudeville, the new play by Messieurs About and Najac, Un Mariage de Paris, was the chief entertainment; and at the Gymnase, the new drama by M. Victorien Sardon, Piccolino. The new military and equestrian spectacle at the Cirque, La Prise de Pekin, of course continued its career uninterrupted; and the Porte St. Martin was in like manner under no necessity of changing its bill of fare, which, though containing but one dish of Pied de Mouton, has not yet palled on the taste of the Parisians. At all the theatres some piece of music more or less entitled to the appellation of a cantata, was performed in honour of the Emperor; but out of the entire crop of these laudatory effusions, not one deserves to be singled out for laudation. Genius, when commanded to produce as per order, will frequently produce something not altogether devoid of inspiration; but as the artists who were set to work on this occasion could lay no claim to one whiff of divine afflatus, the flattest commonplace has resulted from the Imperial behest.

There went lately round from paper to paper an intimation that the Minister of State had issued a circular giving notice that he intended to keep the different theatres of Paris strictly each to a limited style of entertainment, as was once the case. But the Moniteur has answered this statement with a paragraph which denies the existence of any such circular. A return to the old system of theatrical monopolies would certainly have been somewhat surprising, when, in all other departments of industry, free trade is the principle of the energetic government under which France now flourishes. One of the theatrical papers here says that M. Montigny, the manager of one of the most popular and prosperous theatres here, has pledged himself to give M. Alexandre Dumas, jun. a bonus of 10,000 francs (400*l.*) for every five-act piece the young author shall bring him. It is said that he is ready to test the fidelity of the generous manager to his word with a bran new drama in five acts, to which he is just giving the last finishing stroke. Is not such a country the paradise of authors?

Some of the papers have published a circumstantial account of the suicide of a young man for love of an actress at the Beaumarchais Theatre, well known under the name of Mlle. Jeanne. The affair has been treated in so jocular a vein, however, that it is impossible it can be anything but a canard, or some joke the humour of which is penetrable only to the initiated, of whom, since the marriage of poor Frogoletta, I am happy to say I am not one.

The tragic actress, Mad. Ristori, is said to have had the offer of an engagement for America, and the terms proposed are 75,000 francs (3000*l.*) per month, but the lady, it is added, has asked 25,000 more, bearing in mind the perils and inconveniences encountered by poor Rachel. The whole is, of course, a barefaced fabrication of the friends of Mad. Ristori, who are always endeavouring to measure her with the great departed tragédienne whose memory is as much too crushing for her, as was her actual presence in the flesh. As if the Americans had leisure to think of any other tragedies than that bloody one they are now in the second act of. To add to the transparency of the falsehood, the gentleman said to be charged with this mission is called the secretary of the New York Academy.

A correspondent at St. Petersburg informs me that the programme for the ensuing operatic season, which commences on the 1st of September, is pretty much as follows:—Two new Russian operas, original both as to music and words, will be produced at the Marie Theatre. One, entitled Natacha, is by M. Villebois; the other, called Juditta, is by M. Sero, a follower of Wagner, and better known hitherto as a critic than as a writer of music. The subscribers to the Italian theatre will have the bloom of a new opera by Signor Verdi, in which the principal part has been written for Signor Tamberlik. Moreover, the musical public of St. Petersburg will hear, for the first time, the celebrated barytone, Signor Graziani; and it is rumoured that the manager, M. de Sabourow, has concluded an engagement with Mlle. Patti, but of this you can better judge the truth than I. According to an Italian paper, the subject of the new opera, which Signor Verdi is engaged on for St. Petersburg, is taken from a Spanish drama by Martinez de la Rosa, entitled La Fuerza del Destines — that is, the Power of Fate.

No one who is a musician, and consequently knows the limit of what can be done with such masses when there is only one rehearsal, will think of judging, by the standard of artistically perfect singing, the execution of those pieces in which the entire body of vocalists took part; all who were present will, however, confess that, on the whole, everything which under the circumstances could be expected was done, as regards precision and expression. The striking passages in the patriotic songs especially were sung with great dash and enthusiasm.

The collection of new compositions began with the 23rd Psalm, "Der Herr ist mein Hirte," by Herr Julius Otto, Musical Director in Dresden. This was a work of some pretension, in several movements, and was given by the Orpheus Association, the Liedertafel and the Liederkreis, of Dresden. It was followed by a "Festgesang," words and music by the worthy old master, A. Methfessel, of Brunswick. Its patriotic purport, concluding with the words, "Weit jubelnd erschallt das Lied von der deutschen Einheit" (Far and wide re-echo the joyous strains of the song of German unity), called forth, as did also similar ideas in all the other patriotic songs, a storm of applause and hurrahs, as was proved, for instance, in the immediately succeeding piece, "All-Deutschland," words by Herr Müller von der Werra, music by Herr Franz Abt, of Brunswick. The most important composition was Ferdinand Hiller's cantata, "An das Vaterland," words by Herr W. Müller von Königswinter, in which the semi-choruses were sung by the four vocal associations of Munich combined. All the above four compositions, forming the first part of the concert, obtained a great success, as was evidenced by the tumultuous applause and cheers with which the composers were greeted.

The second part commenced with a work by Franz Lachner, "Sturmes-Mythe," words by Lenau, which was extraordinarily successful, and encored. We agree entirely with the opinion thus expressed by the public at large. Besides the highly significant music itself, Herr Lachner had two great elements of success in his favour. In the first place, the text selected:—

> "Stumm und regungslos, in sich verschlossen, > Ruht die tiefe See dahin gegossen," &c.,

a beautiful poem, and, indeed, to speak truthfully, the only real poem in the book of words, and, in the second place, the fact of the vocal portion being accompanied by a full orchestra of string and wind instruments, which were a great relief to the ear, after the eternal braying of trumpets and trombones.

Next came G. von Meyern's poem, "An die Deutsche Tricolore," set to the soul-inspiring strains of the Duke Ernest of Coburg-Gotha, a composition received with enthusiasm, the last strophe being encored. The song, "An die Deutschen," words by Herr G. Elstermann, music by Herr Tschirch, Musical-Director in Gera, next came in for its share of approbation, while the whole wound up with "Des Sängers Herz," words by Herr O. Weiss, music by Herr G. Emmerling, Director of the Nuremberg Sing-Verein. Both words and music were creditable, and even successful; but we cannot blink the fact that, side by side with works by Lachner, Hiller, and other composers of repute, this song appears too insignificant for a "German Vocal Festival."

The audience now streamed out into the open air, and took part in the festive proceedings going on there; friends from north, south, east, and west meeting and greeting one another. So great, however, was the crowd, that many persons never once came across, during the whole Festival, friends whom they knew to be present, and whom they were seeking.

About nine o'clock the stage and audience portion of the building were again filled, and the performances of various separate Associations commenced. To describe them all in detail would be too long a task; nay, to a certain extent, it would be an impossibility, since not only were there no books of the words, but actually no programmes, from which the audience might discover what was being sung, and who were the persons singing. The oral announcement made on the occasion of each fresh piece died away in the large hall, and was a mystery to thousands. It is, also, an undeniable fact, that the size of the building prevented the songs from being duly appreciated; the softer passages, and, in a much greater degree, an absolute piano, were perfectly inaudible in the dearest places opposite the orchestra.

The second day of the Festival (Monday, July 22nd) was rendered remarkable by the grand procession, which was even more complete and brilliant than that on the preceding Saturday. Those persons who were present on this occasion in Nuremberg, will perhaps never again behold anything so nationally grand as this festive procession of five thousand light-hearted Singers.

Nuremberg may, with perfect right, enter the days of this Festival as happy and glorious ones in her chronicles, and we are delighted to acknowledge that the spirit animating the whole Festival gained fresh strength from the sight of the magnificent city—in which even the very stones inculcate German nationality—and from the lively interest evinced in the proceedings by the worthy inhabitants of both sexes.

But to the singers, also, are praise and thanks due, for they shirked no trouble, or any sacrifice of their personal convenience and ease. The procession, which was opened by the vigorous forms of the "Turners" of the Nuremberg Turner-Verein, took nearly an hour and a half in defiling. There were eight or ten bands in its ranks. Before each Association boys bore aloft on long poles, from which fluttered blue and white ribands, shields with the name of the Association, and that of the town whence it came, inscribed in large Gothic letters on them, while, behind these, advanced the members of the Association, with their flags, &c.

Our space will not permit us to enumerate all the Associations present, but we will mention those which were most fully represented, in order that we may give some notion of the far-spread interest the Festival had excited. The towns of Amberg, Ansbach, Apolda, Augsburg, Bamberg, Bayreuth, Coburg, Chemnitz, Constance, Dresden, Eisenach, Erlangen, Elberfeld, Frankfort-on-the-Maine (16 Associations), Fürth (6 Associations), Freiberg in Saxony, Gotha, Hof, Innsbruck, Cassel, Kiel, Landshut, Leipsic, Linz, Magdeburg, Mayence, Mannheim, Meeran, Munich (4 Associations), Nuremberg (11 Associations), Passau, Plauen, Presburg, Regensburg, Rudolstadt, Salzburg, Schwabach, Schweinfurt, Schwerin, Straubing, Stuttgardt, Ulm, Vienna (Männergesang-Verein), Weissenburg, Wiesbaden, Würzburg, Wunsiedel, &c., were strongly represented. Special deputations had been sent from Basle, Bautzen, Berlin, Berne, Brunswick, Bremen, Darmstadt, Heidelberg, Carlsruhe, Cologne, Königsberg, London, Lubeck, Memel, Speyer, Teplitz, Weimar, Zweibrücken, &c. Herr Hennikofen appeared as the representative of the Teutonia Society in Constantinople, and Herr Eisfeld as that of the New York Liederkranz.

The second grand performance in the Music Hall commenced about five o'clock, p.m., and, like the first, comprised eight new compositions.

A hymn, "Singt dem Herrn ein neues Lied," by V. E. Becker, of Wurzburg, opened the proceedings, and was fully entitled, both by its matter and its admirable form, to rank with the best productions of the previous day. It was followed by "Unser Hort," words by Dr. Hölzl, barrister in Straubing (a most popular and liberal-minded gentleman), and music by Herr Julius Grobe, director of the Nuremberg Liederkranz. It occasioned a perfect storm of delight, owing principally to the lines:

> "Hand in Hand,
> Fürst und Volk fürs Vaterland,
> Eine Flagge auf dem Meer,
> Eine Fahne für das Herr,

* Translated from the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung.

Digitized by Google

Einen Führer in der Schlacht,
Achtung, die der Erdball zollt,
Deutschlands Banner: Schwarz-Roth-Gold."

The storm was lulled by a short and pleasing song, entitled "Frühlingsgruss an das Vaterland," by Vincenz Lachner, of Mannheim, a truly lyrical work.—"Der Deutsche Landsturm," also, words by K. Schultes, music by Kücken, of Stuttgardt, was applauded, but not so heartily as the freshness of the composition merited.

The second part commenced with a work of some pretension, by Herr H. Neeb, of Frankfort-on-the-Maine, words by F. Stolze, "Frisch auf zum Siegen." It begins with a slow movement, which by a pleasing gradation concludes in a fiery allegro, followed, at last, by a solemn Andante maestoso, in which the lines:

"Lass deine Adler fliegen
Zum grossen, heil'gen Kampf!
Wenn naht der Feind, dann zieht
Ein einig Deutschland zum Rhein, Zum Kampf fürs Vaterland!"

and the effective music, produced such an impression, that the applause broke forth before the piece was concluded, and the last movement had to be repeated. Herr Neeb was called on to appear, and was himself so carried away by the general enthusiasm that he waved the German flag repeatedly over his head.

The public—who were numerous in the pit, though less numerous in the boxes—were more excited than on the previous day. Thus, the two songs, "Hör' uns, Allmächtiger, Führer der Schlachten," words by T. Körner, nobly and vigorously set by Herr Möhring, of Neu-Ruppin, and "Ermanne dich, Deutschland," words by Wagner, music by Herr A. Storch, of Vienna, were greeted with tremendous applause and trumpet flourishes; nay, the last of the two compositions was repeated from beginning to end.—After the thunder-clouds of applause had thus noisily discharged themselves, the last chorus, a pious "Danklied," by T. W. Kalliwoda, glided quietly by.

Among the most distinguished performances of separate societies on both evenings were those of the Societies from Coburg, Dresden, Innsbruck, Wurzburg, and Vienna, the Vienna Männergesang-Verein especially, under the direction of their chief, Herr Herbeck, by the artistically excellent manner in which they gave that gentleman's "Waldlied," accompanied by four French horns, admirably played, produced a more than ordinary impression, and were rewarded by long and tumultuous applause, which in this case was rendered to music alone.

Although nothing like a vocal contest for prizes was intended to be held, as the committee, with proper tact, had not combined anything of this kind with a Festival in honour of German unity, a Vocal Association in Berne sent a silver goblet, a gratifying mark of the loving interest taken in the proceedings by those of German lineage in Switzerland, with a request that the Committee would hand it to that Association which they should consider sang best. As, however, no persons were appointed judges of the various performances, the affair gave rise to some little embarrassment when the committees met on Tuesday afternoon. On the proposition of Herr Ferdinand Hiller, however, seconded by Herr Abt, and unanimously adopted by the wholemeeting, the goblet was awarded to the Vienna Männergesang-Vrein.

MUSIC IN MELBOURNE.

No doubt many of our readers will be right well pleased to hear of music and its prosperity in the far-off land of Victoria, which, notwithstanng the facilities of steam, seems almost a life's distance from Old England. We have received a packet of papers from Melbourne, which render a most flourishing account of musical transactions there, and show the progress made in the art to be really considerable. The Musical Union had given at the Exhibition Building, on the 22nd of May, a grand concert in aid of the fund for the relief of the widows and orphans of the soldiers of the 40th Regt. who fell in New Zealand. The concert took place under the patronage of his Excellency Sir H. Barkly, K.C.B., and Lady Barkly, Major-General Pratt, and a host of "militarians." The programme comprised Mendelssohn's First Walpurgis Night, Mr. Henry Leslie's oratorio Judith, and the overture to Ruy Blas. The principal vocalists were Mad. Stuttaford, Mrs. Hancock, Mr. Beaumont, and Mr. S. Kaye; Mr. G. R. G. Pringle conducted. The band numbered 52 players, and the chorus 100 singers. Of the performance, the Argus of Thursday, May 23rd, writes as follows:—

"The concert given last night by the Musical Union, at the Exhibition Building, in aid of the fund for the relief of the widows and orphans of the soldiers of the 40th Regiment who have fallen in New Zealand, was in every respect a success. Not only was the building well filled, but the enticing programme offered was well carried out. Major-General and Mrs. Pratt and Lady Barkly were present, and, in response to a call made upon them, a large number of volunteers from the various corps might be seen in various parts of the building. Of the performances we can hardly speak too highly. The band was one of the best that has been heard within the walls of that building, and much of the pleasure derived from the performance was owing to the good conductorship of Mr. Pringle. The solos were not good, as far as the male singers were concerned. Mr. Beaumont's voice appeared to be a little broken down from too much work, and Mr. Kaye's voice was anything but pleasing. Mad. Stuttaford was most agreeable. We were surprised at the fervour she displayed in singing sacred music, after hearing her in opera, and it is to be hoped that the good effect she created last evening will not be thrown away upon her, but that she will adapt herself to a style in which she shines far more than in the florid Italian school, of which she has shown herself to be a pupil. The little that our favourite singer, Mrs. Hancock, did was done well. The entertainment commenced with Mendelssohn's overture of Ruy Blas, a fine dramatic descriptive piece, that was most deservedly applauded, after which his First Walpurgis Night followed. The piece is short and descriptive, containing many morceaux which only could have emanated from the genius of Mendelssohn. The instrumental music in the piece was very excellent, and the chorus worked well togetogether. Judith, a work produced by Mr. Henry Leslie, an English amateur, expressly for the Great Festival in Birmingham, in 1858, was a wise choice for the Union to make. The introduction is full of brilliant passages, and Judith's prayer, as sung by Mad. Stuttaford, deservedly received applause. The second part of the prayer is inferior as regards composition—it was too elaborate and showy. Occasionally there was a great preponderance of "brass" in the instrumental part of the music—a fault not owing to the conductorship so much as to the style of the composer. The 'Chorus of Revellers' was, perhaps, one of the best 'bits' of the evening; but altogether the performance reflected great credit upon the members of the Union, and their success must have been to them a pleasing reward for the time they have bestowed in rehearsing, in order to attain their present proficiency."

The "Harmonic Society" of Geelong has not been behind his Melbourne brother, but comes out almost as strong as the "Musical Union" in the performance of Elijah: while the reporter in the Geelong Advertiser, date Saturday, June 15, is much more critical:—

"Not since the departure of Anna Bishop has such an audience assembled in Geelong as last night responded to the call of the Harmonic Society; and certainly the unusual attractions offered warranted the response. Mendelssohn's Elijah constituted the performance, a daring thing for the society to attempt, but the result showed that they did not miscalculate their powers and means, for a more complete performance was never given in Geelong. Elijah is one of the great composer's happiest efforts. In flowing melody it equals any work of Handel or Haydn, and in the use of those combined harmonies in which the resources of the modern orchestra, unknown in the days of the earlier composers, are so largely drawn upon, Mendelssohn stands alone. The array of vocal and instrumental talent on the platform last night exceded anything ever witnessed here. Mad. Stuttaford made her first appearance in Geelong, and won triumphs in the various solos and quartetts which fell to her share; the opening 'Hear ye, Israel,' of the second part being perhaps her greatest effort. Three members of Lyster's Opera Company assisted, namely, Mad. Lucy Escott, Miss Georgina Hudson, and Mr. Squires; and in the sacred music of Elijah they fully sustained the high reputation gained at the late operatic performances. In the air, 'O rest in the Lord,' Miss Hudson surpassed herself, and nothing would satisfy the audience but a repetition. Mr. Squires also was honoured with an encore, a distinction which, we suppose, must be all the more appreciated that it is utterly out of all rule to re-demand any portion of a work such as Elijah. Mr. Farquharson was absent from illness, and his place was kindly filled by Mr. Lyster, who probably suffered by comparison with the gentleman whose substitute for the night he was. The remaining principals were Mr. Ewart, Mr. Lissignol, and Master Cooke, while the band was strengthened by Mr. Johnson (of the 40th), Mr. Reed, Mr. King, and Mr. Gover, from Melbourne. Mr. Plumstead presided at the organ. Mr. Gabb (for whose benefit the concert was) led, and Mr. H. B. Moore conducted, a task for which he proved himself on this, as on former occasions, peculiarly fitted. Those of our readers who had not the good fortune of being present last night may think this brief notice of the concert a mere piece of indiscriminate praise, but we feel assured that nobody who was present will say so."

We are delighted to hear that Friend Gabb—whom we have not the pleasure of knowing—had a good benefit, but still more delighted to learn that sacred music is beginning to find listeners and admirers at the antipodes.

M. GOUNOD'S "FAUST" IN WIESBADEN.*

YESTERDAY I was present at the second performance of this much-talked-of opera. I had heard it also on the previous Sunday, and, while the impression produced is still fresh in my mind, I hasten to give you an account of it.

Without any pretension on my part that you should place any very great reliance on my prophetic glance into the future, I venture to assert that, in setting this subject to music, Gounod has hit upon a lucky idea, as far as the German public is concerned, principally because the prevailing idea of Faust is so popular among us, and always will remain so, as long as there exist struggling beings imbued with the irresistible impulse to overstep the narrow boundaries of this earthly life. From the very fact of the subject being so truly human, and so peculiarly the property of the German people, the music of Faust excites a lively interest, while the circumstance of the action of the first part of Göthe's Faust constituting the foundation of the operatic text, at least in the principal scenes, increases this interest; as, despite the indignation of the guardians of our poetry, is very natural, so far as the great mass of the public goes. For myself, however, I do not think a Frenchman capable of grasping so mighty a subject in all its profundity. There is so much childish, foreign nonsense in Gounod's Faust, that I will not venture to affirm he has succeeded in hitting the nail on the head. One thing is very certain, and that is, that Meyerbeer has constantly shone like a bright constellation before his mind. Gounod has formed himself entirely on Meyerbeer, whom he may, if he be fortunate, in time equal. But his music can boast of truth just a little, as every tone of Meyerbeer can. Gounod is sometimes more economical in the application of his instrumental resources; but he has already involved himself to such an extent with those powerful allies—scenery, transformations, and ballet—that they promise soon to wrest the superiority altogether from the composer. As, however, this opera has already been noticed several times in your paper since its production in Paris, I will confine myself to making merely a few observations.

The introduction to the first act is dignified in character, and prepares us very becomingly for the first scene. Faust's monologue is altogether Meyerbeerish. In corroboration of my assertion I will refer only to the music of "Ein neuer Tag erscheint." The very first chorus, "Ah, schlummernde Mädglein!" is very pleasing; but the following one of the peasants, "Frisch auf ins Feld," is far less fresh and naturally flowing. The duet, No. 2, between Faust and Mephisto, is worked out completely on the model of the well-known scene in Robert le Diable between Bertram and Raimbaut at the cross: the only difference is that Gounod's Mephisto does not express himself so like a cavalier as the Duke of Normandy's mysterious father. Faust's "Ein Wunsch mich beseelt," is composed exactly à la Abt, Kücken, &c. After Mephisto has caused the apparition of Gretchen, and Faust signed the agreement and drunk Gretchen's health, Faust's transformation, which verges on the grotesque (the scholar's dress is changed into that of a gay young nobleman), takes place before the audience, and, being a piece of genuine harlequinade, can naturally produce only a mountebank-like effect. Herr Caffieri, who, by the way, possesses a wonderful voice, and also exhibits dramatic fire in the conception of his part, should not, as a doctor and one versed in the mysteries of magic, contemplate the experiment so much with the air of one of the uninitiated. The said transformation of costume occasioned at the first performance, when it was not effected so speedily or so well as at the second, an outburst of most ill-timed laughter, which appeared as though it would never end; for it was Sunday, and the audience consequently more boisterous than on other days.

The conclusion of the first act is effective, although not a hand was raised yesterday to applaud, either while it was going on or when it was over. In the Kermess scene of the second act, only the students' chorus is vigorous and fresh; the rest is genuine caricature, while the concluding chorus is founded on one of Flotow's motives. Mephisto's couplets, "Ja, das Gold regiert noch die Welt," are very characteristic, nay, even very good; but they did not obtain the slightest approach to anything like applause. No. 6 is a waltz and chorus, "Leichte Wölkchen sich erheben," which is far from coming up to the similar preceding pieces. On the other hand, the words, "Mein schönes Fräulein, darf ich's wagen, Meinen Arm und Geleit ihr anzutragen," and Gretchen's reply, "Bin weder Fräulein, weder schön, Kann ungeleitet nach Hause geh'n," are set in a really charming manner, and surrounded by a certain poetic halo alone sufficient to weave about Faust and Gretchen the magic bonds in which they get entangled the first moment they behold each other.

The couplets No. 7 in the third act, "Blümlein traut, sprecht für mich," have a strong touch of Taubert's and Schubert's songs in the same style: they are very pleasing, and procured for Herr Schneider (Siebel) the first applause of the evening. At the conclusion, a high and forte note on the word "leise" produces a disagreeable effect; but whether the composer is to be blamed for this, only the French text can prove. Faust's cavatina, "Gegrüsst sei mir, o heil'ge Stätte," is a charming composition, exceedingly favourable for the singer, and the first beautiful number of the opera. An obbligato violin runs through the cavatina, which Herr Caffieri sang admirably, but without obtaining the slightest applause.

In the ballad "Es war ein König in Thule," Mad. Deetz, who has been engaged only a short time, was most deservedly applauded. She must beware, however, of forcing her otherwise fine voice in the lower notes, if she would not soon expiate her fault in the higher ones. She was repeatedly applauded in the following scene, and also in the waltz-air, which becomes at the end very flat. No. 11 (duet between Faust and Gretchen) is well composed; but Meyerbeer's creations are always present to our mind. The song sung by Gretchen, in scene 13, from her window, on which the moonlight is beaming, sounds exactly as if it had been written by Richard Wagner himself; for this you may boldly take my word!——Mad. Deetz and Herr Caffieri were called on before the curtain.

No. 13, fanfare and chorus (the return of Valentine with a detachment of troops), with an introductory march, are truly original, although the rhythm struck me as being à la Verdi. It proceeds in a continued progression of the forte as well as of the tempo. It is a brilliant number, and occasioned a storm of applause at both performances. It had to be repeated. Mephisto's serenade (No. 14) is a strange composition, and, indeed, the whole part of Mephisto is a continuous burlesque on everything that constitutes music—melody, rhythm, and accent. The church-scene (No. 17) is effective, especially the chorus, "Wenn erscheint der Tag des Herrn," which is treated like a chorale: the concluding chorus, however, degenerates into mere screaming.

In the fifth act the stage-carpenter and scene-painter play a most important part; but I cannot consider their efforts as an enrichment in a musical sense. Every one is completely immersed in what he "sees," and many must have entirely forgotten that they came to hear an opera. But what nonsense I am talking! The majority of the audience at both performances had come simply to behold the wonders in the way of scenery and transformations, of which report had circulated the most fabulous accounts. In the fifth act I could not discover anything in the way of new musical motives.

In conclusion, I cannot help saying much more was expected from the opera from a musical point of view. I left the house deceived and undeceived. The opera is magnificently put on the stage, and will, no doubt, turn out an attraction during the summer.

Wiesbaden, July, 1861. W. WÜLFINGHOFF.

* Translated from the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung.

ENGLISH MUSIC,—I assert emphatically that the English are a musical people, always have been, and always will be, in spite of money-grubbing and the worship of the dollar. But the world is continually assured of the contrary. Although the music-publishers, great and small, from Beale and Chappell down to the cheapest pirates of the trade, deluge the land every day with new songs by English living composers, the cry is dinned into our ears constantly that the English are "not a musical nation." The cry is at least a hundred and fifty years old, and may be found recorded in the pages of the famous "Miscellany" of Pope and Swift, and elsewhere in the newspapers of the days of Queen Anne and George I. It has never ceased from that day to this; and by dint of constant iteration, acquired such currency and authority, that, in 1820, when the great Napoleon discoursed to his faithful Las Cases, in the mournful days of his captivity and exile at St. Helena, on all imaginable subjects—of war, policy, philosophy, and literature—he declared that English music was execrable. "The English have no music," said he; "or, at all events, no national music. They have, in fact, but one good tune." And, to show his qualifications for the office of musical critic, he declared that tune to be "Ye Banks and Braes o' Bonnie Doon."—Robin Goodfellow.

Letters to the Editor.

PASTARELLI OR RANSFORD.

Omega is greatly obliged to the Editor of the MUSICAL WORLD for answering his inquiry in so straightforward a manner, and would feel further indebted to him if he would kindly and candidly say whether he would advise a lady to put herself under the tuition of Mad. Pastarelli or Miss Ransford, to be brought out in the concert-room; or could he name any other whose terms are reasonable?

[Of Mad. Pastarelli we know nothing. Of Miss Ransford we know she has a charming voice and sings like a mistress. Many teachers we could vehemently recommend, but knowing their terms to be anything but "reasonable" are necessarily reduced to silence.—ED.]

FORKS.

SIR,—Will you have the goodness to inform me, through the medium of your journal, how I can obtain a set of forks constructed on the principles developed in Schiebler's Theory? I have applied to M. Tuhr of Giessen, who is recommended by the author, but have received no reply. Yours, J. COX.

[We shall probably best answer the purpose of our correspondent by giving publicity to his letter.—ED.]

SIR,—Will you through your columns permit me to ask whether a harmonium or a cabinet organ would be the best to have in a small country church, which happens to be very damp? The subscription has been raised for either; but a difference of opinion exists as to which is preferable. The opinion of a good and known judge would decide the question. E. W. L.

[The opinion of a good and known judge is entreated for the above.—ED.]

"POSSIBLE" LETTER FROM A "POSSIBLE" FRIEND IN LONDON (FORMERLY), IN REPLY TO A "POSSIBLE" FRIEND IN GLASGOW.

RESPECTED "FRIEND," — How great is the pleasure thou hast bestowed upon me, my dearest, my dearest! Joan has been galloping to arms, whilst health and blooming youth (fair and ugly, false and true), busy, curious, thirsty, fly (since nature mankind for society framed), to Bacchus, god of mortal pleasure. "Joan's ale is new, boys," says Sue to Prue. "Jack, thou'rt a toper!" "Fie! nay, prithee!—curs'd be the wretch that's . . . .Would you taste the noontide air?" Says Pontius in rage, "No more shall buds on branches spring when Phœbus the tops of the hills boast no more!" Prepare your heart for mirth, Friend Damon;—if thou wilt believe me, there were three cooks to our musical club (cheerful virgins), as Cupid roguishly one day go to Joan Glover, and says "Lie still, my dear—half-an-hour past twelve o'clock—let ambition fire thy mind. How great is the pleasure!" continued he; "with early horn I'll range around the shady bowers." Joy to the happy pair!

Come, learn by this, ye bachelors, how merrily we live when U and I together meet young Colin fishing near the mill! I, like the bee, with toil and pain, fill, fill, fill the glass, as Celia near a fountain lay—chairs to mend, blooming Bacchus, ever young. Behold he comes! he comes!! the hero comes!!! Britannia's sons rejoice!!!! Britons, where is your magnanimity!!!!! Fame, let thy trumpet sound!!!!!! Mortals, wisely learn to measure the jolly bowl!!!!!!!

Then old Chiron thus preached to his pupil Achilles: Hark! the bonny Christ-church bells call George again, boy. Fly, care, to the winds, ye gentle gales: 'Twas afternoon one summer's day, as I saw fair Clora walk alone, when Bibo thought fit from this world to retreat. "May we never want a friend," said I: "come, follow me with merry glee. Hark, away, 'tis the merry-toned horn;" when up came a soldier. "Soldier, take off thy wine!" "Long live his—Queen—Geor—Victoria!" said he. "Wilt thou lend me thy mare?" I said. "Come hither, my country squire," said the warrior; "wine does wonders—the morning is charming. 'Twas you, sir.

'I am, in truth, a country youth,
Take her and be faithful still.'"

Major's Corner. V. S. C. F.

P.S.—Mary the sempstress is fresh as a rose, a thousand miles from thee, o'er the sunny sea. You were pretty Frank in your epistle, and I more so!

VOLTI SUBITO CON FURIA.

COLOGNE.—In honour of the Deutsche Kuntsgenossenschaft, at present assembled here, the Festival Committee got up a concert, on the 14th inst., under the direction of Herr Ferdinand Hiller, in the Gürzenich. The programme comprised the "Hallelujah" from Handel's Messiah, Weber's overture to Oberon, "O weint um sie," for solo, chorus, and orchestra, by Ferdinand Hiller; andante and variations (from Op. 47), by Beethoven (Herren Hiller and Von Königslow); three songs by Mendelssohn, Weber, and Hiller (Mlle. Emma Genast); "Zigeunerleben," by Schumann; and Symphony No. 7, in A major, by Beethoven.

MUSICAL FESTIVAL ON THE DONAU.—The first German-Austrian vocal festival at Krems and Stein, two towns adjoining each other on the banks of the above river, took place on the 29th and 30th June. There were present twenty-four associations, numbering from ten to a hundred and ninety-five members each; while eleven associations sent deputations consisting of from two to eight persons. The grand total of singers present was 1034. Numerous German flags waved from the windows, and most of the houses were decorated with appropriate inscriptions, such as "Das Haus hat keinen Herrn heut, Den Sängergästen sei es geweih't" ("This house to-day has no master; it is dedicated to our vocal guests"); "Wer und woher? Das gilt uns gleich; Haus und Herz gehören euch!" ("Who are you? whence do you come? That is all the same to us; our heart and house are yours"); "Liedwird That; Früh oder ers spat" ("Sooner or later, songs become deeds"). The South-German vocal associations are distinguished by a pleasing custom, which is, that each association has a matter of its own, mostly in rhyme, and set in four parts, which is the first piece of music it sings on its arrival in, or departure from, any place. The festival was held in the open air. A stage was erected for the singers, surrounded by green foliage, and separated by flower-beds and a fountain from the space allotted to the public, who numbered three thousand. The combined choruses were but moderately good; indeed, it was hardly possible for them to be aught else, with only one rehearsal, although the conductor, Herr Willvonseder, of Krems, did all he could to render them effective. The city best represented was Vienna, by the Männergesang-Verein of 196 members; the Akademischer Verein, of 134; the Sängerbund, of 84; and the Techniker Verein, of 45. Krems was represented by 56, and Linz by 53 (the Frohsinn Association), and 41 (the Sängerbund) vocalists, all of whom met with a hearty welcome from the inhabitants. The proceedings terminated with Arndt's "Vaterlandslied."

A RIVAL TO PICCO.—People are accustomed to say, "that is impossible," whenever they hear of anything which passes their comprehension. "That is impossible," was the cry when certain writers asserted that Paganini played whole concertos on the G string; "that is impossible," was again the cry, when the papers announced that the daring Blondin would cross the Falls of Niagara on the tight-rope, and yet both these impossibilities proved not only possibilities, but actual facts. Will not people once more exclaim, "that is impossible," when they are informed that a certain Herr Nagy Jacob has succeeded, by persevering labour, in attaining such proficiency on the shepherd's-pipe, or "Hirtenflöte," as to play concertos on it, and to excite the admiration both of professionals and the general public? From the little insignificant-looking instrument of elder wood, with six holes without keys, he produces tones extending over nearly four octaves, with a degree of almost incredible power and fulness, while, on the other hand, he manages his instrument with such gentleness as to remind his hearers of the soft chirruping of the lark, or the melodious warbling of the nightingale. In short, there are no mechanical difficulties he does not overcome. "That is impossible," will again be the cry, but the public will shortly have an opportunity of convincing themselves of the truth of the above tatement, as Herr Nagy Jacob is about to make a tour through Germany.—Russian Paper.

English Music.—It was Mad. de Staël who averred that music was "a glorious inutility," and musicians have but too often endeavoured to verify the saying, when they have ignored or despised the aid of what they call the "words." Our modern composers do not always consider that a song without meaning is like a body without a soul; and our modern vocalists, private and public, add to the mischief, and sing songs, both in the drawing-room and on the stage, without giving their listeners the remotest chance of discovering whether they are singing English, Italian, Hebrew, or Chinese; and as if it were part of their purpose to conceal both the meaning and the language of the poet. But, in spite of such drawbacks as these, aided by the favour in which Italian music is held in all courtly and aristocratic circles, no one who pays attention to passing events can avoid seeing that the love of music has very greatly extended itself in England of late years; and that next to Germany and Italy, England is fast becoming the most musical country in Europe. To say nothing of her native composers, England must ever take the foremost rank among nations for the encouragement given by her people to the great masters of musical art.—Robin Goodfellow.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The letter of An Enemy to Oppression, Low Salaries, and the Farming System, is not admissible for two reasons: First, it is somewhat scurrilous; Secondly, it is not true.

Curioso.—Question A.—We cannot say. Question B.—We never heard of an opera entitled Aminta.

LONDON: SATURDAY, AUGUST 24, 1861.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—The "Fête Communale," which, from the 17th to the 21st day of this present month, made Antwerp the busiest city in Belgium, perhaps in Europe, would have had no particular interest for the readers of the Musical World—to whom Van Dyk and Rubens, Marsys and Ortellius, Stockmans, Van Schoonbek, Teniers, and Van Noort, are little else than more or less illustrious names—but for the concert held in the Theatre Royal on Monday night. Nor, probably, on any other account would your present correspondent have relinquished a few days' invigorating sea-breeze on the sandy shores of Ostend, where you may see ladies and gentlemen, in pantomimic costume, disporting themselves by hundreds in one common bath (which, being of salt-water, I presume, wipes out the "seeming" indelicacy of the proceeding), and so pleased with this un-English mode of recreation that they remain long enough immersed in the briny shallow to pass for a shoal of mermen and mer-women (Neptune forbid there should be mer*maids* among them!) What amateur of the art divine, however, could have resisted the temptation held out by the following hand-bill, found lying on the very-bad-breakfast table of that very bad house of temporary accommodation, the Hotel de Couronne:?—

So good-bye to the invigorating sea-breeze and the sleek-looking merwomen (who might easily be mistaken for seals—so closely do their party-coloured semi-coverings adhere to their soft bodies!)—Good-bye to the dreariest of hostelries in the straightest and whitest of towns! Good-bye, enfin, to relaxation, and once more "to the mill." After a tedious and dusty ride of some eight hours, by a circuitous route, in which, through not taking advantage of the new railroad from Ghent, we diverged nearly forty miles from the way, travelling zigzag, rather than direct, to the city of Petrus Paulus—which you enter as though by storm, at the end of an indefinite series of entrenchments (don't you wish you may get it, Maître Napoleon?)—was in safety reached. Within the walls, 100,000 Antwerpians, young and old, were taking the sun—a pitiless, pavement-baking (but that Antwerp has no pavement) sun, with not a breath of air to modify its scorching. This to them was a matter of indifference; it was "fête"—and during "fête" no one remains at home. The hotel selected by our small party (of two) was precisely that against which we had been warned, as dear at any time, and at such a time impracticable to all but millionaires—the Hotel St. Antoine which we ("we" means I), though not over-burdened with "fives," much less weighed down with millions—have always noted as one of the most comfortable in Belgium. Moreover, the worthy host, Herr Schmidt-Spaenhoven (not to be confounded with Beethoven), has a sly "leaning" towards Englishmen; and though there was the King of Bavaria (Maximilian the Little), with a hungry and troublesome suite besides, the Duc de Brabant (whom Jesuits affect), and even the correspondent of the Kölnische-Zeitung, to entertain, lost neither his patience nor his urbanity, but provided excellent accommodation for his newly-arrived English guests (the last of some twenty Britons, in the same hotel, attracted equally to the fêtes), who never had cause to complain of one instant's neglect during the "hurly-burly" of an anxious and brain-perplexing week. If M. Edouard Rigele and his companion-secretary of the "Commission Centrale" (whose name we disdain to perpetuate in the columns of the MUSICAL WORLD, content to paste one butterfly on the leaf of sempiternal humiliation) had exhibited a tenth part of the affability and business habits of Herr Schmidt-Spaenhoven (who some years since obtained his passport to immortality from William Russell of the Times—a passport to which we here formally affix our "visé"); or, better still, if Herr Schmidt-Spaenhoven had been himself appointed secretary-in-chief to the "Commission," then would the "Commission" have been literally a "commission centrale," instead of which it actually proved little more efficient than a commission de commissionaires—one knowing nothing and recognising nothing that another would expound and settle down as "law." At the next "fête," when Antwerp shakes its fists at Brussels, and throws Ghent overboard, we strongly recommend that a deputation be despatched over the seas, to Mr. Bowley, general manager of the Crystal Palace, who will teach the Antwerpian burgesses how to "organise" a vast undertaking, and, in short, how to manage generally.

Antwerp, August 21st.

To continue writing amidst the surrounding hubbub, yesterday and the day before yesterday, would have tried the nerves even of a "special correspondent;" and as I am merely a dilettante-reporter, a correspondent by the way, I gave up the tax, as alike impossible and superfluous. (For "I," read "we," and vice versâ.) About the general proceedings of the "Fête Communale" I cannot tell you much, the truth being that though we witnessed a good deal it was merely tantamount to a rapid glance, or glances, at the shifting objects in a kaleidoscope. To see everything, moreover, was out of the question. You will naturally have sent your own Ruskin, Ottley, Chorley, or Tom Taylor, to write you elaborate and veridical accounts of the exposition of Fine Arts in the street of Venus, and the ancient pictures in the Museum hard by. Of these—however much admiring, understanding next to nothing—I cannot presume to speak, even were I less averse from poaching on the estate of other critics. They are, nevertheless, the most unanswerable arguments which the city of the Cloven Hand (Antwerpen) can bring in support of the position of quasi-defiance it just now maintains against the capital of Belgium. Backed by King and court, the nabobs of Brussels are anxious to change the venue of art-congress from the venerable Flemish port to their own more populous and half-Frenchified purlieus. The "Fête Communale," to which the world is summoned to send emissaries, as representatives of art, was got up by the inhabitants of Antwerp as a species of challenge to all Belgium. "See what we can do to entertain the foreigner, and vindicate our rights, as the oldest and first art-emporium of the kingdom!" exclaims Burgomaster Loos, with his co-burgesses. And straightway a series of fêtes, to last over three days, are instituted, which exceed the September fêtes in full-grown proportions, as much as an Antwerp cabbage exceeds a Brussels sprout. Out of doors, day and night, an uninterrupted succession of amusements — including processions concerts, regattas and other aquatic sports on the Scheldt; civic shows and ceremonies; jeux (du palet, de boule, and de guilles); shooting matches, not only with carabine, but with arc (au berceau, and à la perche), and arbalète (grande, petite, and à galet); military music; part-singing in chorus; distributions of prizes for all sorts and shades of excellence; illuminations, fireworks, and et cetera. In-doors, receptions, congresses, debates, banquets, toasts (with champagne), and what not? Among other celebrations ("solennités") was a banquet in the Théâtre des Variétés (completely "gutted" for the occasion), to which 1200 guests were invited, and at which Burgomaster Loos presided, giving toasts. The decorations of the salle were magnificent; and vast as was the host of diners, everybody dined at ease. That they also fared liberally and well, may be gathered from the carte du menu:—

The Soyer and Donald of the occasion were MM. Allard and Lambo: may their prosperity be equivalent to their achievements! This banquet was veritably a great work, and its "execution"—by the waiters and consumers, who respectively waited and consumed prestissimo, with a vigour and precision worthy the occasion—was beyond praise. Entre autres, 1200 ortolans (grives?)—fattened, larded, and couchés on a delicate bed of toast—were helped and disposed of in the space of a minute. The only convives who exceeded their allotted portion (and this was accomplished by means of an expedient familiar to musicians under the name of "diminution"—two ortolans (grives?) disappearing in the same time as one) turned out, on inquiry, to be Burgomaster Booltverbist (of Ypres) and Echevin Zwallow (of Tirlemont). M. Huglmanns, Huglemann, or Hugelman, a French orator, missed his ortolan (grive?) while preparing a speech which, for common-sense and eloquence, if not for vivacity, has been frequently surpassed. The ortolan (grive?) of M. Huglemanns was despatched, à l'improviste, by a German painter, hight Schnell, whose large canvass, "Wurst und Pumpernickel," had obtained the honour of an invitation. After "The King," Burgomaster Loos proposed the toast—"Aux étrangers!—à nos hôtes"—to which the aforesaid M. Hugelman, Huglemann, or Huglmanns responded teratologically. In allusion to England (which he generously placed next to France), M. Huglemann, Huglmanns, or Hugelman ("Uglyman"—suggested, at the Hôtel "Rydek," an English snob who had not been invited) said that its "raison d'être" was not "its vessels and armies of to-day," but son Milton, son Bayron, et son Dick" (query Dickens?)—which I took reason to doubt, seeing that French ships were just now multiplying faster than French poets; whereat M. Hugl(el-le)man(mann-mamns) "de rire." But enough of the banquet, and of the speeches, at which the representatives of England "cut" a comparatively mediocre figure—being outdone even by the "urchs," "ists," and "isches" of the Teutons, who, with at least a hundred "colour-poets," and half as many "tone-poets," at the feast, were thirsty, ravenous, tongue-fluent, and obstreperous, "Hoch"-ing and drinking—not "Hoch"-eimer, but Champagn-"eimer"—in equal measures and with equal genialismus (G pronounced not as in gin but as in begin). M. Geeraerts, President-director, by the way, superintended "les apprêts" with infinite care, and a zeal that showed his heart was in the ortolans — or vice versâ, as Tite Live and Quinte Curce might have written, had they been commissioned to historiograph this banquet in Latin.

What do you care about the dancing in the saloon of the Royal Society of L'Echo de l'Escaut (we Londoners have no Royal society called The Echo of the Thames or Serpentine)? What though it was ornamented à merveille, and the garden illuminated to boot? What though bouquets, and patisseries, and fruits were there in profusion, let who would appropriate them? What though at eleven o'clock M. Charles Rougier, the Minister (Hon. President of the "Echo"), unexpectedly made his appearance, accompanied, or rather piloted, by Burgomaster Kerchove-Delimon (of Ghent), and was formally received by M. Possoz, of the musical department, with whom, as with MM. Thys, Dumarteau (of-the-hammer), and others, he conversed familiarly? What though the cries of "Vive Rougier!" rent the air? About as much, I believe, as your correspondent, by the way. Pass, therefore, to the "fête de nuit," offered to the civic guards of the Kingdom by the administration of the Théâtre des Variétés (more dancing); and thence, without "stoppage," to another "fête," offered to the members of the Congrès Artistique by the Société Royale d'Harmonie — a veritable Fête Champêtre, held in the gardens of the Society, which rivalled Mr. E. T. Smith's "Cremorne" in dazzling splendour and variety of glittering emblem — oil for gas, however, and the odour all the less grateful for being the more convincing (a "convincing odour" is new?). Music took a large part in this "fête," and we (I) only wish it could be reported as a musical exhibition at all suitable to the Festival; but that is unfortunately not the case. A more insipid, spiritless, commonplace achievement than the "cantate de circonstance" (words by M. Dumarteau), for which M. Alphonse Lemaire, director of the Society's orchestra, composed the music, has rarely been listened to; and all the vehement ejaculation of M. Tillez, in the solos, could not make it pass for genuine. This, too, was preceded by a festival overture, the composition of M. Henri Simon, in no respect a bit superior. Has modern Flanders nothing better than this to show in the musical department?—or are MM. Lemaire and Simon Antwerpian composers par excellence, and therefore entitled to be exposed on each and every such occasion? The rest of the programme was as trifling and uninteresting as possible — even Wagner's trumpery march from Tannhäuser assuming a certain degree of importance in the midst of such a heap of harmonious nonentities.

The gardens were literally "crammed," and the ear-stunning vociferations of the Flemings over their beer in the "Restauratione" at intervals not only drowned the music, but even the voices of their Teutonic visitors — which was really quite extraordinary, and will be scarcely credited by those who have attended Bradenburgian, Hanoverian, Brunswickian, or Westphalian merry-makings. The illuminations, however, and, above all, the fireworks, made up for all. To save post, I must stop here. The rest next week.

THE following letter, received by this day's post, is entitled to consideration, apart from those communications from correspondents to which we are in the habit of devoting special columns hebdomadally. The writer is evidently anxious to establish a case of error and a grievance. He is, however, in all probability, impelled to do so by causes ulterior to any violent attachment to the Art or abstract desire for the dissemination of musical knowledge. As he signs himself "Provinciencis," we must needs conclude he is no true metropolitan, but rather a dweller in the inland, haply some cathedral town, or city, with a music-hall. We might have made shrewder guesses at his whereabouts, but that the post-mark has been in part defaced, and all that remains legible is "— ton-on-Thames." Were it of sufficient moment, and had we our instrument at hand, we might have ascertained to a T, or some other letter, by the aid of the microscope, the exact habitat of our correspondent. His card has been enclosed, or we should not have acknowledged the communication, but the address is wanting. It will, however, answer our purpose better to publish the epistle in full, and reply to it in the best way we can. We consequently print it verbatim et seriatim:—

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE MUSICAL WORLD.

"SIR,—I pray you to exert your powerful and universal influence to expose a system pursued at the provincial festivals, by which the very existence of these earnest and admirable feasts of reason are, in my opinion, and that of many others, seriously threatened. No man than myself has a greater love and admiration for these two giants of the choir, Handel and Mendelssohn; no man can draw deeper delight from hearing those mighty master-pieces of sacred song — the Messiah and Elijah; no man could hear them oftener with the same ecstacy of enjoyment—the same unwearying sense of pleasure. But, Sir, in the organization of musical festivals, the general public must be consulted and their tastes conciliated. In all probability I should never have noticed the subject of my own accord, nor do I think the idea would ever have occurred to me; but when I hear grumblings from every side, I am compelled to ask myself, is there really any matter for complaint?

"I have attended nearly all the festivals in England for the last twelve or fourteen years, and the staple commodity of each programme at each festival has been, without variation, the Messiah and Elijah. These two oratorios, indeed, constituted the 'Festival;' the rest was superogatory — mere lace or fringe-work to the garment. Now, the people around me want to know, is this thing to last to the end of the chapter? Are the Messiah and Elijah to stand as the special performances, say, for the next twenty years? Are audiences to be forced to listen to the same oratorios so often that they must tire of them? Has Handel written but one great work for the sacred choir? Is St. Paul to be laid aside for ever for his more popular brother? Is there no living talent worth a trial? Has the love of novelty expired? Have managers no ingenuity — committees no resources? These, Sir, are some of the many questions asked by those with whom I come in contact, all tending to show that the time has arrived when a change in the programmes of musical festivals is imperatively called for — that is, if monetary considerations are to have their weight in such undertakings. Festivals are likely to increase from the impetus given to music of late years; and if they all resolve themselves into performances of the Messiah and Elijah, I tremble for the cause of music in the provinces. There must be a limitation to all delights, and no one will deny that even the pleasure derived from hearing Handel and Mendelssohn's master-pieces would pall upon the sense from too frequent repetition. The period, then, as it seems to me, has arrived when the attention of directors of provincial festivals should be called to a fresher and more liberal provision of their fare, and when the public should no longer be treated as beasts who are always fed on the same viands.

"I trust, Sir, you will advocate this cause with your usual power and freedom from prejudices, and that you will make plain to all concerned in the interests of these grand monster meetings in the provinces, that their vitality depends on an infusion of new blood, and that no one thing in this world can go on in giving pleasure ad infinitum.

Yours,

"PROVINCIENSIS."

But for a certain air of earnestness, and some little display of reasoning, the above letter might appear intended as a capital joke. The argument of "Provinciensis," in fact, has not a leg to stand on. Nevertheless, as we believe there are a few individuals who, from want of thought, entertain the same opinions, it may be worth while to expose the sophistry of our correspondent, and to show the utter groundlessness of his remarks. It is true that for many years the oratorios of The Messiah and Elijah have constituted the special features of every Festival given in the provinces of England, and, we may add, Ireland and Scotland. No great Music Meeting in Cathedral or non-Cathedral town has taken place in which they were not the very head and front of the programme. In short they grew into stereotyped performances of the Festivals, and were accepted as such. "No Messiah, no Festival—no Elijah, no Festival," might have resolved itself into an axiom as self-evident as a rule in mathematics. True, also, this unvarying adherence to two works throughout such a length of time, and in so many various places, might, without reflection, be attributed to prejudice or helplessness on the part of the managers. A moment's consideration will demonstrate that the directors of the Festivals were on every occasion compelled, whether they would or not, to make the oratorios in question their chief selections. That The Messiah is the most popular musical composition ever given to the world everybody knows. That Elijah, as a sacred work, stands second to The Messiah only in the estimation of the public, may be taken for granted. It does not seem at all strange, therefore, that these wonderful master-pieces should be performed more frequently than other sacred compositions. The people love to hear them, can listen to them more than once, and each hearing only serves to increase their delight and veneration. Such works, indeed, fasten themselves on the mind with greater tenacity the oftener they are heard, and are welcomed on their return with all the pleasure of an old acquaintance who comes to see us after an absence. So it is with Don Giovanni at the Italian Theatre. No amount of representations can make that glorious opera "used up;" its vitality is insured by a combination of power and beauty hardly to be looked for in any other work.

But let us grapple still closer with "Provinciensis," and annihilate with a word his proposition that the too frequent repetitions of The Messiah and Elijah will endanger the prosperity of the Festivals. Perhaps the too frequent repetition might. This, however, does not take place, and is not likely to take place. The great provincial music gatherings are held once only in three years, and consequently no danger need be apprehended that audiences will grow tired of what they hear so seldom. Above all, facts are stubborn things. It is proved every year at every Festival that The Messiah commands the largest attendance during the four days' performances, and, next to the Messiah, Elijah. The two oratorios together bring to the Charities larger receipts than the rest of the entertainments of the week, sacred and secular. What has "Provinciensis" to reply to this? Would he have the stewards ignore money when organizing the Festivals? Would he have popular feeling sacrificed to gratify a few tired-out amateurs? Perhaps he himself has written an oratorio, and is biding his time until the Messiah and Elijah have grown stale. If he depend upon that juncture for the bringing out of his work, it will be all the better for Posterity. Plenty of time, we have no doubt, will be given him for correction and improvement.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.—It is pleasing to see that a little more energy has been manifested by the Committee since the retirement of Lord Westmoreland. We, for our part, however, fail to recognise the "national" character of the Tenterden Street institution, and have little hope of the national taste receiving that fostering care so essential to vigorous manhood and hale old age, till the "collective wisdom" shall see fit to extend a portion of that support to music of which the remaining fine arts are considered worthy. Why music—confessedly the most elevating of all arts—should be ignored, it is not for us to determine; but we do hope the day is not far distant when England will lift up its head amongst the nations, as proudly conscious of her musical prowess as of others—utilitarian, it is true, but far less noble and exalted.—Brighton Gazette.

MR. SULLIVAN, who carried off the Mendelssohn scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music, has returned from Leipzig, where he had been sent to complete his musical education, under the contrapuntist Hauptmann.

MR. ALFRED MELLON'S CONCERTS.

THE first specialty of the present series of concerts took place on Monday evening, when a very large audience was attracted by the announcement of a "Mendelssohn night." The first portion of the programme was entirely devoted to the compositions of this great master, the unwaning popularity of whose works in this country attests alike their permanent value and the soundness of English taste. The concert commenced with the overture to the Midsummer Night's Dream—that marvellous inspiration in which the boy composer (for he was but sixteen when he wrote it) evinced a poetical fancy and romantic imagination worthy of the text which he has illustrated. In nothing have Mendelssohn's facility and geniality (the most invariable accompaniments of high genius) been more remarkably displayed than in his exquisite music to the Midsummer Night's Dream. Recurring, after the lapse of many years, to the work of his boyhood, he amplified his early ideas, and composed the incidental pieces which, with the overture, have now taken rank as the most important illustrations which musical art has ever contributed to the works of our great poet. The performance of Monday night was in every way worthy of the occasion. The orchestra, numerically strong and individually excellent, played the overture with a mingled delicacy and fire which left nothing to be desired. The other pieces selected from this work were the Scherzo, the Intermezzo, the Notturno, and the Wedding March, which latter was, as it usually is, enthusiastically encored.

The greatest instrumental feature in the selection was M. Sainton's masterly and beautiful performance of the concerto, the only one ever written by Mendelssohn for the violin, and certainly one of the very greatest works of the master. The mechanical difficulties of this wondrous inspiration are so great that violinists capable of vanquishing them are very seldom met with, but rarer still is it to find a performer who thoroughly understands the poetical significance of the work, and can express it genially and consistently even to the smallest details. Such a consummate artist, however, M. Sainton proved himself to be on this occasion; for not only was his playing pure, brilliant, equal in tone, and perfectly carré, even in the most rapid and trying passages, but his emotional expression of the music, whether it demanded fervent passion, dignity, pathos or lightness, was all the author himself could have desired. M. Sainton's rendering of this concerto was, in short, a great artistic achievement, and, as such, was duly recognised by the audience, who applauded the eminent French violinist most enthusiastically at the termination of each movement.

Mad. Laura Baxter sang the fine air from "St. Paul" (which suits her noble voice exactly) with appropriate breadth of manner and genuine musical feeling; and the duet from "Son and Stranger" was likewise done ample justice to by the same lady and the accomplished Mlle. Parepa.

The remainder of the Mendelssohn selection consisted of the glowing overture to Ruy Blas—a work which for passionate intensity may pair with Weber's Ruler of the Spirits. Of the orchestra we have already spoken in terms of high praise, and Mr.

Mellon's conducting is equally worthy of commendation. He evidently has the score in his mind as well as before his eye. The rest of the concert, consisting of a miscellaneous selection, calls for no special notice.

The success of this first "Mendelssohn night" was unmistakeable, for the spacious "promenade" was densely crowded, and the audience seemed to appreciate completely the profound poetical beauties of the compositions. Never was the important and now generally admitted fact, that there exists in London a great public taste for high musical art, more strikingly exemplified, and we trust that the brilliant result of Monday's performance may induce Mr. Alfred Mellon (whose warmest sympathies, we know, are with the Classic Muse) to venture still further in his honourable endeavours to popularise the orchestral works of the great masters.

Those who paid their shilling (and they were very many hundreds) for the sake of the Mendelssohn part of the concert only, made an excellent investment of their money — indeed nowhere out of London could such music, so well performed, be heard for so small an outlay.

Provincial.

PLYMOUTH. — (From a Correspondent.) The opening of the Plymouth Theatre on Monday last brings forcibly to one's mind the old and somewhat hacknied proverb, "Where there's a will there's a way," for when it closed some two months ago, the public having a keen perception of the required alterations, hardly believed Mr. Newcombe's promise that it should re-open in August or September; but they evidently did not anticipate the exertions of their untiring and liberal manager, whose outlay on this occasion may be counted by thousands, but whose unflagging zeal can only be fully appreciated by those who are personally acquainted with him. Much as was expected from him, the public, in general were hardly prepared for the view that met their eyes on Monday, for every vestige of the old familiar, but slightly shabby house, had entirely disappeared, and a new one, second to none in the United Kingdom for beauty and comfort had taken its place. At the rise of the curtain the National Anthem was sung by the whole of the company, whose united voices echoing through the house were for one moment drowned by the applause which followed Miss Kate Ranoe's solo. The anthem over, Mr. Newcombe's name was vociferated from every part of the house, in obedience to which he appeared before the curtain, but being totally unprepared with a speech for the occasion, begged to be allowed to wait until after the first piece, when he would address a few words to his patrons.

Shakspeare's Twelfth Night ("as revised by the late J. P. Kemble,") and interspersed with vocal music, commenced the season of 1861, the principal parts being taken by Mr. J. O'Sullivan, Miss Kate Ranoe, and Miss Addison. The gentleman, as Duke Orsino, had little to do, but did that little well. Miss Addison was amusing, but hardly gave the idea of Shakspeare's deeply-loving though unloved Viola. This being her first appearance in Plymouth, however, she was, we think, a little anxious, and so scarcely did justice to the ability she possesses. Miss Kate Ranoe's Olivia was well conceived, and played throughout in a quiet, ladylike manner, showing how much may be done with a part, essentially devoid of all clap-trap; the Duke Orsino's messages of love were quietly declared, while her growing love for Cesario, his messenger, became gradually apparent. Both Mr. O'Sullivan and Miss Kate Ranoe (the Mills na Coppaleen and Colleen Bawn of last season) were warmly greeted on their first appearance. Nothing, however, throughout the evening elicited such a universal and unmistakably earnest round of applause as Miss Ranoe's song of "Crabbed age," which, though by no means the most beautiful melody in the piece, was so artistically rendered that it at once turned the scale in the minds of those who wavered in their opinion of the expediency of introducing music into the comedy, and added one tie more to those which had already bound the Plymouth public to this very clever young lady. The remainder of the characters were well sustained, and at the fall of the curtain Mr. Newcombe was again called for, when he made a most appropriate and touching speech, in which he showed the difficulties he had experienced in his career of manager, and how, though obstacles appeared at every turn, and success seemed impossible, yet, by an upright course and unflinching determination, he had at last brought the long wished-for goal within view. A farce entitled The Captain's not a-miss concluded the evening's entertainment.

STAFFORD. — The Boudoir Opera Company finished their second tour at Stafford, with selections from the Bohemian Girl and Lucrezia Borgia on the 14th inst., under the patronage of the officers and members of the Stafford Volunteer Rifles, when they had a full house. The splendid band of the corps played several popular selections during the evening, and every one seemed highly delighted. They gave a grand concert the previous evening at Stone under the patronage of Captain Fitzherbert and the officers and members of the Stone Rifle Company: the room was crammed, and the encores numerous. We believe it is the intention of this Company (owing to numerous requests) to go over the same ground again ere long.

A LITERARY LION. — We have had amongst us, for some time a literary lion. He has now gone away, so that we may, without danger of his being overwhelmed with "deputations" and such like obtrusive company, give due publicity to the fact. It was Mr. Alexander W. Thayer, a gentlemen well-known in literary circles in America, and not altogether unknown on this side of the Atlantic. It is from his pen that a series of charming sketches of musical life in England have emanated. They appeared originally in Dwight's Journal of Music (Boston), under the pseudonyme, "Diarist," and have frequently been copied into our periodical press. The great work upon which he has been engaged "half a life-time" is drawing towards a close, and we look forward to the only complete "Biography of Beethoven" with feelings of unmixed, pleasurable anticipation. Mr. Thayer came to England (from Vienna) to pick up information bearing upon the comprehensive subject, and we have reason to believe that he is perfectly satisfied with the result. Our veteran, Mr. Neate, is in possession of several interesting autographs, which were liberally placed at Mr. Thayer's disposal. We wish him every success in his great and glorious undertaking.—Brighton Gazette.

THE BEGGAR'S OPERA. — As Aristophanes claimed, in the Frogs, to have the purpose of ridiculing the bad tragedies of the time, so Gay professed, in his Beggar's Opera, to declare war against the Italian Opera, which, at that time, was asserting its sway over the public taste, to the serious damage of the legitimate drama. Witnessing the Beggar's Opera, as it is performed in our day, we can readily understand its great popularity on its first production. Its songs are enough to account for that. But it is certainly not easy to understand how it came to be regarded as a telling and pungent burlesque upon Italian opera. It does not turn the laugh against opera, in the shape it now assumes. When Macheath sings song after song to Polly, with a few unmeaning words of prose "dialogue" between, we have no suspicion that he is ridiculing the absurd formula of the Italian opera. The actor does nothing to indicate anything of the kind. He is solely intent on singing his songs well, and we are solely intent on hearing them sung. Instead of being a burlesque upon opera, it is an opera itself, recommended only in that it possesses the one enjoyable element of an opera—good music. This is only another proof that the burlesque writer can never trust to his satire and his "purpose," to make his piece "go" with the public. Aristophanes introduced the gross jokes, which he condemned, to rescue his satire from dulness; and Gay adopted sprightly airs for the same purpose. Walker, who first played Macheath, was a better actor than he was a singer; and it is probable that, to this circumstance, the Beggar's Opera owes its great reputation as a burlesque. Walker imitated the manner of the Italian actors to perfection, and caused roars of laughter by gestures and by mimicry of operatic action, which are now altogether lost sight of. Had Quin, for whom the part was originally intended, played Macheath, the burlesque of the piece would, probably, never have been brought out; and the Beggar's Opera would have been originally what i is now—simply a pleasing burletta.—Cornhill Magazine.

THE OLD VOLUNTEER AND THE MYSTIC BASSOON.

It chanced on the evening of yesterday, the 11th of March, being the year of grace 1861, that an old Volunteer met with an incident of so novel a character, that a relation of its principal features may not prove altogether uninteresting. The day had been unusually stormy and rough, even for rough and stormy March. Aurora had indulged in an extra hour or two in bed previous to placing her rosy fingers on the lock of the golden doors of the east, and the steeds of Phœbus, when they did spring from the deep, were immediately confronted by Æolus, whose countenance was more than usually morose, and voice more than commonly hoarse and threatening. Furiously did he rave and scream as he hurled his chilly missiles at the chariot of the god of day, nor ceased till he had compelled him to put up for the night at an hotel at the West-end. In short it was a day which proved beyond cavil that the hour had not yet arrived in which a certain worthy Editor might be able to place his finger upon his nose, as he bids God speed to old Winter.

About an hour after Phœbus had taken up his night's quarters, the old man sat, as has been for many years his wont to do, in his little private room, neatly and unostentatiously furnished. Indeed he was surrounded by all the comforts of life a man of his years could desire. Everything appeared to be in its usual state of efficiency and willingness to adapt itself to all his requirements, if we except his pet canary, which usually favoured him with a canticle before retiring for the night. This he had omitted on the occasion in question; and whether it was the primary cause which threw the old gentleman into a state of melancholy so foreign to his nature, we know not. But this we do know — he was in melancholy mood. Reclining on a couch drawn near the cheerful fire, with massive silver-mounted pipe in mouth and hand, he even forgot to inhale the fumes of the fragrant weed, and puffed imaginary clouds long after the fire had unwittingly died out from the handsome China bowl. But, hark! and the old volunteer started from his deep reverie! Had he not heard a voice which sounded like that of some friend in days long long gone bye? He looked wistfully over the room, as though half expecting his eyes must meet some visitant from another sphere. Not so, however. But again the long unaccustomed voice startled the old man's ear, and if it did not mislead him (and this could hardly be possible—for has he not been celebrated for the goodness of his ear ever since memory and himself first became acquainted?), it came from out a venerable mahogany case, diurnally dusted by no hands but his own—for Molly, the housemaid, knows it would be more than her place is worth to put sacrilegious hands thereupon.

In the reign of terror expected by old ladies of both sexes, which promised to receive inauguration with the advent of the first Napoleon to these islands, our hero had come forward as a volunteer in defence of home and hearth. His principal weapon was a bassoon—the identical bassoon which had rested in peace in the case above-named since the day its proud owner had heard, on undoubted authority, that the "Little Corporal" had surrendered to the captain of the Bellerophon. A great and glorious day was that in the martial eye of our hero; second only to one, and that one it was which had rendered his bassoon sacred for ever. The Duke of York and staff were coming to inspect a large body of regulars and volunteers, and a field day was to be held upon the heath. On the route thither, it being a very hot day in June, our friend, with the other members of the volunteer band, had made a call to wet their parching whistles at the Baited Bull Inn, where, having imbibed a liberal quantity of mine host's good cheer, it was resolved that the band should wait till the arrival of the Duke, on whose appearance they should instantly commence playing the march bearing his royal highness's title. But the best laid schemes of men and mice, &c., we all know to be too true, and on this occasion, long ere his royal highness appeared in sight, every member of the—volunteer band, with the single exception of our hero, was, to use his own expressive terms, "dead drunk." But he—all honour be to him—determined his royal highness should be greeted with his favourite march, solo bassoon without accompaniment. And so he was. His royal highness heard it—alighted from his horse—went in to the Baited Bull—praised the performer's performance and the quality of the bassoon—ordered a pint of ale, drank it and rode off, leaving our hero in a state of rapture, and his comrades wrapt in a state of beer. And on recovery, and hearing the events detailed, they held solemn conference with the host, and it was unanimously resolved that henceforth the Baited Bull Inn should be ever known as the Duke of York Hotel.

Here let me pause to ask, Is not our friend to be held in honour for his reverence of that bassoon?—undoubtedly he is. He has long learnt to think upon (for he seldom ventures to look upon) that bassoon as something of a mystic bassoon. For after the event above recorded he somehow could never get it to aid him properly in the performance of any tune save the Duke of York's March. It mattered not what music he essayed to render thereon, but so sure as he tamely progressed with just seven bars thereof, the bassoon gained the mastery, and was rattling away at the march aforesaid might and main, till the poor half-distracted performer literally sank down from sheer exhaustion.

On the occasion in question, it can be no cause for wonder that the remembrances of these peculiarities of the bassoon crowded thickly into the brain of our hero—indeed the voice before alluded to as half recognised, as that of an old friend, was the voice of the mystic bassoon—the martial notes of the composition so oft-named and to be named here. With mingled feelings of awe and reverence he arose, and drawing from his capacious breeches pocket a bunch of keys, after many failures he applied the right one to the case, and the mystic bassoon saw again the light—not of day, but of short-six. He stood contemplating the bassoon with feelings almost indescribable, and the silence was only broken by occasional gusts of wind revelling amid the trees, which, in their turn, sported with the window panes of the old man's room, and a more frequent hickup (or hiccough) from the otherwise silent looker-on himself. Suddenly something — perhaps a dream — had awakened the favourite canary, and it gave an uncanary scream. The old gentleman tottered towards his little pet to inquire into the cause of its disquietude, but ere he had satisfied himself on this point, he was truly alarmed and terrified by the sound of the Duke of York's March, as played upon the mystic bassoon in the palmy days of his volunteerhood. Facing about as he had never before done since he last donned his regimentals, what was his horror to behold the bassoon, not disjointed and peacefully resting in its case, but — what a case! — standing whole and erect as a bassoon is able to stand, and going it at a rate known only to the late frequenters of poor genial Jullien's promenade concerts! How long this solo lasted it is impossible for him to say, being too greatly alarmed to note Time's march, owing to the mystic notes of the march by the bassoon at the time. He only knows that it did eventually cease, and then, after drawing a deep sigh, it spoke out thus: — "Master, don't be alarmed: I was so glad to get out once more from my prison for a breath of air, which I had no sooner got than I could no longer contain myself, and my long pent-up feelings urged me once more to give you our dear old march, which brought us both so much credit. But, good gracious! how old and used-up you do look! What has befallen you, old chap?" "Hickup," said he in reply. "Here am I," went on the mystic bassoon, "as well and as hearty as I was on the very day H.R.H. complimented me on the strength and beauty of my voice—whilst you;—well, I declare!—ha! ha!! ha!!! why, you'll be food for worms now long before I shall." "Hickup." And the mystic bassoon went on moralising and making odious comparisons between itself and its master; then suddenly throwing a summersault in the air, it again alighted on the floor, and struck up afresh the self-same air in tones most defiant and boisterous; at which moment almost every table, chair, and other available appurtenance of the room, commenced marching three deep round the same, and the old man was fain to take refuge upon his couch, lest his gouty toes should suffer inconvenient proximity to the legs of the articles in motion; but no sooner had he availed himself of a place thereon, than it directly began rising end after end like a rocking-horse; which so decidedly upset his powers of endurance, that Molly, hearing his cries for assistance, hastened in, and eventually got him upstairs and put him to bed. Yet even here he was not entirely free from the mystic power of his bassoon, which kept on dinning into his ears the Duke of York's March, till Morpheus kindly took the old gentleman in hand and lulled him to repose.

Now when the old volunteer rose very, very late next day, with the notes of his favourite march still chiming gently in his ear, he slipped secretly down to his sitting-room ere he had half dressed himself, and with his face partially lathered and shaved, to see what the mystic bassoon might be after then, and on observing it quietly resting in its case, and hearing no sound save the matins (as he wrongly supposed them to be) of his canary, which had introduced a bar or two as a "counterblast" to too much "tobacco,"* he mentally resolved that let Boreas blow cold and loud as he might—let him hurl sleet, snow, hail, or whatever he could, at the chariot of Phœbus, henceforth, never would he stay within again all day long drinking whiskey punch with his holocaust of "shag," so help his mystic bassoon!

W.

* Lest this sentence should be deemed a "dark saying of the wise," I would explain that the poor bird's pipes had been put out of tune through inhaling too plentifully the odours of the "fragrant weed on the previous day

MADAME SAINTON-DOLBY'S NEW SONG,
"THE DAYS THAT ARE NO MORE."
(Poetry by TENNYSON.)
Composed expressly for Madame Sainton-Dolby by JACQUES BLUMENTHAL.

"Who does not know the Poet Laureate's exquisite lines, beginning:

'Tears, idle tears, I know not what they mean;
Tears from the depth of some divine despair
Rise in the heart, and gather to the eyes,' &c.

That M. Blumenthal, though a Dutchman, loves the poetry of Tennyson, may be gathered from the true sympathetic manner in which he has set his beautiful verses to music. The popularity of this little song is already attested."—Musical World.

Ostend.—The Ostend journals inform us that a grand musical solemnity was held at the Casino on Saturday the 23rd ultimo, under the direction of M. Jules de Glimes, the eminent professor of singing, from Brussels. The company included some of the most distinguished and renowned amateurs in the kingdom, among whom may be mentioned his Majesty the King of Prussia, Prince George of Prussia, and the Grand Duke of Baden, all connoisseurs par excellence. So universal was the demand for places, that more than 400 persons could not be accommodated, M. de Glimes, however, ever willing to oblige, although at no small trouble and expense to himself, consented to remain and organise a second concert on Monday, whereby the disappointed were gratified (all except those whose chief desire might be to see the royal amateurs), as the programme was almost identical in both entertainments. The artists were Mlle. Trebelli, "the famous cantatrice," as the Journal de Bruxelles styles her, from the Italian Opera of Paris; Herr Theodore Formes, brother to the celebrated basso, and first tenor of the Grand Opera of Berlin; the brothers de Munck—the one a distinguished violinist, the other a distinguished violoncellist; and M. Gouchon, a pianist of repute. The performance was eminently successful. La Trebelli and M. Formes, above all, covered themselves with glory. "Their beautiful voices harmoniously married" (we transcribe literally from a local paper), "produced an effect not to be expressed" (indicible). M. de Glimes is complimented on all sides, not merely for the zeal and energy he displayed in organising the concert, but for the admirably artistic manner in which he accompanied all the pieces on the pianoforte. Both entertainments, indeed, are likely to constitute the great musical events of the season 1861 at Ostend.

Melbourne.—The return of the Lyster troupe to the Theatre Royal will be signalised by the production of an original serio-comic opera, entitled "The Gentleman in Black," by Mr. Marsh, of this city. Competent judges speak highly of the music. The principal airs are said to possess a fresh and sparkling character, while the overture indicates not only the inventive powers of the composer's mind, but his knowledge of instrumentation, and his capacity to turn the resources of the orchestra to the best advantage. The opera is to be produced with every regard to scenic effect; and as the period at which the story is laid is that of the first French revolution, and the destruction of the Bastille constitutes the finale, there is ample scope for illustration and effect. We are glad to learn that Mr. Kyte contemplates making some extensive and necessary improvements in the Theatre Royal, including the addition of an elegant refreshment-room for the exclusive use of ladies attending the dress circle. This is proposed to be erected on the west side of the theatre, and will resemble a conservatory, ornamented with shrubs and flowers, and a fountain. A new method of illuminating the dress circle is to be introduced, and the present uncomfortable seats are to be replaced by others of a more commodious character.—Argus, June 7.

BOULOGNE.

August. 28, 1861.

If there be any smoke-dried Londoner still undecided where to pass his midsummer holiday, let him make up his mind to come to Boulogne. Nowhere else will he get such a thorough change; no other sea-side town offers more attractions in the way of amusement and relaxation. I am an authority on the subject, for there's not a watering-place on the coast of England of which I cannot speak from personal experience. I have tried Brighton, and have vainly endeavoured to combine enjoyment with submission to the fashionable regulations to which its visitors are supposed to submit. I have been to Ramsgate and Margate, have lounged upon their jetties, and spent my money at their libraries, have been made uncomfortable by the gorgeous, hot-looking velvets of the nosey matrons, and have been jostled rudely by the breast-pinney brethren, who, at this time of year, forsake Jewry to invade the Isle of Thanet and claim it as their own. I have sauntered along the beach at Hastings and calculated the result of a jump from Lover's Seat. Lowestoff and Llandudno are equally well-known to me, while the boasted charms of Scarborough have proved themselves far too fatiguing for my fastidious taste.

To appreciate Boulogne thoroughly I advise a short sojourn en route at Folkestone, that most mysterious of all places where, as far as I have ever been able to make out, civilisation is limited to half a dozen houses and a hotel, the rest of the town being apparently in the same condition, and the natives in the same wild state as they might have been when Cæsar visited them. Dine at the Pavilion Hotel table d'hôte because it is the worst dinner you can possibly meet with—badly cooked—badly served. If you have time, sleep at the hotel in the dismal room which will be allotted to you—bathe in the morning. Dinner, bed, and bath have their uses. Under other circumstances I should say, avoid them, as you would any cause of misery and unhappiness; but in this instance they will be beneficial and give a spice to your enjoyment of the petits plaisirs de la vie provided for you on this side of the water.

Musical people seem to be very generally of my opinion as to the attractions of Boulogne. Prima donnas, tenors, basses, contraltos, pianists, and composers are to be met with everywhere. At the tables d'hôte, the promenade, the library, wherever you go, some well-known face will surely meet you, and the only unpleasant feeling likely to interfere with your amusement is the possibility of the labours of the London season being renewed at Boulogne by the innumerable concert-givers and beneficiaires here congregated together. They are, however, devoted to the dolce far niente, and apparently have forgotten for the moment all about their programmes and advertisements. Their chief enjoyment is bathing. Now bathing, as carried on in France generally, and at Boulogne particularly, is a very much more respectable and sociable amusement than it is in many sea-side towns on the English coast. At Margate I remember last year being scandalised by the conduct of the bathers, and those who watched them from the shore. There were no regulations as to costume. Men and women were to be seen within a few yards of each other, destitute of any covering whatever; while young ladies who were fortunate enough to inhabit the houses facing the sea, brought their opera glasses into requisition to get a better view of the disgraceful exhibition which daily presented itself to their eager gaze.

Such an outrage on decency as that which is, I dare say, still in practice at Margate and elsewhere in England at the sea-side, would be punished severely in France. At Boulogne the bathers of both sexes are compelled to dress, the fact of being in the water not being considered any excuse for violating the rules of propriety. This year there are certainly some drawbacks to the bathing, but not of a very serious nature. The management of the baths has, I am told, fallen into the hands of the municipal authorities, who have appointed very incompetent persons to carry out the arrangements. Great is the confusion of a morning on the shore among the applicants for tickets, towels, dresses and machines. The père de famille with his numerous progeny anxious for a dip gets very impatient. He remonstrates gently at first, but soon begins a crescendo of fire and fury, which attains an alarming height until he is thrust, family and all, into a machine, and carried off into the water, where his anger soon gets cooled. Après tout he has only had to wait some short time longer than usual, and the crowd of visitors is sufficient apology for his being forced to do so. In the water you can enjoy a pleasant swim with your fair friend whom you may have met at a table d'hôte. That's she in the blue-striped bloomer costume. She swims well, and will very probably beat you if you try a race with her. Take care of the priest who is floundering about in that tremendously long gown, if you happen to strike out too far you may do him serious bodily injury. He looks more like an air mattrass than a human being as he floats on the top of the water.

It is twelve o'clock and everybody's bathing — all the prima donnas, tenors, basses, and contraltos in Boulogne. "Com' è dolce' sta mattina," says Donna Anna, as, she greets you from among the breakers. "Venez nous joindre," screams Fidelio, who is hand in hand with Weber's Concert Stück, dancing and splashing about like an amphibious Bayadère. "Gott im Himmel" exclaims an old German, as he puts his toe in the water. "N'allez pas si loin," shout the officers of the Humane Society to some venturesome swimmer out so far that his head is only a small black speck on the blue expanse. The boat, which is always in attendance, rows after him, and he is made to turn in shore. So it goes on. Girls laughing, children screaming, men shouting, until everybody has had a demi heure à l'eau, and gone home to lunch. A drive to the Vallée, or a sail on the Liane, helps to pass away the afternoon very pleasantly, and to get up an appetite for the table d'hôte at six o'clock. And what a feast for Lucullus is that table d'hôte (no matter at what hotel—the Imperial being the best, par excellence) compared to the pyglossian meal at Folkestone. No means are neglected to make the repast as enjoyable as possible. The decorations of the table are elegant and artistic. Flowers and fruits in pretty china dishes, massive gold and silver candelabras have a brilliant effect upon the snow-white spotless cloth spread for a hundred or more visitors, and extending the whole length of the spacious salle à manger. The dinner is unexceptionable, well cooked, and capitally served. There are objections to every table d'hôte, or rather to dining on any occasion in public. Your opposite neighbour may be a man of vulgar habits and offend your gentility by using his fork as a toothpick, or eating peas with a knife. He may be an insufferable coxcomb, and annoy you by his noisy overbearing conduct — but at the risk of such contingencies you stand a chance of sitting next to an agreeable companion, or of a pair of bright sparkling eyes to look at over the way, either of which is a very pleasant adjunct to a dinner, and raises your spirits accordingly. At Boulogne I have had experience of every sort of neighbour, and am happy to say the more agreeable have hitherto exceeded the objectionable, both in number and effect. Dinner over, there is plenty of amusement, whether at the Etablissement, where you can dance or play at cards; at the Tintilleries, where you can dance only, but as violently as you like (and that's a consideration with some people); at the Theatre, where you can hear comedies, and now and then an opera, very respectably performed; at the fair, where you can see real Dulcamaras, male and female, retail their medicines to the too confiding populace. It's really worth while listening to the eloquent impudence of these charlatans, who seem to make a very good living by their trade. Last week I heard one hold forth to the crowd from the roof of her carriage, a very decent-looking vehicle, upon the rumble of which were two drummers who preluded every sentence of Mad. Dulcamara by a deafening rappel. She sold the medicines of her father, a physician, according to her story, too well off to do so himself. He had made a colossal fortune — she continued to dispense his drugs from purely philanthropic motives. They were perfectly harmless, and to prove it she swallowed a box full, having, she said, a slight attack of indigestion. How the drums beat as the pills went down one by one! It was quite alarming.

Besides the amusements I have mentioned, concerts are occasionally given by the Société Philharmonique, for which artists of the first rank and reputation are engaged. One took place last week, and excited great interest on account of the celebrated Sisters Marchisio being announced to sing.

Here is the programme in extenso:—

M. Al. Guilmant tiendra le piano, qui sort des ateliers d'Érard.

The Salle des Concerts is not a very first-rate music room. Narrow, long, and low, when crammed, as it was on this occasion, it becomes most insufferably hot. To enjoy music one ought to be completely at ease, cool, and comfortable. The architect, in whatever age he lived, was evidently not of this opinion, and from what I have seen of concert rooms, architects generally seem to differ from me. That, however, by the way. The band of the Philharmonique consists of amateurs, and is therefore exempt from criticism—a fortunate circumstance for all the amateur bands I have ever heard. The Boulogne Sterndale Bennett (judging from his back), is a good-natured musician. He took things very quietly (judging from his back), and allowed no mishap to disturb his equanimity. His shoulders are broad and his head small, so that, as far as one can tell (judging from his back), he is physically qualified for the position he fills. True, he might have got red in the face when the amateur trumpet came in too soon, or have shaken his fist privately at the violoncello, and made signs indicative of wrath at the bassoon, but if he did, it was so well managed, that judging from all he deigned to show the public, viz. his back, there is not a more easy-going conductor in the world than he is. The concert having been inaugurated by the overture to Masaniello, the amateurs and their conductor left the platform, and the Sisters Marchisio appeared. The great attraction of the evening, they were greeted with loud and prolonged applause. It says a great deal for the energy and enterprise of the directors of the Société, that they bring such artists to sing at their concerts, it being well known that the "sisters" demand and receive as extravagant terms as any other vocalists of the present day.

They fully justified their engagement, by attracting an audience which filled the Salle des Concerts to overflowing. The opinion of the continental press of the talent of the two young ladies is already familiar to the readers of the Musical World. Wherever they have appeared, the enthusiasm of the public has been excited by the perfection of their duet singing. It is difficult to imagine anything more sympathetic and harmonious than the blending of their voices, while the extraordinary vocal facility they have acquired, enables them to execute the most surprising fioriture and cadenzas with unerring certainty and effect. The Semiramide duet they sang as arranged for them expressly by Rossini himself. It met with immense success. M. Lamoury is a violoncellist of very great talent, and had he contented himself with playing twice, would have left a most agreeable impression. But three violoncello solos are too many in one evening. The listener became satiated and fatigued long before M. Lamoury had brought his cello gymnastics to a termination.

M. Gennaro Perrelli plays the piano with a touch as light as air, and astonished everybody by his performance of some variations for the left hand alone. As far as mechanical skill is concerned, M. Perrelli was completely successful; but, for my own part, I would rather listen to the young lady playing a simple melody from the Mariage aux Lanternes in the next room, than all the arpeggios and difficulties ever overcome by patience at the sacrifice of sentiment. But then I am not a musician, and M. Perrelli might say I know nothing about it. The concert was finished brilliantly by the Norma duet, after which the fresh air afforded a most agreeable change to the stifling atmosphere of the crowded room. Since the Société Philharmonique there has been nothing remarkable to disturb the daily routine of bathing, lunching, driving, and dining. Should anything further happen it shall be duly recorded by the

THE BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Birmingham, Aug. 26th.

I arrived here this evening, and immediately wended my way to the hostelry I always "use," as Jeames would say, for there I am certain of being well treated. In my opinion, a great deal more depends upon a critic's securing comfortable quarters and generous diet than people usually imagine. Napoleon declared that the stomach ruled mankind, and Theodore Hook has described—too truly, I am afraid—how the judges' after-dinner verdicts at the Old Bailey were influenced by the quality of the marrow-puddings and the flavour of the sheriffs' fine crusted old port. I always make it a rule, therefore—for the sake of art, mind you, and not my own—to look after my creature-comforts, as much as possible, on occasions like the present, and, to tell the truth, I generally succeed pretty well.

Of course, the approaching Festival is the great theme of conversation, and excites a vast amount of enthusiasm among all classes. From the current reports, there is every reason to believe that, this year, it will prove a grand success, both artistically and pecuniarly. For the first fact we have a guarantee in the names of the artists engaged; and, for the second, in the anxiety displayed to obtain places. However, we shall see, or, to adopt a foreign phrase never before employed—Nous verrons.

Aug. 27th.

I have just had the pleasure of listening to one of the finest performances of Elijah it has ever been my good fortune to hear. Nothing could have gone off better. The principal singers, the chorus, the orchestra, and, though last not least, the conductor, Mr. Costa, are entitled to the highest praise. Before proceeding further in matters musical, I may, perhaps, mention parenthetically, in terms of sincere commendation, the efforts made by the proper authorities to secure the comfort of their visitors. A great deal has been said, and justly, of the precautions adopted by the managers of public fêtes in Paris and other foreign cities, but, after having seen the order and regularity that prevailed in Birmingham to-day, it would have been impossible for any one to repeat the parrot-cry, "They do these things much better in France." Barriers had been erected along the principal thoroughfares leading to the magnificent Town Hall, so that, although the crowd was very great, the visitors were not incommoded by it in the slightest degree. In fact, everything, including the weather itself, was all that could be desired.

Since the last Festival, the interior of the Town Hall has been redecorated, in a style which would gladden the heart of Mr. Owen Jones himself. The means of illumination, too, have been improved by some classical gas-candelabra, a present from the Messrs. Elkington. Altogether, the building, when filled, this morning, by its audience of well-dressed women and men, all in holiday attire, and in the best possible spirits, presented a coup-d'œil which will not easily be forgotten by those present.

The appearance of Mr. Costa in the orchestra was the signal for an enthusiastic burst of applause, the best proof how deeply the celebrated conductor's efforts are appreciated by the good people of Birmingham, as well as by the members of the chorus and orchestra, who were quite as demonstrative as the general public.

The proceedings commenced with the National Anthem, Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington taking the first verse, while the second was arranged as a quartet, sung by the above lady, Miss Palmer, Messrs. Sims Reeves and Santley, the whole audience standing up in obedience to the time-honoured custom. Then came the real business of the day, the oratorio itself. As I have previously remarked, it was magnificently given. Elijah is identified with Birmingham, and no festival here would be considered complete without it. The local amateurs composing the chorus know the work by heart; and when we recollect that, in addition to this, they have enjoyed the advantage of Mr. Costa's advice and guidance for a week or so, we can easily understand that their performance must be immeasurably superior to that of the various associations at the grand musical gatherings in Germany, where the vocalists, to the number of one or two thousand, as at Nuremburg lately, have only one rehearsal. I do not mention this with a view to depreciate the efforts of the natives of Fatherland, but merely to chronicle the fact that England, unmusical as foreigners will persist in calling her, frequently sets an example, even in music, which might with advantage be followed by those who are eternally asserting they are our superiors in all that relates to the divine art of Mendelssohn and Beethoven, of Handel and Mozart. Were I to notice in detail all the fine effects in the singing of the chorus, I should greatly exceed the space allotted to me in the columns of the Musical World. I never heard finer choral vocalism. Thus, not only were what used to be considered the grander choruses, the chevaux de bataille of the choristers, exquisitely given, but those choruses to which less attention was formerly paid, such as "Blessed are the men," "The watching over Israel," and "He that shall endure to the end shall be saved," were rendered with a delicacy, an amount of feeling, and a degree of precision which imparted to them an importance they never before possessed in the minds of the general public—however much musicians may have been impressed with their consummate loveliness — and prove that, high as Elijah has hitherto stood in popular estimation, its fame has not yet attained its culminating point, but will go on steadily increasing from year to year, as fresh beauties, hitherto unsuspected, like the existence of gold in Australia only a short time since, continue to be evolved. Man's intelligence requires to be matured up to the appreciation of great works. Shakspeare had long slumbered with the dead ere his sublime productions met with anything like the respect due to their transcendant merits; and such, I am inclined to believe, is the case with the creations of Mendelssohn. Before concluding my notice of this portion of the performance, I may mention that, at a signal from the Earl of Shrewsbury and Talbot, the president on the occasion, the final chorus of the first part, "Thanks be to God," was repeated.

I now come to the solo singers. The soprano music was confided to Mlle. Titiens and Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington. The former lady has evidently made great strides in the rendering of oratorio music since her first essay in the Creation. The music in Elijah is evidently better suited to her powers than that of Haydn's masterpiece, and the experience she has gained is of great use to her. "Nobody is missed" was a favourite axiom of Talleyrand, the astute, and, though we cannot help regretting that we shall no more listen to the sweet, pure tones of Clara Novello, or the fascinating strains of Mad. Otto Goldschmidt, Mlle. Titiens' singing to-day went far to prove the truth of the observation which emanated from the cynical heart of the wily ex-priest and whilome diplomatist. Her execution of the fine air, "Hear ye, Israel," was a superb piece of artistic vocalisation and expressive declamation—calm, lofty, and unaffected. Her pronunciation of the English words, moreover, was extremely satisfactory, and proves how assiduously she must have laboured to approach perfection — which I am almost tempted to assert she has attained — in every imaginable respect. In the double quartet, "For he shall give," in the trio, "Lift thine eyes," and in the quartet and chorus, "Holy, holy, holy" — in the last especially — her natural aptitude for oratorio was placed beyond a doubt. The music of Elijah is not exactly adapted to Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington. Nevertheless, she is far too accomplished a vocalist ever to disappoint altogether the expectations of her audience, and belie her well-earned reputation in other branches of the art. But her style is rather too light for the severe and measured tread of oratorio. I intend these observations generally, for she was very fine in the concerted pieces, as well as in the duet between the Widow and the Prophet. The contralto music was divided between Mad. Sainton-Dolby and Miss Palmer, who fully sustained their previous reputation. Mad. Sainton-Dolby was especially good in the air "O rest in the Lord," which was repeated at the request of the noble President, for the audience have no ostensible part in the matter, being requested to refrain from all manifestations of applause at the morning performances, although they are allowed to be as demonstrative as they choose in the evening. The opinion of the Musical World with regard to encores is, by this time, pretty well known to all its readers. But if the system of overtaxing the powers of artists is bad, or if it is out of place for the general public to call for the repetition of a particular piece, why should the said system still be pursued by the President himself, who, above all others, I should say, is bound to set a good example and preserve order and decorum? Such an arrangement savours too much of a partiality for cringing towards those in high places. It may suit the Hofburg Theatre in Vienna, but is far from appropriate in a great centre of intelligence and political liberty like Birmingham. In the words of Hamlet, I beg to say, "Reform it altogether." But revenons à nos moutons. Miss Palmer was excellent throughout, distinguishing herself more particularly in the air, "Woe unto them," which she rendered with touching expression and artistic finish. Mr. Sims Reeves was in fine voice, and never sang with more spirit than on this occasion. His rendering of the recitative and air, "If with all your hearts," was superb. The same may be said of the accompanied recitative, "Man of God," in Part II., and, "Then shall the righteous." Mr. Santley was heard to great advantage in all the music allotted to him. His rendering of the song, "Lord God of Abraham," and, "Is not His word like fire?" created a deep impression M Montem Smith effectively discharged his duties as second tenor and the subordinate parts in the double quartet were well sustained by Mrs. Sutton, Messrs. Mason, Briggs and Smythson. The final quartet, "O! come every one," sung by Mlle. Titiens, Miss Palmer, Mr. Montem Smith, and Mr. Santley, was a great treat. It narrowly escaped repetition, for the President gave the signal for an encore. But Mr. Costa, somewhat like Nelson, perhaps, on a certain occasion, did not see it, and thus the artists' lungs were spared. The final chorus, "And then shall your light," formed, by the manner in which it was delivered, a worthy conclusion to this magnificent performance. I should be guilty of an act of most culpable omission were I not again to state that the playing of the band was simply magnificent. It could not have been surpassed, and but seldom equalled.

Among the notabilities—the sommités, as the French style them —were the Earl of Shrewsbury and Talbot, president; the Mayor of Birmingham and party, Lord Calthorpe, the Hon. Miss Calthorpe, the Hon. Augustus Calthorpe, Colonel the Hon. Somerset Calthorpe and party, Mrs. Dugdale, Mr. W. S. Dugdale, jun., the Rev. W. Astley, Lady Willoughby de Broke and party, Lady Mordaunt and party, Lord Wrottesley and party, Viscount Lifford and the Hon. Miss Hewitt, Sir Francis Scott, Lady Scott, and party; Sir W. Hartopp, Lady Hartopp, and party; the Hon. and Rev. W. Lyttelton and party, Lady Charlotte Chetwynd and party, the Hon. and Rev. John Bridgeman and Miss Moncrieff, the Rev. Mr. Biddulph and party, the Rev. Herbert Peel and party, the Baroness Windsor and party, the Hon. and Rev. Mr. Clive, Lady Sandys and party, Mr. T. H. Foley, M.P., and party, Mr. W. Scholefield, M.P., and party, Sir T. Winnington, M.P., and party, Mr. John Hardy, M.P., Mrs. Hardy and party, Sir Francis Shuckburgh and party, Sir John Trollope, M.P., and party, Mr. Howard Galton and party, Lord Raglan and party, the Rev. W. Graham, the Hon. Colonel Legge and party, Lord Somerville and party.

The general audience numbered more than 1500 persons, and the total receipts, including donations and collections, amounted to 1809*l.* 17s. 10d., a welcome addition to the funds of that admirable institution, the General Hospital.

Aug. 28th.

Really, the duties of critic on a London musical paper are by no means light. At the close of the London season, the gentleman who "does" the theatres, may pack up his portmanteau or carpet-bag, and proceed in search of that relaxation he so much needs after his weary labours. He may visit Paris or Baden Baden; drop in to see a friend at Berlin or Vienna; pay a visit to the Tyrol, scale Mont Blanc, or pass a pleasant fortnight in exploring and admiring the beauties of the Rhine. If he be more homely in his tastes, he may roam through the lake districts, lounge on the esplanade at Brighton, or eat shrimps and wear buff slippers at Margate. He is not sent about the country to record the provincial achievements of dramatic stars. Were Robson and M. Fechter to appear in the same piece at the Theatre Royal, anywhere out of the sound of Bow Bells, Londoners would be perfectly contented to put up with the accounts furnished by the local gentlemen of the press. But the poor musical critic is differently situated from his dramatic confrère. For him there is no rest, and nolens volens, after laying down his pen as soon as Belgravia envelops its parlour blinds in old newspapers and Pall Mall is deserted, he must be off into the provinces to record the musical doings there. His task is certainly rendered agreeable when he can hear such a performance as the one I have just noticed, but, alas for his patience and his nerves, when he is doomed to sit out a "miscellaneous concert," such as that given last evening! The following is the programme:—

PART I.—Overture (Siege of Corinth), Rossini; Duo—Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington and Signor Belletti, "Signorina, in tanta fretta" (Don Pasquale), Donizetti; Song—Miss Palmer, "Save, Father, on the sea," Hatton; Trio—Mad. Rudersdorff, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, and Mr. Sims Reeves, "Ti prego, O Madre pia," Curschmann; Aria—Signor Giuglini, "Spirito gentil" (Favorita), Donizetti; Glee—Mad. L. Sherrington, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Montem Smith, and Signor Belletti, "Blow, gentle gales," Bishop; Aria—Mlle. Adelina Patti, "Ah! fors e lui" (Traviata), Verdi; Duo—Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington and Mr. Santley, "La ci darem la Mano" (Don Giovanni), Mozart; Song—Mad. Sainton-Dolby, "The days that are no more" (Poetry by Tennyson), Blumenthal; Scena—Mlle. Titiens, "Softly sighs," Weber; Concerto Pianoforte—Miss A. Goddard, in G Minor, Mendelssohn.

PART II.—Overture (Der Freischütz), Weber; Ballad—Mr. Sims Reeves, "Fresh as a Rose," Balfe; Trio—Mad. L. Sherrington, Mad. Rudersdorff, and Mad. Sainton-Dolby, "Night's lingering shades" (Azor e Zemira), Spohr; Aria—Signor Belletti, "Sorgete" (Maometto Secondo), Rossini; Air—Mad. Rudersdorff, "Isabelle la oruelle" (La Circassienne), Auber; Duo—Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini, "Da quel di" (Linda di Chamouni), Donizetti; Aria—Mlle. Adelina Patti, "Ah, non credea mirarti" (Sonnambula), Bellini; Duo—Signor Giuglini and Signor Belletti, "Claudio ritorna" (Elisa e Claudio), Mercadante; Scena—Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, "The Shadow Song" (Dinorah), Meyerbeer; Duo—Mlle. Titiens and Mr. Santley, "Crudel Perche" (Nozze di Figaro), Mozart; Finale, Tutti—"Vadasi via di qua," Martini.

Now, there is not a number in the above with which every musical Londoner is not on terms of the most intimate acquaintance, and therefore you may judge of the effect the entire selection exercised upon your Correspondent, who had not only to listen to, but to report on it. However, "Needs must when the devil drives," and therefore I will at once proceed to give you a faithful account of the proceedings. In the first place, the two overtures were great hits. Need I say they were both splendidly given by the band? Miss Palmer produced a highly favourable impression in Hatton's ballad, "Save, Father, on the sea." Of the other two ballads, "The days that are no more," sung by Mad. Sainton-Dolby, and "Fresh as a rose," sung by Mr. Sims Reeves, the latter appeared to suit the audience more especially, as great efforts were made to prevail on Mr. Sims Reeves to repeat it, but that gentleman was true to his principle of not accepting encores, and declined acquiescing in the general wish. The same was not the case with Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini it the duet, "Da quel di," from Donizetti's Linda di Chamouni. By the way, we have every reason to be thankful for the appearance of Signor Giuglini at the Festival. He was travelling from Brighton on Sunday by the train which ran into the excursionists, and might have shared the deplorable fate of so many others. As it is, he has escaped with merely a bruised hand. He accepted an encore also in "Spirito gentil," from the same composer's Favorita. Of the duets, in addition to the one already noticed, that from Don Pasquale, "Signorina, in tanta fretta," sung by Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington and Signor Belletti, produced no marked sensation, but appeared caviare to the Birminghamites. Mozart's "La ci darem la Mano," sung by the same lady and Mr. Santley, went, on the contrary, in splendid style; but Mercadante's "Claudio ritorna," from Elisa e Claudio, was not more successful than "Signorina, in tanta fretta," although given by Signori Giuglini and Belletti. Mozart's "Crudel, perché," from Le Nozze di Figaro, however, excited the liveliest marks of approbation. The trio by Curschmann and that by Spohr met with a hearty welcome. The freshest piece in the programme was "Isabelle la cruelle," from the veteran Auber's last opera, La Circassienne. This was confided to Mad. Rudersdorff, who acquitted herself as she invariably does. But why should I go on, noticing the programme piece by piece, and repeating opinions which must long ago have become familiar to every reader of the MUSICAL WORLD? Let me proceed to the more remarkable events of the evening. The first, according to its place in the programme, was the début of Mlle. Adelina Patti before a Birmingham audience. It may be boldly asserted, without fear of contradiction, that every person among the vast assembly collected each night within the Town Hall awaited with anxious expectation the appearance of our recent musical importation from America, an importation in the eyes of sundry enthusiastic musicians worth all the cotton ever sent from New Orleans, though even artists would feel terribly at a loss, if suddenly deprived of the ordinary and highly necessary articles manufactured from the material in question. Of course, when I used the expression "every person," a line or two above, I alluded to the Warwickshire lads and lasses pur sang, and not to those of "the nobility, gentry, and others," who although born, perhaps, in the country, visit it only when fashion declares it mauvais ton to be seen in town. The great majority of the audience—taking that word in the acceptation I intend—wished, in the first place, to hear Mlle. Adelina, in order that they might not be behind the age, for they follow the taste of London with regard to a fair artist, as much as in the weighty matter of a new shape for bonnets, or a novelty in mantles; and they wished, in the second place, to hear her in order to rid themselves of the airs of superiority assumed by the small minority who had already done so. The latter looked forward to the appearance of the young lady with an inward chuckle, and a complacent smile, as much as to say, "Wait a moment; it is all right. We have told you she is magnificent, and you will soon see whether we were not right." In fact, if I may judge from some half dozen who chose the fascinating doncella as their theme of discourse with me, they made her success rather a personal matter. At length, the wished-for moment arrived, and Mlle. Adelina stood on the platform. In a moment, aye, in less, a thousand glances were levelled at her. It struck me that the first impression was one of incredulity, and those who had reported such marvels of the youthful prima donna, fell at least cent. per cent. in the estimation of their fellow provincials, as far as the article of veracity was concerned. But this state of things did not continue long, and ere Mlle. Patti had concluded the cabaletta of her first air, she had worked her audience up to a state of enthusiasm. Her success was no longer—if it had ever been—a matter of doubt, and her fame received the Brummagen stamp, this time, by the way, impressed upon a first-rate article. Her triumph in the air from La Sonnambula was even more brilliant, and the "Ah! non giunge" excited a tempest of applause, which could not be allayed until she had accepted an encore, which she had refused to do in her first air. The other great event of the evening was the performance of Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor, by Miss Arabella Goddard. I regret to say that, after leaving Boulogne to be present here last evening, this gifted lady had been attacked by such severe indisposition as to render it a matter of doubt whether she would be able to play. Her absence would have deprived the lovers of really fine music of a most intellectual treat. Not a sign of her indisposition was apparent in her performance. On the contrary, as if to show what she could do, she fairly excelled herself. Her reading and rendering of the adagio was masterly, delicate, and expressive, in the extreme, while under her magic touch the andante was invested with a charm, a beauty, it is impossible to describe. The applause she received was tremendous, and caused one to regret that one or two more such samples of genuine classical music had not been included in the programme. Why, for instance, among the many hackneyed pieces set down, could there not have been a grand orchestral symphony? Echo answers, Why? Let us hope that those gentlemen who have the management of the next Festival may be induced to give this subject their serious consideration, and treat their audiences to something more in accordance with the spirit of the present day, and with the rapid strides made by classical music of a high order during the last twenty years. I must now conclude, but before doing so, I will add that the concert, as a whole, undoubtedly delighted the audience, and sent them home in great good-humour.

[For an account of the performance of Samson, given on Wednesday morning, we refer our readers to an article in our leading columns from the pen of our correspondent.—H. H., Ed.]

Aug. 29th.

Very grave doubts had been entertained and freely expressed, before the commencement of the Festival, whether the Committee had acted judiciously when, in lieu of the usual miscellaneous concerts, they came to the determination of giving an oratorio in the evening, an oratorio having already furnished the bill of fare for the morning. The opponents of the course adopted maintained that two oratorios in the same day would not only pall upon the public, but also prove rather severe work for the singers. Toujours perdrix, they said, is a thing to be avoided, however fine and succulent each individual bird may be. The supporters of the committee asserted, on the other hand, that the objections urged against the plan were obviously futile, because there was a different audience in the evening to that in the morning. "Who shall decide when doctors disagree?" is a question which has been asked ere now, and, as a rule, Time alone can answer it. This has been the case in the present instance. Time has now demonstrated that the plan was not a wise one. As compared with the miscellaneous concert on Tuesday evening, there was a falling off at the performance of The Creation last evening in the receipts, which amounted only to 642*l.* 10s., a fact all the more to be regretted since Art on occasions like the present is intended to assist the cause of Charity. But I will leave financial matters and proceed to notice the more striking points in the performance, for anything like a detailed criticism would be superfluous, considering how well the public is acquainted both with the work itself and with the rendering of it by most of the principal performers. The following was the "cast" of the Creation yesterday evening:—

Part. I.—Introduction, "Representation of Chaos;" Recitative, Signor Belletti, "In the beginning;" Chorus, "And the Spirit of God;" Recitative, Mr. Montem Smith, "And God saw the light;" Air, Mr. Montem Smith, "Now vanish;" Chorus, "A new created world;" Recitative, Signor Belletti, "And God made the firmament;" Air and Chorus, Mlle. Titiens, "The marvellous work;" Recitative and Air, Signor Belletti, "Rolling in foaming billows;" Recitative and Air, Mlle. Titiens, "With verdure clad;" Recitative, Mr. Montem Smith, "And the heavenly host;" Chorus, "Awake the harp;" Recitative, Mr. Montem Smith, "In splendour bright;" Chorus, Trio, and Chorus, Mlle. Titiens, Mr. Montem Smith and Signor Belletti, "The heavens are telling."

Part II.—Recitative and Air, Mlle. Titiens, "On mighty wings;" Recitative and Arioso, "And God created great whales;" Terzetto, Mlle. Titiens, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Signor Belletti, "Most beautiful appear;" Trio and Chorus, Mlle. Titiens, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Signor Belletti, "The Lord is great;" Recitative and Air, "Now heaven in fullest glory shone;" Recitative and Air, Mr. Sims Reeves "In native worth;" Recitative, "And God saw everything;" Chorus, "Achieved is the glorious work;" Trio, Mlle. Titiens, Mr. Sims Reeves and Signor Belletti, "On Thee each living soul awaits;" Chorus, "Achieved is the glorious work."

Part III.—Introduction and Recitative, Mr. Sims Reeves, "In rosy mantle appears;" Duet, Mad. L. Sherrington and Mr. Santley, "By Thee with bliss;" Chorus, "For ever blest be his power;" Duet, Mad. L. Sherrington and Mr. Santley, "O star the fairest;" Chorus, "Proclaim in your extended course;" Recitative, Mr. Santley, "Our duty we have now performed;" Recitative, Mad. L. Sherrington, "O Thou for whom I am;" Duet, Mad. L. Sherrington and Mr. Santley, "Graceful consort;" Recitative, Mr. Sims Reeves, "O happy pair;" Chorus, Solo parts by Mad. L. Sherrington, Mr. Sutton, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Santley, "Praise the Lord, ye voices all."

Mlle. Titiens fully sustained her recently earned reputation as a singer of sacred music of the first class. Her rendering of "The marvellous work," and of the airs, "With verdure clad," and "On mighty pens," excited but one sentiment among the audience—that of profound and well-merited approbation, and more than confirmed the decision lately pronounced upon this lady in the same work at the Crystal Palace and Exeter Hall. Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington gave universal satisfaction in the music of Eve, while Mr. Santley did as much in that allotted to Adam. The bass music in the first and second parts was sung by Signor Belletti with his usual excellence. The tenor music in the first part was confided to Mr. Montem Smith; the remainder being reserved for Mr. Sims Reeves, who produced as great a sensation as ever in the recitative and air, "In native worth." The choruses were admirably given; and, to sum up, the whole performance passed off most satisfactorily, despite the chilling absence of anything like applause.

It is as difficult to say anything new about the Messiah, which was the oratorio selected for this morning, as it is about the Creation. The parts were thus distributed:—

Part. Overture; Recitative (accompanied), Mr. Sims Reeves, "Comfort ye;" Air, "Every valley;" Chorus, "And the glory of the Lord;" Recitative (accompanied), Mr. Santley, "Thus saith the Lord;" Air, Madame Sainton-Dolby, "But who may abide?" Chorus, "And He shall purify;" Recitative, Miss Palmer, "Behold! a virgin;" Air and chorus, "O Thou that tellest;" Recitative (accompanied), Mr. Santley, "For behold! darkness;" Air, "The people that walked;" Chorus, "For unto us a child;" Pastoral Symphony; Recitative, Mad. L. Sherrington, "There were shepherds;" Recitative (accompanied), "And lo! the angel;" Recitative, "And the angel said;" Recitative (accompanied), "And suddenly;" Chorus, "Glory to God;" Air, Mad L. Sherrington, "Rejoice greatly;" Recitative, Miss Palmer, "Then shall the eyes;" Air, "He shall feed his flock;" second part, Mad. L. Sherrington, "Come unto Him;" chorus, "His yoke is easy."

Part II.—Chorus, "Behold the Lamb of God;" Air, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, "He was despised;" Chorus, "Surely he hath borne;" Chorus, "All we, like sheep;" Recitative (accompanied), Mr. Sims Reeves, "All they that see Him;" Chorus, "He trusted in God; Recitative (accompanied), Mr. Sims Reeves, "Thy rebuke;" Air, "Behold and see;" Recitative (accompanied), Mr. Sims Reeves, "He was cut off;" Air, "But Thou didst not leave;" Chorus, "Lift up your heads;" Full Chorus, "He is the King of Glory;" Recitative, Mr. Sims Reeves, "Unto which of the angels;" Chorus, "Let all the angels;" Air, Mad. Rudersdorff, "How beautiful;" Chorus, "Their sound is gone out;" Air, Signor Belletti, "Why do the nations;" Chorus, "Let us break;" Recitative, Mr. Sims Reeves, "He that dwelleth;" Air, "Thou shalt break them;" Grand Chorus, "Hallelujah."

Part III.—Air, Mlle. Titiens, "I know that my Redeemer;" Quartet, Mlle. Titiens, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Signor Belletti, "Since by man came death;" Chorus, "By man came also;" Quartet, Mlle. Titiens, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Signor Belletti, "For as in Adam all die;" Chorus, "Even so in Christ;" Recitative (accompanied), Signor Belletti, "Behold! I tell you;" Air, "The trumpet shall sound" (Trumpet Obbligato, Mr. Harper);" Grand Chorus, "Worthy is the Lamb." Amen.

The performance was magnificent. Again did the great German prima donna, Mlle. Titiens, electrify her audience. Her rendering of the air, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," was sublime. The other more noticeable points was the singing of Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington in "Rejoice greatly;" of Mad. Sainton-Dolby in "He was despised;" and of Mr. Sims Reeves in the whole of the music which fell to his share. The chorusses went admirably, the "Hallelujah" being encored by the President.

The receipts amounted to the large sum of 2,653*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.*, thus proving that the attraction of The Messiah is as great as it ever was, except in the solitary instance of the Festival here in 1855, when it drew 2,370 persons to the Town Hall.

Among those present were the Earl of Shrewsbury and Talbot (president) and party, the Mayor of Birmingham and party, the High Sheriff of Staffordshire and party, the Hon. Colonel Legge and party, the Earl of Powis and party, the Countess of Bradford, Miss Moncrieff and party, Viscount Lifford, the Hon. Miss Hewitt and party, Lord and Lady Willoughby de Broke and party, Mrs. Monckton, Sir John Trollope, Bart., M.P., Lady Trollope and party, Lord Wrottesley and party, Lord Lyttelton and party, the Hon. Georgiana Leigh, Colonel the Hon. Somerset Calthorpe, the Misses Calthorpe and party, Sir Francis Shuckburgh, Bart., and party, Lady Mordaunt and party, the Rev. Mr. Biddulph and party, Sir George Chetwynd, Bart., Lady Charlotte Chetwynd and party, Sir William Hartopp, Bart., Lady Hartopp and party, Sir Francis Scott, Bart., Lady Scott and party, Admiral Parker and party, C. N. Newdegate, Esq., M.P., Mrs. Newdegate, Miss Boucherett and party, J. Hodgetts Foley, Esq., M.P., and party, Henry Whitmore, Esq., M.P., Mrs. Whitmore and party, the Rev. Herbert Peel and Mrs. Peel, Mrs. Dugdale and party, the Rev. Mr. Astley, Edward Bolton King, Esq., and party, J. H. Galton, Esq., and party, Samuel Pole Shaw, Esq., and party, A. G. Manley, Esq., and party, the Baroness Windsor and party, Mr. Lygon, M.P., and party, the Dowager Lady Ward and party, the Rev. C. Holbech and party, Sir Robert Hamilton, Bart, and party, Sir R. Alleyne, Bart., and party, Lady Louisa Whitmore, John Hardy, Esq., M.P., and party, Lord Raglan, Lady Raglan, and party, the Hon. and Rev. H. Talbot and Mrs. Talbot, Samson Hanbury, Esq., Mrs. Hanbury and party, the Rev. William Greenstreet and party, the Hon. L. Butler and Miss Butler, Mrs. Biddulph and party, the Hon. Miss Rushout.

The concert this evening will doubtless prove a great hit, seeing that Miss Arabella Goddard is to play Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat, and that both Mlle. Titiens and Mlle. Patti are announced to appear. To-morrow we are to have Beethoven's Mass in D, with Handel's Israel, and Hummel's Motett Alma Virgo, in which Mlle. Patti will sing. The Festival will be brought to a conclusion by Judas Maccabæus, and on Saturday there will be a performance of La Sonnambula at the theatre, with Mlle. Patti, Signori Ronconi and Tiberini in the principal parts.

The Musical World.

LONDON: SATURDAY, AUGUST 31, 1861.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

Birmingham, August 29th.

Sir,—The performance of Handel's Samson at the Birmingham Festival on Thursday last was, on the whole, one of the most satisfactory that has taken place since Mr. Costa was appointed conductor, and, indeed, since our great music-meeting has assumed the high position it now occupies. Of the oratorio itself—now happily becoming more and more familiar to the musical public, and gradually vindicating the high opinion entertained by its composer, who (perpetually, it would seem, overlooking the still more magnificent Israel) hesitated whether to accord his preference to Samson or the Messiah—we need say very little. That Samson is the most essentially dramatic of those compositions, the subjects of which Handel was enabled to gather from Sacred Writ, will be generally admitted; nor can the fact of two such vast and elaborate works as this oratorio and its immediate precursor, the great musical epic of Christianity, having been commenced and terminated within the incredibly short interval of ten weeks (from August 22nd, when the Messiah was begun, to October 12th, when Samson was finished) be too often dwelt upon, with wonder at the genius that conceived and the art that accomplished such a herculean labour.

The additional accompaniments supplied by Mr. Costa, the claims of which to favourable consideration have been more than once discussed, would appear now to be indispensable at every grand performance of Samson; and certainly the splendid band of instrumentalists under that gentleman's vigorous control take pains that no effect contemplated by their much-respected chief shall be lost or slurred over. So that, while strict Handelians may indulge in a notion that, here and there, a little too much has been added by the ready and skilful hand of a modern Italian musician to the original granite structure of an old Teutonic giant, few can feel otherwise than gratified at the perfect manner in which the interpolations, such as they are, are allowed to assert their intrinsic value. The choruses on Thursday were worthy all praise, and the immense benefit derived from the weekly practices of the Birmingham Festival Choral Society and the Birmingham Amateur Harmonic Association, again received unanimous acknowledgment. Not to enter into minute details, the whole of that stupendous scene, at the end of Part II., in which the rival apostrophes of Israelites and Philistines are exhibited, now alternately, now combined in one colossal burst of harmony—in which are set forth the antagonistic protestations of Micah, friend of Samson, and of Harapha the giant; in which the solemn choral invocation of the Hebrew, "Hear Jacob's God!" meets a derisive comment in the riotous epithalamium of the idolaters, "To song and dance we give the day;" and lastly, in which a triumphant climax is attained with "Fixed in his everlasting seat" (a masterpiece of choral effect, unsurpassed even by Handel)—all this revealed the utmost possible efficiency: and the impression produced on the enormous crowd assembled in the Town Hall was indescribable. But the great choral displays in the first and second parts of the oratorio, from "Awake the trumpet's lofty sound" (the celebration, by the priests of Dagon, of the festival in honour of their idol), to "Then round about the starry throne" (the prophecy of celestial glory, with which the Israelites stimulate the religious zeal of Samson) in the one, and from "To dust His glory they would tread," to the "Fixed in His everlasting seat" in the other—have obtained frequent and enthusiastic acknowledgment. Less generally appreciated, considering their excellence, have hitherto been the picturesque choruses in Part III., "With thunder armed, great God arise," ending with a musical embodiment of the act of prayer in the highest degree impressive; "The Holy One of Israel be thy guide," spirited enough to arouse the dormant energies of the most crestfallen hero; "Great Dagon has subdued our foe," and "Hear us, our God, O hear our cry," the first expressing the joy of the Philistines at their supposed victory, the last their despair at the unexpected catastrophe, which has involved their enemy and prisoner, Samson, with themselves, in one common ruin—both masterpieces; "Weep, Israel, weep!" the lamentation of the Israelites for their lost champion—in pathos not to be excelled; "Glorious hero," following the "Dead March" (rival to the more noted one in Saul)—with which chorus the oratorio originally terminated; and "Let their celestial concerts all unite"—a happy after-thought, as a morning contemporary reasonably infers, by means whereof the composer averted an anti-climax, and brought his great work to a conclusion with becoming pomp and majesty. These—excepting "Weep, Israel, weep!" which was occasionally out of tune, and "Glorious hero," in certain parts unsteady—were so finely executed by the chorus in the present instance that their merits were just as sensibly felt as those of any of the more renowned choral pieces preceding them. In short, this performance of Samson may be fairly set down as one of the most honourable achievements of the Birmingham Festival—an achievement, indeed, to which the Directors are entitled to look back with pride.

The solo music was, for the most part, equally successful. Miss Banks, apparently not at all disconcerted by the unaccustomed largeness of the arena in "Let the bright seraphim" (deriving, it should be stated, no small advantage from the way in which the famous trumpet part was given by Mr. Harper), elicited the sympathy of the audience to such an extent that the President of the Festival (the Earl of Shrewsbury and Talbot) deemed it expedient to "command" her to repeat the air, although it directly ushers in the final chorus. The same favour was shown to Mr. Santley in "How willing my paternal love," the last song of Manoah (Samson's father), in accordance with a no less unanimous—though, of course, speechless and handless—manifestation of approval; and rarely has approbation been extorted by a more legitimate and truly artistic display. The other bass was Signor Belletti, who, in the music of the giant Harapha, maintained his ground against every rival, and never sang "Honour and arms," his part in the duet with Samson, "Go, baffled slave!" or the declamatory recitatives, with greater animation. To Mad. Sainton-Dolby was allotted the part of Micah, which is as much as to say that the air "Return, O God of Hosts!" was rendered with a classical purity of style that left no room for criticism. Indeed, the expression infused into the last was on a par with that which gained such warm approval for Signor Belletti; but, as this air and the succeeding chorus form but one piece, there was no opportunity for the audience to be equally "demonstrative." The other contralto—Miss Palmer (the part of Micah was cut into halves)—won golden opinions in "The Holy One of Israel." Mad. Rudersdorff undertook the remainder of the soprano music.

The part of Samson is one of the grandest ever imagined by Handel, and at the same time one of the most arduous to the singer, whose physical force and intellectual capacity are alike severely tasked. The elder Braham could at once understand what Handel intended, and render the great composer's meaning plain to every intelligent hearer; but, since Braham, one singer alone has been found with the requisite gifts of voice, intelligence, and executive skill to give the music of Samson with proportionate effect,—that one, it is scarcely necessary to add, is Mr. Sims Reeves, who alike in the sombre and desolate pathos of "Total eclipse," the religious and at the same time passionate fervour of "Why does the God of Israel sleep?" and the fierce impetuosity (so variously set forth in florid divisions) of "Go, baffled coward, go!" rises to the height of the situation, depicts every shade of sentiment and emotion, and thus thoroughly realises the design of the composer. How finely Mr. Reeves delivers recitatives we need not insist. Of these in Samson there are enough and to spare; but, when so simply and unaffectedly declaimed, their prolixity is in a great degree lost sight of. Again; in the long and not very invigorating dialogues with Harapha and Delilah, the same rare talent almost closes the lips of the well-intended councillor about to utter a recommendation to unsparing curtailment. Even the comparatively unthankful air, "Thus when the sun in 's wat'ry bed," which prepares the final "exit" of Samson (Part III.), was made impressive by the peculiar significance given to the last lines—

> "The wand'ring shadows ghastly pale,
> All troop to their infernal gaol,
> Each fetter'd ghost slips to his sev'ral case,"— which materially enhanced the interest of the song, and brought the situation it is meant to illustrate more vividly before the mind. The setting of the sun, as an image of the hero's approaching departure for another sphere, had clearly in this instance suggested nothing to the composer too subtle or profound for the comprehension of the singer. The reading of the entire passage was in the highest sense poetical.

A word of well-merited praise for Mr. Stimpson who presided with ability at the organ (which, by the way, is now and then overtaxed in the additions to the score of Samson), must end this notice of a really admirable performance. That Samson will become popular in Birmingham is more than probable. H. H.

A GREAT deal of curiosity and anxiety is being manifested about the prospects of English Opera in the forthcoming season. "Will Her Majesty's Theatre open with Mr. Sims Reeves, Mlle. Parepa, Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington, &c. &c.?"—"are new operas being prepared for that establishment?"—"will Mr. E. T. Smith be manager?"—"what will Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. Harrison do at Covent Garden?"—"when will the theatre open?"—"what new artists have been secured to assist the co-directors?"—"what composers are busy with what operas?"—are some of the numerous questions being asked on every side, and only a few of which we can at present gratify those interested in the matter by answering. Nothing definite has as yet been arranged about Her Majesty's Theatre; and Mr. E. T. Smith is so deeply absorbed in his new Cremorne speculation—which, thanks to the glorious weather, no less than his own indomitable energy and boundless liberality, has, up to the present moment, turned out, we are right well pleased to chronicle, a most thriving speculation—as to have absolutely no time to give to any other managerial enterprise. That, however, the great theatre in the Haymarket will again open under the banners of English opera we feel confident. The success of last season would fully justify any zealous entrepreneur—even less zealous than Mr. Smith—in trying his hand at the direction. Some mistakes, indeed, were made last year in the administration—inevitable under the circumstances; but these might be easily avoided, and, considering what Robin Hood and the Water Witch achieved for the management, we fancy that there might be far less promising speculations than English Opera at Her Majesty's Theatre. But, as we have said, nothing has been determined, and the prospects of our national music, as far as the establishment in the Haymarket is concerned, are now mere matter for surmise.

Something more definite is known about the future of the "National Opera," under the direction of Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. W. H. Harrison, at Covent Garden. The season will commence the second week in October, and the first novelty produced will be Mr. Howard Glover's opera of Ruy Blas, which was announced last season, but was postponed owing to circumstances over which the managers had no possible control. Mr. Balfe, too, is hard at work, in Dresden, on an opera, the text of which has been supplied by Mr. J. V. Bridgeman, which it is intended to bring out as soon as Ruy Blas has outrun the periodicity of its success. An opera from the pen of Signor Schira has also, we hear, been accepted, as well as one by Mr. Benedict, the latter founded on Mr. Boucicault's drama, the Colleen Bawn—a somewhat intractable subject to treat for musical purposes, we should presuppose, considering the story, the country, and the personages engaged therein. Of Mr. Frank Mori's Bride of Florence and Lambert Simnel—of Mr. Henry Smart's Aminta (if that be the name of his recently finished work)—of Mr. Macfarren's new opera (or of the revival of Charles the Second, promised last year)—of Mr. John Barnett's new or old opera—of Mr. Bristow's American opera, Rip Van Winkle, oft promised, never performed, all of which have been spoken of, more or less, we know nothing positively or comparatively. We have been informed, indeed, that Mr. Harrison has a desk full of librettos, which he has purchased; and we know from experience that he is one of the best living friends to poets who borrow other people's stories and versify them. Were Mr. Harrison, by the way, as shrewd a judge of music as he is of rhymes, it is just possible it might prove more advantageous to the National Emprize over which he part presides. Nevertheless, we prefer managers who understand versifying to managers who attempt it; and consequently can bestow unqualified praise on Mr. Harrison, who last year cried content with his single Gallic adaptation, and has since, as far as we know, not modulated from the manager to the minstrel, and taken the poet's work out of the poet's hands.

About the company we know very little beyond the re-engagement of Mr. Santley and Mr. Honey, the absence of both of whom last season was greatly missed. A letter on the subject from a gentleman who signs himself "Vox Populi," and sends his card, appears in another part of our columns. We cannot agree with the writer that native artists of repute are plentiful, but, on the contrary, think them scarce. Where, for instance, are the directors to find a "prime tenor," Mr. Sims Reeves being retained at another house? Where a "prime lady," Mlle. Parepa and Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington being equally secured? We fancy there is a better chance for obtaining the ladies than the gentlemen, and can see no pretensive tenor who can take the field alongside of Mr. Harrison. We shall offer no further remarks on the subject at present—which we should not have touched upon but for the letter of our correspondent—reserving what we have to say until such time as the programme for the season appears. Pending which, we may be allowed to express our conviction that in the approaching campaign Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. W. H. Harrison will exhibit their utter abnegation of all petty jealousies in the matter of engagements, and that they will endeavour to procure for their theatre the best available talent which the country can yield; by which means only can a true "National Opera" expect to flourish.

MR. ALFRED MELLON'S CONCERTS.

The second "special," or "classical" night was given on Friday, last week, when Handel was represented in the first part, the selection being made from The Messiah, consisting of the principal vocal solos from that grand sacred masterpiece sung by Mlle. Parepa, Mad. Laura Baxter, Mr. George Perren, and Mr. Weiss. Mlle. Parepa sang "I know that my Redeemer liveth," and "Rejoice greatly," with eminent success, the latter creating an immense effect. The fair artist improves nightly, and is gaining in style, which perhaps was her only drawback. The brilliancy of her voice, and great natural facility, are thoroughly appreciated by Mr. Mellon's audiences, who, for the most part, are composed of real amateurs, allured to the theatre to hear good music and nothing else. The season of the dog-days is not exactly the time for the London Gents to disport themselves in music-halls. They flock rather to Margate, Ramsgate, Herne Bay, Broadstairs, and all the chief ports, wallowing on the sands, like sea-cows ashore, or play the mimic sailor, dressed, as Thackeray has it, in telescopes and pea-jackets. But thanks to the love for real music, Mr. Mellon is enabled to dispense with the earless attendance of that vacuous section of the community, and fill the theatre without their smirk persons. But this by the sea. Following the example of Mlle. Parepa, Mad. Laura Baxter produced a decided impression in that most pathetic and heart-rending of all airs, "He was despised and rejected of men," which exhibited her beautiful voice and devotional feeling to the utmost advantage. As, however, we are nothing if not critical, we must confess we should have preferred the air with less emphasis on the closing notes. Mad. Laura Baxter's voice is too fine not to suffer from any the least straining. The song "He shall feed his flock," given, according to custom, in the different keys, by the two ladies, was an irreproachable performance. Mr. George Perren sang the recitative and air "Comfort ye my people," and "Every valley shall be exalted," with becoming expression and dignity, but hardly with that power and largeness of style the music demands. Mr. Weiss was exceedingly forcible in the grand bravura air, "Why do the nations so furiously rage together?" and in the air, "The trumpet shall sound" (trumpet obbligato, Mr. T. Harper), was still more successful. The band especially distinguished itself in the overture and the pastoral symphony.

Variety has particularly characterised the programmes during the past week. A young pianist, Miss Julia Woolf, of whose antecedents we know nothing, has appeared on more than one occasion, executing some popular fantasia with more than average success; new pieces of music have been introduced, new solos played, and Mlle. Parepa, Mr. George Perren, and Mr. Weiss have supplied a ceaseless round of favourite airs, ballads, &c. Saturday was a volunteer night, which, of course, was tumultuously attended by the grey-coats and the green-coats, but unfortunately, not being enrolled corps-wise, we did not feel bound to attend, and cannot state particulars. The performance, however, we hear, went off like a Whitworth rifle. Next week a Mozart night is promised—Thursday is fixed. Monday or Tuesday will be devoted to an "English, Irish, and Scotch" pasticcio. In short, everything is being done which could be done to amuse the London loiterers who are debarred by imperious necessity from flying to the continent or migrating to the sea shore. Let those compelled to stay in town be thankful to Mr. Alfred Mellon for his harmonious spiriting.

Homeward Bound.—Amongst the recent arrivals from Australia with Mr. J. V. Brooke and Mr. Richard Young, we have to record that of Mrs. Hancock, many years leading vocalist in that colony.

Surrey Theatre.—A new operetta, by Dr. Bennett Gilbert, entitled A Night in Fairy-land, will be produced at this theatre on Saturday next, with the following solo vocalists—Miss Camilla Chipp, Miss Thirlwall, M. De Solla, and Mr. Wallworth. A full band and chorus are engaged, and a corps de ballet.

The author of the present work is peculiarly fitted for the task of writing a sketch of Zelter's life, not only from the fact of his being a grandson of the composer, but also because he had at his command the necessary documents—which he tells us are numerous, and by no means exhausted—and, moreover, was acquainted with all the family traditions. He says, in his preface, that it was only a few years ago that he discovered the materials of his biography in the loft of a country mansion in Pomerania. Although in the interval of nearly thirty years since the decease of Zelter, the number of those who knew, loved, and honoured him, may have considerably decreased, the author still hopes his book will find readers; some, he believes, will derive from its perusal the enjoyment arising from participation in the scenes pourtrayed, while others will view it as a romance or a historical picture.

The book is divided into two parts. The larger half is taken up by the autobiography from the pen of Zelter himself, and extends to his thirtieth year. He was born on the 11th December, 1758, in Berlin. This disproves, as the author remarks, the assertion made by another writer in this journal, that Zelter first saw the light at Petzov, a place where tiles are manufactured, near Potsdam.

Speaking of the autobiography, the author of the book observes:—"Apart from the naïveté of its style, the frank good humour of its narrative, and the natural charm of its humour, this portion of the work is a mirror, which may boldly be held up to the youth of the present day. The other half is an attempt further to work up the biography from documents, interspersed with letters. As the first part exhibited the gradual course pursued by the subject of it, the latter should show the consequences of that course, and what was done by the hero when he had arrived at the maturity of his powers. In this latter portion will be seen what reparation Posterity has to make to the memory of Zelter, whom it has too soon forgotten; what he did for his art generally; what efforts he made for the Singacademie, as its founder, its support, and its teacher; how he wrung from the Government patronage and support for a regular course of musical instruction; and how he created the institution of the Liedertafel, besides doing many other things."

The author winds up by saying that he hopes he has succeeded in exhibiting to us Zelter in all his antique strength and worth, so that he may live again in the memory of his contemporaries and be recognised by Posterity as a man who deserves to be honoured, imitated, and remembered.

Such are the sentiments of the author. As may be supposed, the great value of the book lies in the peculiar account of the youth and progress of its hero. In applying this term to Zelter, we guard him from that secondary signification of which it is easily susceptible, and, indeed, necessarily so. It is certainly something heroic, and indicative of a strong mind, for a man, when writing his own life, to speak frequently, and, in most instances, with sharpness, nay, with depreciation of himself. The judgment he pronounces on his own acts imparts to the opinions he utters concerning others, and of which we have many instances, the most lively appearance of truth. This first half of his troubled life is characterised, in an exciting, and frequently a pathetic manner, by the struggle in him between manual labour (for, like his father, he was brought up as a mason), and art (for, from natural inclination, he was a musician). This struggle between the Real and the Ideal is, indeed, the trial which the majority of those who yearn after the highest objects have to go through. But Zelter wrote the sketch of his life at a period when he had nearly brought this struggle to a close. It was a very eventful period for him, for he had just lost his second wife, and beheld his native land in the most abject state of degradation, while he himself was without means, and full of anxious care as to how he should provide for his eleven children, passed the long nights without sleep, though he strove to turn them to account. His warmest wish, namely that of visiting Italy, was never destined to be fulfilled, though he was frequently on the point of carrying it out. His relation to his father had a great deal to do with this. Zelter studied art in silence, and without his father's knowledge, while he followed his trade openly and uninterruptedly by his father's side, so that the old man knew less about his son's taste than any one else. One day, when a piece of music by a certain Zelter (it was the cantata on the Death of Frederick the Great) was performed, he was astonished at there being anybody besides himself of that name in Berlin, and a third person had to inform him that the composer was his own son. Both in trade and art Zelter obtained the highest proficiency by the most marvellous exertion, seconded greatly by his corporal strength. About the same time that he finished his apprenticeship as a mason, and was received as a master, in his five-and-twentieth year, a grand composition of his was selected to inaugurate a new organ in the Georgen Kirche. This composition is discussed at considerable length in the book, and the opinions of celebrated contemporaries on it are quoted. A very interesting opinion is that of Kirnberger, the well-known theorist; Marpurg, his rival, is also mentioned. Of all the other persons (and they are not a few) who were connected with Zelter, the most prominent one is Carl Fasch. What is related concerning him is too valuable for us to pass it over in total silence. Besides, the commencement and destiny, the rise and glory of the Singacademie which he founded, are so closely interwoven with the history of these two men, that, considering the very general interest the subject excites in the artistic world, we cannot refrain from quoting the most important facts.

"From the year 1789, there gradually arose the society which afterwards accidentally obtained the name of the Singacademie, and owed its existence to my noble master, and fatherly friend, Fasch. The works Fasch has left behind him show us a man who, all his life, devoted particular attention to harmony, and exerted himself to apply it to what was serious, elevated and sterling in art. His outward characteristic had become, firstly, from his residence at a small court, and subsequently from his employment in the service of more exalted Royal personages, a reserved behaviour, neither attractive nor repelling. Precarious health and the economy it necessitated had combined to prevent his gaining or promising much. His education and earliest connections were of such a kind, that, possessing as he did a cheerful mind, easily instructed, he necessarily became an admirable musician, but his over-great modesty had accustomed him to place himself beneath other artists, such as Bach, Quanz, and others of less account. Thus, he commenced the first practice with the other members of the Singacademie, as though they were his pupils, trying over his compositions with them, compositions which he offered as mere attempts, however convinced he might secretly be of their excellence. When a good thing is thus begun, and carried out with calm perseverance, it cannot fail to succeed. Such was the commencement of the Singacademie, which dates from a period which was not glutted with music, as the present is."

But smoothly as this reads, that the progress of this now world-celebrated Society speedily ran the risk of being brought to a premature close, because the members did not set about their work seriously, not because they neither were nor wished to be professional singers, but rather, in a far greater degree, because they had no place of meeting such as they were fairly justified in expecting, is a fact we gather as we read further. The Singacademie, so called principally because it soon moved from private houses to the Academy of Arts, though, unfortunately, into a wretched room which could not be warmed, was brought to so low an ebb, that, on many a Tuesday, which even then was the day of meeting, it was impossible to cast a piece of music. The Society was within an ace of being dissolved. "But the girls," says Zelter, "were the most courageous. One day the cold was insupportable, and the majority of the members were for going home. One of the girls, putting her muff upon the floor, knelt down upon it, and wrapped her feet in her long gown. Several others followed her example, and, at last, the whole company, in this touching position, sang a choral, while Fasch burst out into tears. The picture of this evening is still present to my eyes; the scene was so touching, that I trust I shall always preserve it in my memory."

Like the above, all the other anecdotes concerning the progress of the Singacademie are of general interest, and especially valuable to all those who have been or may be members. The fate of the institution is so closely bound up with that of its founders, that we might substitute the one for the other. An intimate connection soon sprang up between Fasch and Zelter, so that the latter, as the former's pupil, as early as 1792, when the rules for the management of the Academy were settled, was appointed Fasch's assistant. Whether Fasch was or was not then aware his pupil was by trade a mason (though we believe he was not), is an undecided question. At Fasch's decease, in 1800, Zelter succeeded to all his duties. During the last eight years the number of the singers had increased from 30 to 148. "One fact which proved detrimental to the Singacademie," we read in another part of the book, "was that we had begun by attempting too much. Six-part and eight-part pieces could rarely be executed (this applies to the Mass by Fasch, and his eight-part 'Miserere mei,' Psalm li.) and it cost no slight effort to pass from such compositions, with breadth, greatness of taste, style, and expression, to small, light pieces, with which we ought to have commenced!"

Letter to the Editor.

OUR NATIONAL OPERA.

Sir,—At the end of the musical intelligence in one of last week's papers, it is stated that the performance of English operas at Covent Garden will commence in October; and a suggestion is made for the consideration of the management, in reference to the attendance of the guard of soldiers during the season.

About the soldiers a great many of the readers of your journal, like myself, care little. They would rather direct attention to the inside of the theatre, acknowledging the accommodation provided for visitors to be excellent, the conductor, band, and chorus to be altogether worthy of an institution which the managers have repeatedly declared is to be the National Opera of our great country.

They would allow that a great deal has been done that had not before, nor has since the establishment of the Royal English Opera, been accomplished. But they remember the colours under which the management sails, and they declare that a first-rate band and chorus is not all they look for, and that there should have been found in the National English Opera Company last season more than two English artists of great repute and position.

There should be more than one first-rate prima donna and primo tenore, one first-rate barytone at least, rather than three or four beginners, and so on in other departments.

They would ask, is there to be a fresh set of débutantes this season?

Let the management look round them; there are English artists who have recently proved themselves of vast value in the lyric theatre. A little additional liberality in these matters would most probably secure an adequate return; and the support which has been given hitherto, as much in favour of the cause as on account of the actual attractiveness of the performances, will be secured to the speculation, in consideration of its supplying such enjoyment as has not always been found.

All honour, however, to the managers who have been the means of rescuing English opera from oblivion, and to the two artists whose talents and exertions have contributed so greatly to the now enduring success of the same.

Vox Populi.

Mad. Lind-Goldschmidt.—The public of Liverpool will not have forgotten the impression created by Mad. Goldschmidt's appearance at the Philharmonic concerts now two or three years since, and we are particularly gratified in being able to announce that the amiable and gifted lady will again appear under the same auspices some time in October next. During the past London season Mr. and Mad. Goldschmidt gave a grand morning concert at Earl Dudley's mansion, in Park-lane, in behalf of the Female Artistes Society, at which the wonderful abilities of Mad. Goldschmidt appeared to be as great as ever. We believe, we may announce that a performance of Mendelssohn's Oratorio of Elijah is now preparing in London, in behalf of a local charity, at which Mad. Goldschmidt has generously offered her services, and will sing Mendelssohn's grandest composition, the interpretation of which has been considered by many as Mad. Goldschmidt's finest achievement. We hear that the Philharmonic Society of this town have arranged for a performance of Haydn's Creation, in which Mad. Goldschmidt is to sing the soprano part, and our own great tenor Sims Reeves will sing the tenor part for the first time with the great artist. Signor Belletti is to complete the ensemble by singing the bass, a combination that has not hitherto been witnessed. The oratorio is to be succeeded the following evening by a Miscellaneous Concert, at which, in addition to the transcendant attraction of Mad. Goldschmidt, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Signor Belletti as vocalists, the eminent violinist Herr Joachim or Signor Piatti, and Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, will combine their distinguished talents. It must give general satisfaction to learn that Mr. and Mad. Goldschmidt, with their family of three young children—two boys and a girl—have become quite domiciled in this country, indeed, that Mr. Goldschmidt has become a naturalized subject of England; and it is very pleasing to find them quitting their retirement at Wimbledon, if only for a season, and resuming a position from which it has been so much regretted they should seem disposed to retire. Few public characters have diffused more real intellectual enjoyment by her professional abilities, or dispensed greater happiness and benefits by her unostentatious generosity, than Mad. Otto Goldschmidt, née Jenny Lind.—Liverpool Albion.

Hitchin.—A concert was given at the Town Hall on Tuesday last, under the conductorship of Mr. Combe assisted by Miss Emily Miller (who sang, among other popular pieces, "The skipper and his boy"), Messrs Vincent and Clarkson as vocalists, and an excellent quartet of stringed instrument players, viz., Messrs. Silberburg, Ball, Leng and Boatmight, whose performances of Beethoven's quartets in G major, and A flat major, and Haydn's in B minor, and D major, were greatly admired. A prominent feature in the concert was a solo on the violin, composed and capitally played by Mr. Silberburg, consisting of an air with brilliant variations. A solo on the clarionet was also contributed by Mr. J. Rawlings, as well as a couple of solos on the pianoforte by Mr. E. J. Crow, so that the audience had plenty at all events for their money. The programme concluded with the National Anthem.

MANAGERS AND MUSIC HALLS.

(From "All the Year Round.")

"When they do agree on the stage, their unanimity is wonderful."

The managers of the London theatres have lately gathered together in a body, and have offered to the observation of the public a practical commentary on Sheridan's admirable text. On this occasion, the motive for unanimous agreement among these gentlemen has been furnished by a certain entertainment at the Canterbury Music Hall, London, which bears a suspiciously close resemblance to the representation of a pantomime. Any performance of this sort—if it takes place out of a theatre—or any performance at all which involves the interchange of dialogue between actors (even when they are only two in number) is viewed by the whole body of the London managers as a dangerous infringement on dramatic rights, which they consider to have been acquired exclusively to themselves. They have accordingly come forward to restrain the proprietor of a music-hall within the strict letter of the license conceded to him, which is a license for music and dancing only—the plain object of the proceeding being to prevent all proprietors of all music-halls from amusing their audiences by means bearing any dramatic resemblance to those which are habitually employed by managers of theatres.

With the immediate judicial decision pronounced on this case, we have no present concern. It is, we believe, understood on both sides that no one decision will be allowed to settle the dispute, and that further legal proceedings are already impending. Our purpose in referring to the subject in these pages is to ascertain what the fair interests are in relation to it, not of the managers only, but of the public at large. A very important question of dramatic Free Trade is involved in this dispute; and London audiences, comprising in these railroad times people from all parts of the kingdom—are directly concerned in the turn which may be taken by its final settlement.

A large proportion of our readers may be probably in need of some preliminary explanation on the subject of music-halls, and of the quality of the performances which are exhibited in them. These places of public entertainment may be roughly described as the growth of the last ten years, both in London and in the large towns throughout England. They are, for the most part, spacious rooms attached to large public-houses, but having special entrance-passages of their own. The prices of admission are generally sixpence for one kind of place and a shilling for another. Both sexes (except, we believe, at Evans's supper-room in Covent Garden, where men only are admitted) are allowed the right of entry—there are female as well as male performers at the entertainments—and the audience have the privilege of ordering what they please to eat or drink, and of smoking as well, at any period of the evening's amusements, from their beginning about seven o'clock to their end a little before twelve.

Of the kind of entertainment provided for the public, under these curious conditions, and of the behaviour of the audiences during the performance, we can speak, in some degree, from personal experience. Not very long since we visited one of the largest and most notorious of these places of amusement—Weston's Music Hall, in Holborn—on a night when the attendance happened to be unusually large, and when the resources of the establishment for preserving order were necessarily subjected to the severest possible test.

The size of the Hall may be conjectured, when it is stated that on the night of our visit, the numbers of the audience reached fifteen hundred. With scarcely a dozen exceptions, this large assembly was accommodated with seats on the floor of the building, and in a gallery which ran round three sides of it. The room was brightly lighted, tastefully decorated with mural painting, and surprisingly well ventilated, considering that the obstacle of tobacco-smoke was added to the ordinary obstacles interposed by crowded human beings and blazing gas-light to check the circulation of fresh air. At one end of the hall was a highly-raised stage, with theatrical foot-lights, but with no theatrical scenery; and, on this stage (entering from the back) appeared, sometimes singly, sometimes together, the male and female of the night—all, with the exception of the comic singers, in evening dress. It is not easy to describe the variety of the entertainments. There was a clever nigger vocalist with a blackened face, and nimble feet at a jig. There was another comic singer, preserving his natural complexion—a slim inexhaustible man, who accompanied himself (if the expression may be allowed) by a St. Vitus's Dance of incessant jumping, continued throughout his song, until the jumps were counted by the thousand: the performer being as marvellously in possession of his fair mortal allowance of breath at the end of the exhibition as at the beginning There was instrumental music played by a full band of wind instruments. There was a little orchestra, besides, for accompaniments; there was a young lady who sang "serio-comic" songs; there were ladies and gentlemen who sang sentimental songs; there was a real Chinaman, who tossed real knives about his head and face, and caught them in all sorts of dangerous positions with a frightful dexterity—and who afterwards additionally delighted the audience by thanking them for their applause in the purest "Canton-English." Lastly, there was an operatic selection from the second act of "Lucia di Lammermoor," comprising not solo-singing only, but concerted music and choruses, and executed in a manner which (considering the resources at the disposal of the establishment) conferred the highest credit on the ladies and gentlemen concerned in the performance, and on the musical director who superintended it. These entertainments, and others equally harmless, succeeded each other at the shortest intervals, throughout the evening; the audience refreshing itself the while with all varieties of drinks, and the male part of it smoking also with the supremest comfort and composure. At the most crowded period of the performances not the slightest disorder was apparent in any part of the room. The people were quietly and civilly conducted to their places by clean and attentive waiters; the proprietor was always present overlooking the proceedings. Not a single case of drunkenness appeared anywhere; no riotous voices interrupted the music. The hearty applause which greeted all the entertainments, comic and serious, never degenerated into disturbance of any kind. Many colder audiences might be found in this metropolis—but an assembly more orderly and more decorous than the assembly at the Holborn Music-Hall we have never seen gathered together at any place of public entertainment in any part of London.

Such is our experience of one of these music-halls, which may be taken as a fair sample of the rest. Canterbury Hall, which happens just now to be the special object of prosecution by theatrical managers, is simply another large concert-room, with a raised stage—possessing, however, it is only fair to add, an attraction peculiar to itself, in the shape of a gallery of pictures. In other respects, it may be at once conceded that if portions of the performances at Canterbury Hall represent an infringement on assumed theatrical privileges, portions of the performance at the Holborn Hall fall within the same category. The pantomime entertainment at one place may be, to all technical intents and purpose, matched by the operatic entertainment at the other. Both are exhibited on a stage; both are illuminated by foot-lights; both involve the interchange of dramatic dialogue—spoken in one case sung in the other. If the managers of our two operas contemplate asserting their interests, as the managers of the other theatres have done, the performance from Lucia di Lammermoor, in Holborn, is as open to attack as the performance of pantomime which is the subject of complaint against Canterbury Hall. With scenery or without it, with costume or without it, the grand dramatic situation in Donizetti's opera, interpreted by solo singers, chorus, and orchestra, is a dramatic performance, and carries the vocalist as well as the audience away with it. Our own ears informed us, on the evening of our experience, that Edgardo delivered his famous curse in trousers, as vigorously as if he had worn the boots of the period. The Lucia of the night could not have sung the lovely music of her part with greater earnestness and emphasis, if her father's halls had opened behind her, in immeasurable vista, on a piece of painted canvas—and Colonel Ashton was as pitiless a gentleman in an unimpeachable dress-coat, as if he had worn the most outrageous parody on Highland costume which the stage wardrobes of operatic France or Italy could produce. If it simplifies the question now at issue—and it does surely, so far as the public discussion of the subject is concerned!—to confess at once that some of the entertainments at music-halls do in some degree trench on the ground already occupied by entertainments at theatres, we make the acknowledgment without hesitation. Legal quibbling apart, the resemblance complained of, does partially exist; and is, in the present state of the laws which regulate such matters open to attack. Granting all this, however, one plain inquiry, so far as the public are concerned, still remains to be answered: Are the managers morally justified in claiming for themselves a monopoly in dramatic entertainment, and in proceeding against the proprietors of music-halls accordingly?

In their present situation, as we understand it, the managers have two grievances which they all complain of alike. The first of those grievances is, that theatres and music-halls are not impartially submitted to the same conditions of state and control. The theatres are under the direction of the Lord Chamberlain; the music-halls are under the direction of an act of Parliament of George the Second, and the licensing magistrates. The Lord Chamberlain, acting as the official victim of old precedents, shuts up the theatres under his jurisdiction in Passion Week; and arbitrarily throws out of employment for that period, not the actors only, but the thousands of poor people who live by ministering to the obscure necessities of the stage. On the other hand, the licensing magistrates, having no old precedents to fetter them, allow the music-halls to open their doors as freely in Passion Week as at any other time—the practical result being, that musical and dramatic performances, with smoking and drinking, are officially permitted, at exactly that period of the year when musical and dramatic performances without smoking or drinking, are officially prohibited. The absurdity and justice of this proceeding are too manifest for comment. If it is wrong to allow any public amusements in Passion Week, shut the music-halls—if it is right, open the theatres. So far as this really serious grievance is concerned, our sympathies are heartily with the managers. Instead of gaining any advantage by being placed under the courtly authority of the Lord Chamberlain, they are actually oppressed, in this particular, by a gross injustice; and they deserve all the help we can give them in subjecting that injustice to public exposure and public attack.

Reviews.

"Rêverie du Cœur"—impromptu pour piano—POLYDORE DU VOS, Op. 65 (Cramer, Beale and Co.).

We have seldom seen an "impromptu" more carefully prepared. True, there is nothing in it; and we can only explain its being christened "Rêverie du Cœur," by the fact of one of its composer's names being "Polydore." A "Polydore," and none but a "Polydore," would have dignified mere twaddle by such a hyper-romantic title. How now Mr. Du Vos?

"Le Dévouement"—morceau pour piano—JACQUES BLUMENTHAL, Op. 58 (Cramer, Beale and Co.).

Another "rêverie" (tant soit peu) du Cœur," but in all respects superior to the foregoing. Mr. Blumenthal is worth half a dozen Polydores, and "Jacques" is a plain, honest, straightforward prename. Our only objection to Mr. Blumenthal's "Dévouement" is the dévouement it exhibits for such passages as the subjoined :—

And the subjoined :—

—of which there are, we must say, with deference to "Jacques," by far too many.

"Espoir du Retour"—nocturne pour piano—J. RUMMEL (Ashdown and Parry).

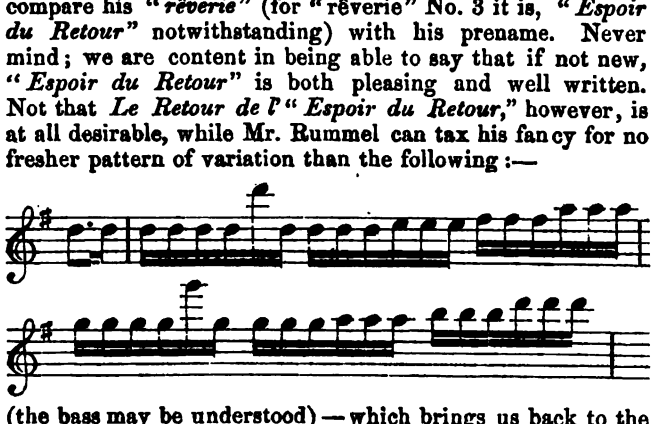
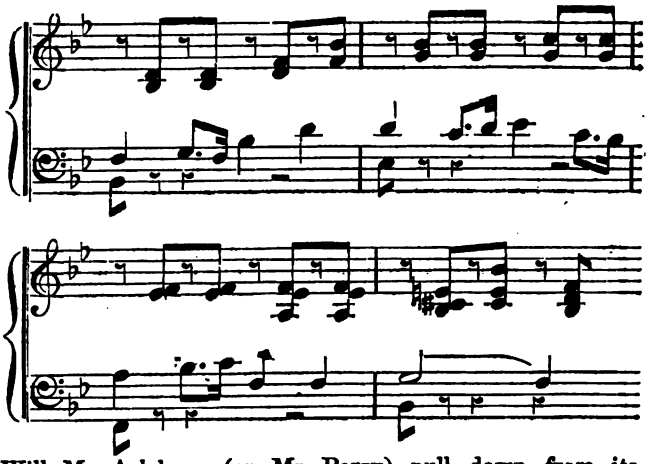
"J." tout court. Mr. Rummel will not give us a chance to compare his "rêverie" (for "rêverie" No. 3 it is, "Espoir du Retour" notwithstanding) with his prename. Never mind; we are content in being able to say that if not new, "Espoir du Retour" is both pleasing and well written. Not that Le Retour de l' "Espoir du Retour," however, is at all desirable, while Mr. Rummel can tax his fancy for no fresher pattern of variation than the following :—



(the bass may be understood)—which brings us back to the earlier days of Mr. Henri Herz and his attenuated shadow, Mr. Chaulieu.

"Serenade"—for the pianoforte—ADOLPHE SCHLOESSER (Ashdown and Parry).

Mr. Schloesser ("Adolphe" may pair with "Polydore") commences his "Rêverie" (for "rêverie" No. 4 it is, "Serenade" notwithstanding) thus time-honouredly :—



Will Mr. Ashdown (or Mr. Parry) pull down from its resting-place, underneath the "Institute," that parcel of Henselt ("Adolphe" also), and refer to a certain "rêverie," or love-song (or something of the sort), in the self-same key as this "serenade" of Mr. Schloesser? If they consent, they will probably detect a shade or so of resemblance between the two. Nevertheless, there are good points in Mr. Schloesser's piece, for which we would only suggest the expunction from the above quotation, of bar 4—as common place—and the substitution of one of less hacknied character. Moreover, at page 6, line 3, bar 3, there are two B's natural, which (or we are much mistaken) should be C's.

"Solitude"—nocturne pour piano—J. RUMMEL (Ashdown and Parry).

A trifle, but a trifle so neatly put together, as to relieve criticism of its duties. That it contains any new point it would be violating truth to say; nevertheless it is something to be correct, while at the same time unobtrusive and graceful.

"The Water Nymph"—ballad—with German and English words—by JOHN BARNETT (Addison, Hollier and Co.)

"Save Father on the Sea"—words by A. MATTHISON, set to music for Miss Palmer, by J. L. HATTON (Addison, Hollier and Co.).

"We merry, merry Fairies"—duet for soprano and mezzo, soprano—words by J. E. CARPENTER, music by STEPHEN GLOVER (Addison, Hollier and Co).

"Stars of the Summer Night"—words by LONGFELLOW, music by WILLIAM ABBOT (Metzler and Co.).

Mr. John Barnett too seldom comes before the public now. On that account alone, both professional singers and amateurs will welcome his "Water Nymph" (a ballad, be it understood, according to the German signification of the term—like Schubert's "Erl King" and many others) with avidity.

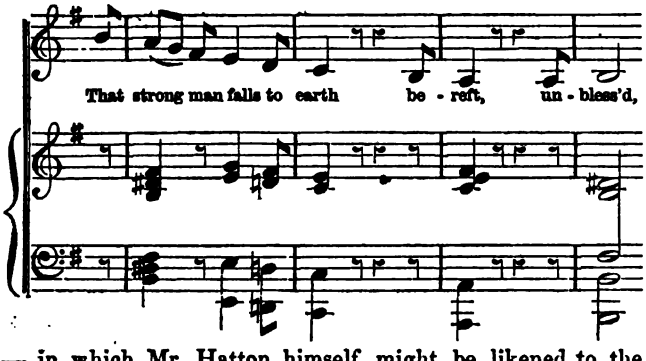
"L'Andalousie"—danse Espagnole, pour piano—JACQUES BLUMENTHAL, Op. 59 (Cramer, Beale, and Co.).

A la bonheur! (we are all among the "Mossous," and so per force must put in a word now and then of their language).

Digitized by Google

A la bonheur! Here at last we have something fresh. This little unpretending piece is worth a dozen "Rêveries" —whether "du cœur" or du cerveau. Both principal theme and episode are good—tuneful, frank, and pretty, without a vestige of affectation. Here and there we find a progression to which objection might be taken, but the whole is so engaging that we shall not stop to cite them. In short, "L'Andalousie" may be unreservedly commended as a perfect thing in its way.

"Save, Father, on the Sea," if not one of its composer's best, and containing, moreover, such (for him) careless points as the following:—



— in which Mr. Hatton himself might be likened to the "Strong man" ("Dormitat Homerus") — is still Mr. Hatton's, and, therefore, if not extraordinary, not ordinary.

We have some idea that Mr. Stephen Glover's duet has already been reviewed; but if not, it offers no point for comment.

Professor Longfellow has this time fallen into ruthless hands. Mr. Abbott should tighten the reins and hold in his Pegasus. Here is an example of his way of traversing the realms of harmony:—

This will never do, Mr. Abbott.

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

September 5th.

PARIS—the heart of the world, in its own esteem—has been growing rapidly more and more languid as its liveliest blood has ebbed away to renew itself in the sea, or re-convert itself with foreign victual, and scarcely now gives one perceptible pulse of life. So I must trust to my intelligence from the provinces and from foreign parts to furnish me with the material for a letter, which will not consequently be very long. Just one little scrap of metropolitan news shall take precedence, and justify the standing title of this correspondence. The Variétés has put forth a bill which is new from the first piece to the last. It consists of a sort of burlesque piece in three acts, called Les Danses Nationales, and two one-act pieces, Un Dîner de Famille, and Brouillés depuis Wagram. The two last, one in the comic, and the other in the sentimental line, are both tolerably good for the time of year, and are capitally acted. While the dull season favours the appearance of second and third-rate dramatic productions, it also affords a field for the novice, and allows him to try his "prentice hand" on provincial audiences. In this way a certain M. Laroche has been permitted to exhibit himself in the great part of Tartuffe, for which he seems to have no other vocation than "vaulting ambition," which seems decidedly to have "overleapt itself." A critic disposes of him thus:—"He has sharp-pointed elbows, and is afflicted with the deplorable mania of sticking them at right angles flat against his sides. M. Laroche has nothing of the lover about him, and I am sure he will be very much surprised when I tell him he has not even the figure for the part. He will perhaps succeed in tragedy, for his delivery is good, but deficient in warmth; it is true, however, and this is one of the anomalies of nature and of art, that warmth is only acquired by time and experience."

The musical papers here inform their readers that Rossini has presented a portrait of himself to M. Alfred Musard, inscribed in the composer's hand as thus: "Souvenir de Reconnaissance à mon interprète Musard—G. Rossini." This will give you an idea to what the dearth of news has reduced the editors, and you will feel a corresponding compassion for me, and show a proportionate indulgence to my efforts.

Trusting to an Italian paper I informed you not long since that the new opera which Verdi is writing for the Imperial Theatre at St. Petersburg was founded on a subject by Martinez de la Rura. This journal has since corrected the announcement, and states that the libretto, which is entitled Don Alvara ò la fuerza del Destino, is drawn from a drama by Angelo de Saavedra, a distinguished Spanish writer of the last century.

Ostend is being favoured with quite a flight of eminent artists, among whom may be enumerated Herr Joachim, Mlle. Trebelli, Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington, Herr Formes, M. Servais, &c. There is also a first-rate flute-player there, whose name is within a letter identical with that of the hero of Italian regeneration,—he is called M. Gariboldi. They say he is an admirable executant, and composes prettily, and I do not see why he should not be justly entitled to both eulogies, although he has had such a narrow escape of having his name immortalised "without his stir."

Naples is not an abrupt transition after mentioning its deliverer, and I may therefore here inform you that a new opera has just been produced there with success. It is entitled Virginia, and the composer is Signor Petrella. For want of an equally convenient link, I must jump, ex abrupto, to the opera at Vienna, whose manager, Signor Salvi, is said to be about to lower the diapason of the orchestra at that theatre to the nominal diapason of Paris, a change for which the singers, if no one else, are likely to be thankful. It is also said that he means to exchange the wooden desks in the orchestra for iron ones, and the substitution is expected to increase the propagation of sound—a somewhat doubtful result. I am really at a loss what further to communicate, for my notes are so meagre they are scarcely capable of being fatted up by any acts of style into presentable facts. Tours is to have a new theatre, the town council having voted 28,000*l.* for that purpose, and M. Marian, an architect of that city who stands high in his profession, will be entrusted with the work.—If the activity and vigour of the emperor of the French is imitated by the new Sultan of Turkey, he does not seem to follow the same illustrious model in his patronage of the arts, for according to a recent account the magnificent theatre which had been erected recently at Constantinople has been turned into a manufactory for rifled cannon.

VIENNA.—Herr Anton Rubinstein's opera, Die Kinder der Haide, with Mlle. Ellinger as Johanna, is to be produced in the course of the present month. According to report, Herr Richard Wagner will shortly visit this capital, for the purpose of superintending the rehearsals of his new work, Tristan und Isolde.—Herr Salvi, the director of the Imperial Opera House, has resolved on adopting the new French "pitch" or diapason, and is now making all the necessary arrangements to that end. Among other measures adopted by him has been the substitution of iron stools, music-desks, &c., for the wooden ones hitherto employed in the orchestra. He has taken this step with a view to give greater resonancy for the various instruments.

To be the successor of a man like Fasch, was, indeed, a distinction for Zelter, who was one day an artist and a mason the next. But he had richly deserved it by his persevering application, and had gone through innumerable privations before he attained it. The way in which he managed to educate himself is, on the one hand, too original, and, on the other, too honourable, for us to pass over in total silence the relation between him and his master. In reference to this we read as follows:—"As the building" (he is speaking of the house in which he was employed in the Schlesinger Strasse, preparatory to being admitted a master-mason, and which, if we are not mistaken, is, at present, in the possession of Herr de Cuvry) "was situate above half a mile from my home, I hired a lodging outside the town-gates, in order to save the long walk. But what was the use of this? After work, I used to go of an evening to Jeannette, who resided during the summer with her parents, in a little country-house at the other side of the city, and, for four or five months, when Fasch was on duty at Potsdam, I was in the habit of walking there and taking my lesson every Friday. I always returned the same day. Fasch, who knew nothing of my occupation, fancied I had business to transact in Potsdam, because I never denied that such was the case whenever the subject was broached. He used to be glad to see me, because I got on, and because he had more spare time in Potsdam than in Berlin. As I continued my visits, however, regularly all through the summer, he used often to remark, 'He must confess I paid something for his lessons, considering the time they cost me, as well as the amount I expended for refreshments and coach-hire, or that my business in Potsdam must be very profitable.' He did not know that I did the distance, there and back, in one day, and in the evening was at my work on the house. I did not, however, find this fatiguing. At something after three o'clock in the morning, I set out from the farm-house where I lived, and, between eight and nine, I was in Fasch's room in Potsdam. My lesson lasted till eleven. I then walked about the grounds of Sans-Souci, or among the hills. I had ordered my dinner for a little before twelve o'clock, at a good inn, outside the Berliner Thor, and, after dinner, I proceeded leisurely back to Berlin, enjoying myself till late in the evening at Jenny's. Neither my father, mother, nor any one else knew a word about the whole matter. The real advantage of my walking home consisted, however, in the agreeable solitude, for, as a rule, I worked out my compositions as I went along, so that I afterwards wrote them down all the more readily. On two or three occasions I hired a vehicle, but the coachman kept me waiting, and I could not get on along the sandy road. I arrived, also, late at Potsdam, where, during the reign of King Freidrich, there was no end to the examination a person had to undergo. 'Whence did I come?' 'How long did I intend to stay?' 'What was my business?' were some of the numerous questions I had to answer. By my own plan I avoided all these inconveniences, as well as the heavy coach-hire, until at last Fasch suspected how matters stood, and refused to accept any further remuneration for his lessons."

Zelter was indefatigable in his endeavours to obtain the patronage of Government for music generally—for which it had previously done nothing—and, of course, for the Singacademie especially, which then belonged exclusively to himself. As long back as the 14th January, 1804, he succeeded in prevailing on the King, attended by the entire Court, to pay a visit to the Singacademie.

By setting to music the poems of Schiller and Göthe, he attracted the attention of these great men, and soon became personally acquainted with them. Göthe was induced to observe that he could hardly have believed music capable of such magnificent strains as those of Zelter. We may mention, by the way, that on the 15th May, of the same year, Schiller, also, attended a meeting of the Singacademie, to hear his ode: "An die Freude," and, likewise, that a funereal performance was got up by the society at his decease. The autobiography does not contain a word about Beethoven, who also visited the academy, and—according to a statement made by the present director—after hearing Fasch's Mass for sixteen voices, extemporised upon several of its motives, on an old grand piano which stood in the ground-floor. The name of Beethoven, as, likewise, the names of his great contemporaries, such as Weber, Radziwil, &c., are not once mentioned.

More than by his songs, however, Zelter succeeded in obtaining the respect of his contemporaries by what was undoubtedly the most important of all his compositions, namely the Auferstehung und Himmelfahrt Christi, words by Rammler, produced, for the first time, at Easter, 1807, and subsequently performed seven successive years. It was also revived at the Jubilee of the society, in 1857, by the present director. Zelter, meanwhile, had to contend with many difficulties thrown in his way by the Royal Capellmeisters. This was the reason of his journey to Königsberg in 1809.

The foundation of the Liedertafel took place at the same period. Concerning this event, so important in its results, we read:—"When we consider the present wide extension of societies of this kind, of all of which Zelter's Leidertafel must be regarded as the parent and model, and when we are compelled to recognise in it an element instructing and elevating the human mind, we cannot avoid assigning a very high position to the importance and bearings of the idea and plan which created such an institution. But there was, moreover, a patriotic signification involved, for the foundation of the Liedertafel was intended to celebrate the return of the king to Berlin."

Intimately connected, also, with his journey to Königsberg, where the Court resided, was Zelter's firm resolve to give up manual labour altogether. He was materially influenced thereto, as may easily be imagined, by the fact that, under the ministry of Wilhelm von Humboldt, he had been appointed Professor of Music at a fixed salary. Gratitude had a great deal to do with the journey, but its great object was to interest the King still more for the art. From the numerous letters written concerning his journey, we obtain a lively insight into the state of things at this period, including that at the Court, as well as the sayings and doings of the princes of the blood, especially of the Crown-Prince, afterwards Friedrich Wilhelm IV.

Zelter was now recognised as a musician, and honoured and loved as a man. He was in the full enjoyment of all his powers, and endowed with a warm love for all that is beautiful and elevated. "He was bold and sharp, but never unkind in his criticism, while he was always natural and child-like in disposition. Neither now nor subsequently do we remark in him any signs of that vanity or arrogance, frequently assumed by artists who have been distinguished by their intercourse with persons of high rank by birth or office. The relation existing between him, as a son, in all the maturity of manhood, and his grey-haired old mother, stands out in truly antique purity and beauty. His strength and depth of feeling, as well as his amiability of heart, always beamed forth so triumphantly from behind many asperities of outward behaviour, and—as his contemporaries sometimes designated it—'Zelterian rudeness,' that even sharp words wounded only for the moment, and the bonds of friendship were never weakened, but were characteristic of Zelter to the time of his death, and have caused all those who were nearly connected with him to remember him with affection."

During the last twenty years of his existence, says the author, we perceive Zelter as composer, teacher, musical director, critic, author, and ministerial referee, occupying a position such as, probably, never fell to the lot of any other musician. The heavy ordeal to which he was subjected, when, in the year 1812, his stepson, for whose sake he had, up to that time, continued his trade, shot himself, brought him into fraternal connection, so to speak, with Göthe, who displayed the warmest sympathy with him, and subsequently, as we all know, addressed him as "Thou."* The voluminous correspondence between the two proves that from this epoch Zelter, "from being simply a man of action, grew up to be a thinker." The letters to Göthe, from 1814, may, observes the author, be regarded as a continuous series of criticisms, constituting a history of the state and progress of art in Berlin. They are completed by Zelter's unpublished but far more voluminous correspondence with other persons celebrated in every branch of art and science.

After an active career in all the various capacities above-named, Zelter lived to enjoy the great pleasure, when he had held his office for twenty-five years, of seeing the members of that admirable institution, the Singacademie, in a position to lay, on the 30th June, 1825, the foundation-stone of a building of their own—a building which reflects great credit upon the architect, Herr Ottmer.

In this building the first performance took place on the 2nd January, 1827; and the Tod Jesu was given there on the 13th April. On the ground floor was Zelter's residence, which he occupied up to his decease. This happened on the 15th May, 1832. As the number of members had increased from 374 to 436, it became necessary to divide the Academy into two bodies, the "Greater" and the "Less Academy." The Ripien-Schule, which met at twelve o'clock every Friday, had already been founded years previously. Many of Zelter's pupils, as well as other artists, of all kinds, sang there. Among these, the most amiable and most celebrated were the never-to-be-forgotten brother and sister, Felix and Fanny Mendelssohn.

The writer of the present article also belongs to those whose earliest reminiscences extend back to this period. As a student, I attended regularly the chorus-classes of the Academie, where Zelter used generally to be in the best possible humour, the first among his equals. Although his own songs occupied a more prominent position than anything else, and he evidently derived great pleasure from hearing them—for instance, at the present moment that I am writing this, I can still hear his "Gallias Cæsar subegit," to which he was particularly partial, and can still see the majestic old gentleman in his blue coat, with his velvet cap upon his grey locks, as he marched up and down the room to the triple time of the song—he was still indefatigable in exhorting the members to exertion, requesting some to write poetry, and others to furnish music, all for the common good. No one was allowed to take offence at his outbursts, which were frequently rather rough and unceremonious. Every one laughed and said nothing. I recollect meeting on those occasions Julius (afterwards editor of the Zeitungshalle), Reissiger, jun. (now conductor in Christiana), and Krause (now a singer at the Royal Opera). I myself also received at these lessons the first encouragement bestowed upon me; for having tried my hand at Horace's ode, "Musis Amicus," Zelter observed, "Come, there is some stuff in it" ("Na, es klingt doch"). Professor Grell, the present director of the Singacademie, was then charged with the task of accompanying the choruses on the piano. The members were indebted to him for many fine contributions. Among them I may mention a "Te Deum" for two choruses, with an orchestral accompaniment, in which the wind instruments greatly preponderated. I have never heard of this work since. To this gentleman, as Zelter's faithful pupil, is the book dedicated. In the appendix there is an index of Zelter's works, published and unpublished, as well as the simple and classical speech which Herr Schleiermacher pronounced over his grave.

FLOD. GEYER.

THE BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Saturday, Aug. 31st.

THE miscellaneous concert on the evening of Thursday, the 29th inst., went off very well, and gave pretty general satisfaction. The programme, though far from perfect, was an improvement on that of Tuesday evening. Here it is:—

PART I.—Overture, Masaniello (Auber); Trio, "Soave sia il vento" (Mozart); Air, "Ah, vous dirai-je, maman?" (Adam); Duo, "Ch' l'antipatica vostra figura" (Ricci); Song, "Twilight is darkening" (Kücken); Concerto, Pianoforte, in E flat (Beethoven); Aria, "Fumsn gl' incensi" (Donizetti); Ballata, "Tu m'ami," La Zingara (Balfe); Grand finale, Loreley (Mendelssohn).

PART II.—Overture, Guillaume Tell (Rossini); Aria, "Bravo, bravo, il mio Belcore" (Donizetti); Duo, "Dearest maiden" (Spohr); Aria, "Mille volte sul campo d'onor" (Donizetti); Quintetto, "E scherzo ed è follia," Ballo in Maschera (Verdi); Song, "Within a mile of Edinbro'" (Hook); Duo, "Se la vita ancor t' è cara," Semiramide (Rossini); Romance, "Ah! now I feel," Dinorah (Meyerbeer); Duo, "Pronta io son," Don Pasquale (Donizetti); Sestetto, "Sola, sola, Don Giovanni (Mozart).

The overture to Masaniello was given with immense spirit by the orchestra. The manner in which it was both played and received would, I am sure, have delighted its composer, had he been present to hear it. The audience were in ecstasies, and encored it with such enthusiastic perseverance, that Mr. Costa consented to repeat it. Mlle. Patti made another stride in the affections of the Birmingham public by her rendering of the air "Fuman gl' incensi," from Lucia. The air was vociferously applauded and encored, but the fair artist contented herself with repeating only the "cabaletta," though she was more yielding with regard to Hook's song, in Part II., and gave the whole of it a second time. The audience were equally lavish of their plaudits in the case of Mr. Sims Reeves, but that gentleman's resolution is as fixed as the laws of the Medes and Persians. His admirers, that is to say, every one present, wished to hear it twice over, but Mr. Sims Reeves contented himself by bowing his thanks and retiring. The finale from Loreley was magnificently sung by Mlle. Titiens and the chorus. In fact, slightly altering the well-known quotation, we safely assert of this lady that, throughout this Festival, "Nihil cecinit quod non ornavit." Indeed, I am almost tempted to say that she added fresh beauties to what is in itself the very acme of beauty. Mesdames Lemmens-Sherrington, Sainton-Dolby, and Rudersdorff, Miss Palmer, Signor Belletti, Signor Giuglini, and Mr. Santley, were also entitled to high praise for the artistic excellence which distinguished all they did. Miss Arabella Goddard, in Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in E flat, added another laurel to the wreath she has so long and valiantly gained as the queen of pianists. Nothing could be more exquisitely grand and noble than her rendering of this work of the great master. Under her hands the piano seemed no longer to be a mere lifeless instrument. It appeared as though endued with consciousness and soul, so sweetly, yet so grandly, did strain after strain ripple from it, entrancing, as though by some magic spell, all who listened.

The receipts of the evening's performance were as follows:—President and Vice-president's seats, at 15*s*., 26*l*. 5*s*.; secured seats, at 15*s*., 716*l*. 5*s*.; unsecured seats, at 8*s*., 316*l*.; total, 1088*l*. 10*s*. The receipts at this (Friday) morning's performance were: President and Vice-president's seats, at 21*s*., 191*l*. 2*s*.; secured seats, at 21*s*., 779*l*. 2*s*.; unsecured seats, at 10*s*. 6*d*., 246*l*. 15*s*.; passes, 1*l*. 1*s*.; donations and collections, 254*l*. 12*s*. 8*d*.; total, 1472*l*. 12*s*. 8*d*.

The concert yesterday morning (Friday) was a great success, the greatest, perhaps, achieved during the whole week. The hypercritical might object that the programme was too long, and that Hummel's Motetto suffered by being placed between two such works as the Mass in D and Israel in Egypt. But censure itself should be silent on an occasion like the present. How shall I describe the grandeur, the sublimity which characterised the performance of Beethoven's great work. Language—at least the language at my command—is too weak. The performance was indeed worthy of the composition, and the singers of Birmingham have far surpassed the most sanguine expectations of their warmest admirers. They have deserved the sincerest thanks of every lover of genuine, classical music of the highest class. Never, I will venture to assert, was such a performance ever heard in this country or in any other. You may think, perhaps, I am a little too enthusiastic, but, I assure you, my enthusiasm is based on good and sufficient grounds. All the praise I can bestow is entirely free from the slightest tinge of exaggeration or adulation. The Birmingham singers have proved themselves the model singers of England—perhaps of the world. They owe a deep debt of gratitude to their local conductors, Messrs. A. J. Sutton and W. C. Stockley, for the manner in which they have been drilled and enabled to do such credit to themselves, and the conductor of all conductors, Mr. Costa. I can imagine what must have been that gentleman's feelings at having such a body of singers at his command, and I trust that the glowing reports he will doubtless take back with him will stimulate the members of our London choral societies to equal the efforts of their provincial brethren.

The solo music was entrusted to Mesdames Rudersdorff and Sainton-Dolby, Messrs. Montem Smith and Santley, and right worthy did they prove themselves of the confidence reposed in them. The orchestra, too, never played more magnificently, while M. Sainton more than sustained his previously great reputation by the manner in which he performed the obbligato violin accompaniment in the lovely "Benedictus." I must repeat that I never listened to such a performance as that of yesterday morning.

In Hummel's motet, Alma Virgo, Mlle. Patti enjoyed the (questionable?) honour of an encore from the noble president. After the motet came a grand selection from Israel in Egypt, again affording the Birmingham singers an opportunity of distinguishing themselves, and the opportunity, on my honour, was not lost. The choruses in the oratorio were quite as superbly sung as those in the Mass. What can I say more? Mr. Sims Reeves especially distinguished himself in "The enemy said I will pursue." Signor Belletti and Mr. Santley accepted an encore in the duet, "The Lord is a man of war," and Mlle. Titiens did the same in the air "Thou didst blow with thy wind." High praise is due also to Miss Palmer for the way in which she delivered the air, "Their land brought forth frogs."

The receipts amounted to £1,472 12s. 8d.

Last night the festival was brought to a close by Handel's Judas Maccabæus. The attendance was not very large, although larger than that on the evening the Creation was given, while those who were present exhibited a much greater amount of enthusiasm than that manifested on any previous occasion, and proved most convincingly that the spirit of Revolution is not confined merely to the Hungarian Diet, which is offering a dignified resistance, shortly to break out, perhaps, into overt acts, against the encroachments of the Austrian Emperor, or to the new-born kingdom of Italy, which has lately kicked out the despots by whom, when divided, and therefore more easily kept in subjection—vide, passim, the maxim of the Hapsburgs: "Divide et impera"—it was so long and so ruthlessly oppressed, but has absolutely found a home in the hearts of a Birmingham audience. The multitude assembled in the hall yesterday morning had been considerably "riled," as Sam Slick has it, by the conduct of the noble president. It was unmistakeably evident that they wished to encore several pieces — among others, "He gave them hailstones" and "The enemy said I will pursue"—but the president was immovable, he would not yield to the general desire, and, consequently, the pieces in question remained unencored—it is the last straw which breaks the camel's back. It is the last drop which causes the bowl—be the latter more or less wreathed—to overflow. The conduct of the president gave anything but universal satisfaction. The public, yesterday evening, appeared to have arrived at a unanimous though tacit resolve to do something—and they did it. One of the "requests," carrying with it, I need scarcely observe, the force of a Russian ukase, on ordinary occasions, and issued by the committee, runs thus:—

"It is the earnest request of the committee that the company attending the performances of sa red music will not manifest their approbation by any audible expressio of applause; and that parties will remain uncovered during the whol. of the performances in the hall."

Now this "request" had created great dissatisfaction not only for the spirit which dictated it (as I observed in my first letter on the Festival), but, also, among certain sticklers for literary elegance, for the style in which it is written. I am not aware who planned it — whether the Earl of Shrewsbury and Talbot, or any one of the distinguished visitors whose names I have, in obedience to custom, given in the regular Court-Circularish official lists —but I would seize this opportunity of hinting to the unknown author that the word "party" has not yet been allowed to pass muster by critics as a substitute for the word "person." Its use in this acceptation has hitherto been confined mostly to members of that class of society which interpolates an e, by no means mute, in "umbrella," calls "chimney," "chimbley," and delights in designating "mushrooms," "musheroons." I would, furthermore, observe that it is the practice of our best writers not to distract the attention of their readers by the introduction of too great a number of nominal subjects. Pronouns, I have somewhere read, were expressly invented for the purpose of enabling an author to refer to a person, or to persons, previously named, without employing over and over again the noun used in the first instance, or supplying its place by another noun. If, therefore, I am not mistaken on this head, the example set by the author of the above "request" in introducing the word "parties" is an example not especially worthy of imitation by the student desirous of achieving purity of style. The grammatical subject of the dependent proposition ushered in by the conjunction "that" after the word "committee" is "the company." Now, if I understand the author aright, the subsequent subject "parties" represents the self-same "company;" argal, the pronoun "they" might have been here advantageously substituted. Why, again, are we treated to the epithet "audible?" Is it not superfluous, as likewise the concluding flourish: "in the hall," unless, indeed, there were, connected with the Festival, performances going on elsewhere? Such may have been the case, but if it was, I did not know it, or I should, as in duty bound, have forwarded you a report of those performances.

But to return to the proceedings yesterday evening. The audience were evidently indignant at having been so long treated as gentlemen inhabiting for the time Millbank Penitentiary or the Model Prison at Clerkenwell, and, as a consequence of their sojourn therein, subjected to the silent system. Little by little did they give indications of what was to come, until, at the conclusion of the grand, soul-inspiring song: "Sound an alarm," sung with superb energy, and, need I say, irreproachable good taste, by Mr. Sims Reeves, they broke forth into a storm — torrent — tornado — hurricane — tempest — or stampedo of applause, which, were I a penny-a-liner, I should say, "shook the building to its very foundations." But I am not a penny-a-liner, and, therefore, shall not say so. I do not like poaching on other men's manors. Consider, therefore, the words between turned commas as unwritten and unprinted, and supply, mentally, others calculated to convey my meaning. So hearty and genuine was the applause that even the inflexible tenor himself relented, notwithstanding the fact that, in obedience to his custom, he had bowed his thanks and resumed his seat. He repeated the air with, if possible, greater spirit than before. Having thus asserted their independence on the broadest basis, and gallantly thrown off the presidental yoke — I am bound to state, however, that the Earl of Shrewsbury and Talbot was absent — the audience, as joyous and demonstrative, not to say uproarious, as school-boys at breaking-up, or Her Majesty's Faithful Commons when following their Speaker to the bar of the House of Lords, paid the same compliment to Mlle. Patti in the air: "From mighty Kings," and Mlle. Patti responded to the call. The other solo singers all merit more than ordinary commendation, for they infused more than ordinary spirit into their singing. They appeared, and, no doubt, were, excited by the enthusiasm exhibited by the audience. Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington delivered the air: "Wise men flattering" with exquisite taste and feeling; Mad. Rudersdorff was admirable in "Pious orgies;" while Mad. Sainton-Dolby and Miss Palmer afforded universal satisfaction in the contralto music, which they shared between them. Mr. Santley and Mr. Montem Smith must not be passed over in silence. They never sang better than on this occasion. The chorus maintained its high character. The two numbers which produced, perhaps, the greatest impression were: "We never will bow down," and, "See the conquering hero comes." Each individual singer appeared as fresh and unfatigued as on the very first day of the Festival. The performance of the orchestra was irreproachable.

At the conclusion of the oratorio, the National Anthem was given, —Mad. Rudersdorff and Mlle. Patti taking the solos. Then followed a whirlwind of applause, from orchestra, soloists, chorus, and audience, for Mr. Costa, who fully deserved it, considering the unremitting attention he has devoted to everything connected with his department — no limited one, you will admit. It is a source of regret for all lovers of good music, that no orchestral symphony was included in the programme of the miscellaneous concerts. Such an omission is the more to be deplored, with such a conductor as Mr. Costa to wield the bâton, and such an orchestra as that at his command to play a work of this class. With this drawback, the Festival of 1861, both in a pecuniary and artistic sense, may be pronounced the most successful ever given in Birmingham.

The Musical World.

LONDON: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 1861.

To the Editor of the MUSICAL WORLD.

SIR,—The civic processions, congresses, banquets, toasts, addresses, replies, illuminations, blunders, "tirs," and fireworks with which the Antwerp artistic fête was rife, almost drove out of my head the only thing which caused me to write about the matter at all—or at any rate, to the Editor of THE MUSICAL WORLD. I mean, of course, the concert, at which Joseph Joachim played Beethoven's violin concerto, to hear which (though furnished with an official "passe-partout") I was forced to disburse ten francs, and to rehearse which (although engaged to play at the concert) Joachim himself had to pay three francs and a half—the price of a public admission to this indispensable preliminary. When I obtained from the prince of fiddlers himself a knowledge of this fact, it somewhat consoled your correspondent: not to know "H. H." was a venial sin; not to know Joachim was quite another matter. But to the concert. The programme you received, and perhaps (for I have not seen a copy of THE MUSICAL WORLD in my travels, except one at Chaudfontaine, but that was The New York Musical World, with which your MUSICAL WORLD has nothing in common) printed. I nevertheless herewith transmit you another sketch, together with the remarks on the performance which I find in my note-book.

"The concert, or 'Fête Musicale,' held in the Theatre Royal last evening, was interesting, and, for the most part, classical. How little it had to do with Belgian art, however, may be seen by the subjoined programme:—

Symphonie Héroïque, Beethoven; Psaume XVIII., cœli enarrant, chanté par Mlle. Artot, avec chœur, Marcello; Die erste Walpurgisnacht, Mendelssohn; Chant de Noël, Angelus ad Pastores ait, chœur sans accompagnement, Roland de Lattre; Air des Noxze di Figaro: Giunse al fin il momento, chanté par Mlle. Artot, Mozart; Concerto pour violon, exéc. par Joachim, Beethoven; Variations, chantées par Mlle. Artot, Rode; Alleluia, chœur de l'oratorio Messias, Handel,

"Roland de Lattre, or, as he is more universally known, Orlando Lessus, stood for ancient, and Mlle. Artot, the well-known mezzo-soprano, for modern music; both very fairly representing their periods, the first as a composer, the last as an executant. The Angelus of the old Fleming—who flourished in the 16th century, and was one of the greatest masters of the school to which he belonged—is a capital specimen of his style,—a style having a good deal in common with Palestrina and his followers. That Mlle. Artot—who sang in her usual manner, with extraordinary vigour, if not refinement, among other things exaggerating the peculiarities of her mistress, Mad. Viardot Garcia—should not have introduced a single piece by a Belgian composer, old or new, created general surprise. Nevertheless, everything she did was applauded to the skies, and after repeating the last variation of Rode's air, she left the orchestra loaded with bouquets. The chorus and orchestra numbered in all 424 performers, considerably more than 100 being instrumentalists. The chorus was admirable, the freshness of the women's voices (sopranos especially) being remarkable. Of course they gave the Angelus of their famous old Roland as well as it was possible; but what distinguished them still more honourably, from the greater difficulty of the task, was the precision, delicacy, and clearness with which they executed the whole of the choral music in Mendelssohn's justly renowned Walpurgis Night; and this in a great measure redeemed the comparative tameness of the band, which, in spite of its numerical strength, sounded weak and hesitating, especially in the department of 'strings.' To those who have heard our English fiddles and basses this discrepancy must have been unfavourably apparent, more especially in the Eroica symphony, which was taken in almost every instance too slowly, and though there was abundance of piano, and no want of what is termed 'light and shade,' seemed (strange anomaly for such a magnificent inspiration) absolutely spiritless. Thus the Walpurgis Night carried away the honours from Beethoven's great work, the harbinger of a new epoch in art. Even Mendelssohn's music suffered from the prevalent slowness of 'temp' to which M. François Callaerts, the conductor, with lethargic obstinacy submitted each successive movement, and still more from the very bad singing of M. Valsovani (baritone-bass), and M. Warnotz (tenor), in their respective and important solos. The contralto part of the old woman was assigned to Mlle. Artot, who gave her air 'Könnt ihr so werwegen handeln,' not much more than half as quick as the composer has indicated. The triumph of the concert was Herr Joachim's superb execution of the violin concerto of Beethoven, which, notwithstanding the occasional un-steadiness of the accompaniments, was one of the greatest musical treats imaginable. How Herr Joachim plays this wonderful composition need not be told to English readers; but it may be added that he never played it with greater dignity, refinement, and esprit. At the end he was complimented by a regular ovation. The orchestra joined the audience in cheering and applauding, the ladies of the chorus threw bouquets on him from all sides, and one of them crowned him with a wreath of laurel. Handel's sublime 'Hallelujah' acted merely as a voluntary to play the people out; and, though rendered with uncommon force and steadiness, would have been voted decidedly 'slow' by our London amateurs, accustomed to the impetuous enthusiasm of Mr. Costa.

"The concert took place in the pit of the theatre, on an orchestra elevated so as to command the stage, the whole of which to the furthermost walls of the building (where we had the good fortune to be placed, in what was facetiously denominated a 'reserved seat,' for the small consideration of 10 francs) was thrown open to accommodate one section of the audience, who were thus separated from the boxes and galleries by the vocal and instrumental performers. The theatre was literally crammed, the King of Bavaria and suite, and other notable persons occupying private boxes."

Joachim's playing was never, perhaps, grander. At least it never made a deeper impression upon me. I sat next to an intelligent German from Vienna, who remembered Joachim's first concert at Vienna, in the spring of the present year, and who gave me a long account of his impressions over a cup of coffee at the Hotel St. Antoine, after the concert was over. "After our curiosity," he said, "had for a number of years been in vain kept on the stretch to make the acquaintance of the most celebrated virtuoso, or, as we prefer naming him, artist, of the present day, we at length had the pleasure of doing so at a concert given by him, with the assistance of the band of the Imperial Opera, in the rooms of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde. What high expectations the public had formed of Joachim's performance were manifested by the very numerous attendance and the hearty cheers which greeted our celebrated visitor on his appearance. The expectations of the public were not disappointed, although the general opinion was that they would not be fully realised until the subsequent concerts, to which we looked forward with the greatest interest. The pieces selected by Joachim were Beethoven's concerto—the concerto of all concertos—an adagio by Spohr, and a sonata by Tartini.

"Even then,"—pursued my German friend—"I could signalise as the prominent qualities of Joachim's play, grandeur of style, and a manly-serious, objectively-characteristic (!) conception, free from anything like coquetry; vigorous and truly imposing fulness of tone, and an indisputable mastery over technical difficulties, is, as far as we are at present capable of judging, indisputable. Whether he possessed passion also, a quality by no means the last that should belong to an astist, was something of which I required more convincing proof, the programme affording him but little scope for developing this particular side of his artistic individuality. His most brilliant effort was, then his truly grandiose execution of Tartini's Sonata, a highly interesting work, for the revival of which we all felt grateful. The burlesque parts especially were played with the most unctuous humour and electrified the audience, who, up to that time, had not been, properly speaking, carried away by his performance, although they had listened to it in a spirit of respectful satisfaction. Joachim, in fact, appeared to be suffering from nervousness during Beethoven's concerto; and, however admirable his execution, so far as correctness and dexterity went, it did not astonish the audience or throw into the shade the well-remembered efforts of other artists—such as Hellmesberger (!) for instance. The cadenza, in the first movement, which was carried out with rather too much breadth, did not please, though the extraordinary mastery of polyphonic playing was of course admired. The performance of Spohr's adagio was, on the other hand, inimitably beautiful, and gave evidence of true and genuine feeling combined with the most noble simplicity; in fact, we all particularly noticed Joachim's highly cultivated taste, and the delicate tact with which, as a rule, he succeeded in adapting his play to the spirit of masters so fundamentally different as Beethoven, Spohr, and Tartini.

"To conclude, I was unable to pronounce a final opinion of Joachim's talent after a single hearing. That he should have disdained, and would as surely continue to disdain, to exhibit it in pieces of 'virtuosity,' in compositions expressly written for the purpose of mechanical display, despite the ease with which the limited repertory at the command of a violinist might tend to seduce him into such practices, I did not consider a merit in Herr Joachim, but looked upon his patience in this respect as necessarily founded on his genuine artistic nature, to say nothing of the satiety of the public, no less than their improved musical education, preventing them from feeling the least desire for such incentives to excitement."

"And what is your opinion now?"—I asked, after this long-winded periphrasis.

"Oh!" he replied, "I have heard Joachim many times since, and am now thoroughly convinced that he is the greatest living executive artist—the greatest, in short, since Paganini."

I regretted to hear such a commonplace from one who had talked so speciously. "The greatest since Paganini;" "the greatest since Malibran;" "the greatest since Braham"—these are common exclamations, and proceed as often from those who are not old enough perhaps ever to have heard, much less to appreciate at their proper value, either Paganini, Malibran, or Braham. For my part, although in the latter of these two predicaments undoubtedly, I persist in believing Joachim greater than Paganini, Jenny Lind than Malibran, and Sims Reeves than Braham. And so I left my chance friend humming the old song:—

"Je suis le docteur Dommerle
Ri, ri, ri, ri, ri, trie de ri de ri.
Et puis je suis Wallon aussi:
Si, si, si, si, si, si, si, si.
Je représente les Fla-hutes,
Tchin na na poûn na na poûn (ter)
Siéger à l'Chamb, voilà mon but.
Tchin na na poûn, na na poûn (bis)."

To which, as he slowly passed on through the Place Verte, I heard him respond:—

"J'achète des taup's au prix courant,
Ran, ran, ran deri deri deran, deri deran.
C'est pour les mettre dans mes champs
Chan, chan, chanderi deri deran.
Des taup's, j'en ai bien peu trouvé,
Tchin na na poûn na na poûn, poûn.
Mais parmi vous j'en trouverai,
Tchin na na poûn, na na poûn, na na poûn."

—which proved that he knew the song, at least, although he was apparently unaware that I had hummed the first verse "àpropos de bottes." Dommerie van Dommerik is one thing, Beethoven von Joachim another.

H. H.

Antwerp, Hotel de St. Antoine, Aug. 27th.

APPLAUSE is the very breath in the nostrils of artists. Applause instantaneous and genuine is that by which actors and singers live and flourish. It is their hope and expectation, their ambition, their first and last object, the goal of all their desires. Deprive the singer or actor of his cheers and his clappings, you refrigerate his enthusiasm, repress his chief stimulant to exertion and sap the foundation of his energy. A voiceless audience is death to an artist. In the silence of congregations he feels his own condemnation, believing when they are mute he must be impotent. And what impulse it must give to a follower in any art to know that his efforts are truly appreciated; above all to the actor, or orator, who looks for immediate approbation when he himself is present! This is the reason why those who make the stage their profession are more sensitive than any other class of the community. They live in an atmosphere of popular excitement, and their only means of being assured that they are successful is by loud expression on the part of those whom they endeavour to please. If there is no expression, it is because they have failed to gratify. The conviction is inevitable.

The anomaly of the power of calling for an encore being vested in the President of the Birmingham Musical Festival has been very properly commented on by the correspondents of the London press. The absurdity was not likely to escape gentlemen at once so observing and captious to everything that wore the semblance of a grievance or an error. But this is no more than what we ourselves have directed attention to, on more than one occasion, in the pages of the MUSICAL WORLD. The right given to the President of commanding the repetition of any piece in a musical performance is a "mockery and a delusion." By what impulse is he governed? By his own feelings. It would be the height of vanity and impertinence to consult his own opinions only — allowing him to have any — in an assembly of thousands of amateurs. Perhaps he is swayed by the muttered expressions of delight from the aristocratic lispers who surround his star-ship like satellites in the President's gallery? This would be little better, and would resolve the Festival into a private concert on a grand scale. One thing is certain: the President of the Birmingham Festival has no means of ascertaining the popular feeling, since all manifestations of approval are interdicted, and consequently he must be moved in his decisions from within himself. That it would be the more gracious act, and one which would defy reprehension, to omit encores altogether, need not be pointed out. Mark the contradiction! Encores in oratorios are forbidden on the ground that they are derogatory to a performance of sacred music; and yet the President has the right, and exercises it, of commanding encores — that is, has the right to do that which is emphatically pronounced to be wrong. Is this Brummagem logic? Now all this absurdity might be done away with if the prohibition against outward expression were withdrawn. What real objection, we should like to know, can be offered to a popular demonstration in the Birmingham Hall during the representation of an oratorio? It is no cathedral, nor sacred edifice, the genius loci of which might indeed with reason plead for extra decorum and forbearance; but a good, stout, profane structure, devoted to all sorts of purposes, like St. James's or Exeter Hall. And as for claiming the observance of exact silence, and expecting straight-laced and rigorous attention to the performance of an oratorio, that that was never contemplated by Handel is demonstrated by the fact, that most of his oratorios were brought out at the public theatres. The Messiah, for instance, was first given in London at Covent Garden Theatre; Israel in Egypt was produced at the same non-ecclesiastical locale, as was also Judas Maccabæus; which proves that oratorio was not regarded in a mere sacred light, but looked upon as an historical representation illustrated by music. Had applause been permitted during the performance of oratorios at the Birmingham Festival much disagreeable observation would have been spared; the most deserving performances — or at least those most desired by the majority of the audiences — would, as they should be, have been repeated; while the President would have escaped becoming the object of many remarks which it is always distressing to hear levelled against high persons in most responsible places. That the noble lord who presided over the Birmingham Festival performed the duties of his office to the best of his abilities, and with perfect freedom from all prejudice and party feeling, we have not the least doubt; but, until the anomaly involved in the prohibition of encores and the authority given to one person to subvert the prohibition be done away with, future Presidents must expect to be questioned and criticised, and Directors of future Festivals be rated for want of foresight and discrimination. Let encores by all means be disallowed; but, for the sake of artists and art, let free utterance be given to feelings of admiration and delight. The dead composer is as much interested in manifestations of applause as the living singer or player.

THE following announcement has appeared in the columns of a morning contemporary:—

"INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION, 1862.—Her Majesty's Commissioners have received a communication from M. Meyerbeer, stating that, in compliance with their request, he will compose a march for the opening ceremony."

The news is not exactly new, as our Paris correspondent had already informed the readers of the MUSICAL WORLD that M. Meyerbeer had acceded to the request of the Commissioners. Our correspondent further stated that M. Auber had consented to compose a piece for the inauguration of the Exhibition of 1862. To these we may now add, that Signor Verdi has consented to supply an Italian composition, and Professor Sterndale Bennett an English one, for the great inaugural ceremony. Germany, France, Italy, and England, thus represented by the most renowned living composers (Rossini is dead to art unfortunately) of the several countries, the musical performance involved in the inauguration cannot fail to create the liveliest interest and curiosity, as no doubt each musician will try his very best for the occasion. Surely after this the grumblers about music being neglected at the forthcoming International Exhibition will be silent. And this, in our opinion, is the only feasible way in which music can be turned to account under the circumstances, and rendered at once agreeable and useful.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Mr. Gye has engaged Signor Delle Sedie, the baritone, for the ensuing season.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.—We are able to state upon trustworthy authority that Drury Lane Theatre will open for a short season, about the middle of this month, with English opera, under the direction of Dr. James Pech.

MR. ALFRED MELLON'S CONCERTS.

Mr. Mellon does well to keep up Jullien's plan of occasionally devoting one portion of a concert exclusively to classical music. It is not bad policy to omit a set of quadrilles now and then, for the sake of inserting a symphony into the programme — to appeal from the large public who are captivated by a dance tune to the still larger public who have learnt to reserve their admiration for the worthiest objects. Paradox though it may seem to be, it is nevertheless strictly true that the best classical concerts are now more thoroughly popular than those which profess to be destined for "the people." "Music for the million" must be music of the highest class. What now pleases the vulgar most was written for the delectation of princes, and a cynic might reverse the terms of the proposition with some show of reason. All this is so well known that we need not insist on it; and we are somewhat surprised at Mr. Mellon's not having declared still more decidedly than he has done for the progress of the art of which he is evidently so enthusiastic a devotee. We feel convinced that he would consult his own interest in no less a degree than the advancement of music if he appealed habitually instead of occasionally to the taste which, whether it be from fashion or conviction, is now paramount in the English nation. It is true that he has given several "classical nights" since the commencement of his concerts, but these might well have been increased in number, and we have never been able to understand the principle on which, in Jullien's time as well as now, they have been limited. It has invariably happened that the concerts on these special occasions have been much more fully attended than usual, and yet conductors seem loth to follow out the plan which this circumstance seems naturally to suggest. If classical music always "draws" best, surely it is reasonable to conclude that it must be a profitable investment. Fear seems to be entertained lest the avidity with which people flock to hear a symphony by Beethoven or Mendelssohn should be lessened by its constant repetition, but very little experience would suffice to show that such fear is groundless. No mental phenomenon is more evident than that, in the study of a masterpiece in any art, the "appetite grows by what it feeds on."

On Thursday night a selection of vocal and instrumental music by one of the great masters attracted, as rarely fails to be the case, a crowded audience. The master was Mozart, to whose compositions the whole of the first part was devoted. The singers were Mlle. Parepa and Herr Formes; and the band was the admirable one to which Mr. Alfred Mellon has accustomed his patrons, now restored to its original strength by the return of many of its most efficient members, whose services during the previous week had been in request at the Birmingham Festival. That the programme was well chosen, judiciously varied, and highly interesting the subjoined will show:—

Symphony in G minor; air, "In diesen heiligen hallen;" concerto, pianoforte, in C major; scene, "Gli angui d'inferno;" air, "Non piu andrai;" overture (Figaro)—Mozart.

The symphony in G minor would alone have repaid so musical an audience as that which was assembled on the present occasion in honour of Mozart. This truly wonderful work is the second of three—the other two being the symphony in E flat, and the great symphony in C, distinguished from its less ambitious predecessor by the traditional title of Jupiter—which were designed and completed within the short interval of six weeks. Notwithstanding the unparalleled finale of the Jupiter—one of the most prodigious examples of contrapuntal science, combined with rich invention, which the art can boast—musicians are pretty nearly unanimous in according the first place among the orchestral compositions of Mozart to the symphony in G minor. Nothing that came from the pen of the author of Don Giovanni and Die Zauberflöte—not even those masterpieces themselves—is more deeply imbued with the spirit of the man and the marked individuality of the artist; and on this account, if on no other, it must always be a special favourite with the lovers of Mozart's music. Those amateurs who were fortunate enough to be at the Royal Italian Opera yesterday evening must have been more than satisfied with the execution of the symphony, which was, indeed, the prominent feature of the concert. Every part was given well—the andante, minuet, and finale to perfection; and so delighted were the audience with the minuet—probably the finest movement of its kind—that they absolutely clamoured for a repetition; but Mr. Mellon would on no account consent—somewhat inconsistently, we thought, inasmuch as he subsequently acceded to more than one "encore," the demand for which was certainly less general and spontaneous. The pianoforte concerto—the earliest and least ambitious, if not the least engaging in the key of C—used to be frequently heard at the concerts of the late M. Jullien, and invariably received with enthusiasm. It was played with remarkable spirit and correctness by Miss Julia Woolf (King's Scholar, if we are not mistaken, at the Royal Academy of Music), who had the good taste to prefer Mozart's own text—the "cadenzas" in the "allegro" and "finale" allowed for—to the embellished versions of Cramer, Hummel, &c., which are for the most part resorted to by modern pianists. The applause that followed each movement was a tribute honourably earned.

The vocal pieces afforded the utmost pleasure. Mlle. Parepa sang the very arduous and trying air of Astriaffamente with extraordinary vigour, taking the high notes, which are its exceptional characteristics, with the utmost ease and certainty, and concluding her task amid applause so loud and prolonged so persistently that she was compelled to repeat the quick movement. If ever the revival of Il Flauto Magico should be entertained, Mlle. Parepa being at hand, there need at least be no difficulty about the part of the "Queen of Night." Herr Formes created a "furore" in the solemn invocation of Sarastro ("In diesen heiligen hallen"), into the spirit of which he enters thoroughly, and which is alike suited to his voice and style. He, too, by the unanimous desire of the audience, was obliged to return to the orchestra and repeat the last verse. With the immortal song of Figaro ("Non piu andrai") Herr Formes was not less successful. The engagement of this popular singer is likely to prove attractive; and the more of Mozart's dramatic songs set down for him the better. The animated prelude to Le Nozze di Figaro, the most genuine and irresistible comic overture extant, brought the Mozart selection to an end with the utmost "éclat." Better played it could not have been. Mr. Mellon directed the entire performance with consummate address, and, not for the first time by many, showed his intimate acquaintance with the classic school of the greatest of "absolute musicians."

The "New York Quadrille," produced on Monday night, has been the novelty of the week, and is altogether a lively and spirited affair, the airs being happily chosen and well put together. The popular negro melodies upon which the quadrille is founded are nightly recognised with unmistakeable symptoms of approval, and the whole performance cheered vehemently. A new waltz, too, called "The Warblers of the Forest," in which the imitation of birds is wonderfully well managed, may also be mentioned as a good thing of its kind.

To-night the "Volunteer Night" will be repeated, and in addition to Mlle. Parepa, Mad. Laura Baxter, Mr. George Perren, and Herr Formes among the vocalists, Mad. Florence Lancia, of whose antecedents our readers need not be told, makes her first appearance, and sings the grand scena from Signor Verdi's Attila.

DUBLIN.—The Misses Leishman gave an interesting matinée in their elegant rooms on Thursday last, when the following programme was gone through:—Part I.—Duo Brillante, harp and piano, on Meyerbeer's "Huguenots" (C. Oberthür); Solo, piano, andante and rondo capriccioso (Mendelssohn); Solo, harp, "Serenade" (Parish Alvars); Duo, harp and piano, "Alpenhorn" (Oberthür); Solo, piano, (a) "May-breeze," (b) "St. Patrick's Day" (Th. Mauss). Part II.—Solo, harp, concerto in E major (Parish Alvars); Allegro brillante, andante, rondo (the orchestral accompaniments have been adapted for the piano by the author); Solo, piano, nocturne; Le Corsair, galop brillante (Th. Mauss); Solo, harp, "Thou art so near, and yet so far;" La Cascade (Oberthür); Duo, harp and piano, "Erin go bragh" (Oberthür). The audience, a highly fashionable one, were highly delighted with what they heard, and gave frequent vent to their approbation. The arrangement made by the Misses Leishman for the comfort of their aristocratic visitors was satisfactory.

MISS ARABELLA GODDARD AT THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL.

(From the "Morning Post.")

WE really cannot help paying a special compliment to Miss Arabella Goddard for her wonderfully fine execution of Mendelssohn's concerto in G minor, not a new work certainly, but still by no means so frequently heard as the vocal pieces we have mentioned. It was also the only solo instrumental piece in the concert, and we may add that the custom which our provincial festival committees appear to have adopted latterly, of excluding such works from their programmes, is not at all worthy of encouragement. The unmistakeable effect produced by Miss Arabella Goddard on this occasion will, we trust, serve to correct the error to which we have alluded. Miss Arabella Goddard never before, to our thinking, played the G minor concerto with such impassioned energy and poetical feeling. The audience listened with the deepest attention throughout, and applauded the fair pianist on every possible occasion with the warmest enthusiasm.

(From the "Morning Herald" and "Standard.")

MISS ARABELLA GODDARD'S appearance in the orchestra relieved the committee of great anxiety, for on her way here from Boulogne the distinguished pianist was attacked with such severe indisposition that she could not attend the rehearsal, and it was at one time doubtful whether she would be able to appear at all. It cannot be pretended that such an elaborate concerto as the G minor could, so far as the orchestra was concerned, go as well as if the conductor had been in the position of coming to an under standing with the soloist. But the performance was in the ensemble a veritable tour de force. It was really wonderful that the orchestral entries should have been so exact. For the fair pianist herself nothing apologetical is at all necessary. No signs of weakness were shown in her passage playing. She took Mendelssohn's rattling octaves and prolonged trills with her ordinary ease and precision, and her adagio was distinguished as usual by its refined, delicate, and intense expressiveness. It was altogether a noble reading of a noble work, replete with brilliancy, brimful of intelligence, and with all its masculine vigour of execution, betraying the woman artist's grace and tenderness.

From the "Morning Herald" and "Standard."

THE instrumentalists had a third opportunity of gaining distinction, and they did not fail to avail themselves of the chance. The E flat concerto of Beethoven is of a proportion approaching to the symphony, although the pianoforte part is of such prominency and magnitude. No executant but of the first rank must approach this colossal conception; the gloomy grandeur of the opening movement, the mysterious melody pervading the adagio, and the irresistible impulse of the rapid rondo, require something more than digital dexterity. The intellect must predominate, the heart and soul must ooze out of the instrument, to keep pace with the orchestral loftiness and dignity. The concerto is without a triviality, the theme is always elevated, the treatment never small. The elaboration is intricate, but always eloquent. Beethoven's pianoforte concertos are like the Greek dramas, in which the human passions are strong, and the pianoforte is the chorus which tells the tale and points the moral. The task, therefore, for the pianist is onerous, and Miss Arabella Goddard evidently felt the responsibility. Her reading was based on a rigid adherence to the text—a most praiseworthy starting-point, and finger work with her is child's play. Her rush of octaves, and there are not a few in this concerto, was marked with high finish, and what she can do in pianissimo passages is equivalent to the declaration that the most perfect phrasing from the human voice is rivalled by her on the pianoforte. Such a performance, in which the pianoforte principal and the instrumental adjuncts were quite hors ligne, ought to have created a classic furore; but here, albeit the concerto was listened to with profound attention, there was no exhibition of excitement at the end. Is it that such high-class works are really beyond the comprehension of mixed audiences? Are the epics of music to be sealed books, except to educated ears? The committee, at all events, are entitled to all praise, for their moral courage in affording the Birmingham festival visitors the opportunity of hearing such noble productions.

(From the "Birmingham Journal.")

The great feature of the concert was the performance by Miss Arabella Goddard and the orchestra of Beethoven's lengthy and elaborate piano-forte Concerto in E flat, commonly known as the Emperor. Mere verbal description would fail to convey an adequate idea of this superb work, which occupied more than half-an-hour in performance, and revealed at every turn such wonders of melody and harmony, such breadth of design, and such elaboration of treatment, such happiness in the motivi, and such variety and fecundity in the instrumentation, that even the magnificence of the execution assumed but a secondary position in the mind of the auditor. The first and longest movement is in the nature of a martial allegro, introduced by a few striking chords for the orchestra, and chiefly remarkable for the lavish employment of the wind instruments, and the fine effect of the pizzicato accompaniments to octave passages for the piano-forte. The following movement, a solemn adagio, is introduced by the stringed instruments, to which some of the finest phrases are assigned, though a melodious passage for the wind instruments, with a chaste and original counterpoint on two notes for the piano-forte, excited much admiration. This movement is connected with the concluding rondo by a series of masterly cadenzas, and the martial character of the earlier part reappears in a more brilliant and striking form than before. We have never witnessed a finer pianoforte performance than that of Miss Goddard on that occasion. The care and brilliancy of her execution are in no particular more manifest than in the silvery pianissimo runs which abound in the pianoforte part; and notwithstanding the great length and novelty of the performance, the audience heard it through with 'bated breath and watchful eagerness, applauding the conclusion as warmly as if some popular ballad were in question.

MRS. BOWERS, an American tragedienne of celebrity in the principal northern cities, has arrived in London, and has been engaged by Mr. Phelps to appear at Sadler's Wells. Mrs. Bowers was formerly manageress of the Academy of Music, and has frequently travelled with Miss Charlotte Cushman as an assistant "star."

LEEDS.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The parish church organ, by Snetzler, has recently undergone several alterations and a thorough repair, and the instrument may now be regarded as a very fine church organ, although the swell (which it is the intention of the churchwardens at some future time to reconstruct) is very incomplete. The work has been executed by Mr. Holt, of Leeds, under the supervision of Walker Joy, Esq., a clever amateur and one of the churchwardens. The following is a specification of the organ as it now stands:—

Great Organ.—Compass G G to F.—1. Double open diapason (metal) 16 feet; 2. Large open diapason (metal) 8; 3. German open diapason (metal) 8; 4. Small open diapason (metal) 8; 5. Stopped diapason (wood and metal) 8; 6. Wald flute (wood) 4; 7. Octave (metal) 4; 8. Octave quint (metal) 3; 9. Super octave (metal) 2; 10. Dulciana mixture 3 ranks; 11. Sharp mixture 3; 12. Full mixture 3; 13. Trumpet 8 feet; 14. Trombone 8; 15. Clarion 4.

Pedal Organ.—Compass C C C to F.—1. Sub-bass (wood) 32 feet; 2. Open diapason (wood) 16; 3. Bourdon (wood) 16; 4. Flute bass (wood) 8; 5. Octave (metal) 8; 6. Mixture 4 ranks; 7. Contra-trombone (wood) 32 feet; 8. Trombone (wood) 16; 9. Clarion (metal) 8.

Swell Organ.—Compass Tenor C to F.—1. Open diapason (metal) 8 feet; 2. Stopped diapason (metal) 8; 3. Gamba (metal) 8; 4. Octave (metal) 4; 5. Trumpet (metal) 8; 6. Oboe (metal) 8.

Choir Organ.—Compass C C to F.—1. Double dulciana (metal) 16 feet; 2. Open diapason (metal) 8; 3. Dulciana (metal) 8; 4. Claribel (wood) 8; 5. Gedact (metal and wood) 8; 6. Octave (metal) 4; 7. Gedact flute (metal) 4; 8. Cor-Anglais (metal) 16; 9. Clarinet (metal) 8.

Couplers.—Swell to great; great to pedal. Swell to choir; choir to pedal. Four composition pedals to great; two ditto to pedal. Ventil to pedal; ventil to manual.

The patent hydraulic engine and additional feeders, the gift of Mr. Walker Joy, have also been applied, and the apparatus is employed for the double purpose of supplying wind to the instrument and for pumping out the waste water for the use of the schools in connection with the church.

The experiment was tried last Saturday evening by Dr. Spark of devoting an entire programme to the works of one composer' and the result was, on the whole, successful. The name of Mendelssohn drew a large audience, including several professional gentlemen and amateurs. The programme included organ pieces, vocal extracts, orchestral music, and two of the celebrated Lieder ohne Worte (songs without words), and considerable interest was manifested in these latter highly popular compositions. Their effect on the organ was in one respect admirable—the song itself coming out with due prominence, and varying in the gradations of tone even more successfully than can be obtained on the piano, for which instrument these Lieder were specially written. But whilst this was an advantage, the organ failed to impart the same superiority to the accompaniments. On Saturday we are promised a Mozart night, and a treat may be anticipated by the lover of pure melody.

Dr. Spark having resigned the office of conductor to that old establishment the Leeds Madrigal Society, after ten years' gratuitous service, a special meeting of the members was held on Wednesday evening to appoint his successor. There were about seventy members present, J. W. Atkinson, Esq., vice-president, occupying the chair. A unanimous vote of thanks was first passed to Dr. Spark for his long and valuable labours in the cause of choral music in Leeds. The members expressed their deep regret at his resignation, which, however, Dr. Sparks finds necessary, as a great portion of his time is now required for his duties as organist of the Town Hall. After a short discussion, the committee's report, recommending John Bowling, Esq., as musical director of the society, was unanimously adopted. On being introduced to the members, Mr. Bowling was received with loud cheers, and in accepting the office he expressed his pleasure at the honour which had been conferred upon him, remarking that he accepted the post because he felt it would be an injury to the cause of choral music in Leeds if such a society (numbering, as he was informed, about 130 members), should be allowed to languish. He promised his best efforts to promote the society's welfare, and begged every member to aid those efforts by constant attendance at the rehearsals.

THE ITALIAN OPERA IN PARIS.—The difference between M. Calzado and the band has had a pacific termination. All the artists of the orchestra remain in their places for the approaching season. The company is already formed, and includes, among the prime donne soprani, Mads. Penco and Volpini, and Mlle. Marie Battu; prime donne contralti, Mads. Alboni and Trebelli; prime donne comprimari, Mad. Tagliafico and Mlle. Vestri; primi tenori, Signors Mario, Tamberlik, Belart and Brini; tenore comprimario, Signor Cappello; primi baritoni, Signors Badiali, Beneventano, and Delle Sedie; primi bassi, Signors Tagliafico and Capponi; primo buffo, Signor Zucchini; director of the orchestra, Signor Bonnetti; direttore del canto e maestro al cembalo, Signor Uranio Fontana; chorus-master, Signor Chiaromonte. Tamberlik will not sing until the spring, and will appear in March and April. Signor Beneventano—well remembered at Her Majesty's Theatre—replaces Signor Graziani, who goes to St. Petersburg. The success of Sig. Delle Sedie in London has secured him an engagement at the Italiens. Of Mad. Volpini report speaks highly. She will share the soprano repertory with Mad. Penco. Signor Brini, who in reality is Herr Braun, a German, is said to have a charming tenor voice. Verdi's Macbeth will be one of the earliest novelties of the season. Tancredi will be produced for Mlle. Trebelli and Mlle. Battu; Anna Bolena revived for Mads. Penco and Alboni; Pergolese's Serva Padrona for Mlle. Battu and Signor Zucchini; and Mozart's Cosi fan Tutte, in which nearly the whole strength of the company will be engaged.

BERLIN.—The great heat lately has proved anything but conducive to the benefit of in-door amusements. The Opera House has been almost deserted by its regular frequenters, many of whom are absent, by the way, at the various watering-places; and has had to depend chiefly on provincial visitors, whom no heat, I believe, would induce to réfrain from "doing" all the lions of the capital. The principal attractions at the above establishment for some past have been Cherubini's Deux Journées and the ballet Flick und Flock; the principal parts in the opera being sustained by Mad. Harriers-Wippern, Mlle. Münster, Herren Krause, Pfister, and Wolf. At the Friedrich-Wilhelm Städtisches Theatre the bills have been monopolised by Orpheus, Genoveva, and Fortunio's Lied. The King has accepted the dedication of a symphony composed for the approaching coronation by Herr R. Wüerst; and the Grand-Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin has presented Herr Ferdinand Sieber, teacher of singing, with the large grand-ducal gold medal for Arts and Sciences. Mlle. Marie Taglioni is at present stopping at her estate in Silesia. She has so far recovered from the effects of her late accident that she will be enabled to resume her professional duties in the course of this month. The popular ballets of Satanella and Morgano will be revived for her.

MARIENBURG.—A project has been set on foot to get up a grand festival for the purpose of raising subscriptions towards the Prussian navy. A committee has already been appointed, and has decided on giving a musical and theatrical performance, together with a series of tableaux vivants. At present, the 13th October has been fixed on as the day on which the festival will take place.

CONSTANTINOPLE.—At the command of the present Sultan, the magnificent theatre erected by his late brother has been converted into a manufactory for rifled cannon.

STOCKHOLM.—Herr Ignaz Lachner, who is now appointed conductor at the Stadttheater in Frankfort-on-the-Maine, after having acted as conductor in the Theatre Royal of this city for the space of three years, wielded the bâton here for the last time in the opera of Guillaume Tell. After the performance, Herr A. Randel, the composer, presented him, on the part of the band, with a large silver goblet, bearing the following inscription:—"Presented to Herr Ignaz Lachner, Conductor and Knight of various orders, by his friends, the members of the Royal Orchestra, Stockholm, the 22nd June, 1861." Herr Strandberg then presented him, in the name of the members of the Operatic Company, with a brilliant ring, on which was inscribed in Swedish, "Minne af Stockholms Scens lyriska Artister" (A memento from the lyrical Artists of the Theatre, Stockholm).

SWEET LAVENDER.

(COPYRIGHT.)

"Sweet Lavender!" that cry along the street
Doth waft my spirit to a far off scene—
A streamlet, sheltered from the noonday heat,
Where, over head, the woven branches meet,
And dancing sunbeams fling their ling'ring rays between.

And I am by that streamlet's mossy side,
And one, still unforgot, is at my feet,
And whisper'd flatteries, I could not chide,
Are mingling with the streamlet's murmuring tide,
Making the summer air so musically sweet.

"Sweet Lavender!" thy perfume doth recall
A thousand memories by sadness shrouded,
Gleams from the sunny past around me fall,
When, like some gay enchanting festival,
Life seemed so fair, the future so unclouded.

Once more I listen, with a feigned surprise,
To that low voice, which near my heart still lingers;
Once more I shun the light from those dear eyes,
And, whilst I strive my feelings to disguise,
Crush thy sweet buds between my trembling fingers.

"Sweet Lavender!" to me thy blossoms speak
A language eloquent of youth's sweet madness;
I gaze till tears are raining down my cheek,
As in thy fragrant beauty I would seek Lost pleasures to restore, with many a vanish'd gladness.

Alas! those hours can never come again,
When storms passed over me like summer showers;
And though I weep o'er buried hopes in vain,
The memory of their light will still remain,
Like the undying fragrance from thy flowers,
"Sweet Lavender!"

TROPPAU.—The Silesian vocal festival, which will come off on the 25th inst., promises to turn out an event of some importance. Already have thirty-six associations, with 1300 singers, signified their intention to take part in it, and it is expected that the number of singers will ultimately reach 2000. Prince Lichnowsky has invited all the associations to pay him a visit in his park at Grätz, on the 26th inst.

WIESBADEN.—M. Gounod's Faust has been performed six times to crowded houses.

DARMSTADT.—The opera-house will probably be re-opened on the 8th inst., with Meyerbeer's Prophète. This will be followed shortly afterwards by La Dame Blanche, the new tenor, Herr Horn, appearing as George Brown.

LONDON:
ASHDOWN AND PARRY
(Successors to Wessel and Co.),
18 HANOVER SQUARE.

EVANS'S
COTTAGE HARMONIUM
At SIX GUINEAS,

Has Five Octaves and Two Foot-boards, is in a French-polished Case, and has a soft, subdued, agreeable quality of tone, designed expressly to suit a Cottage or Small Sitting-room.—BOOSEY and CHING, Manufacturers, 24 Holles Street, Oxford Street, W.

Evans's Ten-Guinea
HARMONIUM

Is in a solid, handsome French-polished Case, and possesses that rich and organ-like quality of tone which particularly distinguishes these Instruments from the French.—BOOSEY and CHING, Manufacturers, 24 Holles Street, Oxford Street, W.

Evans's English
HARMONIUMS;
WITH TWO ROWS OF KEYS,

At 45 and 63 Guineas, without Pedals, and 47 and 130 Guineas, with Pedals,

Although particularly adapted for Churches, are equally effective in the Drawing-room. Not only have the leading members of the profession, including Messrs. Sterndale Bennett, Balfe, Potter, Henry Smart, Best, &c., but the Clergy and the Press have also testified to the very great superiority of EVANS'S HARMONIUMS. These Testimonials may be seen upon reference to Boosey and Ching's Illustrated Catalogue of Harmoniums.

The whole of EVANS'S INSTRUMENTS possess that organ-like quality of tone which has been hitherto unattained by any other manufacturer, and are made throughout in the strongest and most substantial manner by the best "ENGLISH WORKMEN." They are neither affected by heat nor damp.

BOOSEY AND CHING,
MANUFACTURERS, 24 HOLLES STREET, OXFORD STREET, W.

ASHDOWN and PARRY (successors to Wessel and Co.) beg to inform the Profession that they forward Parcels on Sale upon receipt of references in town. Returns to be made at Midsummer and Christmas.

Their Catalogues, which contain a great variety of Music calculated for teaching purposes, may be had, post-free, on application.

SWEET SUMMER, Duet for Soprano and Contralto.
Words and Music by JAMES LEA SUMMERS. Price 3s.
Sung by Miss Banks and Miss Palmer with great success at his Concert, St. James's Hall.

"Not only is the melody sweet and flowing, the 'voicing' good, and the accompaniment both correct and elegant, it has in addition to these desirable qualifications, a strong poetical feeling, by the unaffectedly earnest lines to which the music is set."—MUSICAL WORLD.

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

Sept. 12.

THE torpor of the dull season which rendered the efforts of your correspondent to supply you with a presentable budget of news as desperate as they were abortive has suddenly, and as though a magician's wand had done it, given place to liveliness and activity. The vestivating period of the Parisians is usually ended about the middle of this month, and the crowds which had straggled away in divers directions, or hidden themselves to simulate absence, begin to flock back and show themselves again in their habitual haunts, and Paris becomes once more Paris, and not a huge quartering place for provincial folk and foreigners. The theatres, in expectation of the coming revival, are accordingly all under arms, and the usual stars of each establishment once more twinkling in their appointed places. At the Grand Opera the revival of Herculaneum gave M. and Mad. Gueymard, M. Obin, and Mlle. Livry, and the habitués of that house with whom they are in such high favour, an opportunity of mutually greeting each other on their respective returns from their respective country trips. I should not have left out the name of Mad. Tedesco from this group of favourites. On the following Wednesday the Prophète was revived, the cast including Mad. Viardot, MM. Gueymard, Belval, Coulon, and Kœnig; both evenings were equally brilliant and spirited. It is announced that the management of the Imperial Opera has signed a fresh engagement with M. Cazaux for another five years. The excellence of this artist renders this in every way a prudent step. An edict has just gone forth from the Minister of State, which, by implication, exhibits the weakness of great artists for prominently parading their names in the public bills on the smallest pretexts. It decrees that henceforth no singer shall have their last performances previous to a congé announced more than three times before their departure, and that the same rule be observed in the announcement of any singer's return. If the singer's leave of absence has only been for less than three months, this number of announcements is reduced to two. It is a curious and not altogether unedifying spectacle to see a government step in to check the self-swelling tendencies of the vainest profession in the world.

At the Opéra Comique, the Cid has been produced for the début of Mlle. Balbi in the part of Virginie. This lady's reception was in the highest degree complimentary, and deservedly so, for she is a very charming singer, and only requires, what she seems in a fair way of acquiring—a little more vigour—to take a most distinguished place in the profession she has adopted. Mlle. Balbi started, as did Mad. Ugalde and Mad. Carvalho, as a concert singer. Her next essay will be in the part of Perrine in Maître Claude. The revival of Le Postillon de Lonjumeau, which has been so long announced, is still hindered by the continued indisposition of Mad. Faure Lefèbvre. The manager of the Opéra Comique has just accepted a new opera in three acts, the book of which is by MM. Leuven and Cormon, and the music by M. Jules Cohen. It is entitled José Maria. Mlle. Cordier is about to take her leave of this establishment, having resolved to devote herself to Italian opera, for which line she has already obtained an engagement at Berlin. Mlle. Prort also ceases to be a member of the company.

The Théâtre Lyrique re-opened for the season with Les Dragons de Villars, Mlle. Girard appearing in the part of Rose Friquet, originally played by Mlle. Borghese, who until now had had no worthy successor in this difficult part. Mlle. Girard is not certainly equal to Mlle. Borghese, but she is far superior to any who have since attempted the part. On the following day M. Ernest Reyer's opera, La Statue, was revived, M. Montjauze playing the part of Seline; and lastly, on the day after that, Le Bijou perdu was revived—one of Adolphe Adam's best works—and Mad. Marie Cabel was the heroine of the evening. The house was crowded, and the reception of the brilliant songstress was of the most enthusiastic description. A sort of electric communication seemed established between the artist and her audience, by which each in turn influenced the other. Thus, then, the three great lyric establishments of Paris are once more at the flood in the tide of their fortunes. Soon to these I shall have to add the Théâtre Italien, the programme of which is already put forth. Before I detail its principal feature, let me premise the important fact, that the unfortunate "row" between the manager, M. Calzado, and the orchestra of this establishment has been at last quelled, by the intervention of the Minister of State, who has managed to adjust differences which threatened to deprive the frequenter of the Italian Opera of the service of a host of eminent executants. The following is a list of the principal artists engaged: — Prime donne soprani, Mlle. Marie Battu, Mad. Rosina Penco, Mad. Volpini. Prime donne contralti Mad. Alboni, Mlle. Trebelli. Prime donne comprimarie, Mad Tagliafico, Mlle Vestri. Primi tenori, Mario, Tamberlik, Belart, Brini. Tenore comprimario, Cappello. Primi baritoni, Badiali, Beneventano, Delle Sedie. Primi bassi, Tagliafico, Capponi. Primo buffo, Zucchini. Seconde Partie, Castelli, Mad. Grimaldi, &c. Direttore d'orchestra, M. Bonetti. Direttore di canto e maestro al cembolo, M. Fontana. Maestro di chori, M. Chiaramonte. The notes and observations to be made on this list of artists are that it constitutes one of the best Italian Opera companies the Parisians have been favoured with for many years; that Signor Tamberlik will not sing throughout the entire season as he will be in St. Petersburg, but will return in time to be available for the two last months, March and April, and that the tenor calling himself Signor Brini is no other than the Viennese artist, Herr Graun, whom M. Calzado has engaged for a period of five years. As to the works which are promised to be performed, the principal of them are as follow: — Of Rossini, Tancredi, Semiramide, Il Barbiere, Cenerentola, Otello. Of Bellini, Norma, I Puritani, La Sonnambula, Capuletti e Montecchi. Of Donizetti, Polieuto, l'Elisir d'Amor, Lucrezia Borgia, Anna Bolena. Of Mercadante, Il Giuramento, Eleonora. Of Luigi Ricci, Chiara di Rosenberg. Of Verdi, Un ballo in Maschera, Il Trovatore, Rigoletto, and another work as yet unknown in Paris. Of Flotow, Marta. Of Pergolese, La Serva Padrona. Of Cimarosa, Il Matrimonio Segreto. Of Mozart, Don Giovanni, Le Nozze di Figaro, Cosi fan tutti. While on the subject of the Italian opera in Paris, let me mention that a new regulation has been issued by the authorities, reserving the stalls, or fauteuils d'orchestre, as they are here called, entirely for the use of gentlemen. I cannot understand the wisdom or philosophy of such a law. Why banish the ladies from, as many think, the pleasantest part of the house? Is it not grossly selfish of the Jockey Club to desire this exclusive possession? The ladies had better get an edict to chasser the males from the boxes, where they certainly impair the coup d'œil presented by the ladies' toilets. The house would not look like a quaker's meeting.

The opening of the Odéon for the winter season is the noteworthiest event in theatricals since my last, more especially as it was signalised by the production of two new pieces, and the débuts of three artists. The new pieces are respectively called L'Institutrice and Le Decameron. The first is by M. Paul Foucher, and is on a very hackneyed theme, which is treated, moreover, in a very conventional way. The principal character was played by a young lady who made her first appearance on the stage, Mlle. Rousseil, fresh from the Conservatoire, where she had carried off one of the first prizes. She is very pretty, has a most expressive countenance, and an elegant figure; her aptitude for the stage is of the most marked character, and she will most certainly find her way to the Théâtre Français. A critic advised her not to follow that well-beaten road to glory, but to devote herself to the drame, and win an independent position of her own, like Mad. Dorval and Frederic Lemaitre. The counsel seems a good one, and certainly the public would gain by it, for we are much in want of a good actress in that line. Le Decameron is a little one act piece in rhyme, very graceful, but too delicately tinted, and not sufficiently vigorous for the stage. M. Henri Blaze is well known as the author of a very good translation of Göthe's Faust. He is a son of Castil Blaze.

A new drama has been produced at the Gaité to succeed the at length worn out Fille des Chiffoniers. Its title is Christophe Colomb, and the authors are MM. Mestepés and Barré. It is a decided hit, and promises to have as long a career as its predecessor, to which it is decidedly superior in interest. The Gymnase is preparing a new comedy by M. Alexandre Dumas, junior, to be entitled les Brins de Paille. The Vaudeville, which had closed its doors while it devoted all its energies to the rehearsals of a new comedy, la Frileuse, has produced that work, and it has proved a complete success. It is highly spoken of by all who have seen it, of whom I am not yet one. When I have been I will tell you my opinion.

Have you heard of a fresh infant prodigy?—a son of the late Italian composer Ricci, aged eight, who has just been presiding in the church of St. Justus, at Trieste, over the performance of a grand mass of his own composing!

One of the papers here states that M. Marschner, the well-known composer, who had been staying for the last eight months in Paris, has been taken seriously ill on his return to Hanover.

HEREFORD MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Wednesday, September 11th.

THE Festival commenced yesterday morning by a full choral service, supported by the members of the three choirs. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Musgrave, the Canon Residentiary of the Cathedral, who took for his text the words of St. Luke, "I cannot dig, to beg I am ashamed,"—chap. xv. verse 3—and very appropriate words they are, considering that, as most persons know, the proceeds of the Festival are devoted to the relief of necessitous widows and orphans of clergymen in the three dioceses of Hereford, Worcester, and Gloucester. At the conclusion of the sermon the sum of £55 8s. 5d. was collected—a good beginning.

The oratorio selected for the first morning performance was Mendelssohn's Elijah, which produced its usual effect upon the auditory. The great German master's sublime music struck me as more than ordinarily impressive, as strain after strain burst upon the ear, and then gradually died away with a religious grandeur, so to speak, partly its own, and partly the result of association, for there can not be a doubt that the venerable building in which the performance took place, exercised a deep influence upon the mind. Mr. Weiss took the part of the Prophet Elijah, and fully justified the high popularity he has long enjoyed among the musical amateurs of Hereford. His declamation was exceedingly fine, and his deep bass voice admirably adapted to the music. The soprano music was divided between Miss Louisa Pyne and Mad. Weiss, who both acquitted themselves like true artists. High as is the position Miss Louisa Pyne has attained in what, for the sake of distinction, we must term profane music, her singing yesterday was sufficient to convince the most sceptical, if, indeed, there is any one at all sceptical on the subject, that, if she chooses to devote her attention to it, she will achieve an equally high position in oratorio. Mad. Sainton-Dolby and Miss Susan Pyne took the contralto music, and Mr. Sims Reeves and Mr. Montem Smith the tenor. Most of these celebrated artists have been so often, and some so recently noticed in the same oratorio, that the mere mention of their appearance must suffice on the present occasion. The choruses were, on the whole, well rendered, and afforded general satisfaction, though to one who, like myself, had listened such a short time previously, to the wonderful choral triumph at Birmingham, they sounded, at intervals, rather weak and thin. But then the number of voices at the command of the Hereford conductor is only about a hundred and thirty. The band, reinforced by several of our first London artists, was entitled to high praise, which is due, also, to Mr. G. Townshend Smith, who discharged his duties as conductor most efficiently. Yet it would be useless to deny that, in some instances, his tempo certainly did not please me. Mr. Arnott played the organ accompaniments in a most masterly manner.

The first concert came off yesterday evening in the Shire Hall, which was crammed. The following is the programme:—

PART I.—Overture, Euryanthe (Weber); Scena, "Haste nor lose the fav'ring hour," Der Freischütz, Mr. Weiss (Weber); Scena, "Sad as my soul," Lurline, Miss Louisa Pyne (Wallace); Song, "Adelaide," Mr. Sims Reeves (Beethoven); Fantasia, Flute—On English airs, Mr. R. Sydney Pratten (Pratten); Scena, "Ocean," Oberon, Mlle. Tietjens (Weber); Quartet, "Tho' the world," Lurline, the Misses Pyne, Mr. Winn, and Mr. Weiss (Wallace); Recit. et Romance, "Parmi les pleurs," Les Huguenots, Madame Sainton-Dolby (Meyerbeer); Aria, "Ah si ben mio," Il Trovatore, Signor Giuglini (Verdi); Soli e Coro, "La Carita," Mlle. Tietjens, Miss Louisa Pyne, Madame Weiss, Madame Sainton-Dolby, and Miss Susan Pyne (Rossini).

PART II.—Symphony-Pastorale (Beethoven); Ballad, "When the elves at dawn do pass," Amber Witch, Madame Weiss (Wallace); New Ballad, "Fresh as a rose," Mr. Sims Reeves (Balfe); Aria, "Com'e bello," Lucrezia Borgia, Mlle. Tietjens (Donizetti); Harp obbligato, Mr. Trust; Quartetto, "Ecco quel fiero istante," Madame Weiss, Madame Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Montem Smith, and Mr. Winn (Costa); Harp obbligato, Mr. Trust. Irish Melody, "The meeting of the waters," Miss Louisa Pyne; Aria, "M' appari," Marta, Signor Giuglini (Flotow); Serenade, "Sleep, dearest, sleep," Madame Sainton-Dolby (Randegger); Ballad, "Jamie," Madame Sainton-Dolby (Claribel); Duet, "Al suon dell' Arpo Angeliche," I Martiri, Mlle. Tietjens and Signor Giuglini (Donizetti); Harp obbligato, Mr. Trust; Chorus, with solos, "Merry boys, away," Madame Weiss, Miss Susan Pyne, Mr. Montem Smith, and Mr. Winn (Sir H. R. Bishop).

The great feature which distinguishes the above programme from the programmes of most concerts of this kind was the Pastoral Symphony, which, I hear, we owe to the resolution of Mr. G. Townshend Smith, who had made up his mind that, among the olla podrida of the evening's entertainment, there should be, at least, one specimen of grand orchestral music, and all true lovers of what is really sublime in the noble art, ought to feel highly gratified to him. As I remarked last week, it was a great pity the managers of the Birmingham Festival did not see fit to pursue the same course. Not only, however, did Mr. G. Townshend Smith show his taste by introducing the symphony, but he conducted it admirably, and was well seconded by the members of his band, while the audience gave unmistakable evidence that they appreciated the treat thus afforded them. So much for the assertion, so often repeated by unthinking or ignorant people, that classical music is out of place in a miscellaneous concert. And now to come to the lighter dishes at this musical feast. The scena from Der Freischütz was given with fine effect by Mr. Weiss. Miss Louisa Pyne's pure and splendid voice and magnificent vocalisation were heard to great advantage in "Sad is my soul," and to still greater, perhaps, in the Irish melody, "The meeting of the waters." "Adelaida" was given by Mr. Sims Reeves, as only Mr. Sims Reeves can give it, that is to say, with an expression and a charm which entrance the listener, and prevent him from ever tiring, however often he may hear this beautiful composition. An almost equally vivid impression was produced by this accomplished artist in Balfe's new ballad, "Fresh as a rose," which pleased the audience so much that they attempted to procure an encore. But they counted without their tenor, who respectfully but firmly refused to comply with their wishes. The only other occasion on which they were guilty of the same offence during the evening was at the conclusion of "Ah, si ben mio," when Signor Giuglini, who had sung with delicious freshness and true feeling, pursued the same course as his distinguished English confrère. This is the only plan for putting down the encore nuisance. We are far from desiring that an audience should be cold and apathetic, as, by the way, the audience last night were to a greater or less degree. Let them applaud by all means, for applause spurs an artist on to fresh exertions, and the absence of it freezes his enthusiasm. But when they have applauded to their heart's content, let them stop. Do not let them encore a singer, for if they do they ought, to be consistent, to encore a favourite actor when he does anything unusually good. Fancy their encoring Macready in the murder scene of Macbeth, or the tent scene in King Lear, or insisting that M. Fechter should repeat the soliloquy in Hamlet. I have no doubt that a British audience would scout the idea as preposterous, and boldly assert that no person would ever think of such a thing. But with all due deference I beg to state the contrary. I myself was present at the Théâtre Français, when the audience — supposed to be the best educated and most intelligent audience in Paris — actually encored Beauvallet in a long tirade in one of Corneille's plays (I think it was Polyeucte), and, what is more, Beauvallet gratified their wish — and, perhaps, his own vanity at the same time. But, apart from all other considerations, it strikes me that the system of encores is a mean plan for obtaining more for the money than the money's worth. Whenever I see a person encoring with might and main, I always think of certain individuals who have a knack, when they stop at a fruiterer's to lay out sixpence in oranges, of eating about twopennyworth of nuts or gooseberries, or any other "such small deer," as may happen to be within their reach, while the fruiterer is putting into a bag the fruit they really pay for. Let but every singer resolutely discountenance encores, and they will soon be quietly entombed among the things of the past. But to resume. Signor Giuglini was as successful in his second song, "M'appari," as he was in his first. Mlle. Titiens made a great hit in the scena from Oberon, which scena, by the way, she gave in the German translation, though why she did so I cannot say, considering that it may, as a rule, safely be asserted an English audience is rather better acquainted with English than with German; that Oberon was originally written by Mr. Planché, in the language that well-known author generally employs for the English stage — although he sometimes indulges in a playful outburst of French in the case of "drawing-room entertainments;" — and that the eminent German prima donna pronounces the language in question with remarkable correctness and distinctness. Perhaps Mlle. Titiens was already acquainted with the German words, but surely that was no reason why she should not learn the English ones, if only to observe the distinction between the translation and the original, just as, reversing the order of things — as Mrs. Bouncer was accustomed to do with regard to the head and foot of the bed, when she made it in the afternoon for Mr. Box, after making it in the morning for Mr. Cox — English students of German turn from

"To be or not to be, that is the question," as written by Shakspeare, to Schlegel's version, which runs thus: —

"Sein oder nicht sein, das ist jetzt die Frage;"

or from

"When shall we three meet again:
In thunder, lightning, or in rain?"

to Schiller's rendering: —

"Wann kommen wir drei uns wieder entgegen?
In Donner, in Blitzen, oder in Regen?"

As, however, all my speculations as to Mlle. Titiens' motives for choosing on this occasion to sing in her native idiom, would probably lead to nothing, except, perchance, to a sharp letter from the editor of the MUSICAL WORLD, requesting me to confine myself in future more to essentials, I will at once proceed to inform my readers that Mlle. Titiens made another hit in the cavatina, "Com' è bello," which she did sing in the original, although Lucrezia Borgia is a highly popular opera in Fatherland, and has been done into very choice Ger— ; but I forget—the subject is tabooed. Mad. Sainton-Dolby was grand in "Parmi les fleurs," and charming in the serenade and ballad. The concerted pieces were all excellently sung. Mr. Pratten gave great satisfaction by his fantasia on the flute; and, indeed, the Hereford audience would be hard to please had this not been the case; and Mr. Trust played the harp accompaniments, especially the accompaniment in the quartet, with wonderful delicacy and exquisite feeling, one, of course, presupposing the other.

At half-past eleven this morning the performance of Spöhr's oratorio, The Last Judgment, commenced in the cathedral. The various parts were distributed as follows: —

PART 1. — Overture; Chorus, "Praise his awful name;" Air (Mad. Weiss), "Mighty he cometh to judgment;" Air (Mr. Weiss), "Fear thee not, O man;" Chorus, "Praise his awful name;" Air (Mr. Weiss), "I know thy works;" Chorus, "Praise his awful name;" Solo (Mr. Weiss), "Come up hither;" Recit. and Solo (Mr. Montem Smith, and Chorus), "Holy, holy;" Recit. (Mad. Weiss), "Behold the lamb;" Solo (Mr. Montem Smith), "Weep no more;" Recit. and Air (Mad. Weiss), "All glory to the Lamb that died;" Recit. and Air (Mr. Montem Smith, and Chorus), "Blessing, honour, glory, and power;" Recit. (Mr. Montem Smith), "And lo! a mighty host;" Solo (Miss Susan Pyne), "These who passed through heavy tribulation;" Quartet (Mad. Weiss, Miss Susan Pyne, Mr. Montem Smith, and Mr. Weiss), "Yes, every tear;" Chorus, "Lord God of heaven and earth."

PART 2. — Symphony; Solo (Mr. Weiss), "Thus saith the Lord;" Duet (Mad. Weiss and Mr. Montem Smith), "Forsake me not;" Chorus, "If with your whole hearts;" Solo (Mr Montem Smith), "Johovah now cometh;" Chorus, "Destroyed is Babylon;" Solo (Mr. Montem Smith), "It is ended;" Quartett (Mad. Weiss, Miss Susan Pyne, Mr. Montem Smith, and Mr. Weiss), "Blest are the departed;" Solo (Miss Susan Pyne), "I saw a new heaven;" Solo (Mr. Montem Smith), "Behold he soon shall come;" Quartett (Mad. Weiss, Miss Susan Pyne, Mr. Montem Smith, and Mr. Weiss), "Then come, Lord Jesus;" Grand Chorus, "Great and wonderful."

Everything went well from beginning to end. Mr. Weiss had another opportunity for displaying the powers of his fine, genuine bass voice, and did so with artistic conscientiousness. Mr. Montem Smith was entitled to high praise. He shone with more than ordinary brilliancy, and produced a marked impression. Mrs. Weiss, too, was excellent, more especially in the duet, "Forsake me not," with the gentleman just mentioned. The contralto music found an able executant in Miss Susan Pyne. The chorus and band were fully up to the mark.

After Spöhr's work came Samson, thus cast: —

Overture; Recit. (Mr. Sims Reeves), "This day a solemn feast;" Chorus, "Awake! the trumpets;" Air (Miss Louisa Pyne), "Ye men of Gaza;" Chorus, "Awake! the trumpets;" Recit. (Mr. Sims Reeves), "Why by an angel;" Recit. (Mad. Sainton-Dolby and Mr. Sims Reeves), "Matchless in night;" Air (Mr. Sims Reeves), "Total Eclipse;" Chorus, "O first created beam;" Recit. (Mr. Winn), "Brethren and men of Dan;" Recit. and Air (Mr. Winn), "Thy glorious deeds;" Recit. and Air (Mr. Sims Reeves), "Justly these evils," "Why does the God of Israel sleep?" Chorus, "Then shall they know;" Recit. (Mr. Winn and Mr. Sims Reeves), "For thee, my dearest son;" Chorus, "Then round about the starry throne;" Recit. (Mr. Sims Reeves), "My evils hopeless are;" Recit. and Air (Mad. Sainton-Dolby), "Return O God of hosts;" Chorus, "To dust his glory;" Recit (Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Weiss), "No words of peace;" Air (Mr. Weiss), "Honour and arms;" Recit. and Duet (Mr. Sims Reeves and Mr. Weiss), "Go, baffled coward;" Recit. (Mad. Sainton-Dolby), "Here lies the proof;" Chorus, "Hear Jacob's God;" Recit. (Mr. Weiss), "Dagon, arise;" Chorus, "To song and dance;" Double Chorus, "Fix'd in his everlasting seat;" Recit. (Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Weiss), "More trouble is behind;" Air (Mr. Weiss), "Presuming slave;" Recit. (Mad. Sainton-Dolby and Mr. Sims Reeves), "Consider Samson;" Chorus, "With thunder armed;" Recit. (Mr. Sims Reeves, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, and Mad. Weiss), "Be of good courage;" Air (Mr. Sims Reeves), "Thus when the sun;" Recit. and Air (Mad. Sainton-Dolby and Chorus), "The holy One of Israel;" Recit. (Mad. Sainton-Dolby and Mr. Winn), "Old Manoah with youthful steps;" Chorus, "Great Dagon;" Recit. (Mr. Winn and Mad. Sainton Dolby), "What noise of joy;" Air (Mr. Winn), "How willing my paternal love;" Recit. (Mad. Sainton-Dolby and Mr. Winn), "Your hopes of his deliv'ry;" Chorus, "Hear us our God;" Recit. (Mr. Barnby, Mr. Winn, and Mad. Sainton-Dolby), "Where shall I run?" Air (Mad. Sainton-Dolby), "Ye sons of Israel;" Chorus, "Weep, Israel, weep;" Dead March; Recit. (Mr. Winn), "Come, no time for lamentation now;" Air (Miss Louisa Pyne), "Let the bright seraphim;" Trumpet obbligato (Mr. T. Harper); Chorus, "Let their celestial concerts."

Although a vast number of pieces were cut out, two such works as the above were too long for a single performance. "Enough is as good as a feast," should be borne in mind by the Managing Committees of our provincial Festivals. However, what is done cannot be undone; and therefore I will say no more on this head, but proceed to make a few, and only a few, observations concerning the performance itself. Mr. Sims Reeves was in splendid voice, and never sang better. He was particularly grand and impressive in the air, "Total eclipse." Miss Louisa Pyne, as will be seen by the programme, sang the whole of the soprano music, in a manner that caused me to regret that she is heard so seldom in works of a sacred character. The other artists exerted themselves to the utmost, and the band and chorus were well up to their work.

Among the members of the beau monde present were: The Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of the Diocess and Mrs. Hampden and party; the Very Rev. the Dean, Mrs. Dawes, and Miss Guthrie; Lord and Lady Bateman, the Venerable Archdeacon Freer, Mrs. Lane Freer, and party; Lady Emily Foley, Lady Rouse Boughton, Lord William Graham, M.P., Hon. Captain Hanbury, M.P., Mr. W. H. F. Mildmay, M.P., and Mrs. Mildmay, Sir W. Curtis, Sir W. Milman, Sir Thomas and Lady Hastings, Mr. Beriah Botfield, M.P., and Mrs. Botfield, Lady Boughton, Mr. and Mrs. Boughton Knight, Mrs. Arkwright (Hampton Court), Mr. Arkwright, the Mayor of Hereford, Mr. T. Cam, Mr. Tomkyns Dew, Mr. C. T. Bodenham and Mrs. Bodenham, Rev. Thomas Powell, Rev. E. B. and Mrs. Hawkshaw, Rev. W. E. Evans, Rev. Canon and Mrs. Musgrave, Rev. Canon and Mrs. Huntingford, Mr. and Mrs. Delabarre Bodenham, Rev. John Hopton, Rev. Berkeley Stanhope, Rev. W. Poole, Rev. T. H. Bird, Lieutenant Money Kyrle, Mr. Wegg Prosser, Mr. Chandos Wren Hoskyns, the Rev. W. and Mrs. Newton, the Rev. Beresford Lowther, Mr. and Mrs. Evans (Sufton Court), the Rev. E. R. Hampden, Mr. S. Allaway, Mr. and Miss Hopton (Bishop's Frome), Mr. Richard Hereford, the Hon. and Rev. George Herbert, the Countess of Powis, Mr. King, M.P., and the Misses King, the Rev. Archer Clive, Mrs. Clive, and party; the Rev. W. P. Hopton, Mr. J. M. Herbert, &c.

Thursday, Sept. 12.

The second concert, yesterday evening, at the Shire Hall, went off very well, although there were not so many persons present as on Tuesday evening. This is to be accounted for, in a great measure, perhaps, by the fact that there were no five shilling seats, as at the first concert. Admission could not be procured for less than half a guinea, a large sum for many persons. The following was the programme:—

PART I.—Overture (Anacreon) Cherubini.—SELECTION FROM MOZART.—Duetto, "La dove prendi" (Il Flauto Magico), Mad. and Mr. Weiss. Aria, "O cara imagine" (Il Flauto Magico), Mr. Sims Reeves. Aria, "Non mi dir" (Il Don Giovanni), Mlle. Tietiens. Duetto, "Su l' aria" (Le Nozze di Figaro), the Misses Pyne. Aria, "Il mio tesoro" (Il Don Giovanni), Signor Giuglini. Recitative et Aria, "Non piu di fiori" (La Clemenza di Tito), Mad. Weiss. Corno di Bassetto Obbligato, Mr. Lazarus.

Fantasia Violin, "La ci darem," with variations, Mr. H. Blagrove (H. Blagrove). Aria, "In questa tomba," Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Beethoven. Song, "Shadow Song" (Dinorah), Miss Louisa Pyne, Meyerbeer. Ballad, "Happy Days," Mr. Sims Reeves, H. S. Oakeley. Solo with Chorus, "My task is ended" (Enchantress), Mad. Weiss, Balfe.

PART II.—Symphony, Italian, Mendelssohn. Song, "The Village Blacksmith," Mr. Weiss (Weiss). Aria, "Spirto Gentil" (La Favorita), Signor Giuglini, Donizetti. Aria, "Casta Diva" (Norma), Mlle. Tietiens, Bellini. Song, "Come, if you dare" (King Arthur), Mr. Sims Reeves and Chorus, Purcell. Ballads, "Rest," "A Hawking Song," Mad. Sainton-Dolby, V. Gabriel. Duetto, "Egli m'odia" (Lucia di Lammermoor), Mlle. Tietiens and Signor Giuglini, Donizetti. Song, "The power of love" (Satanella), Miss Louisa Pyne, Balfe. Trio, "Vadasi via di qua," Mlle. Tietiens, Mad. Sainton-Dolby and Signor Giuglini, Martini. Wedding March (Midsummer Night's Dream) Mendelssohn.

The selection was much better than is usually the case at miscellaneous concerts, and afforded the greatest satisfaction. The overture was admirably played, and the same remark applies to Mendelssohn's lovely symphony, and also to his "Wedding March." Mr. Sims Reeves, of course, made a hit in "Come, if you dare," which, as everyone is well aware, he gives with such fire and spirit. The audience were in ecstacies. Mr. Oakley's new ballad, also sung by the same accomplished artist, was highly appreciated. Miss Pyne won golden opinions by her rendering of the "Shadow song," from Dinorah, and Balfe's popular air, the "Power of Love." How she sang both I need not say. Mads. Weiss, Sainton-Dolby, Mlle. Titiens, Signor Giuglini, and Mr. Weiss contributed their share towards the enjoyment of the audience. I must not conclude without awarding its meed of well-merited praise to Mr. Blagrove for his performance of the variations on "La ci darem," nor pass over in silence the artistic excellence with which Mr. Lazarus executed the obbligato accompaniment to the aria, "Non piu di fiori." Both were first-rate.

The following was the programme of this morning's performance at the Cathedral:—

"SPRING," from the Seasons—Haydn. Overture. Recit. (Mad. Weiss, Mr. Montem Smith, and Mr. Weiss), "Behold, where surly winter flies." Chorus, "Come, gentle spring." Recit. and air (Mr. Weiss), "With joy the impatient husbandman." Recit. (Mr. Montem Smith), "Man's grateful task is now complete." Trio (Mad. Weiss, Mr. Montem Smith, and Mr. Weiss), "O be gracious Heaven, all bounteous." Recit. (Mad. Weiss), "Our fervent prayers are heard." Duet chorus (Mad. Weiss and Mr. Montem Smith), "O what varied forms of beauty." Chorus, "Marvellous, Lord, are thy works."

"THE REQUIEM"—Mozart. Chorus, "Requiem Æternam." Solo (Mlle. Titiens), "Te decet hymnus." Chorus, "Exaudi orationem meam." Chorus, "Kyrie Eleison." Chorus. "Dies Iræ." Quartet (Mlle. Titiens, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Signor Giuglini, and Mr. Winn), "Tuba mirum spargens sonum." Chorus, "Rex tremendæ majestatis." Quartet, "Recordare Jesu pie." Chorus, "Confutatis maledictis." Chorus with soli, "Domine Jesu Christe." Chorus, "Sanctus." Quartet (Mlle. Tietiens, Mad. Sainton Dolby, Signor Giuglini, and Mr. Winn), "Benedictus." Chorus, "Agnus Dei." Solo (Mlle. Tietjens), "Lux Æterna." Chorus, "Cum Sanctis."

"Hymn of Praise" (Mendelssohn). Introduction:—First movement, Maestoso con moto; Second movement, Allegro maestoso; Third movement, Allegretto poco agitato. Fourth movement, Adagio religioso. Chorus, "All men, all things." Solo (Miss Louisa Pyne and Chorus), "Praise thou the Lord." Recit. and Air (Mr. Sims Reeves), "He counteth all your sorrows." Chorus, "All ye that cried." Duet (Miss Louisa Pyne and Miss Susan Pyne), "I waited for the Lord, and." Chorus, "O blessed are they that hope." Air (Mr. Sims Reeves), "The sorrows of death." Recit. (Mr. Sims Reeves and Miss Louisa Pyne), "We called." Chorus, "The night is departing." Chorale, "Let all men praise the Lord." Chorus, "Glory and praise." Duet (Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. Sims Reeves), "My song shall be always." Chorus, "Ye nations."

In order to save the post, I must content myself with merely recording that the performance was highly successful. I will go into detail in the next number of the MUSICAL WORLD. I must remark, however, that this has been the best day, in a pecuniary sense, during the festival. There were no less than 1,240 persons present, and the collection for the charity amounted to 220*l.* 7*s.* 5*d.*, being 50*l.* more than was collected on the third day of the last festival. The weather is magnificent and every one is delighted.

By the way, there is a typographical error in my last letter from Birmingham. It is not of much consequence, perhaps, but it may as well be corrected. At page 567 of the MUSICAL WORLD, first column, 15 lines from the bottom, I am made to observe: "I am not aware who planned it"—the "request," namely, on which I was commenting: I wrote "penned."

MANAGERS AND MUSIC HALLS.

But the second grievance—which these gentlemen are now endeavouring to assert—the grievance which practically declares that they object to all dramatic competition, out of their own especial circle, is so preposterous in itself, and is so utterly opposed to the public spirit of the time, that we reject all belief in it, on grounds of the plainest common sense. The great social law of this age and this nation, is the law of competition. Why are managers of theatres not to submit to it, as well as other people? Some of these gentlemen, in all probability, occasionally see a penny daily paper. What would they have thought, if the proprietors of the Times, of the Daily News, and of the other morning journals previously established, and selling at a higher price, had all met together, on the starting of penny papers, and had claimed protection from the public authorities, on the ground that cheap competition in the matter of purveying daily intelligence was an attack on their personal interests? Why, the very pastry-cooks, who once had the monopoly of sixpenny ices, knew better than to make a public outcry on the establishment of the penny ice-shops! Nay, the predecessors of the managers themselves, not only recognised but asserted the privilege of free competition in a free country. Whose voices were raised loudest against dramatic monopoly, in the time of the two patent theatres? The voices of the proprietors of minor theatres, who then occupied a position which the music-halls now occupy towards all the theatres in London. Here is the elder generation of managers shouting, on one side, for Free Trade—and there is the younger generation petitioning on the other, for Protection! Was there ever such an anomaly? Who is to justify or explain it?

If there had been no other and better reason to restrain the managers from coming forward to assert an obsolete protectionist principle (under cover of asserting a strict interpretation of the law), surely the consideration of mere expediency might well have hindered them. We know that these gentlemen are acting on a strong conviction, however lamentably mistaken they may be. But the public has no time to draw fine distinctions; what will the public think of the attempted suppression of the pantomimic entertainment in Canterbury Hall, at the suit of the London managers? Will it not be said, "Here are several eminent gentlemen, occupying the highest places in their profession, and administering the resources of our greatest theatrical establishments, all incomprehensibly jealous of the performances of a tavern concert-room!" Such an imputation would, no doubt, be justly repudiated by the managers. But what plain inference is the world outside the green-room to draw from facts as they stand at present? Perhaps there is one other legitimate conclusion, which has certainly occurred to ourselves, and which the report of the trial in the newspaper may justify. When we saw the deservedly respected name of Mr. Benjamin Webster—who has done more (at the new Adelphi Theatre) to promote the public convenience than any other manager of his time—set up as the name of the plaintiff in a case which had for its ultimate object an interference with the public amusement, we certainly did consider that the spectacle of the wrong man in the wrong place had been somewhat inconsiderately offered to popular contemplation. And, let it be added, we were only the more confirmed in this view, when we remembered that the manager who had been selected to express, on behalf of his brethren, a deep-seated distrust of the rivalry of music-halls, was also the very manager whose theatre has been literally besieged by the public for the last hundred and fifty nights, and is likely to be besieged in the future for a hundred and fifty more. Surely it was a grave error to choose such a prosperous proprietor as Mr. Webster—a man who has shown a determination to advance with the time—to point the protectionist moral and adorn the managerial tale!

To speak seriously, in conclusion, the managers have taken a false step. They have placed themselves in a persecuting as well as a prosecuting position; and they are most unwisely attempting to dispute a principle which the public opinion of the age has long since regarded as settled. We earnestly recommend them to reconsider their course of action—in their own interests. The hostile point of view from which they now regard the music-halls is short-sighted in the extreme. To return to our previous illustration. It is notorious that the cheap newspapers, instead of disputing the public encouragement with the newspapers at a higher price, have raised up an audience for themselves. It is notorious that the library circulation of good novels has rather increased than diminished, since the time when opposition novels have stirred the waters in the world of fiction, by pouring regularly from the press in cheap instalments at a penny a week. On the same principle the music-halls have unquestionably raised up their new public; and, in doing so, will indirectly help to improve the prospects of the theatres, by increasing the number of people who look to public amusements as the occupation of their evening. If the managers don't see this—if they don't see that a percentage of the music-hall audience (not a very large one probably, but still a per-centage) is, in the ordinary course of things, certain to drift into theatres from a natural human love of change—they must at least admit that they already possess, in undisturbed monopoly, immense dramatic advantages over those other caterers for the public amusement, who are following them at a respectful distance. They have the use of stage means and appliances which no music-hall can possibly command, without being knocked down and built up again for the purpose. They have actors and actresses who stand, in a personal as well as in a pecuniary sense, out of music-hall reach. They have relations with English literature which no music-hall possesses, or dreams of possessing; and they have a refined, intelligent, and wealthy public to appeal to, from which the music-halls are separated by the great social gulf which we all know there is no crossing. Here, without prosecutions, disputes, and vexatiously strict interpretations of the letter of the law, is vantage-ground enough for any theatre which is properly administered; vantage-ground which the fiercest music-hall rivalry cannot cut away.

As for the public interest in this question, the discussion of which we have modestly left to the last, the direction that it takes is so obvious as hardly to need pointing out. The more competition there is, the more certainly the public will be the gainers. Let the spur of the music-halls—if any such spur there be—stimulate the theatres to higher and higher exertions by all manner of means; the drama will be the better for it; the actors will study their art the more for it; the audiences will be the larger for it; the managers will be the richer for it. The success of "The Colleen Bawn," at the Adelphi; the success of that excellent artist, Mr. Fechter, at the Princess's; and the success of the admirable pantomime at Drury Lane; all three achieved in the same theatrical year, are facts to form an opinion on; facts which justify the conclusion that a great dramatic attraction is as much above all small rivalries in our day, as ever it was in that golden theatrical age when music-halls were not heard of in the land! We trust the managers may yet be induced to reconsider the motives on which they have too hastily acted. We trust they may yet see that it is their interest, as we are sure it is always their inclination, to follow the old proverbial rule which enjoins us all to "live and let live."

DE OMNIBUS REBUS ET QUIBUSDAM ALIIS.—(From the Brighton Gazette.)—The Birmingham Festival was brought to a successful issue on Friday evening last, by a spirited performance of Judas Maccabæus. The ultimate financial results of the festival are in the highest degree satisfactory. The gross amount received exceeds the proceeds of the preceding triennial meeting by 458*l.* What the clear profit to be handed over to the local hospital will be cannot, of course, as yet be accurately known. In the face of the above fact, however, we may safely premise that it will be a very handsome sum. If we, of Brighton, had the energy and determination exhibited by the Brummegans, there can be no question that our noble County Hospital would reap very considerable benefit from it. But, assuming this to be the case, where is your music-hall? Verily, that is important! and it is to be hoped that a few years will suffice to provide a music-hall worthy of the town, and to set in motion the energies which would not fail to fill it at our triennial festival. One pleasing feature in the late event we feel great pleasure in noticing, as we regard it as a consummation devoutly to be wished: we allude to the explanatory and critical remarks inserted in the programmes. Mr. Macfarren, we hear introduced this plan into England, and we tender him our best thanks for it. It is a reproach to our music-loving population at home, that they are so little acquainted with the historical branch of art. If not absolutely indispensable to a just and proper appreciation of a work of art, a knowledge of the circumstances under which it emanated from the "airy web" of its originator's fancy cannot but be of essential service to us in forming our estimate of its peculiar beauties and character. The more we penetrate into the mysteries of art, the greater will be our delectation; just as a connoisseur derives greater pleasure than the uninitiated in the contemplation of a beautiful painting or a group of statuary. A printed programme of a concert recently given in Portland (U.S.) reminds us that this plan has already been adopted in America. The giver of the concert, and writer of the prefatory remarks in the programme, was Mr. John K. Paine, a gentleman who recently paid Brighton a visit, on his way from Germany (where he studied) to America. It is a pity he could not give the Brighton public an opportunity of hearing him play, for we have no hesitation in predicting, judging from what we heard at frequent exhibitions of his skill, that he will some day rank among the greatest organ players that ever lived.—Death has again been busy in the ranks of musical notabilities. It is Vincent Novello whose loss we have this week to deplore. There is not—nor perhaps ever was—an individual who has done such good service to the cause of art as the lamented deceased. It is to his enterprise and tact that we are indebted for nearly the whole of the sterling musical works which adorn our shelves. And if he had done no other service beyond this—placing the immortal works of Handel in every one's hands—he would be entitled to the unqualified gratitude of all lovers of art, and have succeeded in engrafting his name upon the roll of undying fame. He died, at Nice, on the 9th August, aged 80 years. Requiescat in pace!—JOHN TOWERS.

The Musical World.

LONDON: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1861.

EVERY one remembers the contest for possession of the musical chair at Edinburgh a few years since — how Sterndale Bennett, Henry Hugh Peirson, and some others of less note, were among the combatants, and how Professor Donaldson prevailed against all of them, and, without much elbowing, walked into a place he was, at that time, thought but slenderly qualified to fill. The professor's battles, however, by no means ended with his election. His academic throne was anything but a bed of roses. Nominally, indeed, he held a professorship as amply endowed for all purposes of experiment and demonstration as the most enthusiastic lecturer could desire; while, in fact, he had to fight against all the grievous panoply of law for every square foot of ground he stood on, and every shilling he wished to appropriate.

Poor General Reid little thought what a worse than Armstrong shell he was about to drop into the academic groves of Edinburgh when, by his last will and testament, he bequeathed sundry large sums for the foundation of a musical professorship, and its endowment with largely ample means for its effectual working. Of course nothing could be clearer than the intention of the will; and so Professor Donaldson contended. On the other hand, the Senatus Academicus, with a not unusual leaning, thought that so much hard cash were far better spent on Greek and Latin than on crotchets and quavers, and that General Reid must have meant the former, though he said the latter. Hence the war. For years, as usual, wigs and gowns divided all the spoil of the fray; but finally Dr. Donaldson once more prevailed against his foes and overthrew them. Bit by bit he plucked the General's bequest out of the grasp of the Philistines, until, at length, he stands, the solitary specimen in this kingdom (and in not the most reputedly musical part of the kingdom either) of a university professor of music, provided with an ample stipend, with a spacious lecture-hall exclusively his own, and with surplus funds sufficient for any experimental research he may choose to undertake. It is not our purpose again to raise a question as to what is likely to be taught under such favourable circumstances. It may be that Professor Donaldson's curriculum embraces more of what mathematicians call the science of harmonics than of what musicians mean by the art of music. It is not unreasonably urged that, however interesting it be to verify the calculation, that a string thirty-two feet in length must needs make sixteen vibrations per second, the absolute certainty remains that Beethoven might have written his ninth symphony without being aware of the fact in question. This and similar demonstrations, it may be said, are simply classable as among the materia musica, and as having no more influence to teach a man composition than would a discourse on the phenomena of the solar spectrum in raising up another Turner or Stanfield. However, all this by the way. We shall never know exactly what General Reid meant in founding the Edinburgh chair of music, or how far the teaching of either mixed mathematics or pure music, lay uppermost in his intention. The whole question is committed to Professor Donaldson's charge, and he must deal with it to the best of his judgment. Meanwhile, whatever be his views on this important matter, the zeal and energy with which he carries them out admit of no question; and, if it may be regretted that as yet no public opportunities are devised for correcting and elevating the musical taste of his countrymen, the skill with which he constructs apparatus for his physical demonstrations, and his dexterity in turning it to account, are still sufficient to entitle him to all commendation.

The Professor's latest exploit has been rescuing an additional sum of 2000*l.* from the hands of the lawyers, and with it procuring a very fine organ, which has just been erected in the University music-room. This instrument was constructed by the Messrs. Hill, and is in every way worthy of their great reputation. A list of its contents is subjoined :—

GREAT ORGAN, CC TO G.	Feet.
1. Double Diapason	16
2. Open Diapason	8
3. Gamba	8
4. Stopt Diapason	8
5. Octave	4
6. Harmonic Flute	4
7. Twelfth	3
8. Fifteenth	2
9. Mixture, 4 ranks	1½
10. Posaune	8
11. Clarion	4

CHOIR ORGAN, CC TO G.
1. Dulciana	8
2. Wood Open Diapason ...	8
3. Stopt Diapason	8
4. Gemshorn	4
5. Suabe Flute	4
6. Piccolo	2
7. Cor Anglais	16
8. Cromone	8

SWELL ORGAN, CC TO G.
1. Bourdon	16
2. Open Diapason	8
3. Dulciana	8
4. Stopt Diapason	8
5. Octave	4
6. Fifteenth	2
7. Gedact Flute	4
8. Mixture, 2 Ranks	1½
9. Horn	8
10. Oboe	8
11. Clarion	4

PEDAL ORGAN, CCC TO F.
1. Sub Bass	32
2. Violone, metal	16
3. Open wood	16
4. Violone, wood	8
5. Trombone	16

SOLO ORGAN, CC TO G.

1. Harmonic mixture, 14 ranks.
2. Spare slide.
3. Do.
4. Do.
5. Do.

COUPLERS.

1. Swell to Great.
2. Choir to do.
3. Great to Pedal.
4. Choir to do.
5. Swell to do.

5. Composition Pedals.

Pneumatic action to Great Organ, and draw stops.

5-PART ORGAN CONTAINS—

Bass, Stopt Diapason; Tenor, Gamba; Alto, Keraulophon; 1st Treble, Dulciana; 2nd Treble, Flute.

Number of Pipes, 2580; do. of Stops, 40; do. of Couplers, 5; do. of Composition Pedals, 5.

On this plan we need only remark that it represents an organ, not, indeed, of first-class magnitude, but remarkably complete, well balanced, and effective. The four "spare slides" of the solo organ are to be fitted up as Professor Donaldson may suggest,—he, it appears, not having yet determined what stops may be most advantageously employed.

Of the single stop at present on the solo manual we shall have occasion presently to speak.

When we say that in the course of the work neither expense nor trouble has been spared; that more than usual care has governed the selection of materials (the metal pipes, for example, are throughout formed of what is termed "spot-metal," i. e. half tin and half lead); and that in finishing the instrument, the builders have quite equalled the best of their known achievements, our readers will easily be persuaded that the Messrs. Hill, in providing the Scottish metropolis with an organ of which it may reasonably boast, have added another feather to their cap, already plumed by so many successes. But though everybody knows what the tone of a Hill organ—when cared for as in this instance—is sure to be, there are many points in the planning and construction of the Edinburgh instrument so far out of the usual course as to require a little special description.

It is one of the peculiarities of the whole affair that no organist is appointed to the College Music Hall, nor is any such appointment likely to be made. Professor Donaldson is understood to have no pretensions as a player—nor, indeed, is this any part of his office; so that the organ can never be properly heard except by the special engagement of some eminent performer. It is wanted, indeed, rather as a part of the professor's demonstrative apparatus, than as an addition to the musical resources of the place. It is, in fact, intended for exhibition quite as much to the eye as to the ear. To this end, every part must necessarily be in view, and easily accessible for the closest inspection. Hence comes the first peculiarity of the Edinburgh organ; it has absolutely no case or covering of any kind.

The performer can, while sitting at the keys, see every pipe in the organ, and watch the progress of every tracker and draw-stop-rod he puts in motion. All this, while very convenient to such as are curious about the insides of things, necessarily puts the builder on his mettle in a novel direction. He may no longer be content with that sort of unplaned savagery which merely does its work without accident. His materials must be thrown into shapes pleasing to the eye; their proportions and positions must secure stability while least encroaching on space; where motion is to be transmitted from point to point, its directness and simplicity must satisfy the critical mechanic; and over all must be spread that aspect of external finish which is everywhere recognised as an attribute of good workmanship. We do not say that on these points the Edinburgh organ rivals Cavaillée's beautiful work at the Madeleine—no price indeed yet paid to an English builder would permit this; but without going thus far, the Messrs. Hill have, in this instance, certainly satisfied all the demands of the occasion. As one out of many specimens, we may refer to the admirable construction of the frame-work of the organ. Its main parts are of quite adequate strength, without the slightest appearance of clumsiness. Every portion is disposed so as to yield its support where most needed, yet without either obstructing a view of the interior, or rendering any part difficult of access for adjustment. It is made of deal, singularly free from blemishes of any kind; the angles of all the posts are tastefully "chamfered" off, and the whole is delicately stained, so as to tone down the raw surface of the material without concealing its excellent quality. Similar examples of care—some of which we have yet to notice—are traceable throughout the execution of the instrument. But we must stop here, to resume on an early occasion.

IF any one be desirous to ascertain in what low estimation music is held by some theatrical managers, let him go to the Surrey Theatre and see the new operetta now being performed there every night. Nobody can accuse Messrs. Creswick and Shepherd, the shrewd and enterprising managers, of a want of liberality in their own immediate administration. Good actors themselves, they are careful that the pieces produced under their superintendence shall be well and efficiently represented. If all who labour with them are not first-class artists, they are, at all events, well trained, and possess experience and knowledge. Nothing, in short, is brought out at the Surrey Theatre which could shock and offend by incompetent performance. The company is a good working one, and every man and woman has his proper place and is set his proper duty to perform. This happens because Mr. Creswick and Mr. Shepherd are thoroughly au fait to everything connected with the drama. It would touch them keenly if they thought the meanest of the dramatis personæ had turned the play in which they were performing into ridicule. Knowledge brings sensitiveness; and, could they help it, they would no more allow one of their supernumeraries to be laughed at than they would themselves. With them it is as requisite that a messenger should deliver his line correctly as the tragedian his soliloquy, and by this manner of putting a drama on the stage, success is almost invariably ensured, even for a production of very questionable merit.

From the drama let us turn to opera. Messrs. Creswick and Shepherd, who know so much about dramatic matters, know nothing whatsoever of music. They are not ignorant indeed that operatic performances have been of vast benefit to the treasury of the Surrey Theatre for years past, previous to their joint management—and during it, if we mistake not—and are naturally anxious to make money, even though their own eminent talents may be somewhat obnubilated in the process. Of course, if opera prevail the drama must needs succumb; if the prima donna and first tenor are the rage, the famous tragedian and famous comedian must hide their diminished heads. It was a sublime idea to combine opera and drama together. Messrs. Creswick and Shepherd conceived that they still might make money by music without putting their own transcendent abilities under a bushel. But the junction of the two great branches of the art on an enlarged scale necessitated economy. This, of course, required consideration. We can readily understand the extreme cogitations and agitations, weighings, misgivings, and suggestions of the co-managers when this momentous question was started. "What's to be done?" "I have it," exclaimed one of the partners; "let us dispense with an orchestra!" "That can hardly be," responded the other, "but we can cut them down to nothing." Upon this hint they acted. The band was cut down to nothing, and if anybody doubt it let him pay a visit to the Surrey Theatre, and listen to the instrumental force under the direction of Mr. Isaacson. If ever, in any part of the universe where opera is given, anything so atrociously bad was ever heard, we will allow ourselves to be "chopped into messes." Nothing, in fact, but their unmistakable ignorance can palliate the conduct of the Surrey managers in this respect—not only absolute ignorance of music as an abstract art or a means of providing recreation, but ignorance of the commonest results of musical performances; ignorance of the reasons, very obvious reasons, why one set of entertainments should invariably succeed and another invariably fail. It only proves, indeed, that men out of their immediate calling are seldom capable of forming any opinion whatsoever, and when that is the case, mistake or error is sure to be the consequence. In all probability Messrs. Creswick and Shepherd considered that as long as the vocalists were tolerable the band did not so much matter; that one or two violins were as good as a dozen; that violoncellos might be very well spared; that bassoons were unsightly in an orchestra; and that a strong drum and triangle well beaten kept admirable time. In vain did the conductor—Mr. Isaacson is a conscientious musician — protest, and insist that a band has its separate departments, each of which should have its compliment; that certain instruments were indispensable; that the composer wrote for a full band; that the music would produce no effect, &c. &c. The managers were deaf, or replied, "Why don't you get a good band? We allow a certain sum weekly for that purpose!" "What!" ejaculated the chef d'orchestre, "provide a good band for——" We will not disclose the amount of the sum told to us, since we do not believe we have been rightly informed, nor would any one credit us if we named it. But, if the sum mentioned be really the maximum of the managerial allowance, we can easily understand why the orchestra is so strangely incomplete and inefficient. Could one divest his mind of the gross wrong done to the composer, the performance of the new opera at the Surrey Theatre, accepted as a travestie, could not fail to afford abundant and boisterous merriment. Messrs. Creswick and Shepherd have but to announce the opera as a burlesque. Its success will be immense.

THE analytical notices of important musical works sometimes inserted in the programmes of London Concerts, are so useful and so beneficial in their tendency, that it is to be regretted they are not more frequently met with. To a mixed audience especially they afford a means of thoroughly appreciating, and therefore of more thoroughly enjoying the music performed. They invest the most abstruse compositions with interest by pointing out their salient features, and directing attention to the intentions of the composer during the progress of the performance. With their assistance the casual listener is enabled to trace the plan and form of a quartet or symphony as readily as he would the plot of a stage play. Valuable as are analytical notices by others, they would be infinitely more so were they given by the composers themselves. How interesting and instructive would such a preface be to the works of such illustrious musicians as Mozart, Beethoven, or Mendelssohn! The remarks of Edgar Allan Poe, in his essay upon the "Philosophy of Composition," are almost as applicable to music as to prose or poetry.

"How interesting a paper might be written," he observes, "by any author who would — that is to say, who could, detail, step by step, the processes by which any one of his compositions attained its ultimate point of completion. Why such a paper has never been given to the world, it is difficult to say; but perhaps the autorial vanity has had more to do with the omission than any other cause. Most writers, poets in especial, prefer having it understood that they compose by a species of fine frenzy, an extatic intuition, and would positively shudder at letting the public take a peep behind the scenes, at the vacillating and elaborate crudities of thought; at the true purposes seized only at the last moment; at the innumerable glimpses of idea that arrived not at the maturity of full view; at the fully matured fancies discarded in despair as unmanageable; at the cautious selections and rejections; at the painful erasures and interpolations; in a word, at the wheels and pinions, the tackle for scene shifting, the step-ladders and demon-traps, the cork's feathers, the red paint, and the black patches which in ninety-nine cases out of the hundred constitute the properties of the literary histrio. On the other hand, the case is by no means common in which an author is at all in condition to retrace the steps by which his conclusions have been attained. In general, suggestions having arisen pell-mell, are pursued and forgotten in a similar manner."

It will be urged, perhaps, that such a paper as Edgar Poe here describes, one in which would be detailed the process by which a composition attained its ultimate point of completion, would not be an analytical notice of the nature of those to which allusion has been made; exception may be taken to the imaginings of our composers being designated as cock's feathers, red paint, or black patches; but, allowing that to pass, it must be conceded that such an account of any great work by the author himself would be of greater importance than the minutest examination of the details and construction of the work by the most intelligent critic. Compôsers, it would seem, are less willing, if they be not less able, to define their system of thought by words, than either poets or prose writers. It may be contended that musical composition is so essentially imaginative, as to defy any attempt to describe its origin, or trace its progress satisfactorily. To some it may appear but a vain endeavour to reduce to rule and account materially for that which is too purely subtle in its nature to be submitted to such a process. Whether that be the case or not, it cannot be denied that if an analysis of any work enables an audience to follow the composer more closely in the treatment of his subject, and better to understand the plan of the composition, it thereby fulfils a most important purpose, and proves itself a means of diffusing musical knowledge which should not be neglected.

ANTEATER.

MR. ALFRED MELLON'S CONCERTS.

THE "Volunteer Night" was repeated on Saturday, and again brought together a large gathering of the impromptu sons of valour, who were even more delighted than at the first concert, and more uproarious in their applause. The special attraction of the performance centred in Mad. Florence Lancia, an artist of whose antecedents the readers of the MUSICAL WORLD need hardly be informed. Madame Lancia selected the "war-song" from Signor Verdi's Attila — one of Sophie Cruvelli's most splendid achievements, as the habitués of Her Majesty's Theatre cannot fail to remember — and created a real furor in perhaps the most difficult bravura song of the modern Italian school. A priori, indeed, we should have thought that the "war-song" was only suited to the grand declamatory powers and magnificent means of Mlle. Titiens; but Mad. Lancia's dramatic fire, superior musical intelligence, unusual facility, and fine clear voice carried her through triumphantly. Moreover, if Mad. Lancia did not possess one of the above requisites that constitute a great singer, her exquisitely true intonation would invariably commend her vocal efforts to the ear popular, which is impressed by nothing more forcibly than singing in tune. The encore which followed the "war-song" was too impetuous and persistent to be denied, and the fair artist sang the cabaletta with even increased energy and greater effect. A more decided success could not be achieved, and the performance has been repeated every night during the week.—On Wednesday, in addition to the "war-song"—encored as usual with acclamations — Mad. Lancia introduced the cavatina "Come per sereno" from Sonnambula, and obtained an immense bis, singing the lovely air of Amina with such charm of voice and tenderness of expression as to reach the heart of every hearer. That Mad. Lancia would be heard to greater advantage in Bellini's opera than in Verdi's we feel assured, from this very admirable vocal display; and we expect before long to have the felicity of chronicling her appearance in Sonnambula in one or other of the English operas. Last year in our notices of the operatic performances at the Pavilion Theatre, we predicted Mad. Lancia's success at the West End, when the opportunity would be given her. Thanks to Mr. Alfred Mellon, the opportunity has been offered, and the artist has now asserted her claim to a position in the ranks of art, and has borne us out in the expression of our praise.

Wednesday was devoted to a selection, in the first part, from the modern Italian composers, of which the most agreeable, we need hardly say, was that taken from the Barbiere, five pieces in all, of which the overture pleased most, being encored from all parts of the house. A new singer, Mlle. Vaschetti, advertised as coming from the great theatres of Italy, attempted "Una voce," and sang "Ah! fors è lui" from the Traviata. As she was exceedingly nervous we cannot allude to her performance in any decisive terms. Her voice seems clear and beautiful in the upper tones, but the middle is of indifferent quality, and the intonation not faultless. We shall, no doubt, have to speak of Mdlle. Vaschetti again, when we trust she will be enabled to do her reputation more justice. Herr Formes, who may be denominated the great Armstrong gun of Mr. Mellon's concerts, sang the airs, "La Calumnia" and "Largo al factotum," both magnificently. The latter created a furor, and was redemanded by the whole audience. Herr Formes came forward and bowed, but would not respond further. Mad. Laura Baxter gave Mercandante's air, "Se m'abbandoni" with great beauty of voice; and Mr. George Perren was encored in "Ah! si ben mio" from the Trovatore. In the second part, Mad. Lancia repeated Verdi's "war-song," and added "The last rose of summer," which she sang most delightfully—voice, style, manner and expression, all combining to constitute perfect ballad-singing. Mad. Lancia, we may notice, has one exceedingly rare virtue in a singer. You not only can tell what language she is singing in—which we are sorry to say we cannot do in all our best English songstresses—but you can catch distinctly every word and syllable she utters. In this respect we might commend certain vocal ladies in high places to Mad. Lancia's teaching.

Last night a "Weber night" was given, of which we shall speak next week.

Crystal Palace.—The concert on Saturday was honoured by the appearance of Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini, with whom were Signor Delle-Sedie, Signor Bossio, and Signor Bianchi, the pianist—a very Italian concert. The programme exhibited nothing novel or remarkable. The band played the overtures to Leonora and Les Deux Journées, which, as many thought, were the most acceptable parts of the performance. There was a very large attendance.

On Tuesday the Tonic Sol-fa Association held its second competitive meeting of the evening classes. The nature of this society and the utility of its proceedings have already been commented upon in this journal. The Tonic Sol-fa system cannot supersede the old musical notation, and consequently is a mere delusion of the moment. That, however, the performance of the pupils is entitled to consideration, no one can dispute. The competition was between the "Hull," "Brighton," and "North Staffordshire" choirs,—the "Finsbury" and "Staffordshire Potteries," winners of last year, not being allowed to compete a second time. The trial took place in the concert-room, before Messrs. John Goss, organist of St. Paul's Cathedral; George Hogarth, secretary to the Philharmonic Society; Thomas Oliphant, hon. secretary to the Madrigal Society; and James Turle, organist of Westminster Abbey, who acted as judges. After each chorus had given three pieces, and was each called upon to sing at sight two compositions, with the names of which they were not previously acquainted, one from the old and the other from the new system of notation adopted by the Tonic Sol-fa Association, whilst the judges were considering their decision, the two prize choirs of last year gave a performance in the Handel Orchestra, each giving four compositions. Of these, two, one by each choir, so hit the taste of the audience, that it was not possible to avoid repeating them. These were both comic subjects, the well-known "Call John," and an English version of "Vadasi via di qua." "God save the Queen" was then given by the whole chorus of 1500 voices, after the conclusion of which the judges made their appearance in the front of the orchestra, to pronounce their decision. The first prize of the Crimson Banner and a sum of money was allotted to the Brighton choir; and the second, the Purple Banner, to the North Staffordshire. As the banners were delivered, each body of successful choralists marched along the front of the orchestra, both being greeted with loud applause. The proceedings terminated with a performance of Mozart's "Twelfth Mass," by the united choirs, the solo portions given by a selection of the members of the higher classes. It was a bold attempt, not altogether crowned with success, and one which we hardly think will be repeated in a hurry by the Tonic Sol-fa Association. The performance was accompanied by the great organ and the Crystal Palace band.

Madame Lind-Goldschmidt.—The "Swedish Nightingale" has made arrangements for an autumnal professional tour, during which we understand she will visit Ireland and other parts of the kingdom. Her visit to Liverpool, already announced, is fixed for the 28th and 29th of next month. Having retired with a large competency, some curiosity will naturally arise in the public mind as to the tempting offers made to induce the songstress to emerge from private life. On the occasion of her last visit to Liverpool Madame Goldschmidt was engaged by the Committee of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, who gave her 1000*l.* for her services on two evenings. Some time ago, when rumours were abroad of the intended visit to Ireland of "The Nightingale," communications were opened direct by the same Society with Mr. and Mrs. Goldschmidt, but the offer of 1000*l.* for the services for two evenings was declined. The Committee advanced the offer to 1000 guineas, but that also was declined. A long correspondence subsequently took place, and at length a satisfactory arrangement was made. The report here was that the Committee of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society had given 1200*l.* for the two concerts, but that report was not correct. So far as we can learn, no specific sum has been named. A "sharing arrangement" has been made. In addition to Mr. and Mrs. Goldschmidt, the services of Mr. Sims Reeves, Signor Belletti, and other artists will be secured, but "the party" as a whole will be supplied by Mr. Mitchell or the persons for whom he acts, and he or they will take a very large proportion of the receipts. It is expected that there will be at least 3000 persons present each evening. The charges for admission are 20*s.*, 15*s.*, and 10*s.* 6*d.* Taking the average at 15*s.*, and supposing the hall to be full each evening, the gross receipts would be 4500*l.* At the very lowest estimate, Madame Lind will receive two-thirds of the receipts, or 3000*l.* Out of this, of course, she will have to pay the other artists, and 1500*l.* would be left for the committee to pay the incidental expenses attending such concerts.

Surrey Theatre.—This house of dramatic entertainment opened on Saturday for the autumn season with a combined performance of play and opera on a somewhat novel scale. The dramatic company is numerous, and for the most part efficient if not strong. A new American actress, Miss Georgiana Pauncefort, belonging to the vehement school, is added to the troop, and several new hands figure from Dublin and the provinces. The piece in which they exhibited, however, is such unutterable rubbish, that we no not think if Kean, Macready, Miss O'Neil, and Mrs. Siddons were in the cast they could have made an impression in it. Of the opera, or, more properly, operetta, we can speak in terms of praise. The libretto is taken from the German of Ludwig Tieck, and called Shakspere's Dream; or, A Night in Fairy Land. Shakspere, when a boy, falls asleep in a wood and is found by the King and Queen of the Fairies, attended by Puck and his elves. Struck with the beauty of the sleeping boy, they all endow him with some eminent quality. This is plain enough. The music is by Dr. Bennett Gilbert, and, as far as we were enabled to judge, is both new and good. The band, however, was so strangely incompetent that if it were the Barbiere being executed we could not express a decided opinion of its merits. In the overture at one time nearly every instrument was out, and the effect was the funniest imaginable. The chorus was a trifle better, but certainly not competent to do justice to a work written with apparent care and much pretensions. We do not intend to do Dr. Gilbert the wrong of criticising his opera under the circumstances. The whole of the music has been sent us for review, and we prefer considering its merits from our own inspection rather than from its beggarly presentation by the operatic force at the "Surrey." The principal solo vocalists were Miss Camilla Chipp, Miss Fanny Thirlwall, Mr. De Solla and Mr. Wallworth. These all exerted themselves to the utmost, and had the performance depended on them it would have achieved a respectable success. Fortunately the Surrey audiences are not very critical. They applauded every thing, even the overture, and would fain have the whole opera repeated. They managed five encores. The piece was well put on the stage, and that is the best praise we can bestow on it.

Letters to the Editor.

IMPORTANT TO THEATRICAL MANAGERS.

SIR,—Having the interests of the drama at heart, I beg permission of you to allow me to call the attention of managers of theatres to a fact worthy their notice in a speculative point of view.

Our reliable contemporary, Punch, has recently (!) discovered that Suffolk (as one of your own correspondents contemporaneously found was the case in Folkestone) is still infested with "savages." Now, should any enterprising manager feel disposed to patronise me, and will send a line direct to my address, containing an acceptable offer for a specimen or two of the farouche, I intend going gorilla hunting, in the hope of taking a few "all alive, O!" If it is asked "What can managers of theatres want with savages?" I reply, "Having caught your gorilla, proceed to announce in your play-bills, in bold (and savage) characters (after the scene-painter has finished), "Entirely new scenery, à la Rome, in the palmy days of Cæsar!!! Painted from the life." I see no reason why the plan should not be equally attractive in London at the present day as it was in Rome in the days of Virgil, who tells us they were exhibited in the scenery on the stage, being represented on the purple curtains (intexti, interwoven in the cloth). The then fashion, contrary to ours, might also be adopted—their curtains were raised (tolli) from the flooring to the top, and the figures appeared to rise gradually (how gradually the living Britons rise Punch has informed us) with the curtain. You will find the same beautifully described by Ovid, Met. iii. 3.

La plupart des hommes sont ignorans, or they would perceive that firing rifles from carriages is naturellement the mode of warfare inherited from their fathers: le fils est l'image du père. Your readers are aware that both Cæsar and Tacitus describe (with certain variations) the Britons' mode of fighting from chariots—hence the exhibition of the savage traits, which unstrung the nerves of Punch's correspondent: they follow in the steps of their progenitors as nearly as the state of things in general will permit. The same may be said of another ancient custom—that of giving a male child its first food from the point of its father's sword. The present race of savages, not wearing swords, shoot the "pap" down the newly-arrived gorilla's throat with a rifle, and the operation is said to stimulate the digestive organs to an extraordinary degree.

I simply allude to these little matters as offering timely hints to the scene-painter, when re-decorating the theatre of any manager who shall please to signify to me his desire that I should procure him a living specimen or two, at which time I should be in a position to furnish further details illustrative of this singular animal.—Yours,

Wolves' Wood, near Ipswich. THE CATCHER OF GORILLAS.

P.S. This is no "catch," as the postman will know where to catch me, I being well known as "The Catcher."

[A key to the foregoing will oblige.—ED.]

SIR,—Can you kindly tell me the name of the trio sung by Mad. Sainton, Mlle. Parepa, and Miss Marian Moss at the former lady's evening concert, June 21, 1861. THÉRÈSE.

September 4th, 1861.

[Perhaps one of our readers may be able and sufficiently obliging to answer this question.—ED.]

SIR,—About two months ago I addressed a letter to you on the chromatic and enharmonic scales, being a continuation of the subject of my letter on the "Theory of Accidentals." I should wish to know if you received the letter, and if you thought it worth a place in your periodical. I may explain that it was, in conjunction with my former letter, intended as a preliminary to others, showing the nature and construction of the simple chromatic chords, the compound chords, and the compound chromatic cords, in connection with any given key, the whole being derived from the simple (or common) chords belonging to the key, as shown in my letter Nov. 3rd, 1860, the subjects of my various letters, founded on theories respecting the relation of sounds, which being built one upon another, from the simple elements to the most obstruse chords and progressions, admit of the clearest demonstrations, and are, therefore, not matters of opinion or arbitrary rules, but undoubted matters of fact; and I think you will admit, that to place the science of harmony upon such a basis, is a matter of no slight importance. There is sufficient evidence in the letters of some of your correspondents, contained in a few of the latest numbers of your periodical, to convince any one that the scientific principles of harmony are not understood as they ought to be, even by, in other respects, eminent musicians; that, in fact, these principles as regards the relation of sounds, and their combination and progression, have not hitherto been placed upon a scientific basis, that musicians yet work by "Rule of Thumb." With reference to the correspondence alluded to, I may be treading upon thorny ground; but I must say that the remarks of "An Amateur" have not yet met with a decisive reply, nor can meet with such a reply so long as the system of harmony is, as at present, founded upon merely gratuitous rules, one opinion can only be met by another opinion, and both may differ from other opinions, thus no satisfactory result can be established. If we take the Extract 2, from Mr. Jules Benedict's four-part song of "The Wreath," on page 451 MUSICAL WORLD, an analysis of the harmony certainly gives the true notation thus:—

The question is, Why should the sound in the second chord be written C×, and not D♮ as Mr. Benedict has written it? The first chord is E major, and the third is B major. I think every one will admit the intermediate chord must therefore be related to both these chords. Now, the only keys in which these chords can appear are E major and B major, and in G♯ minor and D♯ minor their relative dominant keys (in G major and D major they would only appear as chromatic chords) therefore the intermediate chord must also be in one of these keys. But there is no possible combination of harmony in these keys, which has the form of the chord given by Mr. Benedict, and also has the same progression. The only combination is from the chords E G♯ B and G♯ B D♯; that is, the chord E G♯ B D♯ in which E and B are primary sounds, and G♯ and D♯ are secondary sounds, then either E or B may be raised a chromatic semitone, or G♯ or D♯ may be lowered a chromatic semitone, these would give, as the nearest representative of the chord of Mr. Benedict, E♯ G♯ B D♯ or E G♯ B D♮ (which last must not be confounded with the chord of the dominant 7th on E), and supposing, for the present, that E and D♯ may be affected chromatically in opposite directions at the same time, we should have the chord E♯ G♯ B D♮, which is that given by Mr. Benedict. Then, as regards the progression of this chord, it is evident that any sound in the scale may pass to either of the sounds adjacent to it in the scale: thus E in the scale of E major or B major may pass to either of the adjacent sounds D♯ or F♯, according as the scale (or portion of the scale) is descending or ascending; but when a sound has been effected chromatically, its progression is limited to that sound towards which it has been moved by the aid of the accidental, that is, the nature of the accidental determines the direction of the motion, like as a body when moved out of the perpendicular has a tendency to fall, or falls in the direction in which it has been moved, the sounds E♯ and D♮ being accidental sounds, are moved, as it were, out of the perpendicular, and, if followed by a concord, fall to the adjacent sounds of the scale F♯ and C♯, towards which they had been moved by the accidental, the only progressions of the chord E♯ G♯ B D♮ being therefore to F♯ A C♯ and F♯ A♯ C♯, according as the key is E major or B major or their relatives, neither of which chord is the third chord in the extract, consequently E♯ G♯ B D♮ are not the true sounds of the second chord. Again, let us take the chords C♯ E G♯ and E G♯ B, both of which chords and all of which sounds belong to the key of E major (the sound C♯, however, does not belong to the sale of B major, being a comma too flat), these chords give the compound chord C♯ E G♯ B in which E or B, as before, may be raised, or C♯ or G♯ may be lowered a chromatic semitone; but you will also find, by reference to my letter, MUSICAL WORLD, March 30th, and also, if you have received it, to the one mentioned as having been addressed to you some time ago, that the 6th of the major scale (as A in the scale of C) being a secondary sound is never raised a chromatic semitone; when, therefore, a sharp appears in connection with this apparent sound, the true sound is that of the supertonic of the scale of the dominant (which is a comma sharpet in pitch than the 6th of the scale of the tonic); this, being a primary sound, may be raised a chromatic semitone, and always appears in connection with the dominant harmony; the sounds then, affected accidentally in the compound chord, are C♯ and E, and the chord becomes C × E♯ G♯ B, in which C♯ is raised in the ratio 135 : 128 and E a chromatic semitone, the C × progresses to D♯ in the dominant chord, E♯ also moving to F♯ in the same; which chord is B D♯ F♯ and is the third chord in the extract; whence the correct notation of the second chord is C × E♯ G♯ B (or C × and not D♮). Again, the same chord, as connected with the key of B major, may be shown thus:—the sounds of dominant and subdominant chords determine the scale or key; the whole of these sounds in the key of B major ar:—

The primary sounds being E B F♯ C♯, the combined sounds may be resolved into the following discords:—

C♯ and E (primary sounds) being raised a chromatic semitone, the last ofthe above chords becomes C × E♯ G♯ B, the EXACT SOUNDS of the chord as given before, in this chord, C♯ being a primary sound, all trace of the dominant chord (as regards its harmonic effect), has disappeared, the chord is essentially a subdominant chord, its fundamental bass being E, the C♯ (supertonic of B) can only be considered as an added sound, and is not the root of the chord, G♯ not being a perfect fifth, nor E a minor third from C♯; the chord, therefore, is related to the first chord in the extract, being derived from it, and is also related as subdominant to the third chord, the passage from the non-employment of the major chord of F♯, the dominant of B, remaining in the key of E major. For similar reasons the G♮ in the 3rd extract should be written F ×, the real fundamental bass being A♮, the subdominant of E.

But other eminent musicians than Mr. Benedict make decided mistakes occasionally. Macfarren's song, "Englishmen by birth are free," from Robin Hood, ostensibly written in E♭ (I quote from the transposed edition), has all the harmonies of the concluding portion of the song in the key of A flat, the song in reality ending on the chord of E flat, as the dominant of A flat, and not on E flat as the tonic key. Again (MUSICAL WORLD, June 1st), Mr. W. C. Filby, in his letter on the Minor Scale, asserts (in fact, though not in words) that there is no flat 7th in the minor MODE; had he confined his remarks to the minor scale, he would have been perfectly correct; but the flat 7th is certainly a sound belonging to the mode, as I think it would be very easy to convince him; in leaving one extreme, it is not necessary to go to the other. He again says, "I do not consider the mediant a desirable degree to carry common chord," &c.—which is a mere opinion—a musician's "rule of thumb"—an easy way of getting rid of a difficulty. Why is it not desirable? And again: "I do not acknowledge a relative major"—which is not remarkable, as my near kin do not happen to be in the army. Another difficulty is disposed of by a distant pun. Alas for musical science! Can Mr. Filby explain what relation has the 6th chord in his first illustration to the key, the chord being A♭ C E♭ and the key C minor? Lastly, to conclude this lengthy epistle, not any of the sounds E♭ F♮ G♮ B♭ C♮ can be generated as harmonics from the bases D A E; neither can F♮ G♮ A♮ C♮ D♮ from the bases E B F♯; therefore, if the sounds of the chromatic scale be determined by the harmonics from these bases, then the two scales (MUSICAL WORLD, pp. 440 and 451) are not the chromatic scales of D and E.

I write not this for insertion in the "WORLD," though I leave it to your discretion to do so (or any part of it), if you think proper. Yet I should wish to know if my previous letter was received and would be inserted.

I remain, Sir, yours truly,
W. W. PARKINSON.

Cheetham Hill, Manchester, August 14th, 1861.

THE LATE CATHERINE HAYES.—Mrs. Bushnell, widow (more generally known as Madame Catherine Hayes), lately residing at Westbourne-park, Middlesex, who died at Sydenham, on the 11th of last month, had executed her will on the 8th of that month, being three days prior to her death, appointing as her executors Captain George John Power and Mr. Henry Lee, to whom probate was granted by the London Court on the 26th of August; her effects being estimated for probate duty as under 16,000*l*. This charming singer and accomplished lady, whose beautiful and touching notes have been so prematurely extinguished by the hand of death at the early age of thirty-six, is, indeed, a great loss to the musical world and to all lovers of true harmony. She was a brilliant artiste in the higher walks of the Italian opera; but the exquisite and touching warblings of this Irish nightingale in the execution of her native ballads were the perfection of harmony, and we feel that it will be long indeed before her place can be supplied in this most delightful department of vocal art. Catherine Hayes married an American gentleman of the name of Bushnell, but she always retained her maiden name; and it is a singular fact that she was so accustomed to it, that she actually signed her will in her maiden name, beneath which she added that of her husband. The testatrix has left an annuity to her mother, and has bestowed legacies upon her sister, Miss Henrietta Hayes, and her aunt, Mrs. C. Daly. The te-tatrix, considering herself much indebted to the kindness of the late Dr. Knox, Bishop of Limerick, has evinced her grateful feeling by bequeathing a legacy to the granddaughter of that prelate. There is a legacy, also, to her servant, whom she mentions with much regard. To Mrs. Lee, the wife of one of her above-named executors, she leaves a diamond bracelet, the centre of which is so constructed as to form also a brooch at pleasure. The rest of her suite of jewellery is directed to be sold, and to fall into the residue, which residue is bestowed upon her executor, Captain Power. For a memoir of this well-known popular vocalist, see a brief notice in our journal, 24th August, No. 60.—London Review.

THE ARION.—We have on former occasions called attention to the claims of "The Arion," from the importance of the means it adopts for the cultivation of musical science. To the public, among whom may be included amateurs of every class, "The Arion" offers the best and largest opportunities for choral and orchestral practice of any society in London. Two evenings a week are devoted to these purposes from the 29th September to the 24th June, under the care and supervision of Mr. Alfred Gilbert, for a subscription so moderate as to be merely nominal. The progress which the society made under Mr. Gilbert's direction last year was abundantly shown at various public performances, all of which attracted fashionable auditories and drew forth the cordial approbation of the first musical authorities. This year "The Arion" promises to be still more successful, if we may judge from the zeal and energy with which the committee and officers are working; and we look forward to a time, certainly not far distant, when it will correspond in rank, as it does already in merit, with those other and greater societies which have had a longer period for their development. "The Arion," however, does not confine its advantages to amateurs. Professionals may and do share them, under conditions very advantageous to themselves, a circumstance of no small practical importance to the lay members. It will be seen from this brief description that "The Arion" substantially meets a real want. It affords to amateurs and professionals alike advantages not otherwise attainable, while to the public it proffers opportunities the most favourable for the cultivation and enjoyment of the highest classes of music under a direction which may fairly compare for efficiency with that of any of the older societies. "The Arion," however, does not interfere, or propose to interfere, with any. It aims exclusively at increasing the love of music for its own sake, and it takes the right way to effect the object. Doing this, we strongly commend it to the active support of the general public. The first meeting of the society was held on Saturday, at the rooms, 9, Conduit-street, under the presidency of Mr. Alfred Gilbert, when the rules were agreed to and the officers for the year appointed.—Morning Star.

LIVERPOOL.—Mlle. Patti has failed to draw crowded houses at the enormous prices necessitated by the costliness of her engagement, but her splendid singing and earnest acting have won the admiration of all who heard her.

The last concert of the PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY was eminently successful. Mlle. Titiens sang magnificently; and Signor Giuglini was in splendid voice. Signor Delle Sedie made his début, and was applauded loudly.

WIESBADEN. — A grand concert (exceptionnel) we understand from a correspondent will take place at the Kursaal on Friday evening the 20th inst. The engagements already made are with Madame Tedesco from Paris, — Herr Stockhausen, — Herr Schulhoff the celebrated pianist, and last not least, Herr Charles Oberthur, the accomplished harpist, whose name is well known in the London fashionable salons.

LINZ.—Balfe's Bohemian Girl has been given, with Mad. Denemy as the heroine.

A PIECE OF MUSICAL STATISTICS.—Attached to the Conservatory of Music in Paris are 81 professors and 934 pupils. Only 179 pupils attend the Conservatory of Vienna, while the professional staff consists of 22 school inspectors and 21 masters.

THE HEREFORD MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

THE interior of the fine old Cathedral presents a far more imposing aspect than at any previous festival. By the removal of the unsightly screen which for many years divided the nave from the choir, the massive proportions of the former have been rendered more striking to the eye, and the architectural beauties of the sacred edifice are no longer buried beneath hideous deformities nor obscured by the accumulated dust of ages. The view through the nave to the stained east window, in which the amethystine hue predominates, and which divides the choir from the beautiful Lady Chapel, is now unintercepted, and the light that poured in from that quarter magnificently lighted up the whole of the interior. The removal of this screen has enabled the conductor to give the orchestra the appearance of being thrown further back than at previous festivals, though, we believe, it covers the same portion of ground. He has, however, wisely remodelled it by giving it an almost circular front, which facilitates the grouping and massing of the voices, at the same time bringing the choruses more immediately under his command, his own seat being thrown somewhat forward. The raised seats at the west end of the nave have been dispensed with, and all the seats are now placed upon the floor, and thus the character of the sacred edifice has been more satisfactorily maintained, consistent with the will and pleasure of those who object to temporary erections in ecclesiastical edifices. The fine old organ, which has just been undergoing the process of tuning, still stands in the north aisle, and is, therefore, close up with the orchestra, though, I believe, it is contemplated ultimately to find room for it in one of the transepts. The ceiling of the north transept, which has recently been treated in a light and elegant manner, the ribs or groins being green, brown, and gold, is now exposed; the mortar and whitewash have been removed, and the floor has been laid in compartments with very handsome encaustic tiles from the manufactory of Mr. William Godwin, of Lugwardine, near Hereford.

At half-past eight o'clock every morning, Divine service has been held in the choir, which, with the south and as much of the north transept as could be rendered available under the circumstances of partial restoration, was filled, on the first morning especially, to overflowing. The Mayor of Hereford, Thomas Cam, Esq., having invited the corporation and the magistracy of the city to accompany him to church, and afterwards to join him at a sumptuous breakfast, there was a general gathering of the body, the mayor being dressed in his robes of office and attended by the mace-bearers and other officials. Of the particulars of those early services I have elsewhere spoken.

Saturday, Sept. 14th, 1861.

Last week, in order to save the post, as I told you, I was obliged to be exceedingly brief in my account of the morning performance at the Cathedral on Thursday; in fact, I scarcely did more than chronicle the event. Now that I am not quite so much pressed for time, I propose to offer a few observations on it.

In the first place, then, I must inform you that very many competent judges were of opinion that the selection from Haydn's Seasons might have been advantageously omitted from the programme, which would have been quite long enough without it. When—I ask, for about the thousandth time—will those worthy gentlemen who have the ordering of provincial festivals restrain their programmes within reasonable bounds? If they have no regard for the lungs of the singers and wind-instrumentalists, or the fingers of the violinists, et hoc genus omne—if they have no compunction about knocking up a tenor, or totally sacrificing the voice of some fair soprano—let them, at any rate, beware of wearying the patience of the public, and thereby injuring the cause of the charity for which the particular festival is held. There cannot be the shadow of a doubt that the great thing is to send the public away pleased and contented. The many-headed monster will then remember with pleasure what was really a morning's or an evening's amusement, and look forward with gratification to the next treat of the same kind. But surfeit a man with anything, and, ten to one, he will never have a taste for it again. Not only, however, was the selection from The Seasons de trop on this occasion, it was not by any means a good sample of what Hereford can do. Well as the solo music was sung by Mad. Weiss, Messrs. Weiss and Montem Smith, the performance left the audience unmoved. The fact is, the choruses were below the mark—manqués, as the French call it. The music itself, too, which has nothing at all sacred about it, seemed out of place within the walls of a cathedral. A far finer performance was that of Mozart's Requiem,—"the" Requiem, as people say, and always will say, probably, just as they talk about "the Duke"—still the execution of the choruses was not worthy either of the work itself or of the members of the Three Choirs. Yet, so great is the power of genius, even when unsatisfactorily interpreted, that most of the choral pieces, as, for instance, "Dies iræ," "Rex tremendæ Majestatis," and "Confutatis Maledictis," produced a profound and lasting impression upon the audience. The solo singers, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Mlle. Titiens, Signor Giuglini, and Mr. Winn, were irreproachable. Mlle. Titiens, in particular, was splendid, and the part she took in the quartet, "Recordare, Jesu pie," was sung by her with a degree of power, ease, and unaffected feeling which I have seldom heard equalled, and, certainly, never surpassed. Mr. Winn, also, was more than usually good, and deserves high praise for his delivery of the bass music. Mendelssohn's Lobgesang went better than the Seasons, but not so well as the Requiem. There was, at times, the same want of steadiness, the same disregard of the nice gradations of light and shade, in the choruses; although, some of them, on the other hand, were given in admirable style. Mr. Sims Reeves was highly impressive, particularly in "The sorrows of death." The duet, "I waited for the Lord," was beautifully given by the Misses Louisa and Susan Pyne; while three grand instrumental movements were grandly performed by the band.

The concert at the Shire Hall on the evening of the same day (Thursday, the 12th inst.) was a most successful affair, and went off brilliantly. The building was crammed—to adopt the good old conventional phrase—to the ceiling, and numbers were unable to obtain admission. The principal feature in the performance was Mr. Benedict's cantata of Undine, which has already achieved such popularity in Norwich and London; and, as far as I can form an opinion from what took place on the evening in question, will soon be as great a favourite with the good citizens of Hereford. Great credit is due to Mr. Townshend Smith for introducing such a work, and the talented composer, who had come down to Hereford on purpose to be present—"assist," the French call it—at the performance of his work, must have felt very much obliged to him. Once more, if I am to state frankly what I think—and, by the way, it was to that end I was despatched down here—I must say, the members of the chorus were not as well up in their work as might have been desired, although they gave very effectively some of the music allotted to them. The parts were thus cast:—Undine, Miss Louisa Pyne; Bertalda, Mad. Sainton-Dolby; Hildebrand, Mr. Sims Reeves; and Kühleborn, Mr. Weiss. Miss Louisa Pyne was suffering from severe indisposition, but despite of this, she scorned to give in, and with wonderful "pluck" went through her arduous task in a manner which elicited the most hearty applause. Mad. Sainton-Dolby was a most excellent Bertalda, and gave the romance, "The baron's old castle looks proud and bright," in first-rate style. Mr. Weiss supported his original part of Kühleborn with all the talent for which he is distinguished; while Mr. Sims Reeves was never more spirited and impressive than in the part of Hildebrand, a part of which, as the readers of the MUSICAL WORLD are aware, he was the original representative, as Mr. Weiss was of Kühleborn. The band was quite equal to its task, and altogether the cantata proved one of the "hits" of the Festival. The same may be said of Professor Sterndale Bennett's overture of the Wood Nymphs, although its proper effect was sadly marred by the hubbub of those persons who came late, and were so deficient in good taste as not to wait until the overture was over, but to blunder to their seats during its performance, to the great discomfort of those who had enough respect for good music to induce them to be at the Shire Hall in proper time. Three pieces which had been set down for Miss Louisa Pyne were omitted in consequence of that lady's suffering so severely from indisposition, as I have already mentioned. In fact, I believe she was so ill as to be insensible, when she was conveyed to her lodgings from the Hall, at the conclusion of Undine. Mlle. Titiens sang the grand scena from Der Freischütz, and "The last rose of summer," to the great delight of the audience, who were vociferous in their applause, and encored the ballad. The other songs, duets, &c., were distributed among Mad. Weiss, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Signor Giuglini, Messrs. Montem Smith, Winn, and Weiss. By the way, I must not forget to mention that the second part of the concert commenced with the overture to Guillaume Tell, played so well that the last movement was encored and repeated. The performance was brought to a close by the National Anthem, the solos being taken by Mlle. Titiens and Mad. Sainton-Dolby.

The performance of the Messiah on Friday morning attracted no less than 1736 persons, while the collection amounted to 307*l.* 0*s.* 7*d.* Both in a pecuniary and artistic sense it was the greatest success of the whole Festival. The charm exercised by this great work is really astonishing. Hundreds and hundreds who care for nothing else will go to hear the Messiah. So much, however, has been said so frequently not only about the work itself, but about every one of the artists who sang in it on Friday, that, not to grow wearisome, and repeat an oft-told tale, I shall content myself with sending you merely a general account of the performance without going into detail, which would be superfluous. The choruses, then, were given in a manner that must have satisfied even the most exacting critic. Despite her severe indisposition of the previous evening, Miss Louisa Pyne was determined that her Hereford admirers should not be disappointed. She sang the principal soprano music most beautifully, particularly the grand and impressive air, "I know that my Redeemer liveth." Mad. Weiss and Miss Susan Pyne, likewise, were very effective. How Mad. Sainton-Dolby, to whom was allotted most of the contralto music, sings oratorio, no one with any pretension to musical knowledge needs be informed. Yet I cannot pass over in silence the way in which she rendered the wonderful air, "He was despised." Messrs. Weiss and Winn divided the bass music between them, the latter gentleman distinguishing himself more especially in "The trumpet shall sound," with, of course, Mr. T. Harper's marvellous trumpet obbligato. The greater part of the tenor music was assigned to Mr. Sims Reeves. I really feel puzzled what to do when speaking of this gentleman. Having praised him so often and so warmly, I am almost inclined to content myself with observing that he sang as usual, but he was really so great on Friday, that I cannot resist dwelling somewhat more at length on so remarkable a performance. The manner in which he gave the accompanied recitative, "Comfort ye, my people," with the air, "Every valley," "Behold and see," and "Thou shalt break them," was simply sublime, and places him at the top of his profession—facile princeps—as the interpreter of the immortal Saxon's music. The band, under the direction of Mr. Townshend Smith, proved themselves worthy of the occasion. Mr. Amott officiated at the organ.

At 7 o'clock P.M. a chamber concert was given in the College Hall. The following is the programme:—

Quartet in D minor, Mozart; Aria—"Per la gloria," Buononcini; Canzonet, "My mother bids me," Haydn; Quartet, with canzonet (Op. 12), Mendelssohn; Duet, "Segui oh cara," Faust, Spohr; Septet (Part 2), Beethoven.

The whole went off with great éclat, the second part of Mendelssohn's quartet being encored. The principal performers were Messrs. H. Blagrove, Clementi, R. Blagrove, G. Collins, Daubert (from the Crystal Palace band), Blakeston, Williams, Mann, and Waetzig. The vocal music was sung by Mad. and Mr. Weiss.

According to custom, the Festival wound up with a grand ball in the Shire Hall. I hear that the amount of beauty present was even greater than usual, and that dancing was kept up to a late, or rather an early, hour; tous les deux se disent.

The Festival of this year has been decidedly successful. The attendance and donations have been greater than at the last triennial gathering in 1858, as will appear by the following tables:—

The whole of the collections are handed over to the Widows and Orphans of the poor clergy, as are also the profits on the sale of tickets, after all the expenses have been paid. The deficiency, however—and there has always been a deficiency hitherto—has to be made up by the gentlemen who generously fill the office of stewards, and who, on the present occasion, were: The Lord William Graham, M.P., the Hon. J. F. W. Fiennes, the Hon. C. S. B. Hanbury, M.P., Sir W. Curtis, Bart. (second time), J. King King, Esq., M.P., H. Mildmay, Esq., M.P., Colonel Clifford, M.P., B. Bullock (second time), T. Dew, Esq., W. Brewster Evans, Esq., Rev. E. Hampden, Rev. E. B. Hawkshaw, T. Hill, Esq., Rev. H. O. Key, A. R. Boughton Knight (second time), Rev. Prebendary Lee, Rev. W. Baskerville Mynors, Rev. Prebendary Poole, R. Webb, Esq., Rev. H. O. Wilson.

For the sake of these gentlemen, I trust that the report generally circulated, that the returns this year will cover the expenses, is founded in truth. It would be "a consummation devoutly to be wished."

The Dean and Chapter avail themselves of the opportunity afforded by the Musical Festival, of placing before those who take an interest in the Cathedral, the following brief statement of the works of restoration already effected, and yet to be completed:—

WORKS COMPLETED AND IN HAND.—1859 to 1861.—To amounts borrowed on mortgage under Hereford Cathedral Restoration Act, 13,000*l.*

1859 to 1861.—By sums expended in the external and internal restoration of north transept and aisles, south transept, north aisle of choir, including Bishop Stanbury's Chapel, north-east transept, south-east transept, south aisle of choir, Chapter House and vestibule, Ladye Chapel and vestibule, and Bishop Audley's Chapel; and the external restoration of north aisle of nave, north porch, south aisle of nave, great cloisters, 10,000*l.*

By money in hand to meet the balance of existing contracts, and the cost of flooring generally (except the choir); repairing and fixing monuments; releading part of roof; repairs of interior stonework, &c., 3000*l.* Total, 13,000*l.*

WORKS PROPOSED TO BE EXECUTED IF SUBSCRIPTIONS SUFFICIENT.—To estimate for fitting-up and flooring of choir; restoration of external stonework of tower; lighting the Cathedral for congregational use; fitting-up of Ladye Chapel for service for St. John's parish, &c., 8000*l.*

By subscriptions in hand and promised, 3,553*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.*

Remains to be provided, 4,446*l.* 9*s.* 2*d.* Total, 8000*l.*

The cost of adapting the organ to its altered position is estimated at upwards of 1000*l.*, for which a separate subscription is being raised (!!) If the necessary funds were provided, the whole of the works in the interior might be completed, and the Cathedral opened, in October, 1862, but with the present incumbrances upon the capitular property (of course) the Dean and Chapter (as usual) are unable of themselves to undertake the proposed works; they therefore earnestly appeal (as from time immemorial) to those resident in the county and diocese, and the public generally, who have not already kindly promised subscriptions, to add their names to the list of subscribers.

IMPORTANT DECISION AFFECTING MUSICAL ARTISTS.—(Before the County Court Judge, Lambeth, September 19).—Rockstro v. Wylde.—The plaintiff summoned Dr. Wylde, director and conductor of the New Philharmonic Concerts, for £2 12*s.* for two performances at these concerts. The judge dismissed the summons, and ordered the plaintiff Rockstro to pay costs. It appeared from the evidence that Dr. Wylde engaged Mr. Rockstro as second flute for the series of six concerts, at a specified sum, viz. £7 16*s.*, Mr. Pratten being first flute. On Mr. Pratten being obliged to give up his engagement at the third concert, in consequence of an extra opera night being fixed for the same eve, Mr. Svensden became first flute vice Pratten. Whereupon Mr. Rockstro, who had calculated on the preferment, refused to fulfil the remainder of his engagement, but demanded payment for the two concerts at which he had performed. Dr. Wylde refused to comply with this demand, alleging that as the contract was for a series of concerts, unless plaintiff fulfilled the whole of his engagement he could not claim anything under the contract. In the course of the inquiry Dr. Wylde stated that during the ten years he had been connected with the New Philharmonic Concerts all the orchestral artists had received the amount demanded without dispute or litigation, but that he found it necessary in the present instance to resist the demand made by Mr. Rockstro, and have the question decided whether he alone was the party bound by a written agreement, saying it was very hard if the law bound him to pay without binding the other party to the contract to serve. The judge decided that Mr. Rockstro had no claim on Dr. Wylde, that the latter was justified in refusing payment to the plaintiff, who ought to have fulfilled his engagement.

SOME PASSAGES IN THE LIFE OF LORENZO DA PONTE.*

I.

DA PONTE'S OFFICIAL APPOINTMENT IN VIENNA. — THE LIBRETTO OF LE NOZZE DI FIGARO.

I LED a lazy life in Vienna, and the money I had brought with me from Dresden was nearly all spent. I did not forget, however, that I had lived in Padua on black olives, and during an involuntary fast of a fortnight slaked my thirst with the water of the Brenta. I began, therefore, to see the necessity of retrenchment, and, instead of keeping on, in the city itself, apartments which were above my means, I hired a modest little room of a tailor in the Wieden suburb.

I had heard it reported that the Emperor had determined on again opening an Italian Theatre in the capital. Metastasio had recently died, and I was ambitious enough to think of getting myself appointed Court-poet. I went and spoke to Salieri. Not only did he flatter my hopes, but, not content with that, offered to use his influence for me with Count Rosenberg, Intendant-General of the Imperial Theatres, and, if necessary, with the Emperor himself, who honoured him with his especial favour. He managed matters so well that the first time I had the honour of being presented to the Emperor, it was not to lay my request before him, but to return him my thanks. Although the praises of Joseph II. were on every one's lips, and in spite of his being everywhere mentioned as a model prince, the idea of being summoned to appear before him inspired me with irrepressible bashfulness.

I had been informed that he judged persons by the first impression they produced on him. I fancied his scrutiny in my case did not prove altogether unfavourable, and I founded my conclusions on the gracious manner in which I was received. He condescended to question me about my private affairs, my native country, my studies, and the motives that had induced me to visit Vienna. I answered as shortly as possible, and my almost laconic replies appeared to satisfy him. The last question he put to me was, how many dramas I had already written.

"Not one, Sire," I replied.

"Good, good," he retorted, laughing; "then we have got a virgin muse."

Out of respect towards Salieri, I intrusted him with the task of setting my first work to music, for he was really one of the first masters of his day. I submitted to him a number of subjects, with the mode in which I proposed treating them, for him to take his choice. Unfortunately, he selected one deficient in every fundamental element of success. It was: The Rich Man for a Day. I began my task, but it was not long before I found out the difference between a thought and its realisation. The more I wrote, the more numerous and greater became the difficulties. The subject offered neither a sufficient number of characters nor variety of incidents sufficient to keep up for three hours — the time the piece was to play — the interest of the public. I found my scenes cold, the action flat, the dialogue dry, my ideas trivial, and the pieces for music clumsily lugged in. By hook or by crook, I completed the first act, but the finale was still wanting. This finale, which is closely connected with the work, should alone have summed up the entire piece, and created a feeling of especial interest. All the talent of the musician as well as that of the artists ought to be displayed in this portion of a man's work, and in it all the effect of the latter ought to be concentrated. The reader may imagine the state of perplexity in which I was. Twenty times was I tempted to fling into the fire all I had written and tender my resignation. At length, after puzzling my imagination, racking my brain, and invoking the aid of all the saints in the calendar, I effected my object, and finished the piece. Salieri looked cursorily through it in my presence, and at length observed, "It is well written, but we must see it on the stage. It contains some very nice ariettas and scenes which please me, but I must, notwithstanding, introduce a few slight alterations, more for the sake of the music than for anything else." The reader may fancy what pleasure his words caused me, and, as we are fond of persuading ourselves that what we wish is true, I began to think the work was, after all, not so bad as I had at first imagined. But in what did "the slight alterations" consist? In mutilating, lengthening, or shortening nearly all the scenes, in interpolating new duets, trios, and quartets, in changing the metre in the middle of an air, in introducing choruses, &c. The music was composed and the work was on the eve of representation, when the well-known Abbate Casti — a poet whose reputation, which he owed chiefly to his Novelle Galanti, was spread throughout Europe — came to Vienna. However admirable his Novelle were as far as regards the poetry, they were infamous as far as morals go.

Paesiello, a well-known musician, highly esteemed by the Emperor, arrived at the same time. He was greatly respected by Viennese musical amateurs, and fancied he had not a rival. He expressed a wish to compose the music for some drama or other. His arrival alarmed Salieri. The Rich Man for a Day was laid aside, and people in Vienna spoke only of Casti and Paesiello. The reader may imagine the expectations of the actors, of Count Rosenberg, of Casti's friends — and in a word, of the entire city. Casti's name was on every one's tongue. King Theodore—for such was the title of his first opera—was performed, and its success was something enormous. How could it be otherwise? The singers were irreproachable, the scenery superb, the dresses magnificent, and the music divine. With a smile on his lips, the poet received every one's enthusiastic congratulations as if they applied wholly to his part of the work.

It was not until Salieri's return from France that the various parts in The Rich Man for a Day were given out. The principal character was intended for Mad. Horace, who was then at the height of talent and the delight of all Vienna. She fell ill; another lady had to take her part, and, as there was no choice, we had to content ourselves with the first that came to hand. Unluckily, however, the lady thus forced on us was not equal to the part entrusted to her, and the piece proved a failure. I did not deceive myself as to the value of The Rich Man for a Day. The libretto was altogether bad, and the music horrible; but that the reader may understand how far my enemies carried their perfidy, it will suffice for me to tell him that they wished to persuade people the failure was entirely owing to me.

Of all the crowd of my ill-wishers, the only one to be feared

*. Speaking of the Memoirs from which the above are taken, O. Jahn says (Mozart, vol. iv. page 181): "I am indebted to M. Scudo, of Paris, for the use of this scarce work" (the original published as far back as 1823). It contains several palpable errors, especially in the matter of dates, and there is no doubt that Da Ponte sometimes places himself more prominently in the foreground than he ought. His accounts are, however, instructive; and, in the main, correct. The narrative of his residence in Vienna was the principal authority for the following portion of my work, though I used it with the requisite amount of caution."

Da Ponte was born in 1749, at Ceneda, in Venetia. In 1783, he became theatrical poet in Vienna, but, falling into disgrace with the Emperor Leopold, proceeded, in 1792, to London, and, in 1805, to America. He was never lucky enough to be in easy circumstances. He died, at an advanced age, on the 17th August, 1838, in New York.

was Casti, on account of his superiority to the rest, his maliciousness, and particularly the high patronage he enjoyed. Fortunately, I had on my side the Emperor, who, under all circumstances, displayed the more zeal in defending me the more violent my opponents became in their attacks.

"This young man," he said, one day, to Andrea Dolfin, the Venetian ambassador, who also was one of my patrons, "possesses too much talent not to draw down upon his head Casti's envy, but I will take care of him. Only yesterday Rosenberg endeavoured to persuade me, after the failure of the piece, that we ought to have another poet. Casti was in my box, and hoped, perhaps, that I would give him the place. I answered that before taking such a step I would have another opera by Da Ponte."

The unfortunate result of my first attempt was sufficient to dishearten me and prevent my appearing before the Emperor. One morning, however, he happened to meet me as he was taking a walk. On coming up to me he stopped, and said, with the greatest kindness: "Take my word for it, your opera is far from being so bad as some people would wish others to believe. Pluck up your courage, and give us a masterpiece which shall reduce them to silence."

He told Martini to apply to me. In consequence of this, the latter called and asked me whether I would write a piece to be dedicated to the wife of the Spanish ambassador, for she would feel highly flattered.* . . . . Two years elapsed before I was perfectly restored and able to resume my labours. I had selected Le Bourreau bienfaisant for the subject of the first drama I intended for Martini. I set about my task. Actuated by the double desire of being named Court-poet, and of getting rid of me, whom he looked upon as the only obstacle in his way, Casti was hardly made acquainted with my notion before he hastened to spread about a report everywhere he went that I had selected a bad subject for an opera buffa. He had the boldness to repeat this before the Emperor, who felt called upon to observe to me:—

"Da Ponte, your friend Casti affirms that your Bourreau bienfaisant will not make people laugh."

"Sire," I replied, "I should be delighted if it only made him weep."

"I hope it will," said Joseph II., perceiving at once the double meaning of my words.

The opera was produced, and pleased the public from beginning to end. Several of the audience, including even the Emperor himself, were actually seen to applaud the very recitatives. "We have triumphed!" whispered Joseph II. to me, after the first performance, as he passed me in the hall leading to the boxes, where I had stationed myself. Those three words were in my eyes of greater value than whole pages of ordinary commendation.

My success, and, still more, the particular favour Joseph II. displayed towards me, gave a fresh impetus to my poetic inspiration. Not only did I feel powerful enough to meet my detractors boldly, but even to dispise their efforts, and I soon had the satisfaction of seeing composers apply to me for librettos. At that time there lived in Vienna only two masters worthy, in my opinion, of the name: Martini, for the moment the protégé of Joseph II., and Wolfgang Mozart, whose acquaintance I had had the opportunity of making, about that period, at the house of his friend, the Baron von Wetzlar. Although endowed by nature with musical genius, far excelling, perhaps, that of all other composers past, present, and to come, Mozart had, up to this time, never obtained a chance of exhibiting his godlike powers in Vienna, in consequence of the cabals of his enemies. He lived unknown and unappreciated, like some precious stone, which, hidden far beneath the surface of the earth, conceals from all the secret of its brilliancy. I can never reflect without pride and delight that it was chiefly to my perseverance and energy that Europe owed the discovery of the wonderful genius of this incomparable composer. The injustice and envy of my rivals, of journalists and of Mozart's biographers, will never allow an Italian like myself such an amount of glory; but all Vienna, and every one who was acquainted with Mozart and myself in Germany, Bohemia, and Saxony, together with all the members of his family, and, more especially, the Baron von Wetzlar himself, his enthusiastic admirer, in whose house the first spark of the divine flame shone forth, can testify to the truth of what I say.

After the success of Le Bourreau bienfaisant, I called on Mozart, and told him what had occurred between Casti, Rosenberg and the Emperor. I asked him if he felt inclined to compose the music for a libretto written expresly for himself.

"It would afford me the greatest pleasure to do so," he replied, "but I doubt whether I should obtain permission."

"I undertake to overcome all difficulties."

"Very good; then let us set to work at once."

I was reflecting on the subjects I should select for two men of such opposite talent as Mozart and Martini, when I received an order from the Management to write a drama for Gazzaniga, a very good composer, but who was no longer in fashion. In order to get this tedious task as soon as possible off my hands, I chose a French comedy: The clear-sighted Blind Man. In a few days I ran up a piece that was successful neither in the text nor the music. It was played three times and then withdrawn.

This circumstance, although disagreeable, did not affect my reputation, and I again began to turn over in my mind the subjects I intended for my two friends. I clearly perceived that Mozart's immense genius required a drama of a grand and lofty kind. As I was talking with him one day, he asked me whether I could not found an opera-text on Le Mariage de Figaro, by Beaumarchais. The notion pleased me, and was quickly and successfully carried out.

Shortly before this, Beaumarchais' piece had been prohibited, by command of the Emperor, as being written in an immoral style. How could any one again propose it? The Baron von Wetzlar, with his accustomed liberality, offered me a handsome price for my work. He assured me that, in case it were forbidden in Vienna, he would undertake to get it produced in London or in France. I did not accept his offer, but quietly set about my task, in the hope of a favourable opportunity of submitting it to the Management, or to the Emperor himself, if I had the courage to do so. Martini was the only person I admittted into my confidence, and out of respect for Mozart he was magnanimous enough to give me time to end my piece for the latter before beginning one for him. As I wrote the libretto, Mozart composed the music. In six weeks the whole was completed. Thanks to Mozart's good star, I found a favourable opportunity to lay my manuscript before the Emperor himself.

"How is this?" said Joseph II. to me. "You know that, however admirable he may be in instrumental music, Mozart has never written anything for the voice, with the exception of a single piece, of no very great importance."

"I myself," I replied, timidly, "would have written a drama without the approbation of the Emperor only in Vienna."

"That may be; but I have forbidden the German Company to play this Figaro."

"I am aware of that; but, in altering the comedy into an opera, I have left out some scenes entirely and shortened others. I have constantly endeavoured to get rid of everything that could shock propriety and good taste; in a word, I have produced a work worthy of the theatre which your Majesty honours with your gracious patronage. As for the music, it is, as far as I can judge, a masterpiece."

"Very good; I rely upon your taste and sagacity. Let the score be copied out."

In a moment I was with Mozart. I had not communicated the joyful news, however, before an order came for him to proceed with his score to the palace. In obedience to this, he took the Emperor some selections which perfectly delighted him. Joseph II. possessed unerring judgment in matters of music, and everything relating to the fine arts. The extraordinary success which the wonderful work, of which I am speaking, has had all over the world, is a proof of this. Yet, however, incredible it may appear, the music did not meet with unanimous approval. The Viennese composers, whom it crushed, as well as Rosenberg, and, more especially, Casti, did not fail to disparage and sneer at it.

Their deceitful conduct increased our mutual hatred, and Mozart and myself were not free from apprehension lest a combination might be got up against us by our two opponents, and a certain Bussini, the wardrobe-inspector, an individual capable of any business except that of an honourable man. When Bussini heard of the ballet I had introduced into my Figaro, he hurried off to the Count, and said, in a tone of disapprobation: "Your Excellency, the poet has introduced a ballet into his opera." The Count sent for me, and the following conversation took place between us:—

* Da Ponte was, however, taken ill. His illness was the result of an attempt made by one of his countrymen to poison him, from motives of jealousy.

"You must be aware, Sir, that his Majesty tolerates no ballets in his theatres . . . . Consequently, I order you, Mr. Poet, to strike out the ballet you have introduced into your piece.—Where is the scene?"

"Here."

He tore two leaves out of my manuscript, and flung them in the fire. He then returned me the libretto with the words: "You see, Sir, how far my power extends." He then honoured me with a "Good day!"

I immediately went off to Mozart, who flew into such a passion that he wanted at once to go to the Count, to give Bussini a sound drubbing, and then hurry off to the Emperor and take back his manuscript. I had the greatest trouble in the world to pacify him. At length, I begged he would keep quiet for two days, and leave the management of affairs to me.

Meanwhile, the grand rehearsal had been called. Before it took place I went to the Emperor, who promised to see about the matter. He condescended to be present at the rehearsal, and all the high aristocracy of Vienna accompanied him. The first act met with unanimous approbation. It concluded with a pantomime, during which the band was to play the ballet music, as the dances were prohibited. The band was silent. "What is the meaning of this pause?" the Emperor inquired of Casti, who was sitting behind him. "That is a question to which only the author can give your Majesty an answer," replied the Abbate, with a malicious smile. I was summoned. Instead of justifying myself, however, I laid before his Majesty a copy of my manuscript, in which the scene, as originally written, was retained. The Emperor read it through, and asked why the dances were not executed. I still remained silent. He saw I would not state the facts, and, therefore, turning to the Count, requested of him the explanation I hesitated giving. "The dances are omitted," replied the Count, stammering, "because there is no corps de ballet in your Majesty's theatre."—"But there are corps de ballet in the other theatres; and it is my desire that Da Ponte shall have all the dancers he may wish."—Half an hour afterwards we had four-and-twenty persons, dancers and figurantes. The ballet was performed. "Very good," exclaimed the Emperor; and this fresh proof of favour redoubled the thirst for revenge in the heart of my powerful persecutor.

At last the day of the first performance arrived. The performance took place to the great abashment of the maestro, and the by no means diminished vexation of the Count and Casti. The opera itself was brilliantly successful; it pleased the Emperor especially, as well as all true lovers of music; it was considered a lofty and almost divine work. The libretto, likewise, obtained its share of applause, and my modest competitor, Casti, was the first to point out its beauties. But what was his praise? Censure concealed under the semblance of good nature. "It is true," he remarked, "that it is only a translation from Beaumarchais; but it contains fine verses and several very pretty things."

The Count von Rosenberg, whose favour he was very apprehensive of losing, asked him to write a drama for Salieri, who was dying with envy to beat Mozart's opera. It was at this period he wrote La Grotta di Trofonio, the second act of which is anything but satisfactory, as far as art is concerned.

The music was very beautiful, a fact which the friends of the poet trumpeted forth everywhere; but this could not induce the Emperor to change his mind. There was still one stroke to be played, but that stroke completely ruined Casti with the Emperor, who very much admired his verses, it is true, but by no means admired him. Casti had just given the finishing touch to his Dschingis-Khan, a Tartar poem, which, however, ranks far beneath his Novelle Galanti, and especially Gli Animali parlanti. This poem expedited his disgrace. He had it carefully copied out, and presented it with his own hands to the Emperor. Justly or unjustly, Joseph II. thought he saw in it a biting satire on Catherine II., whom he esteemed and admired. He sent for Casti to his box, and handed him a hundred sequins, with the words, "For your travelling expenses!"—a delicate method of dismissing him. Casti understood what the words meant, and a few days afterwards left Vienna.

THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL AND THE "ATHENÆUM."—The people of Birmingham are naturally impressed with the belief that their Festival is an event of national as well as of local importance. In this view they are confirmed by the principal organs of the London press, by the common consent of musicians, and by the eagerness with which amateurs from all parts of the kingdom flock to this town at each successive triennial meeting. There is, however, one person whose opinion differs from that of all England—and this is the critic of the Athenæum. All that this writer can find to say about the recent Festival is summed up in one paragraph so brief and flippant as justly to entitle it to the designation of "a piece of impudence." Here is the report, extracted in full from the last number of our contemporary:—"The Birmingham people have had fine weather, if not original music, for their Festival. The town has been very gay, and the listeners curious and excited. In the absence of any new feature calling for musical remark, we have only to record the fact of the Musical Festival having been held, and with an appearance of success." Even if the Athenæum were what it once was, such a judgment as this would have reflected discredit upon the writer, and exposed the paper itself to deserved censure. As it is, the matter is hardly worth notice, for the Athenæum no longer holds the foremost place amongst critical journals; and its opinions are of very little importance either for censure or praise. As regards the Birmingham Festival, therefore, we need say nothing in vindication. But we may ask our contemporary whether the production of new works is the sole end and aim of great musical gatherings? May it not be quite as meritorious to render with absolute perfection known works of the great masters, as to concentrate the attention of conductor and performers upon the production of new works of less assured excellence? If Festivals are designed for the cultivation of the musical art, careful performance should be their primary aim. At all events the journal which affects to consider itself the leader of musical criticism should scarcely allow petulance to get the better of good sense, or to set up its own whim as the standard of judgment in matters of taste.—Aris's Birmingham Gazette.

LONDON: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1861.

"ENOUGH is as good as a feast," and "people will never let well alone," are maxims which wisdom often strives to inculcate, but the application of which to the purposes of life mankind seldom makes. When a thing done is applauded and elicits general approbation, the doer is apt to conclude that he has but to repeat the same to obtain a larger amount of approbation and applause. It never occurs to him that what afforded gratification at first may fail to convey pleasurable emotions on a second hearing or seeing; nor does he consider how efficacious a mover of delight Novelty is, nor how much Praise is dependent on circumstances. The Festival of the Metropolitan School Choral Society, held at the Crystal Palace on Wednesday, was not a genuine success. Few exhibitions are more interesting and exciting than the congregation of a large body of children lifting up their voices in prayer or exultation, manifesting the high state of discipline to which tender years may be brought by care and attention, and proving what an extraordinary influence music exercises over the youthful mind. Between two and three thousand juveniles, belonging to the various Metropolitan Schools, assembled on Wednesday in the Great Handel Orchestra, and sang a selection of sacred and secular pieces, in some instances so admirably as to raise the enthusiasm of the audience. The scene was highly inspiriting. The boys and girls were in holiday attire; the juvenile bands shone in uniform; the teachers, male and female, were got up with a keen eye to the highest state of respectability; the day was magnificent. Yet can we not claim for the "Choral Festival" anything approaching to a triumph. And how to ascertain the cause? Is it not possible that the public have had this year too many juvenile feasts? Six of these peculiar entertainments happening within a few months would not be unlikely, we should imagine, to more than satisfy popular craving. The Annual Festival of the children at St. Paul's — heretofore restricted to a single demonstration — was repeated at the Crystal Palace (or the Crystal Palace fête took place first, we forget which, but it is all the same for our argument); the Tonic Sol-fa Association deemed it necessary to hold a second gathering; and now the Metropolitan School Choral Society feels called upon to follow in the same track, and provide a second entertainment for the music-thirsty public. Of course the last concert of the Metropolitan Schools coming latest fared worst, as by that time the London world might be supposed to have had quite enough of juvenile singing for one year. Now, if there were really anything approaching perfection in the performances of the children; if they sang even as they might be made to sing, had teachers nothing to do but teach, and pupils nothing to do but learn; if with their fresh, pure, liquid voices they could be made to vocalise with the same accent and decision as adults, which they never can be; or even if the whole mass could be brought to move in concert — as we have no doubt a few hundreds from the thousands could — then we do not think that six Juvenile Festivals on a monster scale would be too many in the season, but rather believe that the success of the first would constitute the attraction of the second, and so on. At present it cannot be denied that the Children's Festivals are at least as much indebted for their favourable reception to the indulgence of the public and the forbearance of the critics as to their own excellence. Every allowance is made for deficiencies and shortcomings, and even failure is not visited with reprehension. Should, however, the public and the critics be too frequently taxed in their indulgence and forbearance they may be induced to turn restive, apply the proper tests to the performances, and declare the results. In the number of their concerts the various "Juvenile Societies" do each other no good, but rather the contrary, since by making the Children's Choral Festivals too common they expose the defects of the singers, which at first might be concealed, but in the end must be made known.

If there be an absolute necessity for these annual exhibitions — as the friends of the Societies assure us — let them by all means take place once in a way, and let the utmost care be given to the rehearsals. The public won't grudge its single meeting to the children at St. Paul's, nor to the one Festival of the Metropolitan School Society and the Tonic Sol-fa Association at the Crystal Palace. The truth is, we and many others do not care greatly for concerts performed by juveniles, knowing well from the very constitution of things that they must be incomplete and imperfect; but we should like, nevertheless, to hear them once a year, that we may know what progress the pupils have made, and what influence music has exercised in refining the taste and enlightening the judgment of those to whom taste and judgment otherwise might have been a sealed book. This is the problem we desire to see solved, and for which we have lent our countenance, and will continue to lend it, to the vocal exercitations of the Children.

To the Editor of the MUSICAL WORLD.

SIR,—Theatrical matters at Frankfort-on-the-Maine have once again approached a crisis. The management of the theatre was for a very long period in private hands, but six years ago it was undertaken by a joint-stock company, consisting of inhabitants of the town, who entered upon the enterprise with a capital of 30,000 florins. The corporation granted a yearly subsidy of 8000 florins, 3000 florins being especially set apart for the pension fund, and the remainder for the purchase of scenery, dresses, &c. The management was entrusted to an Intendant, assisted by a committee of shareholders. The first Intendant, Herr Roderich Benedix, appointed at an annual salary of 4000 florins, having proved incompetent for the post, retired of his own accord, and his place was supplied by a smaller committee of three shareholders, aided by the advice of the stage manager, Herr Vollmer. Out of this nominal triumvirate, however, there soon arose an absolute government. Dr. Von Guaita, a lawyer, took the reins entirely out of the hands of his two colleagues, who, it is true, exhibited but very little energy in the discharge of their artistic duties. This may be accounted for by the fact that one of them, Herr W. Speyer, the well-known song composer, is a very old man, and that the other, Herr Reuhl, devotes his attention more particularly to the financial department.

The system pursued by Herr Benedix was marked by feebleness and vacillation, but his successor displayed great strictness and severity, and introduced many excellent reforms on a small scale. He was, it appears, deficient, however, in the urbanity and consideration absolutely necessary in a theatrical manager. It is very certain, too, that Dr. Guaita is deficient, wanting in the proper understanding of what is favourable to the interests of art, for, under his management, the theatre sunk to a very low ebb. About this there are not two opinions. Indeed, the Frankforters resolved to introduce some other system, and several private managers offered to take the theatre entirely at their own risk, or with a much smaller subsidy than that granted by the Corporation. Dr. Guaita, however, possessed some very warm friends among the members of that body, so that the matter remained for some time in abeyance.

Meanwhile a purely personal dispute between Dr. Guaita and Mlle. Januascheck, formerly a member of the company, together with other circumstances connected with the learned jurist's management, became general topics of conversation. To hear the energy and violence with which theatrical affairs are discussed by the Frankforters, one might almost fancy the peoples of Italy, Hungary, and Poland were plunged in the deepest sleep, while peace reigned throughout the world. Mlle. Januascheck, however, was for twelve years the especial favourite of the public here. In the summer of last year she was prevented through illness from fulfilling her professional duties, and Dr. Guaita discharged her in the winter, a measure he was authorised to adopt by the statutes of the theatre. The Frankfort public, nevertheless, highly disapproved of the proceeding, and Dr. Guaita judged it advisable to publish certain letters and documents, for the purpose of proving that Mlle. Januascheck was herself to blame for her discharge. The lady maintained the contrary, affirming that she had been driven away by Dr. Guaita, and promising to adduce proofs of what she advanced. Meanwhile, after leaving the theatre, she got up a brilliant farewell concert, at which Herr Friedrich Devrient, and the Society called the "Liederkranz," gave their services. After the concert, the popular lady was invited to a grand supper by her admirers of both sexes, in the Hôtel de l'Union, and presented with a silver laurel wreath. Some weeks later, she published a pamphlet, entitled, Illustrations for a History of the Frankfort Theatre under the Management of Dr. Von Guaita. By Fanni Januascheck. Being written very wittily, and spiced with facts relating to the Doctor personally, this brochure produced a great sensation, but, for the present, I must forbear venturing a decisive opinion of its merits, as I have heard only one side of the question. It is, in any case, much to be regretted that Dr. Guaita should not have seceded rather than Mlle. Januascheck. The manager's place might easily have been filled up; but there will be some difficulty in finding a satisfactory substitute for the prima donna, who has since been "starring," with great success, at Zurich and elsewhere.

Since Mlle. Januascheck's departure, two incidents in connection with the above circumstances have thrown the whole place into a state of violent commotion. These incidents—which are freely discussed, not only in the town itself, and in the local papers, but in those published elsewhere—have given rise to the bitterest animosity against the police authorities and Dr. Guaita, who being on intimate terms with the chief of the police, is held morally responsible.

A Dr. Ed. Löwenthal, one of the writers on the Arbeitgeber, and editor of a Universitäts Zeitung, expressed his dissatisfaction with the management of the theatre in a very powerful article. By an involuntary error he stated in this article that the Burgomasters of Frankfort had been present at the supper given to Mlle. Januascheck, whereas, in truth, they were merely present at the concert. In consideration that "a paper containing such unreliable intelligence does the town little credit," and, farthermore, on account of an article on military excesses in Greifswalde, Dr. Löwenthal was ordered, on a requisition, as it was pretended, from Prussia, to quit Frankfort! The Prussian embassy declared, however, that it had made no requisition of the kind, so that the general opinion is, that Dr. Löwenthal's expulsion is closely connected with the fact of his being the author of the article condemning Dr. Guaita's management. Dr. Lowenthal himself, as well as the ambassador of Würtemberg, has appealed to the Senate.

The second incident was still stranger, perfectly unique, indeed. A young Austrian, employed as clerk in some mercantile house, after the fall of the curtain, expressed his disapproval of the performance by hissing. For this he, too, was ordered to leave Frankfort! It is true that, according to the law, any alien may be expelled from the town without a reason being assigned; but the present affair created an extraordinary sensation, and, according to report, a general meeting of the inhabitants will shortly be held, for the purpose of protesting against such arbitrary proceedings. It is more than probable that Dr. Guaita will, before now, have found himself unable to escape the effects of the storm he had conjured up around him, for besides Mlle. Januascheck's brochure, another has since been published by Carolina Morska, who, far more bitter than her predecessor, makes serious charges against the theatrical jurist. How all this has ended I am unable to say. You manage such matters better in London. H. H.

Frankfort-on-the-Maine, Sept. 16.

MR. ALFRED MELLON'S CONCERTS.—The "Beethoven Night" on Wednesday was the special feature of the week. The programme included the "Pastoral Symphony," Overture to Egmont, slow movement and finale from the pianoforte Concerto in E flat, aria "In questa tomba," and Rocco's song "Gold, Gold," from Fidelio. The symphony was given entire and created an immense sensation. An audience of big-wigs or Alexander Thayers, indeed, could not have listened to it with more earnest attention, nor received it with greater delight. Both it and the overture were incomparably played. The movements from the pianoforte concerto were executed by Miss Julia Woolf, who appeared somewhat intimidated. Mad. Laura Baxter gave the contralto air beautifully, and Mr. Weiss Rocco's song with splendid power of voice. In the second part, Mad. Florence Lancia — now become one of the greatest attractions of Mr. Mellon's Concerts — sang the Cavatino "Ah! fors' è lui," from the Traviata, and a new ballad by Mr. Mellon, called "Cupid's Eyes," and was encored in both. The fair artist, too, during the week introduced a new song, composed by Mr. Frank Mori, entitled "A thousand miles from thee," which has had a great success.

On Thursday, Spohr's Symphony, "The Power of Sound," was given. A new tenor, Mr. Vernon Rigby, who had obtained a great reputation at the Alhambra, made his appearance and sang three of Mr. Sims Reeves's songs — "Let me like a soldier fall," "My own, my guiding star," and "My pretty Jane." Mr. Rigby has a fine tenor voice, which wants a great deal of cultivation. We advise him to cultivate it. It is worth his while. We would also counsel him not to bring himself into direct comparison with Mr. Sims Reeves. He would sail better to steer clear of that beacon light of the concert-room, which at the same time warns and points out the way. Verbum Sap., which being interpreted means "a good word to tenors."

Letters to the Editor.

SIR, — In your last week's Journal (MUSICAL WORLD) I read an article on Professor Donaldson's organ here; you promise to let us hear more: will you be so kind as tell us the disposition of the fourteen rank stop and length of longest pipe, also shortest?

I attended many of the professor's lectures in his old class-room, and there I saw and heard an organ in which he had a row of pipes (one note) fourteen in number tuned so as all to speak at once: how are they tuned to the scale? — some must be tuned either flat or sharp, otherwise it must sound very bad. I know a discord is a dissonant, or inharmonious combination of sounds, so called in opposition to the concord, the effect of which the discord is calculated to sweeten and relieve. Some discords are formed by the union of the fifth with the sixth, and the forth with the fifth, the seventh with the eighth, and the third with the ninth and seventh, all which require to be introduced by certain preparations; but I have no doubt you will be able to give me a little more light on the subject. I am, Sir,

Yours, very respectfully,

Edinburgh. HOMOPHONOI.

UN PASSE-PARTOUT.

MONSIEUR,—Vous voyez que je suis toujours pŏli et prêt ŏbliger. Vous n'y comprends rien du tout! Helas! helas! c'est trop plaisant! Avouez que vous voulez räiller, ou dites-moi vous ne savez pas quelque chŏse des "Londres Charivari." Eh bien! To drop Français and pick up plain English, allow me to say, in the brusque et bref language of un cheval de chasse—in this unaccountable portion of the United Kingdom nature grants the privilege of speech to our chasseurs, as an antidote to the volubility of the genre "âne" Balaamic—the species common along our eastern coast: premier, that Charivari (the London) having announced a discovery of existing specimens of the farouche palæozoic; c'est à dire (lest this subject should degenerate into a vexata questio), Punch having learned that we have living still among us, in Suffolk, direct descendants of the ancient Britons, whose modes of life and social manners are precisely those of their forefathers; second, that the aforesaid forefathers were (some of them) taken to Rome in the tems (not "Old Father") of Tacitus, &c., to "sit" to the peintre in their various attitudes of savage-vie, for the decoration du spectăc; letroisième, that it proved a successful speculation; quatrième, that I believe it would be equally successful in London now; cinquième et la dernière fois, I, in my character of attrapeur, did, formally, honourably, politely, and condescendingly proffer my services in the aid of any theatrical manager whose enterprising spirit shall induce him to test the value of my proposition.

Hoping this clé may fit the lock of the door of all difficulties in connéxity ăvec moi "foregoing,"

I am, Monsieur, Votre, &c.

HOW TO KNOW AND GIVE RIGHT NAMES TO ALL SORTS OF LESSONS.

THESE are, 1st, Preludes; then 2ndly, Fancies and Voluntaries; 3rdly, Pavines; 4thly, Allmaines; 5thly, Ayres; 6thly, Galliard; 7thly, Corantoes; 8thly, Serabands; 9thly, Tattle de Moys; 10thly, Chichonas; 11thly, Toyes, or Jiggs; 12thly, Common Tunes; but lastly, Grounds, with divisions upon them.

And of every of these I will give you some kind of knowledge, by way of description.

The Prelude is commonly a piece of confused, wild, shapeless-kind of intricate play (as most use it), in which no perfect form, shape, or uniformity can be perceived; but a random business, pottering, and groping up or down from one stop or key to another, and generally so performed to make trial whether the instrument be well in tune or not; by which doing, after they have completed their taning, they will (if they be masters) fall into some kind of voluntary or farcical play more intelligible, which (if he be a master, able), is a way whereby he may more fully and plainly show his excellency and ability, than by any other kind of undertaking, and has an unlimited and unbounded liberty, in which he may make use of the forms and shapes of all the rest.

Pavines are lessons of two, three, or four strains, very grave and sober, full of art and profundity, but seldom used in these our light days.

Allmaines are lessons very ayrey and lively, and generally of two strains, of the common or plain time.

Ayres are, or should be, of the same time (yet many make triplas, and call them so), only they differ from Allmaines by being commonly shorter, and of a more quick and nimble performance.

Galliards are lessons of two or three strains, but are performed in a slow and large triple time, and (commonly) grave and sober.

Corantoes are lessons of a shorter cut, and of a quicker triple time; commonly of two strains, and full of sprightfulness and vigour, lively, brisk, and cheerful.

Serabands are of the shortest triple time, but are more toyish and light than Corantoes, and commonly of two strains.

A Tattle de Moy is a new fashion'd thing, much like a Seraband, only it has more of conceit in it, as (in a manner) speaking the word (tattle de moy) and of humour (as you will find quite through this book, where they are set), that conceit being never before published, but broached together with this work. It may supply the place of a Seraband, at the end of a suit of lessons, at any time.

Chichonas are only a few conceited humorous notes, at the end of a suit of lessons very short, viz., not many in number, yet sometimes consists of two strains, although but of two semibreves in a strain, and commonly of a grave kind of humour.

Toys or Jiggs are light, squibbish things, only fit for fantastical and easy, light-headed people, and are of any sort of time.

Common Tunes (so called) are commonly known by the boys and common people singing them in the streets, and are of either sort of time; of which there are many very excellent and well-contrived pieces, neat and spruce ayre.

The Ground is a set number of slow notes, very grave and stately, which (after it is expressed once or twice very plainly), then he that hath good brains and a good hand undertakes to play several divisions upon it, time after time, till he has showed his bravery both of invention and hand.

Thus I have given you to understand the several sorts and shapes of most lessons in use.

CHURCH MUSIC.

SIR,—Will you allow me a corner to complain of what is becoming a perfect nuisance in at least one of our churches, not very far from the Sand Pits? I mean the fine singing. The subject was mooted in your columns two or three years ago, I am sorry to say with very little effect, owing, it was thought, to the fact that the organist gave her services gratuitously, and the consequent delicacy of the point. The case, however, being now altered—having now a paid organist—we did think to have had something like decency in the conduct of the singing. The fact, however, is the reverse. Whereas we did formerly get good performances on the organ, if the singing was of somewhat too difficult a character for untrained voices, now we shine in the last, but lack the first most terribly. Congregational singing is o it of the question. If we get a hymn tune occasionally that we can sing, the chants, or rather the tunes to which the psalms are sung, are altogether of too intricate a character for any ordinary congregation to attempt to join in. After standing up for a quarter of an hour while the Te Deum is performed, and counting the rafters in the roof, you begin to wish devoutly it were over, that you might sit down to something a little more edifying, which you are allowed to do in the course of a few minutes.

But this is not the worst of it. The aim of the singers appears to be not to sing "to the praise and glory of God," nor even to give effect to the music (much of which is really fine), but to give as much scope to their own voices as possible, which means they try to effect by the loudness of the noise they make. Each sings at the top of his or her voice, the trebles trying to drown the bass and tenor, the second treble trying (and very often succeeding) to drown all. The general effect may perhaps "be imagined," but is certainly beyond my ability to describe. The style in some instances is more like a comic song (which idea is strengthened by the comical pronunciation of quite ordinary words, such as fel*ler*ship, &c., instead of singing becoming for a place of worship.

Judging from yesterday's performance I should think the matter had about reached its climax, and that the incumbent and churchwardens would certainly interfere and put a stop to what I must call disgraceful irreverence. If they do not they must not be surprised to see empty seats, for there are other churches in the neighbourhood where, if more modest in their attempts, they are proportionately more successful in their results. THE BIRMINGHAM GENERAL HOSPITAL.

THIS noble and time-honoured institution has pursued its course of charity and work of mercy for upwards of fourscore years, and from its opening, in the year 1778, until the present time, has administered medical and surgical relief to more than half a million of sick and maimed poor. According to the statistics in the Auditor's Report for the year 1860, the Institution received no fewer than 23,434 in and out-patients; of whom 12,383 were accidents and urgent medical cases admitted without-tickets. This number is found, on comparison, to exceed, with the exception of the four old metropolitan endowed hospitals, the number treated in any other hospital in England.

The annual expenditure of the Institution is 9,200*l.*, to meet which it has an income of 4,400*l.* from annual subscriptions, and 1,500*l.* from invested property (including the interest arising from the Permanent Accident Fund); there is, consequently, an annual deficit of 3,300*l.*, dependent entirely upon the benevolence of the public and the results of the triennial musical festivals. This deficiency of expenditure over reliable income — which is entirely attributable to the fact of so many accidents and urgent cases being admitted without tickets — is matter of great and increasing anxiety to the weekly Board of Governors. Nor can it be a subject of surprise when it is stated that these patients — who, from the very dangerous and lingering state of their accidents or ailments, constitute by far the most expensive class of cases treated — cost the hospital 4,600*l.* annually; towards the support of whom the Institution only commands an income of 430*l.* from the Accident Fund and Free Subscription List. It is, moreover, apparent, from the rapid increase of population and the development of manufacturing and mining operations in the town and district, that these accidents and cases of acute illness are increasing in a corresponding ratio.

Notwithstanding the liberal response made to the appeals by the clergy and ministers of all denominations on Sunday, 13th November, 1859, and the munificent sum contributed through their instrumentality, the Institution is still heavily in debt. This cannot be wondered at, when it is explained that the number of patients relieved during the three years ending June 30th, 1860, amounted to 60,804, against 46,594, the total for the three previous years ending 1857, being an increase of 14,210; and that, in consequence of the depressed state of trade, the receipts for the official year, from donations, legacies, and other contingent sources of income, have lamentably fallen short, as compared with former years. The donations of the present year only amount to 450*l.* against 910*l.*, the average of the three last years; and the legacies to 200*l.*, against 1,800, the average for the same period. The present balance to the debit of the hospital at the treasurer's is 4,200*l.*; and this will be considerably augmented when the tradesmen's accounts for Midsummer have been defrayed. The balance against the hospital at the corresponding period before the Festival in 1858 was 3,942; and the following account, laid before a special meeting of the weekly board in March last, exhibits the causes of this increase of debt.

An Account exhibiting the causes of the estimated deficit at the 31st of July, 1861, as compared with the corresponding period of 1858, just before the Festival.

1858, July 31. Dr.
To balance due to Treasurers ...	£2,382 0 0
To Investment Account temporarily expended, but paid back out of 1859 Receipts	1,560 0 0	£3,942 0 0
To Deficiency of Donation and Legacies applicable to Current Expenditure, during the three years ending 31st July, 1861, as compared with 1858		4,278 0 0
To Cost of increased number of Patients during the same period (in-patients, 1,210; out-patients, 13,200)		2,271 0 0
To Extraordinary Expenditure on Buildings, Furniture, &c., during the three years above, to 31st July, 1861		1,875 0 0
		£12,366 0 0

1861, July 31. Cr.
By Increase of Subscription List during the three years ending this day		£2,740 0 0
By Increase in Dividends' Account during the same period		392 0 0
By Amount received from Collections in the year 1859	£5,200 0 0
Less transfer to Donation and Subscription Accounts, Expenditure, &c. &c.	878 0 0	4,322 0 0
By estimated Deficiency in the Treasurers' Account, on July 31, 1861		4,911 0 0
		£12,366 0 0

The Weekly Board have, nevertheless, long contemplated the erection of a second new wing to the hospital. By a special appeal, issued in January last, the proposed building "is intended not only to provide additional beds for patients, but, on the testimony of the Medical Board, dated 16th March, 1859, is deemed absolutely and imperatively essential on sanitary grounds, to relieve the crowded state of the present wards." "It will also provide a convenient operating theatre (the present one having been constructed when the hospital contained only 60 beds, and it now has 240), a new chapel for the proper performance of divine service, nurses' accommodation, and improved Domestic offices." The cost is estimated at 5000*l.*, towards which 3500*l.* has already been contributed; but the Board feel that they cannot commence this work until the heavy balance against the treasurers has been liquidated. The Festival Committee, deeply impressed with the extreme importance of maintaining this noble Hospital unfettered in its operations, and of enabling it to dispense in an enlarged manner the inestimable blessings of health to the sick and afflicted poor, earnestly appealed to the public, and invited their patronage and support on the occasion of the recent Festival. They felt that the cause for which they were striving was good and great — that hospitals were, of all charities, the most capable of affording relief, and least liable to abuse — and that there was none more worthy than the Birmingham General Hospital.

operas at the Theatre Royal. The season commenced on Monday last, the 16th, with Trovatore. As usual, a very numerous and enthusiastic audience assembled on the occasion. The opera was cast as follows:—

Leonora—Mlle. Titiens,
Azucena—Mad. Lemaire,
Manrico—Signor Giuglini,
Conte di Luna—Signor Delle Sedie.

Notwithstanding the unpleasant effects of a rough passage from Holyhead the day before, all the singers were in excellent voice, and achieved great success. Each met with a hearty welcome, Arditi being, perhaps, more favoured than the rest. "Viva! Victor Emmanuel!" "Bravo, Arditi!" "Arditi, where's your wig?" and other similar expressions, from the galleries were to be heard amidst the storm of applause which greeted the popular conductor upon his appearance in the orchestra. It is needless to describe the performance of Trovatore by artists who are so well known. Suffice it to say, there were the usual encores and recalls, and that everybody was delighted. The manager delighted because the house was full—the singers delighted because they were vociferously applauded—the public delighted because the manager had brought them singers to applaud. The "gods" expressed their delight in the style peculiar to themselves. They yelled and whistled at Titiens as loudly as ever; they frightened Delle Sedie by approving "Il Balen" after the same fashion. Between the acts they amused themselves with the customary discordant noises, and they did not hesitate to tell Giuglini, in the middle of "Ah si ben mio," that he sang better than Mario. A favourite amusement with the "gods" in question is to assist the bands to tune their instruments. This they do by making the most horrible din imaginable, producing an effect upon the more sedate portion of the audience too deafening to endure for long. Luckily, the band of the Theatre Royal does not require much tuning, otherwise this practice of the "gods" would deprive ordinary mortals of all pleasure for the rest of the evening.

On Tuesday, the 17th, Mlle. Anna Whitty made her appearance in Puritani, and was eminently successful. This young lady possesses a most agreeable voice, which she uses with great skill. Her appearance and acting are unexceptionably ladylike and artistic. She will undoubtedly attain a high position as an operatic singer, and is a valuable addition to the list of our native prima donnas. Giuglini charmed all who heard him, and warbled, as our neighbours would say, "to ravish." Delle Sedie is a great artist, perhaps the most accomplished baritone on the Italian stage. A recollection of his singing the music allotted to Riccardo—how exquisitely refined was every passage he delivered of his impressive acting, every gesture, every look, indicative of sentiment and purpose,—confirms the opinion. With less voice than many baritones of the present day, he contrives to make amends for this deficiency by the most consummate art, and enchants the listener by the ineffable delicacy of his vocalisation. Ciampi exerted himself vigorously as Giorgio, and sang his solo in the famous duet, "Suoni la tromla," with appropriate animation. Indeed, so excited were the two, Riccardo and Giorgio, when they came to the ensemble with which the duet finishes, that it was a question whether they might not meet with the fate of Harmonides, the flute-player, who, according to Lucian, played a solo at the Olympic games so loudly that he burst his throat and died on the spot. No such fatal accident, however, happened to our Puritans, whose vocal efforts excited the admiration of the "gods" before-mentioned to an unlimited extent.

Last night, Wednesday, Norma was the opera performed.

Norma—Mlle. Titiens,
Adelgisa—Mlle. Whitty,
Oroveso—Signor Ciampi,
Pollio—Mr. Swift.

The ladies fully sustained their reputation, and were, of course, greatly applauded in the celebrated duets. The débutant of the evening, Mr. Swift, is spoken of in all the daily papers as being the best Pollio heard upon the Dublin stage—rather strong praise, considering his predecessors have been none other than Mario and Tamberlik. Mr. Swift's voice has greatly improved, and he has, moreover, made vast progress as an actor. To-morrow night his powers will be tested by a very different style of music to that of Norma. He is to appear in Barbière as Almaviva, with Mlle. Whitty, Delle Sedie, Bossi, and Ciampi. To-night Marta will be given, and Lucrezia Borgia is announced for Saturday. Thus we shall have had six operas during this the first week of the present Italian Opera season.

ANTHATER.

RYDE, ISLE OF WIGHT.—A correspondent informs us that Mrs. Merest, late Miss Maria B. Hawes, some time since the most popular contralto in the country, has reappeared in public life, and gave two concerts at the Victoria Rooms on Monday, the 9th instant, one in the morning devoted to sacred music, the other, in the evening, to secular. The fair artist appears to have been eminently successful, and was applauded to the echo in all her efforts, holy and profane. In the morning Mrs. Merest sang the recitative and air, "Behold, a virgin," "Oh, thou that tellest good tidings from Zion," and "He was despised," from the Messiah; the airs, "If with all your hearts," and "O rest in the Lord," from Elijah; and in the evening, Hadyn's canzonet, "She never told her love;" her own ballads, "I'll speak of thee"—at one time so great a favourite—and "I saw thee weep;" and the song from Robin Hood—Robin's song—"My own, my guiding star." That Mrs. Merest will be welcomed back to the concert-room, of which she was ere while so distinguished an ornament, is a matter of course, more especially as contraltos are now few and far between. We should, however, advise her earnestly to forego all expectation to be derived from undertaking the tenor repertory. We have not heard her sing, "If with all your hearts," and "My own, my guiding star;" but, despite the fervent expressions of our correspondent, we cannot help feeling assured that the attempt to rival Mr. Sims Reeves in London would be followed by unmitigated failure. Such non-natural aspirations should be resigned to caricaturists of the great tenor. We have no doubt of Mrs. Merest's success at Ryde, and shall be glad to hear her once more in the capital, where she has so often won honour and renown.

BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL.—At a meeting of the Festival Committee Mr. Hickman submitted a statement of the financial results, embracing everything except the items of "Donations after the Festival." From that statement it appears that the gross receipts were 10,970*l.* against 10,497*l.* in 1858. Donations raising the total to 11,000*l.* were received at the meeting. The sterling merits of the musical performances account for the gratifying result shown by the receipts, as the donations were less by about 200*l.* than in 1858. The following is a corrected summary of the receipts at the last two Festivals:—

Receipts, Tuesday, 1st day	£3,126 18 8	£2,702 7 10
„ Wednesday, 2nd day	1,937 16 0	1,945 10 5

Schemes	317 4 0	310 0 0
Total	£10,497 7 1	£10,970 7 5

The following donations have been received since the Festival:—August 31: Miss A. E. Taylor, 5*l.*; W. F. Taylor, Esq., 10*l.*; Miss Anderton, 5*l.* September 2: Frederick Gye, Esq., 50*l.*; S. Tilley, 3*l.* 3*s.* September 6: Lord Calthorpe, 50*l.*; Anonymous (per Mr. Hickman), 8*l.* 8*s.* The total of donations received since the conclusion of the Festival is thus raised to 290*l.* 14*s.*, making the total receipts at the present moment 11,261*l.* 1*s.* 5*d.*, or 119*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* more than the total receipts of 1858. Other donations will no doubt be yet received, and it is therefore premature to speculate to what extent the funds of the General Hospital will be benefited by the Festival.

SOMETHING ABOUT WARSAW.

AFTER the autumn vacation, it is expected by the sanguine, that Polish will be made the language of public instruction in the gymnasiums at Warsaw, though the information hitherto published on the subject in the Polish journals is not very reassuring. The Government shows itself as sensitive with regard to the susceptibilities of Germans as it is callous in respect to those of Poles; and to avoid the possibility of any small German being "Polanised" against his will, or that of his parents or grandparents, or great-grandparents—now, it is to be presumed, no more—it is proposed that all juvenile Poles of German origin, counting as far back as the third generation, shall be regarded as Germans and educated accordingly. This is a test of nationality worthy of those electors of Southwark who, on the strength of his name, declared Mr. Layard to be a Frenchman. Applied in Poland, it would make Germans of the late Lelewel, one of the most enthusiastic of Polish patriots (in consequence of which he was exiled, not only from all Polish territory, but even from liberal, sympathetic France); of Vincent Pol, one of the most popular of living Polish poets, and who was considered sufficiently a Pole in 1846 to be all but murdered in the massacres of that year; of Dr. Dieth, the most eminent of Polish physicians, and one of the Polish representatives in the Reichsrath. For the last four or five centuries the best portion of the middle class in Poland has been composed almost exclusively of German settlers and their descendants. There are Poles in Cracow with German names whose ancestors have been burgesses of the city since the 15th century, and to describe whom as Germans would be very nearly as absurd as to describe Englishmen of Franco-Norman origin as Frenchmen. Remove the Austrian troops, the German and Bohemian civil functionaries, and a certain number of Viennese shopkeepers established in Lemberg, and the "German element" in Gallicia will be small indeed. The Government gives it a magnified appearance in the eyes of foreigners by Germanising the names of Polish towns, and maintaining German as much as possible, in spite of protests and promises, as the public language of the country. It also keeps up German theatres, which no one attends, and German newspapers, which no one reads. The German theatre in Lemberg is supported by a forced contribution levied on the Polish municipality, amounting to 40,000 florins a year—a sum which, if the Austrian currency consisted of silver and gold, and not of curl-papers, might be worth 4000*l.* of our money, and which at the actual rate of exchange is equivalent to 3000*l.* When dramas and comedies are performed, the audience is composed of about six Germans, who encourage one another the best way they can, and perhaps one Pole, who has looked in simply to enjoy the dulness of the evening. Occasionally, too, as happened when I was in Lemberg, an Italian opera is performed in the German language—a fine language, certainly, for such a purpose, in which tu m'ami can only be rendered by du liebst mich! This attempted suppression of one of the manifestations of national life is the more intolerable, inasmuch as the Poles have admirable actors of their own, and a comedy writer who, as a creator, or rather a presenter of national types, has certainly not his equal in Western Europe, where our dramatic works possess more or less literary merit, but have long ceased, and perhaps of necessity, to reflect in any broad manner national peculiarities. From the needy Polish gentleman of the ancient Republic, who, in spite of his utter want of cash, says to himself that he is, in a political sense, eligible for the Polish throne, to the Polish Anglo-maniac of the present day, who sets up milestones on his estate, and thinks it the height of pleasure to drive an English mile before breakfast,—the comedies of Alexander Fredro abound in characters whose humour is eminently Polish. It is worth observing that this love of imitating foreigners is also in part the subject of the best Russian comedy ever written. Indeed, in spite of notable differences, there are many points of resemblance, social and intellectual, between the Russians and Poles—far more than either of them, and especially the Poles in their present most natural mood, would care to acknowledge.—Times.

THE FEMALE SWISS SINGERS IN EDINBURGH.—"In the music and piquant manners of the Female Swiss Singers Mr. Howard has afforded his patrons something like a new "sensation." The band consists of six ladies, all neatly attired in the characteristic dresses of the Swiss peasantry—with short skirts, muslin neck-pieces, and high-heeled shoes. First the whole band joins in chorus; then the individual members sing solos or duetts; and the entertainment usually closes with a scena—one of the ladies personating a gentleman in order to give eclat to the performance. The artists who distinguish themselves in solo singing are Miss Keller, Miss Johanna Claussen, and Mrs. Decker-Schenck, and all are particularly clever both in their singing and acting. In a long piece, entitled "The Modern School of Vocalization," they gave some capital imitations of ballad, Italian, and nigger singing, which were, of course, vociferously encored. We could say a great deal more about this talented troupe, but description quite fails to convey an adequate idea of such a musical treat. The Swiss singers must be heard, and once heard they are sure to induce a second visit."—(North Briton.)

A HINT TO MUSIC PUBLISHERS.—(From the Builder).—A range of buildings, forming ten alms-houses, has been recently erected and completed at Old Buckenham, Norfolk, the inmates having been installed a few days since by their benefactor, Mr. Robert Cocks, of New Burlington Street, London, who, at his own cost, has purchased the land, and erected these buildings for the benefit of the poor deserving inhabitants born in the above-named village. This kind-hearted gentleman has also endowed them with 2*s.* per week each, and a ton of coals per annum, for ever. A handsome Bible, of large type, is placed in each house for the use of the inmates. The frontage of the buildings is about 222 feet. Each house consists of a living room and bed-room, each 10 feet 6 inches square, and 9 feet high in the clear, both lighted from the front. The floors of living rooms are of paving tiles, on 6 inches of concrete; those of the bed-rooms are of wood. Each room has a fire-place fitted with Pierce's cottager's stove; also a cupboard and other conveniences. Opening from the living-rooms are wash-houses, 8 feet square, with sink and a place for coals; also a separate "closet" for each house. The buildings are of red brick, with white brick and Bath (Box ground) stone dressings; the two ends being brought forward 3 feet, with pointed gables, and moulded stone coping and angular buttresses. In each gable is a shield and monogram (R.C.) in a quatrefoil. There are two porches to centre houses, projecting, and carried up with a gable and buttress, also containing a stone tablet with inscription. The whole is roofed with Bangor Duchess slating on 1-inch boarding, &c., and surmounted by an ornamental ridge and crest tiling. The sashes are of cast iron. Three sides of the ground are inclosed with a red brick wall, 3 feet nine inches high, coped with white saddle-back coping bricks, the gate piers being carried up somewhat higher, and surmounted with stone caps, weathered, and gables on all sides. At the rear of the buildings, in the centre, forming the water supply, is a well of spring water, and a rain-water tank; the whole of the rain water being collected from the various roofs, and conducted by means of glazed earthenware pipes into the said tank. The cost of the buildings, including the purchase of the ground, is about 2000*l.*; this sum being exclusive of the architect's fees and the endowment. The builders are Messrs. Loveday, of the above village, who have executed the work from the designs and under the superintendence of Mr. Thomas Dyke, of London, architect.

EVANS'S

COTTAGE HARMONIUM

At SIX GUINEAS,

Has Five Octaves and Two Foot-boards, is in a French-polished Case, and has a soft, subdued, agreeable quality of tone, designed expressly to suit a Cottage or Small Sitting-room.—BOOSEY and CHING, Manufacturers, 24 Holles Street, Oxford Street, W.

EVANS'S

TEN-GUINEA HARMONIUM

Is in a solid, handsome French-polished Case, and possesses that rich and organ-like quality of tone which particularly distinguishes these Instruments from the French.—BOOSEY and CHING, Manufacturers, 24 Holles Street, Oxford Street, W.

EVANS'S

ENGLISH HARMONIUMS

WITH TWO ROWS OF KEYS,

At 45 and 63 Guineas, without Pedals, and 47 and 130 Guineas, with Pedals,

Although particularly adapted for Churches, are equally effective in the Drawing-room. Not only have the leading members of the profession, including Messrs. Sterndale Bennett, Balfe, Potter, Henry Smart, Best, &c., but the Clergy and the Press have also testified to the very great superiority of EVANS'S HARMONIUMS. These Testimonials may be seen upon reference to Boosey and Ching's Illustrated Catalogue of Harmoniums.

The whole of EVANS'S INSTRUMENTS possess that organ-like quality of tone which has been hitherto unattained by any other manufacturer, and are made throughout in the strongest and most substantial manner by the best "ENGLISH WORKMEN." They are neither affected by heat nor damp.

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

October 3.

MOURNFUL is the almost solitary theme left me to descant on in my present letter. It is the heavy loss which the French stage sustains both in its honour and ability by the death of Mad. Rose Chéri, whose unblemished private character rendered her an exception, though, it is just to say, not a solitary one, among her co-mates. The fact that this lady fell a victim to her maternal devotion (the cause of her death being diphtheria, caught of her son, whom she was nursing) is so emphatically set forth in all the obituary notices published on her in the French papers, that it is at once made plain how little the most ordinary domestic virtues are expected to be found in company with histrionic eminence. The career of Rose Chéri has shown that, even in France, a woman can be born, as it were, within call of the prompter's boy, and live an entire life on and by the stage, without forfeiting one jot of the substantial virtues and outward respectabilities which best beseem her sex, and which it is but a cheating exchange to part with for any amount of the glitter and tinkle of public distinction. The deceased actress was the daughter of a M. and Mad. Cizos, provincial actors, and came into the world, at Etampes, thirty-seven years since. Owing, it is said, to some absurd pun on his name having annoyed him, her father changed it to Chéri, and the assumed cognomen acquired early celebrity from the talent which his daughter displayed as a child in the part of Léontine Focq. Her début in Paris took place at the Gymnase, in June, 1842. The piece in which she appeared was Estelle, but she made little or no impression on this occasion. Another chance was afforded her a month later, when she was fortunate enough to give marked tokens of the talent she subsequently developed with such conspicuous success. Having become the chief ornament of the Gymnase, she was promoted to the chief place in the household of its director, and became Mad. Montigny. She was doubtless a most accomplished actress, although, to my mind, somewhat cold and artificial. Not a little of the favour she enjoyed with the public, however, was due to the respect she inspired from the known purity of her private life and the amiability of her character in all her social relations.

On Monday M. Faure made his début in the Poniatowski opera Pierre de Medicis, which has undergone certain modifications, which the princely composer himself, M. St. Georges, the writer of the book, and M. Emilien Pacini, joined in effecting. These changes consist in the suppression of the lugubrious scene in which Laura was deprived of her locks, the capillary sacrifice being now prevented by the timely arrival of Peter, who saves her from the fatal shears and unites her to his brother. The former finale, also, is now replaced by a grand concerted piece, with chorus and the principal part for the tenor. This piece was never before executed, and was written by the Prince for M. Fraschini, who was to have sung it at Madrid.

At the Opéra Comique, L'Etoile du Nord has been revived for the return of Mad. Ugalde, who, in spite of spiteful detractors, soars as triumphantly as ever above the difficulties of her part. The character of Danilowitch is transferred to M. Pouchard, owing to the departure of M. Delauny Riquier; and Mad. Reeilly replaces the likewise absent Mlle. Prevost, as one of the vivandières. M. Roger has returned, and sang last week in Haydée, but he has been mute since from illness, whether the usual "morbus tenoris" (" indisposizione di tenor ")—I know not.

The bills of the Théâtre Lyrique alternately announce La Statue (M. Rety's opera) and Le Bijou Perdu. Mad. Cabel's appearance in Jaguarita is promised ere long.

Paris, further than the above, yields little more news of a musical interest. So I must make an excursion to foreign lands. Let us to St. Petersburg, taking Berlin by the way. In the latter city the Royal Theatre is preparing to produce Spontini's opera of Nurmahal on a scale of extraordinary magnificence, the occasion being the rejoicings on the coronation of King William I. The chapel choir of Berlin—technically called in the language Dom Chor—is to take part in the ceremony at Kœnigsberg. They are to appear in a costume special to such occasions, and which is thus described:—a scarlet levite or gown, black breeches with buckled garters, buckled shoes, black velvet cap. As fine feathers do not make fine birds, quiristers in scarlet are none the less prone to fail in expression as well as in tone. Ere I go to the north you may just think it worth a short round about only just to find out that at Frankfort-on-the-Maine the people have been playing an opera by Schubert, which is not exactly new, but has never been played before, though they say it's a beautiful score. The Domestic War it is christened, and I am told the public listened with the most intense delight, applauding with all their might at the posthumous production which now by Time's effluxion is allowed to see the light — why so late astounds me quite. What the critics find to praise they express by this neat phrase — the colouring is delicately fine; what they mean I can't divine. Now let's off to the capital of the Czar, the distance on paper is not far. Here again the funeral knell fills the air with its solemn swell, singing the old melancholy song, "Short is life though art is long." I regret in short to state that the manager of the State-opera here is now the late M. Cavos, for a fit — apoplectical to wit — has removed him from the scene, and this curious fact I glean — that the present house of mourning is the same that he was born in. He was buried with all honour, all his troupe, from "prima donna" to the chorus, taking part in the "Requiem" of Mozart—which was chanted o'er his grave. Here permission let me crave to enumerate the names of the signors and the dames, who are worthiest to be noted in the troupe I just have quoted: Ladies first, Mads. La Grua, Nantier-Didiée, Fioretti, Bernardi, Dottini and Everardi. Gentlemen next, Signors Tamberlik, Graziani, Everardi, Marini. The sudden death of the manager has retarded the opening of the season. Your readers have already been told that the new opera Verdi has been composing expressly for St. Petersburg is to be entitled La Forza dèl destino. It is said that the maestro has asked and is to have 80,000 fr. for his score (3,200*l*.). Much more will be spent on the "getting up" of the opera, and it is doubtful whether the large capital fund thus sunk will return a profit, for the public of St. Petersburg is a limited one, and does not constantly recruit itself from the rest of the empire as do those of Paris and London. Some people think some of the money to be thus hazardously expended might more wisely have found its way into the coffers of the National Lyrical Theatre, which is sadly in want of leading artists, and would be none the worse for an extended repertory. The old ballet of Esmeralda, than which few since produced have been better, has been produced at the Théâtre Marie, with Mlle. Nadedja Bogdanoff in the part so charmingly created by the regretted Carlotta Grisi — whose "truandaise" was wont to be the chief joy of our truant days.

I suppose it is not information to your readers to say that Meyerbeer takes the direction of the music for the coronation festival at Kœnigsberg, and that he has composed a solemn hymn expressly for that occasion. It may be news, however, to state that in the ancient city of the Prussian kings there is an opera house, and that recently in that opera house was performed Herr Wagner's Opera of the Phantom Ship, and that to hear that opera the honest Königsbergers flocked in vast numbers, hailing the work of the prophet composer with mighty enthusiasm.

The Italian Opera of Paris opened last Tuesday with Il Matrimonio Segreto. Of this event more in my next. Here is the cast of Gluck's Alceste at the Grand Opera: Alceste, Mad. Pauline Viardot; Une Suivante, Mlle. Taisy; Admète, M. Michot; Le Grand Prêtre, M. Cazot; Caron, M. Coulon; Hercule, M. Borchard; Apollon, M. Mechelaere; Evandre, M. Kœnig; Un héraut, M. Freret.

NEW YORK.—Herr Ullmann appears to be in a bad way. There is no chance, for the present at least, of his securing the services either of Mad. Medori or Mad. Charton, so that, in all probability, the Empire City will remain this season operaless. This seems to be Herr Ullmann's own view of the matter, for he has let the Academy of Music to Professor Hermann, the conjurer; and, if in his heart he wishes that worthy gentleman could conjure him away to some land where debtors can walk about without fear of unpleasant consequences, surely no one can blame him.

ST. PETERSBURG.—Signor Cavos, composer and stage-manager of the Imperial Opera House, is dead.

MUSIC AT BERLIN.

(From our own Correspondent.)

All our vocal stars have returned, and are once more shining away in the firmament of the Royal Opera-house. Mlle. Lucca has made her appearance as Leonora in Verdi's Trovatore with immense success. This young lady has been very lucky. She has won the hearts of the Berlin opera-goers by storm, and seized, in almost no time, on the giddy position of a popular favourite. I perfectly agree with the opinion of the public as to her merits, for we might seek in vain all through Germany for many singers endowed with such a voice as that which she possesses; but, while admitting all her good qualities, I cannot help thinking it would be far preferable, and certainly far more artistic for her, not to be always employing certain high notes, simply because she happens to possess them, while other fair artists do not. She was especially great in the last act, and was rewarded by the most enthusiastic applause. I am sorry to say she was prevented by sudden indisposition from repeating her performance, as announced in the bills. Let us hope her indisposition will not be of long duration. The other parts were well sustained by Mlle. De Ahna, Herren Formes, Betz, and Fricke. — Mad. Jachmann Wagner appeared once more on the operatic stage as Orpheus in Glück's Orpheus und Eurydice, previously to quitting the Opera-house for the theatre. A great many people deprecate the resolution she has thus adopted, or is said to have adopted, on the ground that no one is to be found like her in such parts as this very part of Orpheus, and in those of Clytemnestra, Statira, Sextus, Eglantine, Lady Macbeth, &c. &c. On the 21st September the Royal Opera-house was crammed to the very ceiling. Not a nook or corner was unoccupied. Not a place was to be got for love or money. The cause of this unusual concourse was a very proper wish on the part of the public to pay a suitable mark of respect to a retiring veteran.—After an active professional career of fifty-two years, Herr Zschiesche took his farewell as Sarastro in Die Zauberflöte, and, considering the extensive range of his repertory, which included operas of the German, French, and Italian schools, as well as those of the description more particularly designated "opéras comiques," it must be owned that his place will not be so easily filled up. Herr Zschiesche was also a good oratorio-singer, and a valuable member of the Singacademie. He was a worthy representative of old art, such as is, now-a-days, not often met with. During the course of the evening he was nearly overwhelmed with flowers and laurel wreaths, and called forth several times while the opera was proceeding, as well as when the curtain had fallen on him for the last time. In a short, but feeling speech, he thanked the public for the kindness they had always displayed towards him, and, after requesting they would still sometimes think of him, withdrew, visibly affected.

The admirers of Meyerbeer—and their name is legion—will be pleased that the King of Prussia is shortly to be crowned at Königsberg. If you ask me the reason I have for making this assertion, I reply thus: "I do not pretend, for it would be absurd in me to do so, that the admirers of M. Meyerbeer are, as a class of persons, separate and distinct from each and every other class of persons, particularly interested in the fact that his Prussian Majesty will shortly, as is now generally known, be anointed King in the old city of Königsberg, if we look upon that fact in a merely political light. But we do not look upon the fact aforesaid in merely a political light. Far from it. We look at it in a musical light as well. M. Meyerbeer, who, as you are aware, is Royal Musical Director-General, and, moreover, as you may perhaps not be aware, a Doctor into the bargain, has been entrusted with the composition of a grand march for the coronation. This, I think, will satisfactorily account for the presence of the lacteal fluid within the adamantine and hirsute sphere of the fruit wherewith the simious tribe are said at times to pelt, in playful sportiveness, unwary travellers. This march will be played by the bands of the cavalry and infantry regiments, stationed in the courtyard of the palace, during the passage of their "Most highest Lordships and highest Lordships"* to the Palace church and back. On the evening of the coronation there will be a grand concert in the Moscovite Room, at the palace, and this concert, also, will be under the personal direction of M. Meyerbeer, who has just returned from Ems on his road to Königsberg.

Talking of this self-same coronation, I must inform you that, some time since, the well-known music publisher here, Herr G. Bock, offered a prize for the best triumphal march in honour of the event. Eighty-three competitors have answered the appeal. Fifty-two contributions have come from the kingdom of Prussia itself. Of these 21 have proceeded from Berlin, 8 from the province of Brandenberg, 4 from Preussen, 3 from Pomerania, 6 from Saxony, 5 from Silesia, 3 from Posen, and 4 from the Rhine provinces. From other parts, 1 came from Anhalt-Köthen, 5 from Bavaria, 1 from Bremen, 1 from Frankfort-on-the-Maine, 1 from Hamburgh, 2 from Hesse-Darmstadt, 1 from Lübeck, 2 from Mecklenburg-Schwerin, 3 from Austria; 2 from the kingdom of Saxony; 1 from Saxe-Weimar; 2 from Schwarzburg-Rudalstadt; 1 from Wurtemburg; 2 from France; 1 from England; 2 from Italy; 1 from Russia (Smolensk), and 2 from Belgium. Herren Taubert and Dorn, of Berlin, and H. Lachner, of Munich, have kindly consented to act as umpires, and decide on the merits of the eighty-three marches, and a very agreeable and amusing task they will have, I make no doubt. I wonder whether they will have the marches all played over by a full military band stationed on the stairs or in the backyard of the house where they meet to agree on their decision. If so, I should say the other tenants, and their neighbours, will be much pleased, particularly those subject to anything like headaches. Fancy Mr. Babbage under the circumstances!

Signor Merelli, the impresario of the Italian Opera at the Royal Opera-house, has just arrived with the tenor, Signor Emilio Pancani. Herr Strakosch, also, from New York, has paid us a visit, on his way to Vienna. Signor Morelli's company commences its two months' engagement on the 1st October, and is thus composed — Sopranos: Carlotta Marchisio, Maria Rideri: altos: Zelia Trebelli, Barbara Marchisio; tenors: Pancani, Montanari; baritones: Squarcia, Zacchi; bassos: Agnesi and Coselli; buffo: Borella, and conductor: Orsini. Adelina Patti will be added, in a week or so, as prima donna. For small parts, artists of the German company will lend their assistance, and sing in Italian. The chorus, on the other hand, which will be that of the Royal German Opera, will sing in German. An admirable arrangement is not it? It will save a small sum in the salaries and conduce so much to the dignity of art!

Herr Dorn has just concluded a new opera, entitled Der Pastetenbäcker (the Pastrycook), words by Herr M. Heydrich. It is to be produced after Christmas.

The following fact cannot fail to interest all admirers of that great genius who wrote the "Pastoral." A number of his admirers collected, during his lifetime, four instruments, consisting of a violin by Nicholas Amati, 1690; a violin by Joseph Guarneri, 1718; a viola, by Vincent Regeri, 1690; and a violoncello, by Andreas Guarneri, 1712. On these instruments well-known masters used to play Beethoven's music in his presence. The instruments afterwards got dispersed, and passed into various hands, until, at length, Herr Peter Jokits, a merchant at Vienna, succeeded in purchasing them all, and offered to present them to the Royal Library in Berlin, on condition of their always being known as "Jokits-Stiftung." His offer was accepted, and the instruments are now in the Royal Library here. On special occasions, works of Beethoven, and Beethoven alone, will be played on them.

The King has just bestowed the Gold Medal for Art upon Herr Franz Mücke, in return for a composition that gentleman lately dedicated to his Majesty. By the way, while I am treating you to the gossip of this very sandy capital, I must not forget to state that Herr von Liszt has just arrived from Silesia, and that Herr Ad. Henselt has returned to St. Petersburg. Among the arrivals to which, according to report, we may look forward some time next month, is that of George Jacobi, first violinist of the Grand Opera, who won the prize at the Paris conservatory this year. It is his intention, so, at least, it is said, to play in public here.

Vale.

* It is thus that the Germans, with a total disregard for grammar—as understood, at any rate, since the time of Shakspere—and a slight obliviousness of their own dignity as human beings, designate the King, and his royal and aristocratic entourage.

MUSICAL DOINGS AT WIESBADEN.

The end of the present season has been, in every way, equal if not superior to its commencement. On Friday last, for instance, there was a grand concert, excellently attended, at the Cursaal, when not only was the programme first-rate, but the galaxy of talent such as could be rarely surpassed, even in London or Paris. In the first place there was Sivori, then Herren Kontski and Stockhausen, with Mad. Cambardi from Paris and Milan. Besides all these, Herr Oberthür, the celebrated harpist from London, lent his valuable aid on the occasion, as did also the admirable chorus from the theatre and the Cäcilien-Verein.

The concert commenced with the overture to Oberon, admirably rendered by the orchestra, under their talented conductor, Herr Hagen. This was followed by one of the best choruses in Mendelssohn's Elijah. I allude to the one beginning, "Siehe, der Hüte Israel's," which the members of the Cäcilien-Verein sang in a manner which reflected the highest credit on every one concerned. The next thing was Sivori's performance of his own fantasia on motives from Lucia di Lammermoor, a performance which obtained for him no end of applause, though his greatest hit was made in the "preghiera" from Moses, with variations, by Paganini, which he played on the G string alone, his violin, for the nonce, boasting of no others, so that he might well have exclaimed, like the magicians, prestidigitateurs, and wizards of the north, south, east, and west, who sometimes burst forth upon the public in all the refulgence of patent leather boots, immense diamond rings, impossible shirt fronts, and overpowering waistcoats, "There is no deception, ladies and gentlemen, there is no deception." He was greatly applauded. Another great feature of the evening was a concerto by Parish Alvars for the harp, a concerto "interpreted," as some writers term it, by Herr Oberthür. This fine artist is a great favourite here, in the first place for his talent, which is undoubtedly first-rate, and then from the fact of his being a citizen of the place, having been a member of the band at the theatre for a considerable time. Besides the concerto above mentioned, Herr Oberthür played two pieces, entitled, "Méditations," and "La Cascade," both original. His performance produced a very deep effect, and called forth the most rapturous plaudits from his delighted auditory. Herr Stockhausen sang an aria from Boieldieu's Jean de Paris, and songs by Schubert and Schumann; Herr von Kontski performed a concerto-symphony of his own for piano and orchestra, and a grand fantasia on motives from the opera of Attila, both the fantasia and the opera from which the motives are taken being his own composition; and Mad. Cambardi sang the cavatina "Casta diva" from Norma, and the grand air from Ernani. The concert was brought to a conclusion by the final chorus: "Dank sei dir, Gott," from Elijah. It was given for the benefit of the Paulinenstrift, which is under the patronage of her Highness the Duchess.

Weimar.—According to the prevalent report, the Grand-Duke has not been successful in prevailing on the Court of Saxony to forego its old grudge against Herr R. Wagner. The Grand-Duke had intended to bestow upon the latter, who was present at the late musical festival here, the order of the Falcon. He made inquiries, therefore, whether such a step would give offence in Dresden. The reply he obtained was to the effect that, if he persisted in his resolution, twelve officers of the Saxon army, who had received the order, would send it back. Under these circumstances, not only was the order not bestowed on Wagner, but a torch-light procession, which was to have been got up in his honour, never came off. Liszt is so indignant at these proceedings that he has determined to leave Weimar. In reference to this matter, the Neue Preussische Zeitung remarks, "It is well known that, despite the numerous benefits Wagner received from the King of Saxony, he took a most active share in the Dresden May insurrection."

Brunswick.—On the 1st instant the old theatre was permanently closed. The new one will be opened in the early part of October with Iphigenia and a piece written for the occasion. The first opera performed will be Tannhäuser, still a novelty here, and the next M. Gounod's Faust.

DUSSIK, DUSSEK, DUSCHEK.

(Written expressly for the Musical World and Dwight's Journal of Music, by Alexander W. Thayer.)

The three names at the head of this article are, in fact, but various modes of writing the same, as adopted by different persons, who in their day made it famous. The doubled s in the Bohemian language is equivalent to the English sh and the German sch; and out of Bohemia e seems to have been thought better fitted to secure the correct pronunciation of the second syllable than i. The name is found with as many variations as Rode's air. Gerber, indeed, quoting from the German edition of Burney's Tour, gives it in the Lexicon of 1792 as Dulsick. Not having the English copy of Burney at hand, I cannot decide whose error this was—Burney's, his printer's, his translator's—or the printer of the latter. Beside the forms given above, it will be found written Duchek, Düsseck, Duscheck, Dussick, and perhaps still otherwise. The father of the English Dussek wrote his name Dussik; the friend of Mozart at Prague wrote his Duschek.

The recent revival of some of the English Dussek's compositions, through the efforts of the director of the Monday Popular Concerts, and their performance in public by Miss Arabella Goddard—the interest which all students of musical history must feel in the Duschek of Prague, as Mozart's friend—the large space which artists of this name filled at one time in the musical world; these and similar reasons are sufficient to justify an attempt to compile such an account of the Dussiks—the true way of writing the name—as will put an end to the present confusion in relation to them.

This article, however, will not be an attempt to write biography, but simply the compiling of scattered notices (for the first time) into what our French friends might perhaps call "Mémoires pour servir." &c. Its basis will be the notices in Dlabacz's (or Dlabatsch's) "Künstler Lexikon für Böhmen" (Lexicon of Bohemian Artists). This Gottfried Johann Dlabacz was a monk, librarian and chorus-master in the convent Strahow, at Prague. His lexicon, a labour of love, running through some thirty years, appeared in 1815 in two volumes quarto. No work of the kind by a single author was ever perfect. Witness Fétis (1st ed.) and even Gerber; our English musical biographical dictionaries are unluckily below even contempt; and so may many an error be pointed out in Dlabacz. But as to the Dussik family to which J. L. D. belonged, his authority is unquestionable, his notes having been made from the oral communications of that artist's father and mother. This remark seems to be necessary, because the authorities recently followed in England, in a notice of J. L. Dussik, are directly contradicted by Dlabacz in some points.

The following is, I believe, a complete list of the Dussiks, who have made themselves known in the musical world:—

1. Johann Joseph Dussik married Veronika Stebeta.
2. Wenzel Dussik.
3. Johann Ladislaw Dussek married —— Corri.
4. Franz Benedict Dussek.
5. Veronica Rosalia Dussik married —— Cianchettini.
6. Adalbert Dussek.
7. Franz Duschek married Josepha Hambacher.
8. Karl Duschek.

Adalbert Dussek and Wenzel Dussik may be dismissed in the few words, which Dlabacz has granted them.

"The former," he says, "was a distinguished concert-master on the viola d'amour, and lived in Prague as a virtuoso upon that instrument in the years 1745-7, being in the habit of playing "as was then the custom, on still moonlight nights in the public squares of the old town, to the universal applause of the people who collected about him, in which performances he was accompanied by Wenzel Petrik a very skilful performer on the violincello." He made the course of philosophical study at Prague, became a priest, joined the order of Cistercian monks, and entered the convent at Königssaal, near Prague, where he died about 1768.

Wenzel Dussik, born in 1750 at Mlazowicz (Mlatsovitsch) in Bohemia, was a younger brother of Johan Joseph Dussik, who took him into his family and tutored him into a good organist and bass-singer. He began life as an organist at Olmütz, but after some years of service there, returned to his native country, and became organist at Eiche; whence after a time he accepted the place of "school-rector" at Bitesch in Moravia, where he died about the close of the century.

JOHANN JOSEPH DUSSIK.

In a history of the provincial town Königingrätz, in Bohemia, a family of this name is mentioned as giving magistrates to the town so long ago as 1472—1497. Two and a half centuries later, a Dussik—whether a descendent of that family or not, Father Dlabacz does not appear to know—lived in the town of euphonious name, Mlazowicz, as "Wagenmeister." What the hocus-pocus was a Wagenmeister? A mere peasant driver of wagons? a mechanic—the builder of four-wheel vehicles—a grade higher in society? Or was he master of the post-coaches? If so, he was a small official. Or was he an owner of coaches and horses, and thus "one of the first men in town?" If the latter, this Dussik was a very good match for Elizabeth, daughter of George Schreiner, teacher at Holowaus, and of local reputation as bass singer. At all events, that match was made, and when he died, 1749 or 1750—Dlabacz is a little confused in his dates here—he left Frau Elisabeth with two boys on her hands—Johann Joseph, born in 1739, and Wenzel (noticed above), an infant at the breast—or was he a posthumous child? But let Dlabacz go on with the story, with as much of his quaintness as I can give in English.

The widow "gave the ten-year old boy into the school of her brother-in-law, Johann Wlachs*, a skilful tutor of the musical youth of Mlazowicz, and in a few years had the joy to see him a preceptor in the same school, where he not only very often took upon himself the duties of his uncle, but out of gratitude remained with him several years.

"Thence he came, as assistant in a school, to Langenau, where he studied thorough bass so zealously, and taught the boys so assiduously, that three years later he was called, as second teacher, to Chlumecz. As he here, and indeed in all that region, had the reputation of being a very good organist and a skilful teacher of youth, the magistracy of Czaslau† offered him the positions of organist and head teacher in the town school of that place. He accepted these appointments in 1759, and began the duties of his office with great applause. To them he gave his days—but his nights, sometimes the whole night through, to the scores of a Caldara, a Bach, a Fux, a Tuma, &c., which he studied, and from which he copied pieces suited to the wants of his pupils. Order, industry, piety, and the long-desired finer culture of the pupils, reigned in his house. And thus he gained both love and honour, and the pupils respected him as their father. For them he thought he might be able to do more if he should share domestic cares with a 'house-mother.' Her he found in Veronika Stebeta, a daughter of Judge Johann Stebeta—whose services to the town had been of great value,—whom he married, May 9, 1760, and who bore him two sons, Johann Ladislaw and Franz Benedikt, and one daughter, Veronika Rosalia; all three, at this present, great virtuosos. For how could he, who gave such an excellent musical education to the children of others, have failed as to his own?

"Duly fitted by study at home, both sons were early provided with places in choirs; the one as a singer in the Minorite Church at Iglau, the other as organist in the Convent Church in Emaus, where he enjoyed for several years the guardianship and aid of the brave composer and organist, Father Augustin Ssenkyrez (Shenkeerch).

"In the year 1802 Dussik had the pleasure to see once more, in his old age, one of his sons, J. L. Dussek, one of the greatest virtuosos in Europe,—together with his daughter, Veronika Rosalia, who had married M. Cianchettini,—and to enjoy their well-earned fame.

"Dussik has written a great deal; and among his best works are—one Pastoral Mass, two short Litanies, one Regina Cœli, and many pianoforte sonatas, fugues, and toccatas, which have received the praise of a Burney and other great musical experts.

"Among his pupils of high rank he gave special praise to Baroness Obiteczky of Obitecz and Rabenhaupt, by marriage Baroness von Litzau.

"In 1807 he was still living in Czaslau, and still the best teacher there."

So far Dlabacz. Burney visited him in 1771 (?), and speaks of him as one of the very first among German organists. When he died I cannot make out; but in a notice of his son's death in Paris, in 1812, the father is said to be still alive at Czaslau.

Johann Ladislaw (or Ludwig) Dussek, eldest son of the preceding, was born at Czaslau (Haslau), Feb. 9, 1761. Dlabacz, Gerber, and others, write his name like his father's, with an i; the Leipziger Allg. Mus. Zeitung generally writes e, as do, of course, the English and French publications of his day. Hence the great confusion which has arisen as to the authorship of works by Dussik and Dussek.

"He began," says Dlabacz, "to play the pianoforte (or harpsichord) in his fifth year, and, upon the testimony of his own father, to smite the organ in his ninth."—This expression is an old German oddity. In old musical works people always play (spielen) the harpsichord, but smite (schlagen) the organ.—"Thereupon he went to Iglau as soprano singer, where he lived some years under the care of his near relation, Father Ladislaw Spinar (at that time chorus-director in the Minorite Church), at the same time 'hearing the Humanities' (pursuing liberal studies) under the Jesuits; which course (of study) he continued two years longer at Kuttenberg, where he was organist in the Jesuit Church. After this he went to Prague, heard philosophy, and took the degree of Master.

"At this period it was his desire to join the order of the Cistercian friars, but his youth prevented his admission into the convent Saar. So he entirely gave up his pious wish, willing by music alone to seek his fortune in the world. He was successful. He soon made a journey with his special protector, an Austrian captain of artillery, to Mechlin (Malines), where he remained some time as pianoforte teacher, and thence went on to Bergen-op-Zoom and Amsterdam."

In those days, it should not be forgotten, Austria held most of the "Low Countries," which accounts for the constant intercourse between the musicians of Prague and Vienna on the one hand, and those of the Rhine countries on the other; a fact which had great influence upon the career of many artists, Beethoven among them.

"In those two cities he made his public appearance as a young 'Tone artist,' and published some of his better compositions."

Dussek must have been very young at this time—perhaps twenty-one or twenty-two years of age—no exact dates are given. The first contemporaneous notice which I find of him is in Cramer's "Magazin der Musik" (Hamburg and Altona), in an article of notices of new music, headed with the date January 15th, 1783. It is this:—

"Concerto pour le clavecin ou pianoforte avec accompagnement de deux violons, alto et basse, deux hautbois et cors ad libitum. Composé par Dussick, œuvre premier, libro 1 et 2: à la Haye chez Hummel et fils.—Trois sonates pour le clavecin ou pianoforte avec accompagnement d'un violon ad libitum."

Upon these works "W.," whoever he may have been, remarks: "In both the concerto, as well as in the sonatas, the leading quality is a lively and brilliant execution; we find, especially in the first two, much that is both new and good; so that this hitherto unknown author, who is a Bohemian, gives promise of that excellence in his future works to which we have become accustomed through the productions of a Mislewezeck, a Duschek, and others of his countrymen."

We next find Dussek in Berlin, in 1784. This was the period of the great popularity of Franklin's harmonica, and instrument makers were everywhere endeavouring to find some sort of key apparatus to take the place of the wet fingers in producing the tones. In Berlin two men in particular, unknown to each other, were then endeavouring to solve the problem; Röllig, a very accomplished Viennese, distinguished afterwards for several interesting musical inventions, and a certain Hessel, whom Gerber calls a mechanician, from St. Petersburg, but who, according to Röllig (in a letter to the Leipzig Musik-Zeitung, February, 1803), was an excellent portrait painter from Courland. These two men accomplished their object, each in his own way. Röllig afterwards

* Call it Flax—that is near enough.

† Chaslaw:—more recently the C (the open C) has been expunged, and the name is written Haslau.

travelled extensively with his instrument, upon which he was very skilful, while Hessel's passed into the hands of young Dussek. Gerber says, in the *old Lexicon, writing at the latest in the winter of 1789-90, "I remember still with pleasure having been witness in Cassel, in 1785, of the extraordinary skill, precision, and rapidity of both hands of this great artist upon the pianoforte, and of his learned and judicious execution upon the keyed harmonica. He was then travelling to exhibit the instrument. It was in no way different from the ordinary harmonica, except that the glasses were put in motion by a treadle and band, and were arranged in three rows instead of one, for the greater convenience of adapting the keys."

In his notice of Hessel, Gerber says, after copying a description of the instrument, "I can testify to the correctness of this description, as I heard Herr Dussek play upon the very instrument here described, in Cassel, in 1785. He enchanted all his auditors by a slow harmonic introduction, full of learned modulations, followed by the choral 'Allein Gott in der Höh' sey Ehr'.' He, however, at that time claimed the instrument as his own invention."

"But not alone as a performer," continues Gerber, "but also as a composer, this young man (Dussek) takes a superior rank among the Germans. There have already appeared from his pen:—

3 Pianoforte Concertos with accompaniment, Op. I. at the Hague.
6 Pianoforte Sonatas, with 1 violin, Op. II., Hague.
6 ditto ditto ditto Op. III., ditto.
3 ditto ditto with violin and violoncello, printed [at Berlin in 1786; and, finally,
3 Easy (Kleine) Sonatas at Paris, Op. I.

"Judging from the Berlin publications, the ruling qualities of his compositions are uncommon delicacy and the finest taste, combined with fine invention and great knowledge of harmony. There would be nothing left to wish, if this fire and this richness of invention did not too often mislead him into forgetting the art of expressing his ideas within due limits."

From Cassel, Dussek made his way to the electoral court at Mainz (Mentz), "where he gained the favour of the nobility, and the affection of distinguished 'tone-artists.'" (Dlabacz.)

In 1786 he went on to Paris with the hofmeister (steward?) of the French ambassador at Berlin, where he played in the presence of the queen, Maria Antoinette, who granted him her protection. Gerber makes him go thence directly to London; but Dlabacz says, "Notwithstanding this (i.e. the favour of the queen) he was forced away from Paris by his longing to see Italy. So he journeyed to Milan, where he gave concerts both upon the pianoforte and the keyed harmonica, and won the universal respect of the Italian musicians. Similar proofs of regard were shown him on many occasions by Germans, and the distinguished Saxon Kapellmeister Ernst assured his (Dussek's) father in a very friendly, and for the son most flattering letter, that when passing through Dresden, he had gained the high opinion not only of the entire electoral orchestra, but of the Elector himself, and of all the Court."

Means are wanting to trace him through the years 1788-9—probably English publications may supply them—but Gerber says he had gained firm footing in London as teacher of the pianoforte in 1790, and Dlabacz mentions the "Princess" of York as one of his pupils.

Joseph Haydn, too, found him in London, and thought so highly of him as to write to the elder Dussik in Czaslau as follows:—

"Most worthy friend,—I thank you from my heart that you, in your last letter to your dear son, have also remembered me. I therefore double my compliments in return, and consider myself fortunate in being able to assure you, that you have one of the most upright, moral, and, in music, most eminent of men, for a son. I love him just as you do, for he fully deserves it. Give him, then, daily a father's blessing, and then will he be ever fortunate, which I heartily wish him, for his great talents. I am, with all respect, your most sincere friend,

"London, Feb. 26, 1792." "JOSEPH HAYDN."

"About 1792," Dussek married Miss Corri, who was the principal singer at the London Professional Concerts, he being concerto player to the same, and playing in "a style of incredible perfection."—Gerber.

In 1796 (?) he established, in company with Corri, his father-in-law, a music publishing house, which had the title "Music-sellers to their Majesties, and their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and Duchess of York."—Gerber.

But the English part of Dussek's life must be left to some other person. I will pass on to his advent again upon German soil.

(To be continued in our next.)

* Gerber's "Lexicon der Tonkünstler is in two parts, that of 1792 in 2 vols., that of 1812-14 in 4 vols. The latter is not a new edition of the former, but its complement and supplement. One must have both. The preface to the "old Lexicon" is dated March 26th, 1790.

NEW ORGAN IN EDINBURGH.

SIR,—When I wrote you last week relative to our professor's organ here I did not think you would insert it in your work, otherwise I would have been a little more particular in what I said regarding the combination of intervals to form a mixture, or sesquialteras, as organ-builders call them; sesqui is a Latin particle, signifying a whole and a half, and which, when joined with altera, terza, quarta, &c., expresses a kind of ratio, and, I suppose, hence the word sesquitertia is a musical ratio.

I am only an amateur in music, and a bit of a mechanic in the way of organ-building. I therefore read your article on the professor's organ with pleasure, and hailed the idea of hearing more about it from you, especially how the 14-rank stop is tuned or tempered.

I can easily understand the mixtures, at least, the usual 3-rank, or even 6-rank, which to me is nothing more than a combination of the common chord; and, notwithstanding all the incomprehensible names (now) given by organ-builders to the different stops, they all end in octaves or unisons, differing in quality of tone according to the different shapes or formation and voicing of the pipes—some of them wretchedly imitated.

The principal is, I believe, the stop generally tuned from. We have, then, either 16 feet, 8 feet, 4, or 2, the 12th being a fifth above the principal, 3 feet. Suppose the 14-rank stop begin at a given length of a pipe, say the usual lowest pipe in mixtures, what size must the smallest be when it reaches the top of the scale?—I am, &c.

MUSIC IN RIO JANEIRO.

SIR, — Taking a great interest in your compatriot Mr. John Cheshire, harpist, and Member of Royal Academy, I beg to transmit to you the notice of his grand vocal and instrumental concert that he gave here (at Rio de Janeiro) on the night of 2nd of September. The house was attended by a most fashionable audience, and rung with applauses. The bouquets and wreaths were numerous. Mr. Cheshire, who is in great favour at the Court, must be surely satisfied with the reception of the Brazilians. They have appreciated his talents, and were astonished at his extraordinary manner of playing the harp.

I have the honour to be, with regard,
Your most obedient servant,
BARON DE CAYVIR.

At Rio de Janeiro, 5th Sept. 1861.

[We have not received the notice alluded to.—ED.]

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—After having officiated as conductor for ten years at the theatre, Herr G. Schmidt lately resigned the post. To mark their high appreciation of his good qualities, the members of the operatic company, as well as of the orchestra, have presented him with a magnificent album, containing their photographs, and some most flattering verses. Herr G. Schmidt is at present busily engaged, completing a new opera, for which the celebrated Mad. Birch-Pfeiffer has written the libretto.

The Musical World.

LONDON: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1861.

To the Editor of the MUSICAL WORLD.

SIR,—The letters of your correspondent "D"—who addressed you from Berlin in the years 1855 and 1856—contained so many allusions to the subject of my present communication, that I feel no doubt of its attracting the attention and engaging the interest of most of your readers. The death of Heinrich Augustus Neithardt is not of very recent date; but, happening as it did in the height of your London "season," it was merely commemorated by a paragraph. Now, in the dull time, you will perhaps not object to my filling up what would otherwise be a strange gap in your musical record.

H. A. Neithardt, Royal Musical-Director, and conductor of the world-renowned Berlin Dom-Chor, which he founded, was born on the 10th August, 1789, at Schleiz. On the 18th April, 1861, at 10 A.M., the true heart of this good and worthy man, who was not merely known and respected, but beloved by all classes of society, ceased to beat, and, on the 22nd of the same month, at the same hour of the morning, his mortal remains were consigned to their mother earth. Another of Germany's noblest sons thus passed from among us! In him death snatched away one of the foremost in the ranks of Prussian musicians, and, I may fairly add, composers. Though his decease was duly recorded in the papers, the readers of the MUSICAL WORLD will, no doubt, allow me to hold up this man of the people, in a few short lines, to public sympathy, and, since the grave has closed over him, to record how much he was honoured and loved by his fellow-countrymen, and in what religious respect his memory is held. Neithardt never coveted the laurel-wreath, although, perhaps, he received the highest and most numerous marks of distinction. His intelligence was profound and lucid, his patriotism deep and heartfelt. No one ever worshipped Prussia with greater ardour than he, and in no one's breast was love of country purer and more holy. This fact is proved by his patriotic songs, his Vaterlandslieder, and his whole character. So long, therefore, as there is such a land as "Prussia," and a "Prussian nation" represent it, so long will Augustus Neithardt, composer of the popular and national song, Ich bin ein Preusse, live on the lips and in the hearts of the people. This song is a monument, proving, more triumphantly than monuments of bronze or marble, the permanent character of the services rendered by its composer. How many millions have already sung, with enthusiasm, in all parts of the world, their cherished folk's song, Ich bin ein Preusse, and what countless millions will continue to sing it in honour of their nation and of their national composer? Neithardt was endowed with a genuine German character. He was constitutionally proud, and his forehead bore the stamp of true and manly dignity. In social life, however, he was distinguished for his great amiability, and loved to idolatry by his family and intimate circle of friends. During his severe and prolonged sufferings, Neithardt looked forward cheerfully to the termination of his earthly career, and when, on the 24th January last, he was informed of the decease of his late Majesty, brother of the present king, who was so attached to art, and did so much to promote its interests, he exclaimed: "Heaven, why should not I have died, and he have lived!"

In No. 33 of the 14th annual series of the Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung appeared a very interesting and detailed biography of Neithardt—then still living—on the occasion of his 67th birthday; and as the same feeling of sincere respect, admiration, and esteem, subsequently prompted the writer of that biography to strew the last resting-place of his valued and lamented friend with words of the deepest sorrow and regret, he rightly judged that the many admirers of Neithardt, who had by that time heard the sad news of his demise, would be thankful to him—the writer—for referring them—as in his well-seasoned monody he did not fail to do—to the circumstantial biography in question. The friends of the departed musician were also reminded that a lithograph, by Fischer, of the excellent portrait painted by Oelker, together with a facsimile of Neithardt's own handwriting, and of the first bar of the national song, Ich bin ein Preusse, was published at the time by Bote and Bock, Berlin. What Neithardt did, as co-representative, together with Herren Weller, Schick and Gottfried Rode, of Prussian military music from 1813 to 1840, is stated at length in the biography.

On the 22nd April, at 10 A.M., the funeral took place, in the churchyard of the Domgemeinde, amidst marks of deep and universal sympathy. All the artistic and literary celebrities were present. Among them were noticed his Excellency the Count von Redern, the Counts Von Wehern, Illaire, Von Kleist, Herr von Pommerische, Director-General of the Customs, Herr von Olfers, Director-General of Museums, M. Meyerbeer, Musical Director-General, and several others. The Court-Preacher, Snethlage, read the burial service over the coffin, and the Dom-Chor, under the direction of Herr von Herzberg, executed, in the real feeling and spirit of Neithardt himself, the following pieces:—Erbarm Dich unser; Ich weiss dass mein Erlöser; Christus ist die Auferstehung; Ja, der Geist spricht, and more than one Amen. The worthy clergyman then delivered an address full of consolation, derived from the life and actions of the deceased, now conveyed to his final home, amid solemn strains proceeding from the bands of the Garde Schützen Bataillon and the Kaiser Franz Regiment, to which corps he had been successively attached, as musical-director, from 1816 to 1840. The members of the Dom-Chor followed immediately after the bier. One of them carried a laurel-wreath on a black cushion, while others bore mourning palm-branches. The procession was closed by a great number of carriages. At the grave, the clergyman, having pronounced a few more appropriate sentences, the coffin was lowered with the usual prayers, the blessing and the strain Wenn ich einmal scheiden soll, while the relatives and friends of the deceased paid him the last tribute of earthly homage and respect. Since the death of Mendelssohn, perhaps, no bereavement has been so deeply and universally felt in Prussia as that of the founder of the Dom Chor. H. H.

Berlin, Sept. 30.

OUR readers need fear no violent irruption of warfare or politics in the columns of the MUSICAL WORLD, when we say that England has good cause to be proud of her Volunteers. Not a bit less pleasurable, either, is it to think that the "movement," as it is called, so quickly and ominously engendered, is fast growing into vitality and permanence far beyond the circumstances which called it forth. Drill and the use of the rifle have taken post—and long may they hold it—among the "institutions" of the country. Far enough as such subjects are from our usual vocation, it is nevertheless impossible to withhold thought altogether from the military and political significance of the shield-raising everywhere busy around us. It is comfortable, for instance, to believe that the long dark shadow of the Napoleonic nose, once supposed to be sniffing up the fatness of our homes, is at length averted,—scared, mayhap, at the odour of gunpowder so unexpectedly reeking up from the land of cotton and hardware. Also, should "we the people of England" (per pro. the three celebrated tailors of Tooley Street) once again take it into their wise heads to drive Queen, Lords, and Commons to their way of thinking by the argumentum ad bacculinam, or some other pet nostrum of the "physical force" party, it is by no means unsatisfactory to reflect on the certain presence of another description of "force" eminently more potent in the service of sense and order than any of those promiscuous levies of untrained pluck and muscle that were formerly our constitutional boast.

But what has the MUSICAL WORLD specially to do with the Volunteers? Truly, nothing as to their marchings, countermarchings, wheelings, deployings, and the like; yet we may have much to say to that strange kind of music, or its blatent substitute, rather, with which they so generally regale us. While earnestly desiring all imaginable success for their energetic zeal in soldierly training, and never dreaming an instant's doubt of their resolution to fulfil those sterner duties that may perhaps one day fall to their lot, we are obliged to think it would be quite as well—much better, indeed, for the ears of their non-combatant brethren—if they attended somewhat to the matter alluded to. It is surely a pity, where all else is excellent, that a small particular should be so much in fault. On all other points our Volunteers are will nigh overwhelmed with praise from the highest authorities. One regiment is declared to have attained such perfection of drill as to be ready for any emergency; another, when brigaded with the "regulars" in a sham-fight at Aldershot, might, it seems, "except for its uniform, have been mistaken for a part of the line:" while in the matter of shooting, our national rifle practice has already become at least equal to any in the world. So far, so very good; yet our Volunteer bands are, for the most part, very inferior, and the music they play is generally abominable. Just test the thing, and that without any squeamish criticism. Take any fine Saturday—the Volunteers' "marching-out" day par excellence. With what mingled feelings of pride and annoyance does one watch regiment after regiment of fine stalwart fellows come striding up the middle of the street in true soldierly fashion, each headed by its "band," forsooth, hotly engaged with some tune of the most odious vulgarity! Truly, the contrast here between good and bad, noble and base, becomes something between ludicrous and intolerable.

But why are our Volunteer regiments doomed to march to this execrable kind of music? Surely, not for want of better. To say nothing of what native composers may have done, the celebrated band-masters of Germany—Walsch, Berr, and hosts of others—have furnished an almost inexhaustible stock of marches, full of spirit and musical interest, admirably arranged, perfectly suited, as they were designed, for open-air use, and cheaply and easily procurable. Not, certainly, for lack of money, if, as we are informed, several Volunteer regiments pay sums varying from 600*l.* to 800*l.* per annum for the merely occasional services of their bands. Scarcely, we imagine, for want of care, if the amount of trouble bestowed on other subordinate matters be a criterion. Who, for instance, does not remember the time when the cut and colour of a tunic, the fashion of a chaco, and the device of a button, were as eagerly discussed in Volunteer circles as though the ball-room, rather than the battle-field, were the scene—billets doux, rather than boulets durs, the missiles, of their future engagements? No; none of these is to blame for the nuisance complained of. The missing quality is, we fear, good musical taste, together with some knowledge of the subject in hand. Bands have been found necessary to keep the men in marching-step, and have been paid for accordingly; but here every kind of trouble about the matter has, no doubt, come to an end. Band-masters seem to have been appointed at random, bandsmen selected without discretion; and as to choice of music, the vulgar instinct in favour of the last popular tune appears to have prevailed against any notion of music as at all concerned in the business.

The vilest music has its use, no doubt; but limited, say we, to its rightful place and audience. It may be well enough for some famous "negro delineator," with an incomprehensible wit in his blackened face, to be perpetually wishing he "were with Nancy,"—always provided the place and its occupants be in keeping with his aspirations. No reason do we see why "the great Mackney" should not, if he chooses, continue to extatify his peculiar patrons with the curious information that his name is "Old Bob Ridley, O!"—and quite as little why another illustrious individual should not, so long as his breath endures, give saltatory confirmation of the otherwise inexplicable statement that he is "a perfect cure." All such things, however mysterious to the rest of the world, possess, no doubt, a verbal and melodic luxuriance exactly fitted to the tastes of those who pay for them. Nay, we admit them to be happily adapted to those humorously imitative faculties enjoyed by the gamins of our streets; and, by a stretch of fancy, can even suppose them scarcely misplaced in the hands of that social pest, the Italian organ-grinder. But here toleration should cease. Let the vile cleave to the vile, and let them go hand in hand together whither they will: but of all offences against the "eternal fitness of things," there surely need be none greater than that our noble Volunteer regiments should help to perpetuate these senseless and odious vulgarities by means of the bands which they retain, perhaps, let us say, with some little eye towards the public gratification. Of course, we are quite prepared for the excuse that such things, bad though they otherwise be, make capital "marching tunes." Very likely: but that is no reason for their employment. Any strongly-rhythmed melody, in 2-4 or 6-8 measure, so timed that the "big drum" may make itself felt on the beginning and middle of the bar, and at the pace of 116 per minute, is a good "marching tune." We have already pointed out how the volunteer bands may be supplied with abundance of such music, spirited, well written, and in every way effective.

All this, doubtless, is to Colonel Macmurdo mere trifling, and to General Hay foolishness. "Arms and the man" they sing: that is their business. "Music" say we—that is ours. Moreover, we cannot consent to think anything trifling or foolish which tends to affect the taste of a people. At all times and places military music has been a great source of public gratification; and, where so much can be so easily done, it will be more than matter of regret if our Volunteer bands do not henceforth contrive to please the ears of their street admirers, while lending a hand, at the same time, to raise their taste somewhat out of that slough of negro mire into which it has unhappily fallen.

THE death of Mr. William Farren has created no hiatus in the histrionic art—has left no blank on the stage. The great comedian had retired, or, more properly, had been forced into private life some six years since, and for several years previously, although exhibiting in public, had been a mere wreck of his former self. The light of his intellect, however, had not gone out prematurely. Mr. Farren was born in 1786, and was consequently in his 75th year when he died. At 70—the age at which he quitted the stage—few artists keep possession of the boards, none certainly who desires his name to be handed down to posterity. Had Mr. Farren made his exit some ten years before, it would have been all the better for his reputation. Many who beheld him in the decadence of his powers put no faith in his popularity, and attributed to his mannerism what was certainly owing to his talent. William Farren was beyond all question one of the most consummate actors of his time. The "divine fire," or genius, we are inclined to think, had been denied him; but every other quality which goes to make up the great artist he possessed in an eminent degree. He was always considering, always studying, always elaborating and polishing, until he thought he had brought his delineations to perfection. Then, and then only, did he feel satisfied. His love for his profession amounted to enthusiasm. He was happy only before the footlights, contented only with the shouts of an audience ringing in his ears. This enthusiasm constitutes the very whip and spur to the progress of the artist; and the love of applause stimulates him to never-ceasing exertions. Without an ardent temperament and natural vanity, the difficulties and obstructions which present themselves on the threshold would deter all candidates for histrionic fame from further venture. William Farren worked his way slowly and surely to the top of the ladder, and in his career bequeaths us one of the most striking examples of what industry, perseverance, and indomitable energy may effect without absolute inspiration.

Mlle. Patti.—The negotiations with Mlle. Patti and the directors of the Paris Italian Opera have come to nothing. We believe this young lady, in accordance with the counsels of her friends, will retire from the stage and concert-rooms for a few months, to afford a season of necessary repose to her voice. Exertions like hers are not to be continued with impunity by human organs, of whatsoever strength.

MR. ALFRED MELLON'S CONCERTS.

On Monday night Elijah was given, not piecemeal, like the Messiah, but entire and unadulterated. This retailing of Handel and giving Mendelssohn wholesale requires explanation. The execution of Elijah was commendable, if not irreproachable. The great difficulty lay with the chorus, which was composed of very heterogeneous materials, and to many of the component parts of which Mendelssohn's oratorio appeared a sealed book. The principal soloists were Mlle. Parepa, Miss Julia Bleaden, Miss M. Bradshaw, Mad. Laura Baxter. Messrs. Vernon Rigby, R. Seymour, Lewis Thomas and Gadsby. M. Vernon Rigby, although considerably out of his depth, pleased in the tenor music, which he really might sing well would he only study singing. The air, "If with all your hearts," indicated good expression, and by no means a deficiency of judgment; nevertheless, a voice produced like that of Mr. Rigby, after so objectionable a method, can never find favour in refined ears. The new tenor has a good natural voice, but should learn to sing de novo.

Last night, the last "Classical Night" was given, and to-night the last "Volunteer Concert" will take place. That favourite songstress, Miss Poole, has appeared during the week, introducing some of the popularities of her repertory with her wonted effect. On Thursday we had the pleasure of hearing her sing, in her most graceful manner, Hadyn's canzonet, "My mother bids me bind my hair," the old ballad "Jock o' Hazledean," and an English song. The same evening Miss Susanna Cole delighted the audience in Mr. Macfarren's beautifully tender and expressive ballad, "The beating of my own heart," and also sang the cavatina from the Gazza Ladra, "Di Piaca," with a brilliancy and command of voice that surprised her warmest admirers.

On Monday the Creation will be given, and on Saturday the erformances will be brought to a close.

Crystal Palace.—The London Glee and Madrigal Union sang on Saturday. Miss Eleanor Armstrong was the solo vocalist, and Mr. Oscar Beringer, a youthful pianist, made his first appearance. The thoroughly artistic singing of Mr. Land's Glee and Madrigal party has procured for it considerable celebrity, and on this occasion the singers fully sustained their reputation. Such thorough blending of voice, and equality of tone and phrasing, is only to be attained by careful practice. Horsley's glee, for male voices, "When the wind blows in the sweet rose tree," was sung by Messrs. Baxter, Cummings, Land, and Lawler, in an irreproachable manner; and Elliott's quintett, "Come, see what pleasures," was equally well rendered by the same gentlemen and Miss Wells. A quaint madrigalian dialogue, from Ravenscroft's Melismala, called "In the merry spring," completed their contributions to the programme. The audience received Miss Armstrong's two pieces, "Ah, forse è lui!" and Macfarren's song, "The beating of my own heart," with much favour. Miss J. Wells sang "My lodging is on the cold ground," and was joined by Mr. Lawler in the maypole song, "Come, lasses and lads," which was encored. The band contributed two overtures, Euryanthe and the Siege of Rochelle; and Mr. Wells (flute), and Mr. Bonnisean (cornet), performed a solo each.

Madame Jenny Lind.—Arrangements have been made in Aberdeen for two musical entertainments of the highest order, to be given about the middle of November. Madame Lind-Goldschmidt, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Signor Belletti will be the vocalists; Signor Piatti and Mr. Blagrove, solo instrumentalists. Herr Otto Goldschmidt will also take part.

Rose Chéri.—All lovers of the drama will regret to hear of the death of that charming actress Madame Rose Chéri, who lately expired, at Paris, of a malignant sore throat. It is said she caught the malady while nursing her son, who is now out of danger. Madame Rose Chéri was only thirty-seven years old, having been born at Etampes in 1824. In 1845 she married M. Lemoine-Montigny, the manager of the Gymnase.

Death of Mr. Arthur Smith.—Mr. Arthur Smith, brother of the late Mr. Albert Smith, expired a few days since after a brief illness.

LETTERS FROM AN AMERICAN IN LONDON.

No. 2.

(See Musical World, Sept. 28.)

London, June 28.

On the way hither from Paris, on a fresh June day, past the sweet clover fields of northern France, over the smooth channel from Boulogne to Folkstone, and again through greener fields of Kent, where the hops grow and the sheep graze — fair afternoon's picture of the rural luxury of England — hastening, belated, to get what might remain of the London musical season, I looked into the Times, and fancy my chagrin at reading of an event just past, which had always stood high in the list of musical satisfactions anticipated in a visit here! The annual concert of the three or four thousand Charity Children in St. Paul's cathedral had taken place the day before! I enclose, however, the Times report of it. Other disappointments were of course inevitable in any plan of a year's travel. Several great things, which it had been my fate to miss all over Germany, I was again too late for here. For instance, the repeated performances of Rossini's really great opera, William Tell, which are said to have been excellent in every way. So too, the two grandest works in the prospectus of the Sacred Harmonic Society, the Israel in Egypt of Handel, and the Missa Solennis in D of Beethoven, had gone by. There remained one more concert by that Society, and that was to be on the very evening of my arrival — Costa's oratorio of Eli, conducted by the composer in person. The day's journey had been exhilarating, and the musical appetite was sharp after the two months' fast in Italy. So my first taste of London — after the Crystal Palace had stretched out its arms of greeting in the distance (how it shone against the setting sun!), and after being jostled over crowded London Bridge, and finding lodgings — was a hurried drive to Exeter Hall, to hear what might be heard of at least one London oratorio.

I arrived in the middle of the first part. The exquisitely modulated and insinuating tenor of Sims Reeves was even then stealing through the passage ways. He was just finishing his principal air. The great gloomy hall was crowded to the utmost, and it was only possible to obtain a back seat in the balcony — not a bad place for listening to such great waves of tone as roll forth from a choir of 600 effective voices, supported by a band of about 100 instruments. I was in no mood to listen or remember critically; simple exposure to the invigorating and refreshing influence of great choral harmonies was all I sought, together with gratification of the natural curiosity to see and hear what one had so long read of. The choruses of Costa are not giant works of genius; he is no Handel, Bach, or Beethoven; only a clever follower of Mendelssohn. But he is a masterly musician, and has contrived some grand, and many beautiful, if not decidedly original, effects in Eli, as we already knew in Boston. There was great precision, positiveness and vigour in the rendering of the choruses. The voices blended finely, the parts were well balanced, the quality of tone was clear and musical. There was no faltering and little screaming. All were up to the mark, and seemed quite at home in the music, and in such work generally. It was only in the finer contrasts and gradations of light and shade, in pianissimo, &c., that one was reminded of the superiority of the choral societies in Berlin, Leipzig and Dresden. It was right hearty, vigorous, unanimous, English work, however, and often told superbly; once or twice sublimely; and always in a way to stir up much enthusiasm in the audience, who, with the singers, made the evening an ovation to England's favourite conductor, proud to recognise him also in the character of composer.

The solos were sung by Mad. Rudersdorff, a fine and flexible soprano, with good skill and expression; Mad. Sainton-Dolby, who gave the pretty contralto part of Samuel quite acceptably; Sims Reeves, whose sweet, expressive, finished tenor tantalised us with too little — it was only in a trio and a quartet that we heard him, and that with a rare satisfaction; Signor Belletti, our old friend of the Jenny Lind times, who used then to render the bass airs of Handel surprisingly well for an Italian, and who is still one of the main stays of a London oratorio; Mr. Santley, a comparatively new candidate for public favour, who has a rich and resonant baritone, which he uses tastefully and with much effect; and Mr. Montem Smith. The orchestra was admirable. The unwearying responsiveness of the great audience was almost as interesting as the performance. Whether the English be a really musical race or not, there is no people that craves and sits out so much music.

Last evening — to jump the interval for the time being — I heard another oratorio in the same place: — the old Messiah by the Yorkshire Choral Union. To hear the famous Yorkshire chorus singers, and in the well-known choruses, was a chance not to be neglected. Nor were my expectations disappointed. This time I had a front seat, in a rather thinly scattered, but delighted audience. There were perhaps four hundred singers, and they were wonderfully effective. The sounds leapt out with a startling elasticity and vigour. There is a heroic unanimity and certainty in the charge of these Yorkshiremen. Chorus singing seems to have been a life-long patriotic exercise with them; a common cause, honoured and carefully kept bright. There was an irresistible spirit about it; here too not much of fine shading, or of pianissimo, but a sort of dazzling splendour of delivery, a fervour that sweeps on to victory and takes you off your feet. Of course, the most satisfactory achievements were such pieces as the "Wonderful" chorus, "Lift up your hands," "Hallelujah," &c. "He shall purify," "Behold the Lamb," and "All we like sheep" were exceedingly impressive. But one missed somewhat of the profound and almost Bach-like tenderness and inwardness of "And with his stripes." The proportion of female voices looked small, but by no means sounded so; they were all telling voices; each voice jump upon the instant at coming in. One peculiarity in the composition of the choir would look strangely in America. In the band of contraltos you see but a dozen or so of women scattered about and isolated among the men. The male contralto, or counter tenor, so exceptional with us, appears to be the rule among the Yorkshire voices. Some of them, of course, were boys, as were many of the sopranos; but the great majority were men. The solo singing was not remarkable, but reasonably fair. The best were Mr. Santley in the base recitatives and airs, and Mr. Whitehead (so far as I could make out from the bills) in the tenor. Mrs. Sunderland sang mechanically well in the soprano arias, and Miss Freeman furnished little more than voice to "He was despised," &c. The orchestra, from the Philharmonic Society, was effective. So was the organ, played by Dr. Monk, of York Cathedral. The conductor was Mr. R. G. Burton.

In the morning (or, as we say, afternoon) after my arrival (Saturday), I attended the public rehearsal of the last "New Philharmonic" concert, in St. James's Hall; and on Monday evening the concert itself. It was a large and fashionable audience, all in "evening dress," which is the rule here, where seas of glorious free music, with all the genial warmth thereof, do not avail to melt or wash away old icebergs of uncomfortable etiquette. The Hall, which is much smaller than the Boston Music Hall, is most beautiful and unique in its architecture, and especially in the way in which it is lighted, by single star-shaped jets depending from all parts of the arched ceiling, and at heights varying with the curve of the arch, so that it suggests the free feeling of being under the starry sky. The orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Wylde, is large and powerful, and played some movements capitally, though it is said to be not the best orchestra in London; but of course there are contrary opinions about that, now that London has three rival orchestral societies, where once the "Philharmonic" had the whole field. The overture to Coriolanus (Beethoven) was certainly rendered with great fire and precision, and made a smart beginning to the concert. Next came a masterly performance of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto by Herr Wieniawski, a young Pole of the Hebrew stamp of features, who has taken his stand in the first class of virtuosi; there was fire and tender feeling, and technical mastery enough in it, if not decided evidence of individual genius. Then the dark familiar figure of Carl Formes presented itself, who sang with powerful effect a satanic sort of aria from Spohr's Faust. Mrs. Lemmens-Sherrington followed with a French air from Herold's Pré aux Clercs, with fine obbligato violin accompaniment by Mr. Blagrove, first violin in the orchestra, and apparently in nearly all the orchestras here. Mrs. Lemmens-Sherrington has a clear, sunshiny soprano, and fine florid execution. The Eroica Symphony closed the first part, much of it impressively rendered, but not up to the Leipzig or the Berlin standard by many degrees. Part II. began with the lovely tranquillising chorus and soprano solo: "Calm is the glassy ocean," from Mozart's Idomeneo, nicely rendered. Mr. John Francis Barnett, an élève of the Leipzig Conservatoire, played (in the illness of Miss Arabella Goddard) the perpetual cheval de battalle of young pianists, Weber's Concert-stück, and showed very clear and brilliant execution. A florid duet for voice and violin, by Pacini and Artot, was sung by Mrs. Sherrington and played by Wieniawski; and the concert ended with the Men of Prometheus overture, thus making it mainly "a Beethoven night." DUBLIN.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Oct. 3, 1861.

A PORTION of your own correspondent's last letter has been quoted in a Dublin newspaper, prefaced by the following remarks, headed:—

COCKNEY SNEERS AT IRELAND.

To the Editor of the Daily Express.

SIR,—By way of pendant to the excellent leader in your paper of this day, I send you the accompanying extract from the Musical World of last Saturday. It will excite no surprise that a little journal should "follow suit," when the thunderer of Printing-house Square omits no opportunity of indulging in a sneer at this country. The article will not be read here, for the Musical World does not count many subscribers in Ireland — not, perhaps, more than a dozen; but the inventions of the small wit, who calls himself "Anteater," may serve to amuse many folks at the other side of the Channel, who, in spite of telegraphs and steam, are profoundly ignorant of men and manners here. Of course no person who knows anything of society in our city will put faith in such an absurd tale, which might do in the hands of the late Mr. Power, or the present Mr. Samuel Lover, to raise a laugh in public places of amusement, at the expense of their countrymen. Irishmen do not say "foine" for "fine," whatever Yorkshiremen may, or "Doblin" for "Dublin," which foreigners do sometimes. I wish "Our own Correspondent" better occupation than trying to bring into hatred and contempt the manners of his fellow-subjects in this part of Her Majesty's dominions.—Your obedient servant,

October 1, 1861. UNION.

It is the story of the lady who came to sing for her daughter that excites the wrath of "Union," and converts the pen of that ready writer into a very shillelagh, with which the head of "Anteater" is threatened in the true spirit of Quixotic chivalry. Notwithstanding the assertion "that no person who knows anything of society in this city will put faith in such an absurd tale," the absurd tale is, nevertheless, nothing but a simple narrative of an amusing incident which really occurred, and no fiction. The dear old lady not only offered, but did sing for her daughter, and went away satisfied at having been heard, and with Arditi's advice that she (i.e. the daughter) had better study and cultivate her voice. "Union" may deny the existence of an Irish brogue, the slightest trace of which imparts such delicious piquancy to the conversation of his fair countrywomen—he may measure the wit of others by his own standard, or restrict the list of subscribers to the "little journal" to any number he may please in his imagination, but he has no right to deny, in such terms, the veracity of your correspondent, or to attribute to him the intention of relating, it may be, a ludicrous, but still an "o'er true tale," and of "trying to bring into hatred and contempt the manners of his fellow-subjects in this part of Her Majesty's dominions." Nor is he justified in estimating at so low a rate the refinement that prevails in Irish society, as seriously to believe that it could be affected by the narration of a circumstance as unique as it was extravagant. But something too much of this!

The Italians terminate their engagement at the Theatre Royal on Saturday next. The operas performed this week will have been:—Monday, 30th September, Trovatore; Tuesday, 1st October, Don Giovanni; Wednesday, 2nd, Ballo in Maschera; Thursday, 3rd, for the benefit of Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini, Marta; Friday, 4th, Il Barbière, and an act of Favorita: on Saturday, the last night, Un Ballo in Maschera will be given. On Friday the whole party will appear at a Morning Concert announced to be given at the Ancient Concert Rooms. The programme includes many of the most favourite songs and concerted music from the operas, besides a new valse, composed for Mlle. Titiens by Signor Arditi. It is said that arrangements have been made with Mlle. Patti for six nights, commencing on October 28th. Should such be the case, there can be no doubt of her meeting with a most enthusiastic reception.

The Dublin public have no reason to complain of the manager of their Theatre Royal on the score of inactivity. He never allows any opportunity to escape him of providing every amusement for them whether it be in a dramatic or operatic shape, and in fact, exceeds the energy of many of the London managers for the vigour and enterprise of his undertakings.

ANTEATER.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

BY IL FANATICO PER LA MUSICA.

Claremont, Howth, near Dublin, October 2nd, 1861.

Here I am in one of the most romantic and beautiful places in the Emerald Isle, enjoying at the same time sea breezes, the society of old and valued friends, and occasionally hearing some excellent music. The Howth Railway train passes every half hour within 500 yards of Claremont, so that we can go to Dublin in half an hour to hear Titiens, and Giuglini, Lemaire, and Delle Sedie, not forgetting Miss Whitty and young Ciampi, who are here at the Theatre Royal with Willert Beale. I have been three times, and was delighted with all the company; indeed, I think Titiens and Giuglini surpassed themselves on Monday evening, when Il Trovatore was given. All the favourite pieces were rapturously encored, and I must do Delle Sedie the justice to say I never heard Il Barbière better sung. The gods were in extacies. By the way, the above said dwellers of Mount Olympus are the querist lot I ever sat in a theatre with: only imagine a solo played exquisitely on a penny tin pipe, and songs and glees sung in a very pleasing manner. I have just had a great treat in hearing Miss Flynn, a pupil of Mendelssohn, who studied at the Conservatoire, Leipsic, play on the piano the following pieces in first-rate style. I am sure you will agree with me her selection was a good one:—Notturne, by Chopin; Second Rêverie, S. Heller; "Souvenir de Beethoven," arranged by Prudent; several of Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne worte, besides his "Spring Song," which she played with the most refined taste, artistic feeling and colouring, and brilliant execution.

VALE.

P.S.—I forgot to mention the last night I was at the theatre His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant was there with the Zingari Cricket Club. Between the acts of the opera, the vice-regal party were much amused with one of the gods singing with an excellent voice, a most amusing parody on Il Balen. This was all very well. Sometimes, however, the noise is anything but agreeable; and woe betide any unfortunate wight who appears in the pit or lower gallery in a white hat: immediately he is covered with cut straw, and paper, that descend (much to the amusement of the ladies in the boxes) like a shower of snow.

LYCEUM THEATRE.—Mr. J. B. Chatterton, the acting manager, took his benefit on Monday last, when, in addition to the dramatic performances—comprising Mr. Falconer's comedy Woman; or, Love against the World, and a new ballet farce, by Mr. W. H. Yelland, called A Midsummer's Eve, a miscellaneous concert was given, supported by Mlle. Florence Lancia, Miss Minnie Clifford, the Misses Brougham, Messrs. Alberte Laurence and Aynsley Cook as vocalists, and Mr. Chatterton (Harp) and Mr. Levy (cornet-à-piston), instrumentalists. The programme was well chosen. Mlle. Lancia sang the "War-Song" from Attila with immense effect, and Mr. Chatterton delighted his friends by a most admirable performance of his harp fantasia, entitled "Remembranza d'Italia." Mrs. D. P. Bowers, an American actress, who made, a short time since, a successful début at Sadlers' Wells, appeared for the first time as Geraldine D'Arcy in the comedy. The house was crowded in every part. Mr. Chatterton should take a benefit every night. It would benefit the theatre vastly.

Provincial.

Liverpool. — The open rehearsal of the Liverpool Tonic Sol-fa Association took place on Tuesday evening, in the Medical Institution. The programme displayed an excellent selection of Madrigals, glees, and part songs.

The winter season of the Saturday evening concerts was inaugurated on Saturday last by the Sisters Sophie and Annie, who appeared in their well-known entertainment, entitled "Sketches from Nature."

Tickets for the forthcoming Jenny Lind concerts are in great demand, and as every seat will specially be engaged, we recommend those of our readers who desire to be present to secure their places immediately. The sale of tickets will commence at the Philharmonic-hall on Tuesday morning at nine o'clock, and terminate at four o'clock in the afternoon.

The Philharmonic concert on Tuesday last, writes the Liverpool Albion, was a perfect musical treat, so far as Mlle. Patti was concerned. Her appearance upon the platform was the signal for a spontaneous outburst of applause (we had almost said enthusiasm, but the philharmonic audiences never lose their equanimity to that extent) from an audience which crowded the vast hall to its utmost capacity. Mlle. Patti was set down in the programme for Donizetti's "Regnava nel silenzio," and Bellini's "Ah! non credea," and "Ah! non giunge," from Sonnambula, also in the duet "Quanti amore," with Signor Ronconi. In each of these the charming young vocalist displayed the compass of her voice to its full capacity, and her easy and graceful rendering of the several airs were not the least attractive features of her performance. Whatever may have been said and written upon the subject of Patti's pecuniary value, there can only be one opinion as to the excellence of her singing. Italian is, of course, her natural forte, but she evinced her artistic ability by singing several English and Scotch airs in a style which would have driven any other audience into ecstacies. Her rendering of "Home, sweet home" (in which she was ably accompanied upon the pianoforte by her brother-in-law, M. Strakosch), was beautiful and plaintive, whilst in one or two Scotch ballads she displayed an amount of arch humour which gave evidence of "unco' appreciation," of the "wut" of Burns. Taken all in all, the concert of Tuesday was a decided and unqualified triumph for Mlle. Patti, and the élite of Liverpool were evidently well pleased with their new favourite.

Godalming.—Notwithstanding the wet weather, the Public Hall was filled by the best families of the neighbourhood on Tuesday evening, when an excellent concert was given, with the assistance of Miss Rose Hersée, Miss Bellingham, Mr. Theodore Distin, and Mr. Melchor Winter, as vocalists, and Mad. Winter as pianist. Mad. Winter's performances of Thalberg's "Home, sweet home," and Ascher's Traviata, fantasia, were much and deservedly applauded. The encore system does not appear to be given up at Godalming. Mr. Melchor Winter was obliged to repeat Balfe's "Come into the garden, Maud;" Miss Rose Hersée, "Lily Bells" (Wallace), and Miss Bellingham, "Home, sweet home." The "Spinning Wheel" quartet from Martha was also re-demanded, but the singers (Miss Hersée, Miss Bellingham, Mr. Distin, and Mr. Melchor Winter) judiciously declined the compliment.

Cardiff.—A concert was given at the Temperance Hall, on Monday week, the profits to be devoted to the building fund of St. Peter's Church, Roath. The weather was what is commonly called in Cardiff "concert weather," yet notwithstanding the hall was well filled. We were led by the advertisements to expect Mr. Wilkes, as accompanyist, and also a full orchestral band and chorus of thirty performers. The thirty performers were, with Mr. Wilkes, nowhere, and the "full orchestral band" consisted of two first and two second violins, one viola, one flute, one violoncello, and a pianoforte, numbering in all, including Miss Susanna Cole, and two gentlemen amateurs, eleven performers. Miss Susanna Cole, the great attraction of the evening, sang two morceaux; the scena, "Softly sighs," from Freischutz—the soft flowing melody in which served to develop the fine quality and tender expression of her voice, and formed a striking and beautiful contrast with the declamatory part, which was rendered with great vigour, energy, and dramatic effect—and Bishop's "Tell me, my heart," sung by the same lady at the Town-hall, in the early part of this year. It was then sung charmingly, but it was sung on this occasion with even more exquisite taste and finish, and was the only piece of the evening distinguished by an encore. Miss Clowes, of Newport, sang the "Maid of Kildare" with great feeling, and was warmly applauded. A gentleman amateur, also of Newport, sang "The Bellringer"—one of Wallace's songs—but it proved a failure; his voice was too weak and unsteady to give expression, and too limited in compass to sing the upper notes in tune. The trio, "This magic wove scarf," afforded infinite amusement from the style of singing and attitude of one of the performers. We never remember laughing so heartily at a musical performance. The fun was increased by sundry gleams of native wit, phrases of idiomatic slang, and racy observations, made by occupants of seats in the gallery, until the whole of the audience was convulsed with laughter. We sympathised with Miss Susanna Cole in her unenviable position; and we would advise the gentlemen not to sing upon the same day with such a performer as that lady.

Brighton.—For some time past several members of the Brighton Rifle Corps have been receiving choral instruction at the hands of Mr. J. Towers, one of our local professors of music. On Tuesday last the class presented him with a testimonial in the shape of a handsome silver fish-slice and fork, in morocco case, on the lid of which appeared the following inscription:

Presented to
Mr. J. Towers,
by the 1st Sussex V. R. Choral Class,
Sept. 18th, 1861.

Sergeant Scott, in presenting the testimonial, passed a high eulogium on Mr. Towers's excellent method of teaching, his uniform kindness, and indomitable will, which had enabled the class—whose vocal efforts, ten months ago, were compared by a local paper to the yells of savages, &c.—to sing so well together as they now did. Mr. Towers briefly thanked them, and congratulated the choir on the progress made, promising them, if they stuck to their posts, the realization of the promise made at the opening of their career, that the choral class of the 1st Sussex should be second to none.

Belfast.—(From our own Correspondent.) On Wednesday, the 18th, Mr. Robinson gave an organ recital at Holywood Church, when a large concourse of people assembled to hear his masterly performance of the following very fine programme:—Toccata (D minor), Bach; Andante con moto, Mendelssohn; Lied, "Mein glaübiges Herz frohlocke, Bach;" Adagio, Beethoven; Fugue (G minor), Bach; Fantasia (Très vitement. Grave, a 5 voci. Lentement), Bach; Impromptu, Adams; Allegretto, Mendelssohn; Chorale (5 parts) (with double pedal, supposed to be the finest specimen extant), Bach. Our new Hall is nearly completed, and will be shortly ready for use; but the directors have not yet decided on how it is to be opened. The general wish is most decidedly for a Festival, concluding with a ball, and it is to be hoped this may be accomplished in such a manner as to redound to the credit of the town, which is making rapid strides in the fine arts, and especially in music.

Edinburgh.—Mr. Howard has engaged the Swiss troupe for another week. Last evening the performances commenced with a selection from the répertoire of the Swiss singers, comprising part-songs and soli formerly noticed in the Courant. Fraülein Keller sang the aria from Betly, "In questo semplice," delightfully, and, on being encored, substituted Foster's ballad, "Willie, we have missed you." The fact is, Keller's voice and taste will win a hearing for anything. As for Fraülein Johanna Claussen, she has quite the command of all our Edinburgh enthusiasm, and when she sang "Comin' thro' the rye," with her funny Teutonic Scotch and arch expression, the house did not attempt to restrain a burst of welcome and applause. It was a very good notion of the management to put the musical comedietta, The Swiss Cottage, in rehearsal, with Claussen as Lisette, and Frau Decker-Schenck as Corporal Max. Seldom has that favourite piece been put on the stage with so appropriate a cast. Lisette spoke better English than Madame Celeste generally does, and acted and sang with vivacity and comic vis. Those who have seen Frau Decker-Schenck in the square-cut velvet of the village schoolmaster, will easily believe that she personates to the life the swaggering, jolly Corporal Max, voice and all. Miss St. George took the part of Natz Teick, and brought her careful acting and artistic feeling to the interpretation of the sorrows of that unwarlike gentleman. The concluding movement—the vocal march from the schoolmaster's wedding—was very effective, the remainder of the Swiss coming on the stage as Lisette's companions, and joining in the chorus led by the jolly corporal. The whole performance was a complete success. The programme was finished by the burlesque of the Invisible Prince, which, we confess, we consider excessively stupid.—Edinburgh Courant.

MADAME LIND-GOLDSCHMIDT AND "LONDON OVER THE BORDER."—The lovers of music, and yet more those whose hearts are open to melting charity, and love to do good to their less fortunate fellow-creatures, will be rejoiced to hear that the great, and good as great, songstress, whom the world hailed as Jenny Lind, has kindly consented to consecrate her high talents once again to the cause of charity, and generously gives her services in aid of the erection of a Church, and for the enlargement of the industrial institutions in the Victoria Docks district, "London over the Border," under the pastoral care of the Rev. Herman Douglas. With this view a concert will take place in Exeter Hall on Tuesday evening, Oct. 22, when Mendelssohn's Elijah will be presented, the leading voice-parts by Madame Lind-Goldschmidt, Miss Susanna Cole, Miss Palmer, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. W. Weiss. These will be supported by a complete orchestra and chorus, under the conduct of Mr. Otto Goldschmidt. Immense must be the attraction of once more hearing the "Swedish Nightingale."—Brighton Gazettee.

MELBOURNE.—There was only one thing wanting to make the success of Mr. Marsh complete, says the Melbourne News—that he should have called himself Signor Maraschino, have attached his music to an Italian libretto, and disclaimed all connection with the colony. Fortunately for Mr. Marsh, who has produced an original work of great merit, his composition was presented last night to a discriminating and kindly audience, and its success was as gratifying as he could desire. The performance was somewhat faulty at times; but, thanks to the liberality of Mr. Lyster, the efforts of Mad. Escott, Miss Hodson, Messrs. Farquharson and Squires, the quality of the music, and the zealous co-operation of the gentlemen of the orchestra, the Gentleman in Black has made a hit. The overture was well received; but the opening scene with the double chorus would have been better if some of the number had sung more in tune, and been less vociferous. The tenor's first song (in B flat) was somewhat tame, but Mr. Farquharson's "I'm a merchant and a dealer," enlivened the audience; and the duet which followed with Mr. Squires is one which will become popular when better known. The same may be said of the aria, "One instant stay." In the third scene of the first act, Adele (Mad. Escott), and Fanchon (Miss Hodson), have some very sparkling music, and the closing duet, in A major, brings down the curtain with applause. The second act opens with a spirited chorus, and a ballet divertissement is introduced, including a grotesque waltz, for which Mr. Marsh has provided quaint music. Adele's cavatina exhibits some original changes in the harmony, and proves the composer's mastery of his art. A political cobbler provoked great merriment by a dialogue applicable to the events of the day; and Fanchon's song, "No longer shoes, sir," was warmly applauded. A rollicking chorus, with some concerted dialogue between Maxwell and the Gentleman in Black conducts the business of the scene to a boisterous finale. The third act contains its choicest composition, the Terzetto a Canone, which was rewarded by the first encore. A similar compliment was paid the tenor's aria, "When first I pressed thee to my heart;" to Mr. Farquharson's "I sing not of beauty;" and to the ballads sung by Adele and Fanchon respectively. At the end Mr. Marsh and the principal vocalists were recalled. Special praise is due to Mr. Marsh for his orchestration. The accompaniments throughout were of the happiest character, and many passages were marked by a freshness and variety which reflect credit on his inventive powers.

NEW YORK.—You have heard, ere this, that poor Signor Amodio died recently, at sea, of yellow fever. He will be regretted by many here, to whose amusement and enjoyment he has contributed. Always ready to do his part, and the very personification of kindliness and good nature, every one liked him, and his private life is said to have been such as to merit general esteem. A "Requiem" Mass was held at St. Stephen's church for the repose of his soul. The church was crowded; one would hardly have expected to see so large and elegant an audience assembled at this season. A number of the fellow-artists of the deceased assisted in the musical performances, which were, in fact, very fine. — Correspondence of Dwight's "Journal of Music."

MUSIC IN MADRID.—A Madrid correspondent of the Athenæum gives some interesting particulars of music in that capital. At the Comic Opera, or Zarzuela Theatre, the company is made up of Spanish artists, and the repertory includes works by native writers, unknown on our side of the Pyrenees. "A glance at the score of two comic operas, Catalina and Una Vieja, by Señor Gastambide, has revealed traits of a vein of nationality which could be worked to good account by a composer more assured in his science and varied in his resources." At the concert every piece was sung with change of scene and in costume.

PRAGUE.—Herr H. Rott, musical instrument maker, has lately invented a new wind-instrument for military bands. He calls it a "Glagol."

STOCKHOLM.—Herr John Frederick Berwald, formerly conductor at the Royal Opera House, has just died, aged 73.—Next season a new and original Danish opera will be produced. It is entitled, The Flight of Charles II., the music being by Siboni, and the libretto by Overskou.

KÖNIGSBERG.—On the day of the coronation the programme at the theatre will comprise Herr von Flotow's Müller von Meran, and the ballet of the "Four Seasons," from Verdi's Vêpres Siciliennes.

SIMS REEVES'S

GREAT SONG,

"FRESH AS A ROSE,"

THE POETRY BY

JESSICA RANKIN,

THE MUSIC COMPOSED EXPRESSLY FOR

SIMS REEVES

BY

M. W. BALFE.

Price 3s.

MISS JESSICA RANKIN'S Poetry is as "fresh" as Mr. BALFE'S Music, and deserves quoting:—

"Fresh as a rose, when her leaves are all spangled
With dew-drops, that glitter like jewels of light;
Bright as the morn, when her first rosy blushes
Scatter the darkness and gloom of the night;
Fair as a lily, whose delicate beauty
Rivals the rose in her exquisite grace;
But brighter, and fairer, and dearer than all,
Is the love-light that beams in thy beautiful face."

Mr. SIMS REEVES first introduced this charming little Song (a companion to "The days that are no more") at the concerts in St. James's Hall, and has since sung it at the BIRMINGHAM and HEREFORD MUSICAL FESTIVALS. Wheuever sung, it has been rapturously applauded, and enthusiastically encored.

Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON and Co. have the pleasure to announce that M. EMILE BERGER has transcribed, in the same popular style that he did Mr. SIMS REEVES's last new Song, "I love YOU"—

MADAME SAINTON-DOLBY'S

NEW SONG,

"THE DAYS THAT ARE NO MORE,"

THE POETRY BY

TENNYSON,

THE MUSIC COMPOSED EXPRESSLY FOR

MADAME SAINTON-DOLBY

BY

JACQUES BLUMENTHAL.

Price 3s.

"WHO does not know the Poet Laureate's exquisite lines, beginning—

'Tears, idle tears, I know not what they mean;
Tears from the depth of some divine despair
Rise in the heart, and gather to the eyes,
In looking on the happy autumn fields,
And thinking of the days that are no more.'

That M. Blumenthal, though a Dutchman, loves the poetry of Tennyson, may be gathered from the true sympathetic manner in which he has set his beautiful verses to music. The popularity of this little song is already attested."—Musical World.

Since the above was written, Madame SAINTON-DOLBY has introduced "The days that are no more," both at the BIRMINGHAM and HEREFORD MUSICAL FESTIVALS, with immense success; and the assertion of the Musical World, that "the popularity of this little song is already attested," is fully borne out.

Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON and Co. have the pleasure to announce that M. BLUMENTHAL has transcribed, in his usual elegant style,

"THE DAYS THAT ARE NO MORE,"

MLLE. FLORENCE LANCIA'S New Song, "A thousand miles from thee," composed by Frank Mori, sung by Mlle. Lancia, and enthusiastically encored every evening at Alfred Mellon's Concerts, at the Royal Italian Opera House, Covent Garden, and at the Crystal Palace Concerts, is published, price 2s. 6d., by Duncan Davison and Co. 244 Regent Street, W.

The Morning Post, speaking of the first appearance of Mlle. Lancia at the Crystal Palace Concerts, says, "Mlle. Lancia made an exceedingly favourable impression."—"Criticism owes a word of praise to Mr. Mori's graceful and very expressive ballad, 'A thousand miles from thee.' The composer has not, we think, appealed so successfully to the popular taste since he produced his 'Who shall be fairest?' which barrel-organs have rendered so familiar to the town."

The Morning Chronicle, alluding to the same song, writes, "Mlle. Lancia gave Mr. Frank Mori's new and highly captivating ballad, 'A thousand miles from thee'—composed expressly for her—with a fervour of sentiment and refinement of expression, which demonstrated that she sings from the heart."

MOLE BULL begs to announce that he has RETURNED to England, and will commence his tournée in England, Scotland, and Ireland, on Monday, November 4th.

VIENNA.—Herr R. Wagner and Herr Anton Rubinstein are expected to leave the capital in a day or two. The former returns to Carlsruhe, while the latter proceeds to Berlin and Leipsic. Through the vocal indisposition of Herr Ander they have both been disappointed in the object of their visit. Rubinstein again leaves Vienna without having heard his opera, while Wagner must await a more favourable opportunity for producing his Tristan und Isolde. It is the opinion of Herr Ander's medical attendants that he will not be able to reappear for a month at least. The Emperor of Russia has accepted the dedication of Herr Anton Rubinstein's opera, Die Kinder der Haide, and presented the publisher, Herr C. A. Spina, with the gold medal for Art and Science. The medal bears the inscription: "Præmii digno." Duke Ernest of Saxe-Coburg Gotha, also, has bestowed a gold medal for Art and Science on Herr Wilhelm Krüger(!), the pianist, at present in Paris, while the King of Prussia has decorated Herr Batta, the violoncellist, with the Order of the Red Eagle, third class (!)

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

October 17th.

There is an equal dearth of artistic and political news. Editors and correspondents are gasping in a vacuum of facts, and the imagination of the penny-a-liner is strained to the verge of lunacy to fill up the abhorred void. The wildest "canards" are now in season. In long strings they swiftly traverse from continent to continent, the big ones protecting the little ones under their sheltering wings, and the whole air is filled with their discordant cries. Except occasionally to serve one up to you roasted at the fire of ridicule, and seasoned with the cayenne and lemon of caustic satire, I am not disposed to deal in this species of game, although licensed by the prerogative of custom. Therefore unadorned fact, however meagre the supply, shall be the only fare with which I shall treat your readers.

To begin with the Théâtre Impérial de l'Opéra; whatever is to be said of note or novelty concerning this establishment must still be in the future tense. A special providence seems continually intervening to save the public from the infliction of Prince Poniatowski's lyrical gem, Pierre de Médicis, which was to have done its worst on the suffering audience weeks ago. This time Mad. Gueymard-Lauters is the scapegoat which averts the calamity, at the cost of her own individual suffering, in the shape of some "indisposition," which, let us hope, is only of that conventional kind to which vocalists, on whom much dependence is placed, are subject. There is a lozenge which professes to cure or avert the aphonia clericorum (cacophonia is the prevalent clerical complaint, however); but what "jujube" is to be given to Jubal when his lyre will not sound, and vox faucibus hæret? However, if Pierre is to come out at all, had not the operation better be performed at once? The suspense is perhaps as bad as the evil to be endured. Get well, then, dear Madame Gueymard: command your dear little larynx to be healed, and, by way of punishment for our incredulity on the subject of your ailment, pour out upon us the wrathful vials of Poniatowski-melody, and let the orchestra crush us under Poniatowski-harmonies, or, as we may say, counter-Poniatowski. The tenor, M. Michot, has the disorder of his order also upon him; for there seems to be a sort of vocal murrain: but in his case the public is deprived of a really great work, and, as is expected, a performance fully worthy of it. It is anticipated, however, that Alceste will, before the end of this month, at length see the light. I am informed that on the occasion of its production the newly-invented electrical metronome will be employed, of which M. Hector Berlioz had already availed himself at several large concerts, and by means of which the immense advantage is obtained of establishing a perfectly simultaneous "beat" between the chorus, or any instrumental performers on the stage, and the band in the orchestra. This important improvement will, no doubt, be in future generally adopted in all large lyrical theatres, and will greatly add to the perfection and completeness of operatic performances. Of thunder we have had enough and to boot in orchestras, and to introduce an electrical conductor by the side of the musical one was a very proper notion. The long-mooted question as to the introduction or not of dancing into Alceste has been settled in favour of the retention of the music Glück had written for a ballet. Accordingly, M. Petipa has been requested to devise means for the employment of a corps de ballet and coryphées, and to invent a pas de trois of a suitable character to the airs which have been retained. It is fully anticipated that this revival will be a great success, of which M. Michot will earn his share no less than Mad. Pauline Viardot. A musical paper mentions the date of the first production of Alceste, which was on the 25th of April, 1776, since when it has been four times revived—on the 22nd of October, 1779; on the 24th of February, 1786; on the 13th "Messidor," year "V," of the Republic, and on the 20th of April, 1825. Pending the interval ere the promised novelties are forthcoming, Mlle. Marie Sax, a young singer whose intelligence and progress have strongly interested the public of the Grand Opera in her favour, will make her reappearance in the Trouvère and Robert le Diable; for she too has been indisposed, only as ordinary mortals are, however, her position as yet being too modest to expose her to those more subtle maladies of which, should she rise, as there is every promise of her doing, she will, in time, no doubt have her share.

Postilions never die; and that magnificent old boy, that Methusalem in jackboots—le Postillon de Lonjumeau, considerably older than Adam, his progenitor—for poor Adolphe was cut off in his prime—is again in his sheepskin saddle, cracking his whip, and blowing his horn, in spite of railroads and locomotives. Poor old fellow!—he is not exactly the fastest of coaches, and instead of leaving his customers behind, like the deaf postboy in Cruikshank's caricature, they have rather distanced him. Nevertheless, the public are willing to humour the old boy, and laugh good-humouredly at his mumbled jests, his tottering swagger, and feeble briskness; and when he pipes out his "Oh! qu'il est beau!" clap their hands, and shout "bravo!" till the old one fancies himself as wild a young dog as ever. Well, let him. There are quite juvenile German postboys not worth him even now, and to whom he could give a start of two or thr stages, and greet them, with his arm round the landlady's waist, at the end of the journey.

M. Montaubry, the son-in-law of Chollet, the original representative of the postilion, is said to be the only singer now in possession of the "traditions" of the part. All "traditions" being more or less respectable, and at any rate historically valuable, he may be congratulated on the fact. How is it some things get antiquated in so short a space of time, and others have a freshness which nothing can affect? Fashion—that baseless infatuation of the multitude—has much to do with the difference, no doubt. The figure of a man or a woman, dressed in a fashion that has been only a few years cast aside, * * * * * * the manner of Prince Napoleon in his Pompeian house, write "Cave canem" upon his threshold. Though his old fangs were poisoned as the hooded snake's, never could it be said of this sad old dog that his bark was worse than his bite. Did you ever see him, hear him, in Don Giovanni? It is impossible to conceive anything more grotesquely bad; and I believe, save by a late rakish Prince, the Prince of Rakes was never so grossly caricatured. The public were a little taken aback by the disqualifications of this artist, who had been trumpeted previous to his engagement, and are sceptical now as to the merits of Signor delle Sedie, who, with Beneventano, is to fill up the vacancy left by Graziani. They say that if one is no better than the other, the two will hardly make up small change for their predecessor.

The papers abound here, ad nauseam, with fulsome anecdotes of Rossini, most of which, with the bons mots they record, are feeble inventions. The "Swan of Pesaro," as they call him, cackles like an old goose, if we are to believe his historiographer. But the old maestro must have foreseen and made up his mind to this plague of flies when he determined to settle down in Paris. An instance of the silliness and ignorance of these anecdote-mongers has just appeared in a contemporary. In recording a morning "serenade" (to use a barbarous contradiction which the absence of any corresponding term to "aubade" compels one to) given by the band of the Garde de Paris under the direction of M. Paulus, the chronicler states that a "Tantum ergo" of Rossini was performed, harmonised by the bandmaster. Rossini is said to have complimented M. Paulus by observing, "Your 'tantum ergo' is better than mine." Now, as Rossini is known to have had a very poor estimate of the composition in question, the force of the compliment is destroyed—which, perhaps, is what was intended (there is no knowing). It is, I believe, certain that Rossini has made up his mind to give the world yet another token of his genius. Resolved as he seemed to have been that he would leave behind him no "senilia" that might bear traces of the inevitable effects of time on the most vigorous powers, the desire to contribute to the fund for erecting a monument to the memory of Cherubini has caused him to set aside his determination; and probably it will be found that the laurel-tree of Apollo was not so dead within him but it could yet push forth a blossom worthy of his old self, of the art he has adorned, and of the brother artist whom he wished to honour. Titan is the title of this work, which is for a grand orchestra; and it will be played at a concert of the Conservatorium especially intended to procure funds for Cherubini's monument.

How old is Meyerbeer? is the popular question of the day. How young he is, has long been the popular exclamation. It matters little, the majority of sensible people will say. Dinorah was fresh enough for a stripling, but that no stripling could have kept his footing in its depth. The Germans, however, have a rage for accurate data, that is, precise dates; so they are comparing and discussing the various assertions and authorities on this point. Some say he is 70; some 65; some say 67. The day of the month (September) as well as the year in which he came into the world, is equally a point of discrepancy and dispute. I believe myself that he is not yet seventy; but what matters when a man was born who is destined to live for ever?

Have you heard that Mad. la Baronne Vigier—once known and admired as Sophie Cruvelli—is about to return to the stage? It is so reported, and being sufficiently probable, as well as pleasant to believe in, there is no reason why the rumour should not be accepted for a verity.

DUSSIK, DUSSEK, DUSCHEK.

But to Louis Ferdinand. This was that Prince whom Beethoven (Wegeler and Ries, p. 110) so highly (as he thought) complimented by telling him "he played not at all royally or princely, but like a strong pianist." From the various descriptions of him which I have seen, I have formed in fancy the picture (in 1802) of a man of thirty years of age, tall and noble in person, and of remarkable mental powers—a true case of the mens sana in corpore sano. It was his misfortune to be a prince of the Prussian royal house—not high enough in rank to be called into public political service—too high to engage in any useful occupation. His active, comprehensive mind could not rest, and he threw himself at one time with all energy into literary and scientific studies—an old journal of the time informs its readers that Prince Louis Ferdinand is devoting himself to the study of Greek—then into artistic pursuits—then abandoned himself to dissipation in all forms—then suddenly allowed his better nature full play again, and so on. He fell in the fight at Saalfeld, Oct. 12, 1806.

As to his relations with Dussek, I translate from him who noticed in the Leipzig Musik-Zeitung, Aug. 19, 1807, Dussek's "Elégie harmonique sur la mort de S. A. R. le Prince Louis Ferdinand de Prusse," &c., from the late Ludwig Rellstab, in his Reminiscences of Berlin Music, in Bote and Bock's Musical Journal 1850, and from Spohr's "Selbstbiographie."

The former closes one of those beautifully involved German sentences which require a double-barrelled memory to retain the beginning to the end, in about these terms:—"The bad principle drew him (Prince Louis Ferdinand) deeply into stupifying sensual pleasures; the good attracted him most powerfully to that art, which has less to do with earth than any other occupation of heart and soul—music. And now must he attempt the destruction of a world and the creation of one, new and more beautiful—or rather annihilate his old self, and give the better part of his being free course. Fate, and those to whom in his outward circumstances he was subject, gave him opportunity to effect the latter, and he embraced it.

"In his latter days—I mean to say the last five or six years of his life—in which he turned again to music with all the fiery ardour of his soul, as the means of pouring out his feelings, and of finding nobler and purer recreation, and occasional hours, at least, of peace of mind—at this period came Herr Dussek to Berlin. The Prince had, indeed, studied music in his youth, and had never wholly neglected it; but his soul was now, for the first time, open to its hidden worth—to its higher and more spiritual value. He had, just now, need of a man who could aid him in learning to express fully and correctly what he wished to say, through musical tones; who could fully enter into the spirit of that which he produced, and enjoy it with him; who could afford him intellectual food in productions exquisitely suited to the feelings and taste of the Prince; and who, finally, apart from their common art, would prove an amiable and pleasant companion. All this he found in Dussek in a higher degree than in all the other musicians of his acquaintance. Dussek was all this to him, and the Prince, in return, was all in all to Dussek.

"And, in fact, Dussek must have been to this prince what no other person could—speaking now, of course, only in regard to their musical relations. His strength, as a composer, lies, in my opinion, in the peculiar, new, striking and brilliant character of his invention, and—in the matter of working out his ideas—in the fire and soul, which are seldom wanting in his compositions; and just these characteristics are what we find in the compositions of the prince. Dussek's playing is astounding in execution, sure, fiery, always effective—it is, in all respects, what is now-a-days called the grand style—I use the term to distinguish it from the galant, the highly ornamented, delicate manner of playing (for instance, Himmel's); and such was the performance of Louis Ferdinand—only not so pure and neat as Dussek's. Hence arose relations between them, which justify Dussek in saying, in the few lines of preface accompanying the work under notice, 'L'auteur, qui a eu le bonheur de jouir du commerce très-intime de S. A. R., ne l'a quitté qu'au moment où il a versé son précieux sang pour sa patrie,'—relations which give him the right to express, in the art they both so highly prized, his feeling at the hero's death, and to offer this work to the glorious manes of the deceased."

Now from Rellstab, who is speaking of the early years of this century and in relation to Berlin:—

"The pianoforte, which in its independence of other instruments and in all classes of society, in so far as they have anything to do with music, plays the most important part, had (in Berlin) several most distinguished names among its votaries. The favourite player of Berlin, and decidedly the first in most delicate purity, elegance, and finish of style, was Himmel, a man created by nature to be the central point in the musical salons, an expression not then in vogue. But far greater, and most decidedly so, was Dussek, not only as virtuoso, but as composer for the instrument. He had, moreover, obtained a corresponding European fame, while Himmel was but a local celebrity, although as such he had been raised to the pinnacle of admiration and favour. To these names belongs a third—that of Prince Louis Ferdinand; these three formed, through a period of considerable length, an almost inseparable artistic brotherhood."

Passing over what is said of Himmel, here follow the remarks upon Dussek and the Prince.

"I now come to Dussek. It is not possible for me at least to picture him as one of the musical celebrities of that period; he belongs more especially to an earlier one (the close of the last century), and was only traditionally known in the particular period which is now under consideration. He was incontestably a greater virtuoso than Himmel, one of the first of European pianoforte celebrities. He had in his eminent technical resources a much wider basis for various development, and, both as player and composer, had done far more for the elevation of the instrument than Himmel; so that he rightly demands a place in the history of the pianoforte to which the other, in spite of his local and well-earned reputation, can no way lay claim. We, in fact, are hardly justified in speaking of Dussek in this place; but then he had occupied a position in the musical art of Berlin which is vividly felt even in our own period. He was joined with the ingenious Prince Louis Ferdinand in a close musical union, the influence of which is in the highest degree valuable.

"The Prince, whose heroic death added immensely to the significance of his life, was at that time an artistic power in society, which, though perhaps owing somewhat to his rank for its splendour, must have been in and for itself of the greatest importance, so intimately combined with, and so transfused through all his other generous personal qualities, was the artistic side of his nature. In him were combined in fullest measure the noblest powers and instincts for love and art, which, it is true, had to struggle with a sensual element, spirited and fiery, in working their way to a pure development and the noble end for which they were bestowed; but which in this very conflict and struggle were something grand and of noble portent."

What is said now of the Prince's pianoforte playing is out of place here, and I pass on to where Dussek's name again appears.

"The Prince played a great deal in company with Dussek; several compositions for two pianofortes and many others for four hands plainly owe their origin to the relations between the great virtuoso and the richly endowed Prince. Himmel, also, as before stated, was often their companion in play, in the real signification of the term, and both Himmel and Dussek were the Prince's favourite associates at the wine cup. What sort of influence in these matters Dussek may have exerted upon the character of the Prince is to me unknown; but Himmel possessed, as we have indicated, that lively and joyous, that good-natured and amiable view of life, which is like the sparkling foam of champagne, and which is, as a rule, the most welcome when brothers in art of high intellectual qualities make the full glasses ring. And so the Prince, Himmel, and Dussek formed a musical triad, each exciting, vivifying, and strengthening the others—but in which Dussek, as a virtuoso upon the pianoforte, decidedly took the first place."

Spohr had come (winter of 1804-5), viâ Dresden, to Berlin, with the singer Rosa Alberghi, where he appeared with her in a concert (March 13, 1805).

While making arrangements for this concert, he presented his letters of introduction, and was invited to several music parties.

"The second music party—to which my fellow-traveller was also invited—was at Prince Louis Ferdinand's. We drove thither together, and were most politely received by our host. We found there a very distinguished company—men adorned with orders, women dressed in the height of fashion, and the first artists of Berlin. I met here, also, an old Hamburg acquaintance, the celebrated pianoforte virtuoso and composer, Dussek, who was now the prince's teacher, and lived with him. The music began with a pianoforte quartet, which was played by him in real artistic perfection. Then I followed. Made wiser by my recent mistake [Spohr had played one of Beethoven's quartets, Op. 18, at Prince Radzievill's, to the disgust of his auditors], I chose to-day only compositions in which I could exhibit my powers as a violinist, namely, a quartet and the variations in G, by Rode. My playing gained the liveliest applause, and Dussek, especially, seemed to be enchanted with it. My beloved Rosa also gained universal commendation by her singing of an air, to which Dussek played the accompaniment.

"After the musical performances were over, the Prince gave one of the ladies his arm, and led the way, every gentleman, at a hint from him, following his example, into the dining-room, where a splendid meal was served. Each man seated himself without ceremony by the lady whom he had conducted to the room; I by my dear fellow-traveller. At first, the conversation, though free and easy, was not indecent. But when the champagne began to foam in the glasses, things were said unfit for the modest ears of an innocent girl. I, therefore, as soon as I discovered that these fashionable women did not, as I had supposed, belong to the court, but more likely to the ballet, began to devise means of secretly getting away with my companion. I succeeded in getting to my coach without attracting the attention of the company, and without hinderance, and returned with Rosa to her mother. Next day I was told that the Prince's music parties generally ended with such orgies."

In the autumn of the same year, in October apparently, Spohr was again with the Prince and Dussek, of which he writes thus:—

"Before I entered upon my new office [concert-master at Gotha] I received a letter from Dussek, who wrote me that his patron, Prince Louis Ferdinand, was going to attend the grand military manœuvres at Magdeburg, and desired me to be his guest during that time, and to take part in the musical performances which he intended to give. The Prince, he said, would write to the Duke and gain for me leave of absence. This was at once granted. I journeyed, therefore, to Magdeburg, and found in the house which the Prince had engaged for himself and his followers a chamber designed for me.

"Here I led a strange, wildly boisterous life, which, however, for a short time was very welcome to my youthful tastes. Often at six o'clock in the morning I, as well as Dussek, was driven out of bed and sent in dressing-gown and slippers to the Prince in the reception-room, where, in consequence of the great heat of the weather, he was already sitting at the pianoforte in a still thinner costume—often with nothing on but his shirt and drawers. Now began the trying over and rehearsal of music for the evening, and this, through the Prince's zeal, would often last so long, that the hall would become by degrees filled with officers in all their stars and orders. The costume of the musicians then contrasted strangely enough with the brilliant uniforms of the courtiers. However, this was not of the slightest importance to the Prince, who never ceased until everything went to his satisfaction. Now we made our toilets in all haste, took breakfast, and then rode out to the manœuvres. . . . . But the Prince was soon recalled from his Magdeburg exile, and I, dismissed with hearty thanks by the Prince, could return to Brunswick. Dussek told me, when I took leave of him, that the Prince had intended to make me a present, but there was such an ebb in his finances that he was forced to put it off to some later and more fortunate time. That time, however, never came, as the Prince next year met his fate at Saalfeld."

It is difficult to get at the truth in relation to any one born to a title on the continent. We get nothing but eulogies. For princes the decalogue is printed without negatives. And so this Prince Louis Ferdinand is made a hero; indeed, some woman or other in Berlin has written a long, wearisome novel of the Herihest Rau and Elise Polko order, founded upon the Prince's history. God be thanked that English and American writers have not yet sunk so low as to make Byron, Nelson, and men of that stamp, the subjects of weak romances, nor the English and American public so low as to purchase works of the kind. Thus far, this kind of literature is reserved for our French and German neighbours. Mrs. Stowe's use of Aaron Burr, in the "Minister's Wooing," was not so successful as to lead to a repetition of the mistake, it is to be hoped.

The truth in regard to Louis Ferdinand clearly is, that the ruined debauchee, a man naturally of splendid qualities and uncommon talent, after having exhausted his powers of sensual pleasure, compounded with his creditors and squared accounts with the world by—unnecessarily throwing away in the skirmish at Saalfeld a life not worth preserving. A man is known by the company he keeps, and hence the intimacy between Dussek and Louis Ferdinand is that which gives the worst impression of the moral character of the former.

THE HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS.

By F. W. FAIRHOLT, F.S.A.

(From the St. James's Magazine.)

LONDON may fairly be considered an enormous Cyclopædia of History, of which nearly every street forms a volume, and every house a chapter. To the reflective mind it is peopled by the past as well as by the present inhabitants. We think of Dr. Johnson in Fleet Street; of Oliver Goldsmith in Green Arbour Court. Memories rush upon us more thickly in our public buildings, for they connect themselves with so large a variety of our fellow-men and their acts—whether they be political, religious, charitable, or merely speculative—that the edifices for the due discharge of the duties thus called forth, whether the House of Parliament or the South Sea House, abound in suggestions which may worthily employ the mind. It is recorded of the great French tragédienne, Rachel, that on the morning of her last departure from Paris, she rose at early dawn and went alone in a small open carriage to the theatre which was the scene of her professional triumph, and, stopping in front of it, in the silent morning indulged, undisturbed, in a last reverie of retrospection, which restored to her mind long-past glories in her professional career. There is something intensely melancholy in a closed or deserted place of amusement; it is all the more sombre because it is created to be gay. A theatre by daylight is ghastly in its wretchedness. Vauxhall never gave the idea of a pleasant garden. Yet all such places abound in memories of exciting scenes, of triumphs in dramatic or vocal art, over which the delighted professional or enthusiastic amateur will descant during his mortal career with pleasure.

Less gloomy than the theatre, the concert-room and the ball-room have still a tristesse of their own. The visions of "fair women and brave men" who have whirled away hours of happiness in the large, dull, comfortless saloon that even "Almack's" looks by day, can scarcely relieve the feeling of sadness that its blank immensity produces on the mind. The Hanover Square Rooms, when they echo in the same way to a solitary footfall, are dull enough; and it requires a strong imagination to invest them with the life and enthusiasm so frequently exhibited there, when each seat has hardly held down its excited occupant, as strains "to which gods might listen and admire" have burst forth from the now deserted orchestra.

The English, it will be allowed, are at the present time a "musical" nation; and there is no great capital where a purer class of music is enjoyed, understood, and more generally patronised, than in London. True, we may have an abundance of vulgarities, may patronise "nigger" melodies, and other works of still more questionable taste; but it must always be remembered that the larger mass of the community have not, and cannot have, the educational refinement necessary to the appreciation of a Beethoven or a Mendelssohn. This large public must be provided for in its own particular way; and hence mere organ-grinding may find its grateful listeners to applaud and reward it.

The rise and spread of a higher class musical taste in England is due to a vast amount of perseverance, and no small share of the direst persecution. John Bull delighted in his old ballads and dance-tunes; very properly too, say we; but, as is too usual with him, he believed in nothing else. "Greensleeves," "Sellenger's Round," "Old Sir Simon the King," "Arthur-a-Bradley," and others of that class, enlivened him at country wakes, May-day festivals, and election balls. They were as exhilarating as brandy-punch, and he wished for no other music. The more refined strains of Italy, where harmony sometimes superseded melody, were to him as mawkish as eau sucrée offered in place of his strong drinks. He could not take the dose quietly, and with true Bull-like ferocity sallied forth with the only argument he knew how to use, the argumentum baculinum, and with "beef-fed" sinews, of which he boasted, did he show the "frog-eating" foreigners that themselves and their music were equally unpalatable to him.

The rioting at theatres when Italian singers first attempted operas in London, in its violence, and its success in banishing them for a time, might excite our doubt of its truth, could we not remember similar scenes enacted but a few years ago, when a company of French actors intended to occupy Drury Lane. In the end, musical art triumphed; but the victory was not won without the battle.

It was chiefly due to individual energy, and that of the humblest class, that concerts became fashionable and regularly established in London. The first meeting deserving the name was held in a remote part of the town, unfit for genteel resort, and, when reached, deficient in proper accommodation.

"It was in the dwelling of Thomas Britton—one who gained his livelihood by selling about the streets small coal, which he carried on his back—that a periodical performance of music took place, to which were invited people of the first consequence. The house was in Aylesbury Street, Clerkenwell; the room of performance was over the coal shop; and, strange to tell, Tom Britton's concert was the weekly resort of the old, the young, the gay, and the fair of all ranks, including the highest order of nobility."

Such is Sir John Hawkins's account of this singular origin of popular concerts. But Thomas Britton, it should be observed, was no ordinary man; he was well described as "a lover of learning, a performer in music, and a companion for a gentleman any day of his life." In carrying his charcoal about town for sale, Tom naturally passed book-stalls and shops where "curiosities of literature" would be hidden from all but the student of books. When he arrived at such a spot, he rested his sack on the ground, freed his hands from his coal-measure, and searched for bibliographical treasures. In this way he obtained a most curious library of rare books, and could, on stated occasions, join noblemen and gentlemen in Paternoster Row, and talk with them over their mutual good fortune in meeting with rarities. Britton played the bass-viol; and the social tastes that brought book-collectors of all ranks together enabled him to do the same for music. The large room over his coal-shed was given gratis for their use. The concerts were gratis also, and the best men in London played at them; the visitors being well-known amateurs and nobles, who did not disdain a scramble up the ladder that led from the coal-shed to the concert-room, rewarded as they were sure to be by the best music.

"Though mean thy rank, yet in thy humble cell Did gentle peace and arts, unpurchased dwell."

Cibber, in his famed "Apology," has noted the difficulties which beset the introduction of foreign singers to the English stage. This was in the early years of the last century, when, as he phrases it, "the Italian Opera first began to steal into England, but in as rude a disguise and as unlike itself as possible; in a lame hobbling translation into our own language, with false quantities or metre out of measure to its original notes, sung by our own unskilful voices, with graces misapplied to almost every sentiment, and with action lifeless and unmeaning through every character." Then came the strange mixture of English and foreign singers in the same opera; the natives singing in the vernacular, the foreigners responding in Italian, than which nothing can be conceived more absurd, or more destructive of art.

It was in 1710 that the first Italian opera, Almahide, was represented entirely by Italian artists. An English singer of eminence, Mrs. Tofts, however, occasionally played with them when the greatest stars among them appeared. This lady seems to have fallen easily into an imitation of that greed for money and applause which was popularly believed to belong to foreigners, by such as judged from some few glaring examples. She, however, seems to have combined with it many other unpopular traits, which led to the following epigram:—

"So bright is thy beauty, so charming thy song,
As had drawn both the beasts and their Orpheus along;
But such is thy av'rice, and such is thy pride,
That the beasts must have starv'd, and the poet have died."

Large salaries were paid to singers from the Continent from the very earliest time of their importation; in addition to which it became a fashion with rich amateurs to make them money presents; favourite ladies, like Mingotti, obtained heavy drafts on noblemen's bankers, which one lady of rank imitated by sending Farinelli one for two hundred pounds.

Crowds of nobility and gentry were attracted about the same time to Drury Lane, to witness the performance of operas, in which the principal characters were sustained by an Italian named Valentini, in his own language, while the remainder of the songs and recitative were sung and recited by Englishmen in English—an absurdity which has seldom been surpassed. Vanbrugh and Congreve endeavoured to profit by the prevailing taste, and produced an opera called The Triumph of Love, translated from the Italian, with the songs adapted to the original music. It, however, met with no success; and after being thrice performed was withdrawn. Owen M'Swiney, the first Director of the Opera, was ultimately ruined; and so capricious was the public, that Cibber records, "We have seen even Farinelli singing to an audience of five-and-thirty-pounds."

A Swiss adventurer, named Heidegger, obtained the favour of the great in the reign of George I., and he was appointed Director of Music and Masquerades to the monarch and court. Under his auspices, Faustina, Cuzzoni, Farinelli and others appeared, and reaped large harvests in England. Feuds among the cognoscenti ran high on the subject of the abilities of their favourites. Cibber, in somewhat quaint language, says, "These costly canary-birds have sometimes infested the whole body of our dignified lovers of music with the same childish animosities. Ladies have been known to decline their visits, upon account of their being of a different musical party." The disputes between Cuzzoni and Faustina for precedence, in the summer of 1727, completely broke up the fashionable world into partisans of one or other. The extreme of this musical furore has been immortalised by Hogarth in one of the plates of "The Rake's Progress," where a small engraving, cast upon the ground of the Rake's morning-room," exhibits Farinelli enthroned as Apollo; kneeling ladies offer their hearts on the altar before him, exclaiming, "One God—one Farinelli!"—a phrase absolutely made use of by one fair leader of ton. Hogarth was as bigoted an Englishman as any could be, and his works abound with bold hits at the foreign singers and the un-English tastes they generated.

It was in the year 1720 that a plan was adopted for a more regular and certain support to the lyrical drama and concert than could be ensured by the casual attendance of the public. A fund of 50,000*l.* was raised by subscription, of which sum 1,000*l.* was contributed by King George the First. The project was placed under the management of a Governor, Deputy-governor, and twenty Directors, and called the Royal Academy of Music. To render the design as complete as possible, not only the chief vocal performers, but a lyric poet, and three of the best composers then in Europe who could be prevailed upon to visit this country, were soon afterwards engaged, viz., Attilia, Handel, and Bononconi. Gallini was at this time manager of the Opera House; but his days were disturbed by continued feuds, particularly as to the superiority of the two last-named composers. Horace Walpole, writing to Mann in 1741, tells him, "The Opera is to be on the French system of dancers, scenes, and dresses."

Handel had by this time ensured his success as a popular musician by the production of works especially suited to the English taste. In fact, he was so completely identified therewith, that the Italian party expressly opposed him, and ultimately had a sufficient influence to deaden the effect of his greatest work, the Messiah, and compel him to visit Ireland, where a greater welcome attended him. Walpole was evidently no friend to the great Saxon, and notes his success on his return to England in no complimentary strain:—"Handel," he says, "has set up an oratorio against the operas, and succeeds. He has hired all the goddesses from farces, and the singers of 'Roast Beef' from between the acts, at both theatres; with a man with one note in his voice, and a girl without ever a one; and so they sing, and make brave hallelujahs; and the good company encore the recitative, if it happens to have any cadence like what they call a tune."

The success which now attended oratorio or concert at last induced their patrons to think of a befitting place for their performance. The theatres or the public rooms of taverns were felt to be inappropriate; and, under the auspices of royalty, the Hanover Square Rooms were completed by Sir John Gallini. They combine concert and ball rooms; but it is only with the former that we have now to do. It is a noble room, measuring 95 feet in length by 35 in width, and is capable of holding 800 persons. The low-arched roof is well adapted for sound. The emblematic paintings upon it are by Cipriani, and are good examples of an artist most popularly known in England by the numerous engravings after his designs, by Bartolozzi. The same artists designed and executed the concert-tickets for many years—works once highly-prized by collectors. The concert-room seems to speak only of past glories; in its palmy days it was one of the wonders of London, and its decorations considered as the ne plus ultra of gorgeous taste. It has lived to be superseded by more splendid and convenient rooms, where good music can be heard at a tithe of former cost. Still, the old room, for its time, was elegant—with its delicate paintings, white and gold enrichments, and walls panelled with looking-glass. The royal box, too, in front of the orchestra, insensibly calls to mind the good old George the Third, with his queen and family, enjoying the strains of sound English music as unpretentiously as any of his subjects below.

The change of taste, the establishment of other music-halls, and the love of novelty so characteristic of the "great public," has condemned Hanover Square Rooms to destruction; and houses or warehouses may in a short time occupy their site. Let us, then, linger a few moments within walls so often "eloquent with sweet sounds" from vocalists and musicians who have delighted us and our forefathers. In 1776 the Concerts of Ancient Music were established, "to keep alive a love for the works of the older masters," a rage for novelty at that time threatening to throw all the compositions of the olden time into oblivion. In 1812, the Philharmonic Concerts were established, to cultivate instrumental music; and it boasted one of the finest bands in Europe; an engagement as a member thereof giving a musician high standing in his profession. Haydn and Weber have superintended their own works at these concerts; while a host of singers have appeared on the platform to enchant all listeners. From 1808 to 1810, Mad. Catalani, the most celebrated of prima donnas, carried all before her in a series of concerts here, in absolute opposition to the greatest English singers of the time, who were arrayed against her at the Opera Concert Rooms, and included Mrs. Billington and Braham. But it is invidious to name any great departed vocalist or musician in connection with these Rooms, which have echoed to the music of the greatest in the art from their opening night to the present time.

It is possible for the thoughtful man to sit in this deserted room and dream over its past glories, even as Rachel sat in the quiet morning and thought, opposite the theatre which had been the scene of her professional victories. In the loneliness of solitude the mind often best expands itself. Crowds, excitement, and confusion go to make the public triumph; but calm contemplation gives that triumph its due value. As you gaze on the lonely rooms, visions of the past fill the void; from king to commoner crowd the seats, and all that has made music a living art throng the orchestra. They pass before the mental vision a long array of brilliant spirits, whose enjoyment of an exquisite art has been quadrupled by giving intense enjoyment to their fellows, and lightened most innocently and pleasantly the load of care each is doomed to bear in life. The world owes its deepest debt of gratitude to the professors of the fine arts, and perhaps most of all to that of music, for much of the purest and best gratification at its command.

But it would not be just to the old Rooms, or to the English character, if we neglected to note the high and holy purposes of charity to which they have been occasionally devoted. How many are the good works that have been first promulgated, and the divine music of "a heart singing with joy," vibrating among the poor, the widow, and the orphan, through the eloquent appeals that have been made here—and never made in vain. The worthless profligate, Charles the Second, was so impressed by that benevolence of the Dutch, that he is said to have declared, when that country was in peril, "he believed God would always help Holland, because of its abounding charities." Let us hope the same for England. Cold and unsocial as we may occasionally be, like the Hollanders we have a hand "open as the day to sacred charity." How many thousand kind hearts have beat in unison, all desirous to do good, while meeting on this pious errand here!

We leave the old Rooms with kindly thoughts—pleasant memories only float about them; and when they are doomed to destruction, we shall feel that another link with the great and good departed has been broken in the world of London.

Letters to the Editor.

Sir,—Since last I wrote you on the subject of our professor's organ, or, as one of the papers here called it, the professor's toy, I have had the pleasure of seeing and hearing it. It is certainly a fine organ, but entirely lost where it is, and I think many parts of it of no earthly use to a lecturer on music: the only useful part is the barrel, where you can at pleasure hear any of the fine parts singly played or all together. I also heard this wonderful mixture of sounds, viz. the 14 rank stop. Can the professor not find a new name for it? I would propose "furniture" (an old name for mixtures), with the addition of "kitchen," for it certainly has a good deal the sound of such articles; but, according to acoustics, I find it perfectly correct, and nothing new, so we cannot call it Donaldson's mixture. I find it laid down by the theoretical portion of music as discovered by Aristoxenus, Pythagoras, Lasus, Euclid, Ptolemy, and others among the great fathers of musical science; but the whole of it may be said to be the sum of a confused multitude of different sounds, whose undulations, being inconcinnous and contrary, disconcert and distract the sense.—I am, Sir, yours, &c.

MADAME DARIO.

Sir,—Having seen in the Musical World of this week the names of the artists engaged by Mr. Beale for Mad. Grisi's tour, I beg to call your attention to the name of Mad. Dario, whom you named Davis. Trusting that you will correct the error, I remain, yours, &c.

LONDON: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1861.

THE programme for the sixth season of the Royal English Opera is now before the public. The company, in almost every department, is strong; the catalogue of new works unusually imposing. No less than nine new operas and operettas are promised, together with the production of Mr. Macfarren's Robin Hood, which, as far as regards the performance at Covent Garden, may be termed a novelty. Are Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. W. Harrison veritably bent on bringing out all these works? We have no doubt it is in their contemplation; but we fear, in this instance, the wish is "father to the thought." However, we may conclude that all are in prospectu, and should one fail, that another is ready to take its place. Success may render impossible the production of one half of those mentioned, which, indeed, we hope may be the case, since we should infinitely prefer having to record a breach of promise on the part of the directors to chronicling one failure in the season. That the management should be prepared for the worst was no more than right; but their fears, we fancy, have outrun their policy.

Let us examine the list of new operas and operettas. They are as follows:—Ruy Blas, an opera in four acts, by Mr. Howard Glover, librettist unknown; the Puritan's Daughter, an opera by Mr. Balfe, librettist Mr. J. V. Bridgeman; a romantic opera by Mr. Benedict, librettists Messrs. John Oxenford and Dion Boucicault; an opera by Mr. W. Vincent Wallace, librettist Mr. J. R. Planché; an opera by Mr. G. A. Macfarren, librettist Mr. John Oxenford; a new opera by M. Gounod, entitled Faust and Marguerite, librettist Mr. H. F. Chorley; an operetta called the Toy-maker, by Mr. George Linley, librettist Mr. George Linley; an operetta by Mr. Frederick Clay, librettist Mr. Tom Taylor; and an operetta by Mr. J. Maddison Morton, librettist not transpired. Here is food for infinite speculation. Can British musicians now say they are neglected? After this, can the cry be raised of undue preference being shown to foreign talent? Of a verity we think that a testimonial of English metal, of English manufacture, and with an English inscription, should be presented by English composers to Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. W. Harrison.

Mr. Howard Glover's Ruy Blas is the first new opera to be presented; the season will be inaugurated with it on Monday. Ruy Blas was put into rehearsal at the latter end of last season, but was withdrawn, composer and managers agreeing that there would not be sufficient time for its proper and complete production. From this work a great deal is anticipated. Mr. Howard Glover is one of the most earnest and deep-searching labourers in the vineyard of music. Many opportunities have not been afforded him for demonstrating that eminent dramatic talent which first showed itself in the cantata of Tam O'Shanter, and culminated in the Ossianic drama of Comale. On Monday night we fully expect the composer will take his revenge for all past slights of fortune.

Mr. Balfe is busy on the Puritan's Daughter, which, we learn from a confidential quarter, is likely to prove one of his masterpieces. As a morning contemporary asserts, "For the first time the popular composer, in the co-operation of Mr. J. V. Bridgeman,' has found a scribe (query Scribe?) of whom he need not be thoroughly ashamed."

The opera upon which the pen of Mr. Benedict is employed is, we believe, a version of the Colleen Bawn of M. Boucicault. The difficulties the composer has to contend against are unusually great, but not insurmountable to talent and experience like that possessed by the author of the Gipsy's Warning and the Crusaders.

What the new opera of Messrs. Macfarren and Oxenford is we know not (unless it be Hamlet), nor what the new opera of Messrs. Wallace and Planché. The new opera of Messrs. Gounod and Chorley is not new.

The operetta of the Toy-maker will exhibit Mr. George Linley, not for the first time, as musician and poet. In one respect Mr. George Linley may be denominated the Robert Wagner of England, Ireland, and Scotland, since he writes his own librettos. It is unfortunate that Mr. George Linley's operetta should be announced for production the same night as Mad. Jenny Lind's appearance at Exeter Hall; not because persons would be won away from the Toy-maker to Elijah, but because all the musical reporters will be doing duty in the Strand.

The operetta by Mr. Frederick Clay will claim our tenderest regard. Mr. Clay is a highly-accomplished amateur, and an enthusiast to boot. We shall look forward with much interest to Mr. Clay's new work. That Mr. Tom Taylor, the universal and eternal, will find him a capital book cannot be doubted.

The operetta by Mr. Maddison Morton will constitute a literary puzzle. That an author who has kept the London world laughing for years by the whimsicality and absurdity of his farces should, all at once, turn his serious attention to the composition of music, is perhaps unparalleled in the history of the art. In commencing with an operetta, Mr. Morton judiciously indicates that he is willing at the onset to try his pinions at a low flight, before he ventures to soar into the empyrean of grand opera. We await with the utmost impatience and keenest anxiety the new operetta from the pen of Mr. Maddison Morton.

That Mr. Macfarren's Robin Hood is to be produced cannot fail to gratify all the lovers of good music. One difficulty only will present itself to the directors—to whom to assign the part of the outlaw, as we understand Mr. Harrison has declined it.

It only remains to supply a list of the company. The sopranos are Miss Louisa Pyne, Mad. Guerrabella, and Miss Thirlwall; contraltos, Miss Susan Pyne, Miss Topham, and Miss Jessie M'Lean—one contralto, by the bye, to each soprano; tenors, Messrs. W. Harrison, Henry Haigh, A. St.

Digitized by Google

Albyn, and C. Lyall; basses and barytones, Messrs. Santley, Henry Corri, Patey, Theodore Distin, Eugene Dussek, T. Wallworth, and George Honey. Most of these are old names and true. The strangers are Mad. Guerrabella and Miss Jessie M'Lean—that is, strangers to the English stage. Mad. Guerrabella sang last season at the Philharmonic Concerts, and left a favourable impression as a singer of the bravura school, almost as a Rossinian singer. To what account the foreign lady is to be turned in an English company we cannot guess. Miss Susan Pyne's return to her old post is a move in the right direction. This lady should never have quitted her old post. The reinstalment, too, of Mr. Santley and Mr. George Honey must afford unqualified satisfaction to the subscribers and patrons of the theatre.

What more need be said? Best of all, that Mr. Alfred Mellon is at the head of the orchestral department—sufficient guarantee that the band and chorus will be as complete and efficient as ever.

THE free objectivity with which Handel treated every character and every situation, however foreign they might in reality be to him, and the way in which he saw through and brought out their most inward significance, is truly wonderful. How strong a mind, bearing within itself all the primitive types of man, must have been granted to an artist who, even to his extreme old age, kept continually creating new shapes, each fresh one surpassing in grandeur its predecessor, while the last eclipsed them all! How great, too, must have been his stores of musical creative power, when nearly half a century of incessant productivity was not enough to exhaust him! Such original strength and elasticity of mind—which disasters that would now-a-days crush our nature were scarcely capable of bending, far less of breaking—we may perhaps imagine poetically and historically admire, but must not expect to meet again. One uninterrupted struggle with adverse circumstances and never-ending artistic creation terminated in the total loss of the little property acquired by Handel during a period of twenty years. All this might obscure his mind, and bring with it bodily illness; but, after a few baths at Aix-la-Chapelle, he again sat before his organ, the same great and unyielding nature, which, in the midst of either happiness or misfortune, could never be diverted from its path. Whoever, indeed, approaches the circle of Handel's influence is drawn towards it by the strength which a pure character, a large heart, and a clear sound mind inevitably possess. No wonder that German critics and biographers, in the course of their extensive historical researches, should feel compelled to linger when they came to this "man-mountain" (as they tell us we English call him), in order to point out what true artistic life and feeling ought to be.

Among our contemporaries abroad, few possess a better right than Handel's last biographer*, to give an impressive lesson as to how musical history should be written, and what course musical literature must pursue, in order not to neglect important questions for the sake of passing events, disputes on technics, and mere subjective phrase-making. The task of writing a good musical history is still accounted an enterprise of doubtful issue, but the second volume of the Life of Handel confirms the hopes awakened by the first, that in its author may be found the precise historian in request. Besides an extensive knowledge of music and polite literature, this diligent writer possesses a great facility in reading scores; his quick eye does not allow the slightest points to escape, while his comprehension of the whole from a part, as well as of the connection between idea and form, is that of a thoroughly educated artist. The most absolute positiveness, and consequently unbiassed truth, are principles which, under no circumstances, does he quit, till he has followed them up to the furthest limits that human sagacity can reach. That his natural position should attach him more closely to one object than to another, is therefore not less natural; but that we are always obliged to recognise as correct the light in which he views his subject, both as a whole and in detail, justifies so much the more the confidence unanimously reposed in his statements. Nor would we, for anything, miss his warmth of artistic susceptibility, since it has nothing in common with over-hasty enthusiasm or personal feeling, but is invariably the result of correct appreciation.

The sympathy between Chrysander and Handel is especially close, being based upon cognate traits of character. Like Handel, his biographer possesses unshakeable industry, sharpness of observation, the desire for education embracing all departments of life, and truth towards himself, combined with impersonality towards others. Such men, who ennoble the present by continually directing our attention to what is highest in art, are the real workers of the Future. The manufacturers of turgid, sentimental art-novels, will lay Chrysander's last and best book aside with a certain degree of aversion, and find only poverty in its critical wealth, on seeing the destruction of many of their ideals, and being compelled to view Faustina or Farinelli in a somewhat different light from that to which they have been accustomed. Let them, nevertheless, ignore the work; they could only make a wrong use of it by pillaging its contents. There have been silly abstractions enough dressed up in historical suits, and adorned, as a modern critic remarks, "with a cast-off wig of Friedemann Bach, or a faded coat of Calvesius."

* Chrysander.

THE accounts in connection with the "Festival of the Three Choirs," held at Hereford last month, are now completed, and the results show a very satisfactory state of things in a considerably diminished deficiency and increased receipts for the charity which these festivals were established to uphold. The collections in behalf of the charity at the previous festival (1858) amounted in the aggregate to 1064*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.*, the largest sum, with one exception, ever till then realised at Hereford. This year the receipts for the charity amount to 1069*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.* The general account (for 1861) shows the following results as compared with the festival of 1858:—Receipts, 2400*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.*; 1858, 1657*l.* 19*s.* Expenditure, 2748*l.* 19*s.* 11*d.*; 1858, 2412*l.* 9*s.* 1*d.* Deficiency, 348*l.* 18*s.*; 1858, 755*l.* 10*s.* 1*d.* This deficiency (348*l.*) will have to be made up by contributions from a guarantee fund subscribed by the public and by the stewards, the 1069*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.* received at the doors of the cathedral for the charity being handed over to the fund without any deduction whatever.

At the audit of the accounts Mr. J. H. Arkwright, of Hampton Court, in compliance with a wish generally expressed, consented to continue in office as chairman until the next festival, in 1864. Thanks were voted to the Right Rev. the Bishop of Hereford, and to the Very Rev. the Dean, "for the effective aid and countenance rendered by them to the music meeting, and for their hospitality" dispensed during the festival week. Thanks were also voted to Mr. G. Townsend Smith, the conductor and hon. secretary, "for his indefatigable exertions in making the necessary arrangements for the musical festival, and bringing it to its successful issue." Thanks, in short, to everybody except to the representatives of the London press, who travel all the way from the metropolis to aid the charity, by giving the widest publicity to the proceedings at the triennial music meetings, which so materially help to support it. Nearly thirty gentlemen have already put down their names as stewards for the next Hereford Festival. The meeting of next year will be held at Gloucester.

AS we fully agree with the principle that what is for the general good should be as widely circulated as possible, whether strictly belonging to our columns or not, the more especially when there is little doubt that our musical readers are quite as much interested as any other portion of the public in learning the progress of a sister science in combatting peculiar forms of disease, we have, therefore, much pleasure in announcing that Dr. O'Connor, one of the physicians to the Royal Free Hospital, promises, early in November, a work on the "Successful Treatment of Neuralgia and other Painful Diseases." With the authority of such a name, and the opportunities of experience at a public institution, there can be little doubt but that the volume will prove a boon to the sufferers from this terrible complaint, so peculiar to our English climate, the more especially when the wintry winds are blowing, and so afflicting to musicians, whether singers, players, or composers.

THE LATE MR. CARD.—We very much regret to announce the death of Mr. William Card, who for many years was principal flute at the Philharmonic, Ancient, and Sacred Harmonic Concerts. He died at 73 years of age, after three years of severe illness, during which time his son, Mr. Edward Card, of Her Majesty's private band, has, with the rest of his family, been devoted to the comfort of the sufferer. Mr. Card was a member of the Philharmonic Society, and also of the Royal Society of Musicians. He will long be regretted and remembered by the musical profession, by his pupils, and by a large circle of friends.

M. OLE BULL.—This celebrated violinist, after a most successful tour in Sweden and Norway, has returned to England, and will shortly commence a tournée in the provinces, for which he has engaged the services of Miss Anna Whitty, Mrs. Tennant, Mr. Tennant, and Herr Formes. M. Emile Berger will preside at the pianoforte.

BROMLEY RIFLE CORPS BAND.—The morning performance last Monday, in the White Hart Assembly Rooms, was attended by the élite of the neighbourhood. The fair sex were there in great numbers, and rewarded the exertions of the artists, Miss Rebecca Isaacs, Miss Leffler, Mr. Henry, Mr. George Tedder (vocalists), and Mlle. Levesque (pianist), both with smiles and plaudits. Mlle. Levesque, a young pianist, possessing a nimble finger and excellent taste, played Wallace's "Cracovienne," and Thalberg's "Home, sweet Home." Mr. C. Henry, who has a bass voice which may be the means of bringing him into prominent notice among concert singers, must be eulogised for his excellent singing; and Mr. George Tedder gave, among other things, a ballad, "Happy moments," in his best style, and Ascher's new song of "Alice, where art thou?" with so much spirit and expression as to delight all his hearers. Suffice it that all the singers acquitted themselves most satisfactorily. The band of the Bromley Rifle Corps played the march from Norma, a waltz by Mr. Millar, and a selection from the Puritani. The accompanyists at the pianoforte, Messrs. Herring and Wilson, acquitted themselves admirably, and the whole concert gave evident satisfaction to the audience.

THE SISTERS MARCHISIO.—These celebrated duet singers will make their first appearance in this country early in January, Mr. Edward Land having concluded an engagement with them, extending over a period of three months.

MR. ALFRED MELLON'S CONCERTS.

MR. MELLON'S second series of Promenade Concerts was brought to a termination on Saturday with the benefit of the director. The theatre was immensely crowded. The principal vocalists were Mlle. Parepa, Mlle. Florence Lancia, Mad. Laura Baxter, Mr. Donald King, and M. Fontanier. The programme was made up of old favourites, and demands little comment. The instrumental features were Beethoven's "Battle Symphony" and the overture to Guillaume Tell.

The policy pursued by Mr. Mellon, and his intentions with regard to the future, will be best explained in the following circular which was distributed in the theatre:—

"Mr. Alfred Mellon desires to express his sincere thanks to the nobility, gentry, and public, for the patronage bestowed on his second annual series of concerts, the last of which takes place this evening, October 12th, 1861. During the season Mr. Alfred Mellon has had the honour to give no less than fifty-four concerts, on consecutive evenings, which have been attended by more than one hundred thousand persons; and it is a source of peculiar gratification to him to be enabled to state, that notwithstanding the great number of concerts given, and the intricacy and difficulty of performing many of the works included in the programmes, that, with two or three exceptions, his patrons were not subject to disappointments. For this result Mr. Alfred Mellon feels he is under great obligations to all the artists with whom he has had the pleasure of co-operating. On undertaking the responsible task of giving a series of first-class instrumental and vocal concerts annually, Mr. Alfred Mellon appreciated the difficulties by which he was surrounded. A remembrance of the talent, skill, and energy exhibited by the late M. Jullien — the great popularity justly awarded by the public to that distinguished musician, conductor, and caterer, during a period of more than twenty years, who left behind him a reputation very difficult, if not impossible, for any successor to equal or maintain — the rapidly advancing musical taste of the public, demanding a widely different, and more varied programme of music to that which proved so attractive in former years—the severe competition which now exists in providing public amusements in London, combined with the early period of the year at which Mr. Alfred Mellon was compelled to announce his concerts this season, constituted the difficulties to which reference has been previously made. In seeking to overcome these, Mr. Alfred Mellon conceived that he would be taking sure steps to entitle his enterprise to public patronage by providing:—1. An elegant, commodious, and suitable locale for his concerts. 2. A band, consisting of nearly one hundred eminent performers. 3. The assistance of vocal artists of the highest repute. 4. Instrumental solo performers of acknowledged ability. 5. Performing instrumental and vocal, classical and miscellaneous music, by native and foreign composers. Mr. Alfred Mellon has endeavoured to carry these arrangements into effect, and he is happy to announce that they have met with the approval of his numerous patrons, and the almost universal praises of the press. In selecting the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden, as the locale of his concerts — with its spacious stage and pit, converted into a grand promenade of unequalled extent — with its abundant accommodation, acoustic properties, admirable ventilation, and brilliant appearance, Mr. Alfred Mellon endeavoured to give an earnest proof of his desire to provide suitably for the comfort of those visitors who honoured him with their presence, and also to enable the music performed to be satisfactorily heard."

THE NATIONAL CHORAL SOCIETY.—This Society, numbering nearly 800 musical amateurs, held its first annual meeting on Wednesday at the Floral Hall. Mr. Martin, the conductor, who established this society last year, gave an outline of the first year's operations, and of the prospects for the ensuing season. The performances are not confined to oratorios, but include other kinds of classical music, sacred and secular; and it is intended that operations shall extend to all parts of the metropolis. Sufficient numbers of members live in each postal district to form local societies for the purpose of giving performances in aid of local charities, and also with a view of giving cheap concerts of classical music for providing rational amusement for the labouring classes. The following oratorios will be included in the programme of the forthcoming season: the Messiah, Creation, Israel in Egypt, Judas Maccabæus, and Elijah, the last-named being appointed for rehearsal for the first meeting on Wednesday evening.

LETTERS FROM AN AMERICAN IN LONDON.*

No. 4.

London, July 11.

Did I say six hundred people listened to Charles Hallé's "Beethoven Recitals?" That was a far too timid estimate; those who know best tell me that there were at least a thousand. Very close attentive listeners they were, with few exceptions; many with book in hand, as I have said; mother and daughter perhaps looking over the same copy of the score, husband and wife, or pair of friends, or lovers. Is their love as deep, we wonder, as the language which now vibrates through them? Have they in them that which answers to the tone-poet's wonderful, most human, most heartfelt confessions? If so, they will know few better hours than that in which they followed, with Hallé for interpreter, that tenderly impassioned sonata, Op. 81, whose three movements bear the titles: "Les Adieux," "L'Absence," and "Le Retour," or to the next in order, Op. 90, in E minor, with which (according to Schindler) there also goes a story, that it was written for the Count Lichnowski, when in love and hesitating, and that the first movement (Vivace e sempre con espressione) was to have been called "Contest between head and heart," and the second and last (Allegretto, E major), "Conversation with the beloved." Lovely indeed is that last movement—tranquil and deep and full of bliss as Mozart. Two more perfect love-poems, true to the heart's experience for ever, do not exist even in music; and it will always be among the worthiest ambitions of first-class pianists, such as Hallé, to perform them worthily, as it is with actors of true genius to keep fresh the inexhaustible significance of Shakspeare.

These two sonatas formed the first part of Hallé's seventh recital. Their treatment under his hands was masterly and delicate. If one could have wished a little more nervous fire in the first one,—more of the restless and impatient Beethoven temperament—the second was all that could be desired; it seemed not only tastefully and finely, but also sympathetically played; most clearly, delicately outlined, warmly, richly coloured, softly, exquisitely shaded. And yet the admirable pianist has not once impressed me as having the live spark of genius in him. I could name a player or two who give me that, while they could never trust themselves to do what he does. The two sonatas were separated by that beautiful song of Schubert's, "Du bist die Ruh" ("Thou art the rest"), sung in French under the title of "L'Attente," by Mr. Tennant, who has a delicate and expressive tenor. This song afforded just the right relief, harmonising well with the mood of the sonatas; but it would have been better not in French.

The second part contained two great ones—two of the so long dreaded sonatas of Beethoven's "last period," about which there has been so much mystification, until some of the more genial and earnest of our new school pianists (prestidigitateurs) turned their attention from the ground and lofty tumbling feats of senseless show fantasias, to these real poems, long locked up in difficulty, and mastered them and made them clear to every listener with brains and music in his soul. The first, Op. 101, in A major, which also has its love story, and dates from about the same time with the Liederkreis, I had heard admirably played by Clara Schumann. I am not sure Hallé did not play it even better, at least so far as the masculine and moody vigour of the second movement (Vivace alla marcia), and the wild impetuosity, self-constrained into a fugato form, of the brilliant final allegro, are concerned. Passing a rather commonplace "Evening song," by Blumenthal, what shall we say of the famous grand sonata (sometimes called "double sonata," because on account of its length it is sometimes published as two), in B flat major, Op. 106? It is indeed a "Titanic" work; and of all things ever written for the instrument it offers perhaps the severest test of all the faculties, technical and genial, of the executive pianist. We have all read, and so too some of the best authorities have told me here—Mr. Benedict, for instance—that no one hitherto has achieved this task so triumphantly as Miss Arabella Goddard. Unfortunately I have not heard her. Of the composition, as such, it would be too much to try to give any account here; but in the performance Mr. Hallé certainly astonished and delighted everybody. It was his crowning feat. If he did not bring out all that possibly could be brought out from a work so crowded with ideas and inspirations, he at least made it all so clear, so consistent, so beautiful and grand and happily varied, so fascinating from first to last, that the charm seemed as short as it was perfect. One wondered when he found the great hill of difficulty actually behind him, lying there so soft and picturesque on the horizon. It certainly required a masterly rendering to make that very long, sombre, deeply brooding Adagio sostenuto (in F sharp minor) interesting to the end, to nearly all the audience, as he did; or to thread the mazes of that wondrous fugue, "a tre voce, con alcune licenzie," of the finale, with such unerring vividness of outline.

The last "recital" was on Friday, July 5th, when Mr. Hallé fulfilled his arduous design to the last letter, by masterly readings of the last three sonatas. First, that in E major, Op. 109, with its fitful alternation of Vivace and Adagio espressivo fragments in the first movement, its prestissimo in the minor of the key, and finally its Andante molto cantabile (never had the deaf giant been so profoundly, sweetly melodious, so apt to melt into the pure cantabile, as in these last days), which has been justly called "one of the most genial and exquisite of those original melodies which he has treated in the variation form." Then,—after a pause filled by the "Adelaida," finely sung by Signor Gardoni—the sonata, Op. 110, in A flat major, also abounding in fitful alternations of tempo, fugued passages, subtle and suggestive variations, singular rhymthical divisions, warm, throbbing melody, and all the characteristics of his last period, while the logical consistency and unity of origin and purpose are never once lost sight of. Finally—after Gardoni had sung "Auf Flügeln des Gesanges" (Mendelssohn), in Italian—the last of all the sonatas, the great one in C minor, Op. 111, ending with another wonderful Adagio cantabile, after an Allegro whose fiery, restless mood seems to revert to that of the C minor symphony, and of the Sonata pathétique, also in the same key. Wonderfully crisp and clear, but perhaps too rapidly, did Hallé take the bold continuous Allegro con brio, which sets out in unison. The Adagio was beautifully done. And everybody involuntarily lingered, as if unwilling to believe that these rare feasts of music were indeed all over. But to every one who listened truly it still lives! If ever concert-giver could congratulate himself on a good work done, and with complete success, that pleasure must be Mr. Hallé's.

To look at him, you would not think him such an artist. There is something almost methodistical in his serious, homely, long face, and the straight, sandy hair well smoothed over the shining head. But there is a beautiful clearness in his look, as of a stream never sluggish, and a quiet self-possession in his manner, which denotes artistic fidelity and character. Such a concert was riches upon riches, following, as it did for me, the unexpected revival (on the day before, the 4th) of a rare experience of brighter days, which was no less than hearing "the Lind" sing again—and with nothing of the old charm, on her part, wanting! Of this I have yet to tell; as well as of many interesting concerts heard in these last weeks, and admirably performed operas, besides, including (after all) Guillaume Tell and Don Giovanni, with the wonderful début of "little Patti" as Zerlina. Meanwhile, just to show the wealth of London—alas! that it takes so much of the meaner kind of wealth to go to operas and concerts here; yet thousands do contrive to pay their guinea every night—look at this list of really distinguished singers, every one of whom has been here and could be heard here during the last few weeks:—

Sopranı.—Mad. Jenny Lind-Goldschmidt (only once); Mad. Giulia Grisi (still taking farewells!); Mlle. Tietjens; Mad. Penco; Mad. Gassier; Mlle. Adelina Patti; Mlle. Czillag; Miss Anne Banks; Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington; Mad. Rudersdorff; Mad. Miolan-Carvalho; Mrs. Sunderland; Mlle. Anna Whitty.

Contralti.—Mad. Alboni (gone to Paris); Mad. Nantier-Didiée; Mad. Lemaire; Mad. Sainton-Dolby; Miss Adelaide Philipps (has not sung); Miss Freeman; Mlle. Parepa.

Tenors.—Signor Mario (still in his prime); Signor Giuglini; Signor Gardoni; Signor Tamberlik; M. Belart; Messrs. Sims Reeves, Inkersoll, Tennant.

Baritones.—M. Faure; M. Gassier; Signors Belletti, Delle Sedie, Guglielmi, Garcia, Ronconi (as Masetto!), Tagliafico; Messrs. Santley, Montem Smith.

BASSI.—Herr Carl Formes; Herr Zelger; Mr. Weiss.

And more, whose names escape me; while one or two of these, perhaps, I have not rightly classed, not having heard them all. Of what I have heard I hope to recall enough to lend interest to another letter. D.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

AT the concert on Saturday Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini were the chief attractions. The programme consisted, with the exception of two valse airs, of selections from Don Giovanni and Marta. The other singers were Mad. Caradori, who has long been well known to the English public, and Signor Bossi, who bids fair to become at least as widely appreciated. Mlle. Titiens sang magnificently the aria, "Non mi dir," from Don Giovanni. She sang, too, "The Last Rose of Summer," which was redemanded. Signor Giuglini's version of "Il mio tesoro" is, to our thinking, a mistake; but the melodious romance from Marta, "M' appari," is almost perfect. "Batti, batti," fell to Mad. Caradori's share, and Signor Bossi displayed a powerful voice and strong dramatic feeling in the spirited beer-song from Marta, although, both in that and in the opening of the duet, "La ci darem," he seemed too much inclined to drag the time. The concerted music was well executed, especially the trio of masks; and the overture to Marta was performed with capital effect. Mad. Caradori sang the favourite aria by Benedict and De Beriot, "Nel dolce incanto;" and a new valse, entitled "Stella," by Signor Arditi, the composer of the now celebrated "Bacio," was twice performed, a band rehearsal taking place in the pause between the two parts of the concert, and Mlle. Titiens afterwards singing it with great applause.

Two popular concerts,—not popular in the St. James's Hall acceptation of the term,—popular as to pieces, but not classically so, have this week been given at the Crystal Palace. The great attraction offered was the opportunity of hearing those distinguished artists, Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini, at one shilling admission. We doubt the policy of the directors in making the charge of admission so low, as we believe such a reduction must seriously interfere with the receipts of the Saturday afternoon concerts, when they cannot present so attractive a combination as on the occasions in question. This, however, is the business of the directors, with whom it is neither our intention nor desire to enter into discussion upon the point. Let them see to it. The first concert took place on Tuesday, the 15th, the second on Thursday, the 17th. The programme of the first was as follows:—

PART I.—Overture (Le Cheval de Bronze), Auber. Aria, "Non piu andrai" (Nozze di Figaro), Mozart; Signor Bossi. Duetto, "Da quel dì" (Linda di Chamounix), Donizetti; Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini. Aria, "Torquato Tasso," Donizetti; Mad. Caradori. Romanza, "Spirto gentil" (Favorita), Donizetti; Signor Giuglini. Cavatina, "Com è bello" (Lucrezia Borgia), Donizetti; Mlle. Titiens. Quartetto (Fidelio), Beethoven; Mlle. Titiens, Mad. Caradori, Signors Bossi and Giuglini.

PART II.—Overture (Il Barbiere), Rossini. Duetto, "Obbligato" (Elisir d'Amore), Donizetti; Signors Giuglini and Bossi. Valse, "La Stella," Arditi. Romanza, "Tu m'ami" (Zingara), Balfe; Signor Giuglini. Duetto (Der Freischütz), Weber; Mlle. Titiens and Mad. Caradori. Terzetto, "Qual volutta" (Lombardi), Verdi; Mlle. Titiens Signors Bossi and Giuglini. Overture (Le Père gaillard), Weber.

With the exception of Signor Bossi, the vocalists are all well, and favourably known to our readers. The stranger is a basso of no ordinary talents and acquirements. He brings with him a well-earned reputation from Italy, where his powerful voice and dramatic talent attracted the attention of Signor Verdi, who wrote expressly for him several of the bass parts in his different operas. Signor Bossi fully justified all expectation by the artistic manner in which he sang Mozart's aria. Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini delighted their hearers as much as ever in the various pieces set down for them, especially in the duet from Linda, which created a furore. The quartet from Fidelio was admirably rendered. The only novelty in the programme was the valse composed expressly for Mlle. Titiens by the talented maestro, Signor Arditi—a sequel to his well-known "Bacio," rendered so popular by Mlle. Piccolomini. The new valse is christened "La Stella," and, judging from its reception by the audience last Tuesday, it bids fair even to transcend its predecessor in popularity. It is in every respect adapted to the magnificent voice and florid execution of the gifted vocalist, who sang it con amore and with the greatest effect. The band, under the direction of Herr Manns, acquitted itself with its usual ability and credit to its energetic conductor.

The second concert, on Thursday, attracted a larger crowd than on Tuesday, but on neither occasion did the audience reach the number of six thousand. Strange indeed that a man walking on a rope above the people's heads should attract between thirty and forty thousand persons, and yet not above a tenth part of that number should be tempted to visit the Crystal Palace to hear two of the greatest living singers!—both being accessible, be it remembered, for one shilling. Query—If Blondin were to cut capers at the opera, would he bring larger houses than Guillaume Tell or Don Giovanni?

The programme of the second concert was of the same character as that quoted above. The greatest effect was created by Mlle. Titiens in the cavatina "Com è bello," from Lucrezia Borgia, and in the duet "Il suon dell' arpe angeliche," from Donizetti's Martiri. The band, under Mr. Augustus Mann's directions, performed the overtures to La Gazza Ladra (Rossini), the Jubilee (Weber), and the Zauberflöte (Mozart).

MADAME GRISI'S FAREWELL TOUR.

DURING the past week Mad. Grisi has sung for positively the last time at Bath and Bristol in Opera, and at Portsmouth and Southampton in Concerts.

Norma, followed by a scene from Sonnambula, was given on Monday, 14th, at the Theatre Royal, Bath, and proved a most successful commencement of the tour. A numerous audience assembled on the occasion to take leave of the incomparable prima donna, who was in splendid voice, and acted with all her wonted grandeur and effect. The cast of the opera was thus distributed:—Norma, Mad. Grisi; Adalgisa, Mad. Lemaire; Pollio, Signor Galvani; Oroveso, Signor Ciampi. As Adalgisa, Mad. Lemaire was in every respect praiseworthy. The talent of this clever artist is remarkable for its versatility. The gay Orsini, the impassioned Azucena, the coquettish Zerlina, all find in her an efficient representative. Her impersonation of the youthful priestess was in no way inferior to that of the other rôles with which her name is associated.

Pollio is not a very grateful part for a primo tenore, either musically or dramatically considered. Signor Galvani made the most of it. This gentleman will be recollected by the habitués of Covent Garden as having appeared at that theatre some five or six years ago. Since that time he has been singing with the Sisters Marchisio at nearly all the principal continental opera-houses, and has achieved a distinguished reputation by the facility of his vocalisation, and agreeable quality of his voice. Signor Ciampi was a capital Oroveso. The last scene of Sonnambula introduced two débutants: Mlle. Dario, who appeared as Amina, and Signor Aspa the Elvino. The young lady having overcome the nervousness inseparable from a first appearance before the public, afforded indisputable evidence of a fresh and charming voice of the Bosio style. She is apparently young, and certainly good-looking. Her method of singing is excellent, showing she has had the advantage of efficient tuition. Stage fright evidently prevented Mlle. Dario from doing herself justice, or giving full scope to her vocal powers in the adagio, "Ah! non credea;" and it was not until the encouraging applause of the audience restored her confidence, that she was able to display the pure quality of her voice, and the great command she has acquired in using it. The allegro, "Ah! non giunge," was completely successful. When the curtain fell the public were loud in expressing their unqualified and vociferously redemanded approbation of the interesting débutante. Of Signor Aspa it is hardly possible to judge, from the very little he had to do as Elvino, in the last scene of Sonnambula. In the concert room his voice is agreeable and effective. He lacks animation, but evinces the feeling of a thorough musician in all he sings. This occasion was "his first appearance on any stage," and the beginning of a career in which he may make as good a name as that he already enjoys for his singing of sacred music. Great praise is due to Signor Vianesi for the completeness and efficiency of the band and chorus he has brought together. They went admirably; the ensemble of the opera, in fact, left nothing to be desired, and was highly creditable to the talented maestro.

On Tuesay, 15th, Don Giovanni was announced at the Theatre Royal, Bristol. The baritone, Signor Cresci, not having studied his part (a most culpable and unaccountable neglect of the conditions of his engagement), it was found necessary to change the opera to Trovatore. A change of opera on a provincial tour is a very much more serious matter than it is in a London theatre. By his being unable to play the "Don," Signor Cresci put the resources of the touring-party to a severe and unjustifiable test, and tried the patience of the Bristol public. The company, fortunately, was equal to the emergency, and the public bore the disappointment good-naturedly enough. Mad. Grisi made amends by exerting herself to the utmost as Leonora, and Signor Cresci in a great measure obtained forgiveness for his ignorance by singing well and acting vigorously as the Conte di Luna. The part of the Gipsy was sustained by Mad. Lemaire—Signori Galvani and Ciampi playing respectively Manrico and Ferrando. Thus the difficulty was surmounted, and Signor Cresci afforded time until Saturday (this evening, when Don Giovanni is to be given at Bath) to study Mozart's music.

On Wednesday and Thursday a concert was given by the principal artists of the party at Portsmouth and Southampton. The programme included, as usual, many of the most popular Italian morceaux of the day. Mr. Willy and Mr. Ricardo Linter performed some solos on the pianoforte and violin, thereby affording an agreeable variety to the selection. Signor Fallar gave Donizetti's romance, "Ah! non avea," with great feeling and appropriate expression. Signor Ciampi, the life and soul of a concert-room, put everybody into good humour by his admirable rendering of the buffo song, "Miei rampolli." Mad. Grisi sang and looked as well as ever, while Mlle. Dario, Mad. Lemaire, and the other artists, all contributed to the success of the concerts.

On Friday, 18th, Norma was performed at Bristol, with the same cast as at Bath; and, as has been already mentioned, Don Giovanni to-night at Bath will terminate the first week of the Grisi farewell tour.

Camden Literary and Scientific Institution, Camden Road. — A highly interesting Lecture on Music was delivered here by Mr. Joseph Goddard on Wednesday evening. Mr. Goddard remarked in commencing, that in lectures upon music it was customary to regard the subject in a light partly historical and partly critical: that, with reference to the historical point of view, music, like many other things, involved a moral as well as a material history — that the material path of its development was too frequently selected for exploration in preference to the moral, which was just the reverse of what should be the case, art partaking more of mind than matter, in a work of art matter being rarefied by mind, and mind itself spiritualised by emotion and moral impulse: that, therefore, the main line of history in art must wind through the channel of the mind and amongst the impulses of man's finer nature. The lecturer then remarked that he intended to review the subject philosophically — to take a strain of music and methodically investigate it, as a botanist would take in his hand and proceed to examine a blade of grass. He then struck two grand divisions in his mental dissection of a strain of music. He remarked that it consisted generally of the physical, material sound, on the one hand, — sound in the abstract, the result of some species of vibration, — and, on the other, of the æsthetic configuration, the melody or measure into which this material element is wrought, with the moral expression thence emanating. The first section of the subject — sound — Mr. Goddard subdivided into two minor divisions, one embracing the history and origin and productions of musical sound, the other the methods by which musical sound is classified into a system and represented in writing; this consideration leading to the subject of the musical system and the history and origin of musical notation. The second main section of the subject — its æsthetic configuration — Mr. Goddard also subdivided into two minor branches, the one embracing the artistic forms of music, the other its moral expression or metaphysics. In the present lecture (which was one of a series) Mr. Goddard confined himself to the consideration of the history and origin of the production of musical sound, and this led to the subject of musical instruments. The lecturer then traced the Greek lyre through its different modifications and improvements, wherein it assumed successively the form of the guitar and the rebec, until it eventually became conformed into the violin. In an interesting digression Mr. Goddard then took occasion to remark that music started upon its course of development in this country pretty equally, both as regarded time and circumstances, with the art in Italy, the Pope who laid the foundation of the art in Italy (Pope Gregory the Great) being the same who despatched St. Augustine on the Christian mission to this island, who brought with him the Gregorian tones; that for a time the race was pretty equal, or, if anything, rather in favour of this country, until the advent of Palestrina, from whose genius the art in Italy received a new impulse, just after, in England, it had endured the blow of the Reformation, the Reformation operating unfavourably for the art of music, as it deprived it of the stimulus the church had hitherto afforded it. Music, moreover, was just stepping out of the church in England at this time, but before it had taken firm root in secular forms its growth was suppressed in the church, and thus it declined. In Italy, on the other hand, it happened that music received a continued impulse in the church till it had fairly taken root out of the church in madrigal, cantata, and opera. Mr. Goddard then, rather ingeniously, traced the developments of nearly all the leading instruments now in use, from two primitive types, the lyre and the reed, showing that each gave birth to two varieties: the lyre, in one direction, to the harp and pianoforte, in the other direction to the violin, violoncello, and double bass; the reed, in one direction, to the organ, and, in the other, to the flute and its species in wind instruments. Mr. Goddard then in an able peroration remarked upon the propriety of cultivating the art of music. He stated that music was a language with which the Creator had endowed humanity, wherein to express and preserve its finest feelings; that it was the great language of good, as literature was the language of knowledge; that, therefore, such a language must be desirable to spread and beneficial to receive. In conclusion, he remarked that its cultivation entailed a negative advantage: that the greatest difficulty of life was not to earn money, but to satisfactorily employ the leisure; that this was the problem which every successful man must eventually face, and he offered the pursuit of music as one solution of it whence both pleasure and profit were to be derived. The lecturer resumed his seat amid general demonstrations of approval, and the secretary announced a succession of interesting lectures and the opening of classes, which was received with great applause. The small but tastefully decorated lecture-hall was entirely filled, and the institution appears to be receiving the encouragement it so well merits.

Provincial.

The Plymouth Herald has the subjoined:—

"On Monday last the deeply interesting 'sensation drama,' the Colleen Bawn, was reproduced, and put on the stage in an exceedingly beautiful manner. The new scenery called forth loud plaudits from all parts of the house; the dresses and decorations were in excellent keeping, and the manner in which the whole was brought forward showed the capabilities of the theatre, and the advantages of the recent improvement. The house, we may observe, with the exception of the dress circle, was crowded to excess. The drama was well played; Miss Kate Ranoe, as Eily O'Connor, fully sustained the character of the charming heroine, and drew down thunders of applause. Mr. O'Sullivan was also exceedingly effective as Myles, and the other characters found able representatives. After the 'sensation scene,' when Eily is thrown into the river, Miss Ranoe and Mr. O'Sullivan were called before the curtain, and received a renewal of the plaudits which had been deservedly bestowed on them throughout the evening. The ballet followed, and was well received. The Colleen Bawn has been repeated every evening since with equal success."

From Brighton we hear that the well-known harpist, Mr. Frederick Chatterton, accompanied by Mrs. H. Percy as vocalist, have been giving three performances at the Pavilion. The playing of Mr. Chatterton appears to have been thoroughly appreciated by his audiences, as also the singing of the lady; the illustrations being in every instance most favourably received.

We glean the following news from the Brighton papers:—

On Wednesday, the 9th inst., Mr. Kuhe gave the first of a series of three recitals in the Banqueting Room of the Pavilion, which was filled with an audience composed mostly of ladies. Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Haydn, Heller, Chopin, figured in the programme, and if variety be charming, it must be admitted that the selection evinced no little judgment and discretion. Of course the professor was well received, as he invariably is, and his peculiar characteristics were as prominently demonstrated and as successful as of yore. Without tiring the reader with remarks on each particular performance, we may say that Mendelssohn's Andante and Rondo Capriccioso, with which the second part was opened, was the most perfect effort of the pianist. A song in each part by a lady vocalist affords a pleasant relief. The second recital took place on Wednesday, the 16th inst.

Herr Derffel commenced his third series of recitals at the Pavilion on Thursday afternoon. His programme was replete with recherché selections from favourite composers, and was as follows:—Polonaise, in E flat (C. M. Weber); Aria, "Il Trovatore" (Verdi), Signor Pietro Fortuna; Sonata, in D minor, Op. 29, No. 2 (Beethoven); "Reviens, reviens," Cavatina, in E (John Field); Nocturne, in G minor, No. 1 of "Les Soupirs," Op. 37 (F. Chopin); Scherzo, 2nd, in B flat minor, Op. 31 (F. Chopin); Aria, "Il Ballo in Maschera" (Verdi), Signor Pietro Fortuna; Rêverie, in D, MS. (Derffel); Valses (Derffel).

At the Philharmonic Society's Concert, at LIVERPOOL, last Monday, Mad. Sainton-Dolby and M. Sainton appeared, with Miss Marian Moss and Mr. George Perren as assistant vocalists, and M. Theodore Ritter, pianist, and M. Paque, violoncellist, as assistant instrumentalists. — Mlle. Patti made her second appearance at St. George's Hall on Wednesday, and sang Handel's "Let the bright Seraphim," the "Shadow Song" from Dinorah, "The Last Rose of Summer," and the "Swiss Echo Song." — The charges for the Jenny Lind Concerts seem to be canvassed with much warmth. "A number of good places," writes the Liverpool Albion, "are still obtainable at the office of the Philharmonic Society, in Exchange Street East. We warn our readers against yielding to the exorbitant demands of sundry clever speculators, who have secured a number of tickets in expectation of being able to re-sell them at twice or thrice their original cost. The legitimate prices of admission are high enough in all reason, but it becomes a costly treat of a less satisfactory character to those who pay an advanced tariff to outside speculators whilst tickets are still to be purchased at the advertised prices." Very true! — At the Theatre Royal three performances of Italian opera have been given with Mlle. Titiens, Signor Giuglini, Mad. Caradori, and Signor Ferri. The operas were Il Trovatore, Lucia di Lammermoor, and Lucrezia Borgia.

A correspondent from Hull writes us that at the Harvest Thanksgiving special service at Holy Trinity Church,—

"The prayers were intoned by the Revs. G. O. Brown, R. H. Parr, and H. G. Kinnear; and the lessons were read by the Revs. J. Scott and H. W. Kemp. The greatest praise is due to Mr. Skelton and the talented choir for the noble manner in which the choral service was performed. The 'Magnificat' and 'Nunc Dimittis,' from Mr. Skelton's services, were effectively given, while the Hallelujah chorus from the Messiah was magnificently performed both by the organist and choir. After the Harvest Hymn had been sung, a sermon was preached by the Hon. and Rev. A. Duncombe, from Psalm cii. 25. The appropriate opening voluntaries were, 'With verdure clad,' and 'The marvellous work,' from the Creation; chants to the proper psalms, Smith and Turle; 'Magnificat' and 'Nunc Dimittis,' Skelton; anthem, the Hallelujah chorus, from the Messiah; a fine old psalm tune to a harvest hymn, and the Old Hundredth psalm and tune; concluding voluntary, 'The heavens declare the glory of God,' from the Creation. The choir consisted of forty voices, the increase to the usual choir being a large number of the amateur members of the Vocal Society, Mr. Skelton, the organist, presiding."

WE learn, both from the Leeds Mercury and a Halifax paper, that a very successful concert was given by Mr. Frobisher at the Hall of the Mechanics' Institute, Halifax, on the evening of Thursday week. The singers were Mlle. Titiens, Mad. Caradori, Signors Giuglini and Bossi.

SIMS REEVES'S

GREAT SONG,

"FRESH AS A ROSE,"

THE POETRY BY

JESSICA RANKIN,

THE MUSIC COMPOSED EXPRESSLY FOR

SIMS REEVES

BY

M. W. BALFE.

Price 3s.

MISS JESSICA RANKIN'S Poetry is as "fresh" as Mr. BALFE'S Music, and deserves quoting:—

"Fresh as a rose, when her leaves are all spangled
With dew-drops, that glitter like jewels of light;
Bright as the morn, when her first rosy blushes
Scatter the darkness and gloom of the night;
Fair as a lily, whose delicate beauty
Rivals the rose in her exquisite grace;
But brighter, and fairer, and dearer than all,
Is the love-light that beams in thy beautiful face."

Mr. SIMS REEVES first introduced this charming little Song (a companion to "The days that are no more") at the concerts in St. James's Hall, and has since sung it at the BIRMINGHAM and HEREFORD MUSICAL FESTIVALS. Whenever sung, it has been rapturously applauded, and enthusiastically encored.

Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON and Co. have the pleasure to announce that M. EMILE BERGER has transcribed, in the same popular style that he did Mr. SIMS REEVES'S last new Song, "I love YOU"—

"WHO does not know the Poet Laureate's exquisite lines, beginning—

'Tears, idle tears, I know not what they mean;
Tears from the depth of some divine despair
Rise in the heart, and gather to the eyes,
In looking on the happy autumn fields,
And thinking of the days that are no more.'

That M. Blumenthal, though a Dutchman, loves the poetry of Tennyson, may be gathered from the true sympathetic manner in which he has set his beautiful verses to music. The popularity of this little song is already attested."—Musical World.

Since the above was written, Madame SAINTON-DOLBY has introduced "The days that are no more," both at the BIRMINGHAM and HEREFORD MUSICAL FESTIVALS, with immense success; and the assertion of the Musical World, that "the popularity of this little song is already attested," is fully borne out.

MR. WILBYE COOPER begs to inform his friends and the public that he has RETURNED from the Continent for the Season. Letters respecting Engagements for Oratorios and Concerts, address 24 Victoria Terrace, Westbourne Grove, W.

MLLE. LANCIA will sing "A Thousand Miles from Thee," the popular new song, composed expressly for her by Frank Mori, at the Saturday Evening Concerts, Glasgow, October 26th.

MLLE. FLORENCE LANCIA'S New Song, "A thousand miles from thee," composed by Frank Mori, sung by Mlle. Lancia, and enthusiastically encored every evening at Alfred Mellon's Concerts, at the Royal Italian Opera House, Covent Garden, and at the Crystal Palace Concerts, is published, price 2s. 6d., by Duncan Davison and Co. 244 Regent Street, W.

The Morning Post, speaking of the first appearance of Mlle. Lancia at the Crystal Palace Concerts, says, "Mlle. Lancia made an exceedingly favourable impression."—"Criticism owes a word of praise to Mr. Mori's graceful and very expressive ballad, 'A thousand miles from thee.' The composer has not, we think, appealed so successfully to the popular taste since he produced his 'Who shall be fairest?' which barrel-organs have rendered so familiar to the town."

The Morning Chronicle, alluding to the same song, writes, "Mlle. Lancia gave Mr. Frank Mori's new and highly captivating ballad, 'A thousand miles from thee'—composed expressly for her—with a fervour of sentiment and refinement of expression, which demonstrated that she sings from the heart."

MR. RICHARD SEYMOUR will sing George Loder's new song, "In a leafy Garden," at the Crystal Palace Concert, this day.

THE QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, Hanover Square.—The Proprietor begs to announce that these celebrated ROOMS will be ready for PUBLIC USE in a FEW WEEKS. For particulars, inquire of Messrs. ROBERT COCKS and Co., New Burlington Street, London, Publishers to her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen, and to the Emperor Napoleon III.

"The London musical public will learn with satisfaction that there is no truth in the current report that the Hanover Square Rooms are about to be destroyed, and the building turned to other purposes. It is true that the lease of the premises has come to an end, and that their possession has fallen into the hands of the proprietor, Mr. Cocks, the eminent music publisher of New Burlington Street. But he, instead of destroying the concert rooms, has begun to repair, redecorate, and improve them in such a manner as to render them more elegant and commodious than ever. These beautiful rooms are unequalled in acoustical properties, by any other music-hall in London, are most conveniently situated, and possess the prestige derived from their association with the most interesting musical reminiscences of the best part of a century. Their destruction would indeed have been a serious loss to the public."—From the Press, Oct. 19.

ORGANIST WANTED, for Independent Chapel. Salary £35. Apply to Mr. Isaac, Maldon, Essex.

NOTICE OF REMOVAL.

MESSRS. MAPLESON & CO.'s British and Foreign Musical Agency will be TRANSFERRED from the Haymarket, on and after Monday next, the 28th instant, to their new offices, 6 SEYMOUR CHAMBERS, ADELPHI.

A MUSICAL PHENOMENON.—A letter from Venice, published in a Trieste journal, says that a professional musician of that place has discovered a prodigy for which there is probably no precedent—a singer, that is to say, who is at once a bass, a baritone, and a tenor. The professor was on his way to Rovigo, when he paused to rest in a country inn. Suddenly, in an adjacent room, he heard a splendid bass voice sing Silva's aria out of Ernani. That at an end, a sonorous baritone struck up the well-known "Lo vedrem o veglio audace." The listener was still lost in admiration of the beauty of these two voices, when a high ringing tenor made itself heard, and sang, with great range of voice, Edgar's closing air in Lucia. The delighted professor could not restrain his enthusiasm, and hurried into the adjoining room to thank the gifted trio, when, to his astonishment, he found the apartment occupied only by one young man, who declared that he himself had sung all three airs. Put to the test, it proved that he spoke the truth, and that the singer possessed the extraordinary range from the low D to the high C, all full and beautiful chest notes. It is thought possible that the professor may persuade this Crœsus of voices, who is the son of well-to-do burgesses, to devote himself to the stage.—(Fudge.)

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

October 24.

Congratulate your correspondent, and pat him editorially on the head; for, if his warlike tastes do not lead him to the field of deadly strife, and his sense of duty urge him fearlessly within the whiff and whiz of shell, shot, and bullet, he has his perils and his hardships to encounter in your service, which, though all metaphysical, or, at any rate, not menacing actual death or maim to the body, are fraught with tortures to his delicately strung sensibility, framed to catch the lightest influences of the beautiful, and to throb harmoniously at its full presence; but which the bad and faulty, the ugly and imperfect, throw into an ecstacy of suffering in which the soul faints and dies, like the coward's, a thousand deaths. Congratulate me, then, for have I not stood in the imminent deadly breach, and dared the horrors of that battery of sad sensations called Pierre de Medicis, directed by Prince Poniatowsky, eminent in the art of offence, skilled in wounding the spirit? Well, since it had to be undergone, as I said in my last, better to have it over at once than suffer the continued tremors of this sword of Damocles. It has dropt upon us at last; we have felt its sharpest edge, but we still live tant bien que mal. I am not going to inflict any lengthened notice of this performance upon you, uselessly reviving my sufferings. without contributing to your edification. Let me only say that M. Faure, the excellent William Tell, and almost excellent Don Giovanni, of your last Italian Opera season, had to make his début in the part of Julian de Medicis, in this tedious work. The part is quite unworthy of his powers, and indeed is not one calculated at all for a singer of first rank. for it contains but one duo and one air. The concerted pieces go for nothing. I told you before, some modifications had been introduced in the denouement of the opera, rendering it less gloomy and repulsive. This has necessitated a new finale, which is quite equal to all the rest of the opera, neither rising nor falling below the dead level of commonplace. The ballet called "Les Amours de Diane," which has always accompanied Pierre de Medicis, has been retained, but neither lends nor borrows grace from its leaden setting, notwithstanding the efforts of Mad. Ferraris.

At the Italian Theatre we had the first appearance this season of Signor Mario, who has sung in Il Barbière and eke in Un Ballo in Maschera. To myself, and to all else with whom I have compared impressions, this artist's voice appears to have wonderfully recovered much of that youthful freshness which his person and deportment have so steadily retained, while the capricious organ which in its periods of thorough efficiency placed its possessor first perhaps among all tenors, actual or historical, has passed through every phase of decadence, even to downright decrepitude, and anon recovered as by some potent charm, or the exhaustion of some withering poison. Latterly, however, the clouds which had drifted across the brilliant luminary had become so frequent and untransparent that its permanent eclipse seemed imminent. The joy of the public, and of the critics especially, whose painful task it is to note, like astronomers, with rigid accuracy the declension or oscillation of these admired stars, who do not bear the operation of science so philosophically as their celestial prototypes — the joy of all, I say, was the greater, therefore, to find Signor Mario's voice in the recovered possession of so phenomenal a share of the attributes of its prime. The vocal sickness of the great tenor has this time no convalescence, but jumps at once to elastic health. In a becchiera of imaginary sillery we drink to its preservation — may it yet continue for many years the even tenor of its course. I borrow this pun from a contributor to Punch, who shall be nameless, but, as it is the only one he ever uttered I was able to see a glimmer of intention in, I embalm the unique specimen in the perfumed and limpid amber of these epistles. Let him be grateful and not attempt this form of jocosity in future. I distinctly do not allude to Shirley Brooks, who to my knowledge has made as many as seventeen successful puns—one unpublished from its objectionable character, and three jingles, harmless, but happy, and who has only publicly failed once, which is in the title he has given to his last most excellent novel, The Silver Cord. I confess I do not take, nor does any one enlighten me whom I have had the good fortune to meet. Why Silver Cord? Pourquoi? Comment? qu'est ce? Je n'y suis plus! If he must have a playful title—they are in fashion with the fantastic jackanapes who write popular books now-a-days—let us have a wee glimpse of relevancy in it. Except that cords and eke silver cords may be mentioned under the head of musical matters, there is as little justification, I confess, for any allusion to S. B. and his book as there is in the book itself for its absurd name. I therefore apologise and resume the silver cord — I beg pardon again — the golden thread of my discourse. Signor Beneventano, who, by the omission of a lost slip from my last letter, escaped as thorough a dressing as any one of his thin-skinned profession ever smarted under, must again, I regret, be put on the block of penal discipline. Justice must have its course, and there shall be no (lost) slip this time betwixt his devoted lips and the poisoned chalice which the even-handed dame recommends to those who have abused her righteous law. "Macbeth doth murder sleep; Macbeth shall sleep no more!" Would we could parody the stern decree and say, "Beneventano doth murder song; Benny shall sing no more." Well, but he does not, some will say, in an honest sense of the word. No more he does, or the owl shall sing the nightingale into an ivy bush. Canis latrat, as we used to say in the Latin exercise book, — the dog barks! He was the Figaro to Signor Mario's Count Almaviva. Poor, light, merry, busy, frisky smoother of Sevillian chins, and plotter of Sevillian intrigues! poor Figaro, to see thee, tricksy barber! thus transmogrified into the most melancholy and lymphatic of hair-dressers. Figaro here! Figaro there! but Figaro is anywhere but at the Italian Opera of Paris at this present moment. In the Ballo in Maschera the part of Renato, the Ankerstrom of the French Gustave, was played by Signor Delle Sedie. The original representative of the character here was Signor Graziani, and I shall do no injustice to the latter, or unduly flatter the former, if I boldly establish a comparison between them. If Signor Graziani excel in the resonant quality of his voice, Signor Delle Sedie, on the other hand, is pre-eminent for his power of expression, his softness and smoothness of tone, and the delicacy of his light and shade. Signor Graziani, in some degree, revelled too freely in the merely physical beauty of his voice, the tones of which seemed to issue forth spontaneously in native excellence. Signor Delle Sedie, whose voice has not the same power, never loses control over it, and gives to each note, with delicate care, its exact value and intention. In the last act this conscientious and most intelligent artist rose to the highest point in the perfection of his execution, as well as in the appreciation of his audience, who warmly and frequently applauded him, and demanded his air "Della vita" a second time.

Mlle. Rosario Zapater—how does this name look for a four-foot poster? One gifted with the second sight might inform us; for his gaze would pierce through the veil of futurity, and see the walls of London and Paris in some not distant future year, placarded with this remarkable, if not very euphonious, assemblage of pre- and cog-nomen, as a summons to the public to come and listen to one of the most sweet and winning songstresses that have ever called down upon themselves the golden showers of Jupiter Populus.* At present the lady who bears this name is scarcely seventeen, but already her beautiful voice, and the power and ability with which she wields it, have attracted the attention of those judges who have had the privilege of hearing her. She is a Spaniard, and her musical education thus far has been entrusted to M. de Valdemora, of whom, though by some of the notices in the papers here, he would seem to be well known, I can only say that he is singing-master to the Queen of Spain, and director of the court concerts at Madrid. It may be that not to know Valdemora argues oneself unknown; if so your correspondent is the obscurest of mortals. But to this illustrious unknown's pupil, whose fame, let us trust, will be somewhat more generally acknowledged, or the promise she now gives must woefully deceive. Mlle. Rosario Zapater sang the other evening before a private assembly of amateurs and critics, and a select portion of the general public at the private residence of M. George Kastner. M. Ambrosie Thomas, the composer, accompanied her, or as they say here, held the piano. The first aria from Lucia, "Casta Diva," from Norma, and the air from the Traviata, were executed by this budding cantatrice in a manner to astonish, no less than delight, the most critical of her hearers.

* I think I was led to this flight by the resemblance of the name Zapater to Zeus Pater. A stricter etymology will bring us down, however, from the King of Olympus to a cobbler — the Castillian for a botcher of shoe leather being Zapatero. Let not the future prima donna be ashamed of the descent thus blasoned in her patronymic. Philosophers and metaphysicians, minstrels and mystic religionists, have been furnished to the world out of the humble craft to which some one of her ancestors probably belonged, as though to give the lie to the impertinent dictum, "Ne sutor ultra crepidam." Why, then, should not the inmate of a cobbler's stall give birth to one destined to fill other and brighter, and more profitable stalls? I say why? Echo answers "Gye!"

I am a great believer in the virtue of blood and race, and a début which has just taken place at the Odéon is most flattering to my convictions on this point. That branch of the seed of Abraham which so grandly blossomed forth—like the aloes, the flower of the century—in Rachel Felix, has put forth another bud, which if less—much less imposing in place and attributes—is nevertheless passing sweet and fragrant. Dinah Felix—the female Banjamin of the family—is the smartest, most plain spoken, and pungent of soubrettes Molière's heart would have desired. Her Toinette in the Malade Imaginaire is a masterpiece of the true old verve gauloise. Another début at the Vaudeville has not proved so happy. Mlle. Juliette Beau, who has just made her first appearance in a comedy written expressly for her, and in which she plays a widow of great personal attractions, has but one marked qualification for her employment—beauty. The public is much obliged to her for taking the trouble to be so handsome, but would be infinitely more grateful if she bestowed equal pains, and with equal success, in trying to be an actress. If ever there was an opportunity of saying "beau" to a goose, Mlle. Juliette Beau's combined name, personal appearance, and mental capacity present it emphatically.

Well, the Colleen Bawn has dived into the British Channel, and has been fished up again by M. Dennery conjointly with Mr. Dion Boucicault, and presented to the world as the most attractive wonder of the day in a Parisian Vivarium, called Le Lac de Glenaston. The original has been a little altered, but its merits still depend on the stage effect of the second act, and the combined results of gas and gauze therein so ingeniously exhibited, promise to attract the same crowded audiences here as they have in England. As you must have been surfeited with the subject ad nauseam, let me only remark that the honourable example set by M. de Chilly, the manager of the Ambigu, deserves to be followed, nay ought, for the character of England, to be strictly imitated by our own managers. Instead of filching the successful English drama, and putting it on his own stage without a "by your leave," or "with your leave," M. de Chilly put himself into relation with the author, and associating him with a French dramatist for the work of adaptation, has made him participate in the profits of the success which is likely to attend it. Luckiest of lucky men art thou to be the first, Dion Boucicault, to profit by the example of fair dealing set us on the other side of the channel!

I had a few odds and ends of stray news to send you, but reserve them, or at least such as will keep sweet, till my next, for I have but time to catch the post.

THE MISSING SLIP.

* * "impresses one with the idea of antiquity more than the oldest mummy in the British Museum. Figaro will be active and vigorous when Spain, under the title of Provinces Ibériennes, shall form a part of the great Gallic Empire of Napoleon XV., and this poor jolly postboy seems an apparition from the tomb of all the Capulets. And thereby hangs a tale.

"The Salle Ventadour, as the Italian Opera House of Paris is called, claims a few words, and then I have done with the theatres. To the Matrimonio Segreto, with which the season commenced, has succeeded in turn La Sonnambula and Semiramide. In the first, Mlle. Battu as Amina gave tokens of being on the road towards a more vigorous dramatic style, and this alone is necessary to complete her claims to the rank of an artist of the highest rank. In the same opera Signor Tagliafico renewed his acquaintance with his countrymen, by whom he was received with every flattering mark of appreciation. With Mads. Alboni and Penco, Semiramide could not fare very ill, and would have fared better but for the untoward casting of Assur to Signor Beneventano. Beneventano, whatever that may mean, he may be, perhaps, but 'Benvenuto,' certainly not, as all will readily agree, who may remember this bass baritone's engagement at Her Majesty's Theatre, where he barked like a watchdog from 1856 to 1858, but alas! did not scare the wolf from poor Lumley's door. So long as this artist (?) remains with M. Calzado, let him, after " * * *

DUSSIK, DUSSEK, DUSCHEK.

(Written expressly for the MUSICAL WORLD AND DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC, by ALEXANDER W. THAYER.)

It appears from my next notice, that Dussek entered the service of a Prince von Isenburg—but who he was deponent cannot say—though only for a short time. The citation is from the Leipzig Musik-Zeitung, Sept. 2, 1807.

"Herr Dussek has resigned his situation with the Prince von Isenburg, has entered the service of the Prince of Benevento (Talleyrand), and will remain henceforth in Paris."

Again, Leipzig Musik-Zeitung, June 21, 1809, from a letter dated "Paris, end of May." The writer is describing a concert given by Rode, after his return from Russia—probably the concert in the Odéon, towards the close of the year 1808—and having finished Rode, goes on:—

"Dussek, one of the creators of the true style of pianoforte-playing, and now for nearly a year again in Paris, made his appearance the same evening, and carried away all his auditors, who appeared to have come for the sole purpose of hearing Rode. It is a very rare thing to hear two such noble artists upon one evening. Dussek had all the greater success, since for a long time no really great pianist had been heard. The pianoforte is just that instrument whose highest development is the least to be sought for in France. Steibelt has introduced here an abominable style of playing; a style which is ruinous to the true effects of the instrument, and which to every connoisseur must seem insignificant, however attractive to the mass of ordinary dilettanti. One of the leading weaknesses of this style, is the abuse of variations for the instrument. All pianoforte teachers in France, and especially in Paris, imitate Steibelt's manner, and enrich it with new faults. And so they have laid aside the good music of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Clementi, Cramer, Dussek and Hummel, and thrown themselves, soul and body, into the charlatanism and insignificance of style which are the ruling qualities of Steibelt and most of his works. In Germany it must be impossible to form any adequate idea of the disgusting manner in which, to conform to the prevailing fashion, one must now play the pianoforte in Paris.

"It was therefore most desirable that a man like Dussek should come here and act as a reformer, and so bring the pianoforte back to its natural aims and ends, to its real greatness and its true sphere. Even in this first concert, Dussek effected much to this end, for he proved that success may be gained by combining sterling qualities with simplicity and sweetness; that there is no necessity for the sing-song and petty trickery by which those wanting in real talent attract attention."

Again, in a letter dated Paris, December 18th, 1809,—"Herr Dussek is in the service of M. Talleyrand, Prince of Benevento. He appears to be treated in a very distinguished manner, and enjoys a respectable salary."—(Leipzig Musik-Zeitung, January 3, 1810.)

Again, "Dussek has written a magnificent grand mass in which he has not only proved himself to be a master in church music, but more particularly a great contrapuntist. He sent this work some time since to Vienna, to Prince Esterhazy, and it is strange that it not only has not been performed, but no notice at all has been taken of it.—(Leipzig Musik-Zeitung, November 6, 1811.)

A few months later (April 15, 1812) the same journal prints a letter from its Paris correspondent, announcing Dussek's death.

"Paris, March 21, 1812. — I am hardly able to-day to report, even in the fewest words, the little, in relation to the theatres here, which can interest the German reader, for I have just been surprised by sad news, which must grieve every true friend of music, but which strikes to the very heart of myself, and all those who personally knew him to whom this news refers.

"Your excellent, worthy and celebrated countryman, J. L. Dussek, is no more! Yesterday morning at six o'clock, in the full vigour of manhood's best years, he closed a career, which, through the ever more thorough culture, development, and solid strength of his great talents and his astonishing industry, had not yet reached its culminating point. He had been rather unwell for some months, but was confined to his bed only two days; his disease was gout, which suddenly attacked his brain, and in less than two hours carried him off. Since it was fated him to die now, it was certainly a blessing, that his excessively active, energetic spirit was not subjected to the trials of a long illness; a blessing to his warmly sensitive, affectionate heart, that he could breathe his last in the arms of his faithful friend and countryman, your noble Neukomm.

"His last work was another set of three sonatas for pianoforte, violin and violoncello — the last of which was finished only to the middle of the adagio.

"There is no necessity of discoursing farther here about Dussek, the man of genius, the richly endowed and solidly trained artist; the entire musical world knew, honoured, loved him; his character as an artist and the characteristics of his principal works have been often enough treated in your columns with intelligence, impartiality and truth. On one point only will I say a word; that Dussek has done perhaps nearly as much as Haydn, and certainly not less than Mozart, to make German music known and respected in other lands. His earlier residence in London, and his later in Paris, have in this regard been of very great influence. As a virtuoso he is everywhere rightly placed in the very highest rank. In rapidity and certainty of execution, and in the conquering of the greatest difficulties, it would be difficult to find a pianist who surpassed him; —in neatness, cleanness and precision possibly one (Cramer of London); — in soul, expression and delicacy certainly no one. As a man he was noble and good; a just, impartial, kindly man; a true friend, sympathising with all the good and beautiful in those whom he knew, with no revengeful spirit against the bad which he met with, and from which he suffered. His weaknesses were such as are inseparable from so overpowerful an imagination and such extreme sensitiveness — such being their origin, they can easily be forgiven. Moreover, through native strength of mind and his frequent and intimate intercourse with the most distinguished persons in the highest classes of society — as with Prince Louis Ferdinand of Prussia — he had gained a vast mass of general information of all kinds, highly polished manners, and great tact for all that is proper and attractive in society; while his joyousness of disposition, his liberality of sentiment, and his freedom from prejudice, made these advantages of singular advantage to him, especially with musicians. His father and first instructor is still living at Czaslau (upon his later and higher development Clementi exerted a powerful influence so long as he—Dussek—was in London); a brother, also a fine pianist, and author of many favourite works, is living in Milan; and a sister, possessed of similar high qualities, is in London, where she is married, to a certain Mr. Cianchettini.

"In his early years Dussek's life was one of struggle; at a later period, when his merit was acknowledged, friendship, successful labour and advantageous position made it for the most part easy and pleasant. In this latter period, he, in perhaps but a single instance, met with a deep and lasting sorrow — and this was when his patron and pupil (in composition and pianoforte playing) Prince Louis — whom it is well known he followed to the field of battle near Jena — was torn from him by death under such painful circumstances."

As to Dussek's works their general character has been sufficiently denoted in the foregoing passages from contemporary writers; their number it might, perhaps, be difficult to determine exactly. The highest opus-number which I have seen is 77, — but this gives a very imperfect idea of the quantity of his compositions, since in those days it was not the custom to call a page or two of runs, passages and trills, confounding some poor, little innocent, common melody, an opus — this term being often made to include three or more important compositions, as Beethoven's six quartets, Op. 18.

Whether all the works of Dussek from 1 to 77 were published does not appear from my authorities. In March 1813 (see Intelligenz Blatt, No. 4 of the Leipzig Musik-Zeitung, vol. xv.) Breitkopf and Härtel print a long advertisment announcing "a complete edition" of the composer's works; but it appears in the course of the advertisement that the edition is to consist of only the more important (bedeutendere) — but whether this design was ever carried into effect, I have not determined.

In the Leipzig Musik-Zeitung, vol. ix. may be seen a song by him written in the compass of three notes — and a canon for four voices to the words "Ha, ha, ha, ha, ich merke wohl an euren werthen Nasen, dass ich mit hübschen Phrasen, das Ohr auch kitzeln soll."

Gerber says, in the New Lexicon, "besides the list of pianoforte works, which I have given in the other Lexicon, he has from 1788 to 1799, that is in a space of less than eleven years, made public so many proofs of his talents and industry, and given employment to so many presses, that the mere task of reducing them to order, and bringing them into a correct catalogue, would demand almost as much care and far more patience than the author seems to have expended upon their composition; for a great portion of them seem to belong to a certain class of manufactured wares, such as are usually sold by the dozen. Whoever knows the two concertos, Ops. 15 and 17, published at Offenbach, will not exempt even them entirely from this charge, nor can the most of his works be declared free from errors in counterpoint." But Gerber, it will be noticed, is speaking of the works of the popular pianist — not of the Dussek of the "Adieux à Clementi," "Elégie Harmonique," "Le Retour à Paris," "L'Invocation," and those truly grand compositions of his last years.

Dlabacz informs us, that while a young organist, he composed much for the church. He says, "those musical compositions, which he wrote for church choirs, are still in manuscript; and for the most part preserved in the Church of St. Barbara in Kuttenberg, and in the Decanal Church in Czaslau." But this was in 1815 — still they may lie there yet. Such are the principal notices, which have come under my observation in German authorities, of the great Dussek.

(To be concluded in our next).

LETTERS FROM AN AMERICAN IN LONDON.*

No. 5.

London, July 16.

Had I come here unconvinced either of the existence of an uncommonly wide-spread and real love for good music in London, or of the possibility of making "classical" music "popular," a single occasion, such as I am about to describe, would have removed all doubt upon the subject. The only regret is, that I can speak only of the last of the so-called "Monday Popular Concerts;" for having heard the last, one would gladly summon up before him the whole series, now stretching back through three seasons, from Feb. 1859 to July 1, 1861, between which dates no less than sixty-four concerts have been given in St. James's Hall, with programmes of the most classical character, without an orchestra, but with first-class performers — really artists, and such only — and never failing to secure the strict attention and unfeigned delight of a very mixed and numerous audience. So I am told, and what I have just witnessed makes it easy to believe. They are called "popular," because they are made accessible to the general mass of music-lovers, and not, like most London concerts of the higher order, only to the wealthy and the few — although you would perhaps be astonished to see how many and how constant are those "few" who frequent fashionable operas and concerts to the tune of a guinea for a seat! The "Monday Popular" are cheap — for London; that is, there is a liberal allowance of room for unreserved seats, and not bad seats, at the one shilling price, while the more favoured places range from three to five shillings. For most of the oratorios and higher kind of concerts the minimum price of admission is three shillings, and the maximum half a guinea, and in many cases a guinea. So that these concerts are "popular" in the sense of comparatively cheap. That they are so in character as well, was a matter of conviction and experiment on the part of the enterprising director (Mr. S. Arthur Chappell), until their remarkable success rewarded the experiment and proved the conviction sound. The Director, in thanking the public at the end of his third season, says:—

"Till very recently, a string quartet or a pianoforte sonata, played by first-class artists, was a luxury reserved for the enjoyment of a few, and regarded, on the other hand, as something inevitably caviare to the multitude. The Monday Popular Concerts, however, were originated with the firm conviction that the quintets, quartets, trios, sonatas, solo and concerted, &c., of the great masters, would be listened by the general public with decorous attention; that the oftener they were heard the better they would be liked; and that every composer, from the profound Beethoven, the elaborate Bach, the genial Handel, the earnest Mendelssohn, the elegant Spohr, and the universal Mozart, to the light and cheerful Haydn, would find admirers. The result has demonstrated that a faith in the readiness and ability of the public to appreciate the highest manifestations of artistic beauty was thoroughly justified."

And one of the leading journals says what is simply true and reasonable in the following extract:—

"The epithet 'popular,' as applied to a performance of music, no longer means something adapted to an uneducated and unrefined taste — something in which the high and classic productions of the art are eschewed, as being calculated to weary the audience. At some of our popular concerts, the customary fare is fit for the palate of the most fastidious amateur. And, far from being neglected on this account, such concerts flourish more and more. Such is the case with the Monday Popular Concerts, given every week during the season at St. James's Hall. At first we had some suspicion of the reality of the musical taste shown at these concerts. When we heard pieces of great length, highly complicated, such as we always believed to be caviare to the general, not only attentively listened to, but applauded with enthusiasm, we could not help thinking there must be some affectation at bottom, and that people would tire of pretending to be delighted with things they did not understand! But time has shown that this was a mistake. These concerts, successful the first season, are still more successful the second. They are even improved in quality; an inferior piece is never admitted into the programmes, nor is an inferior performer employed. Yet the spacious hall is every night crowded to the doors by persons in the habit of frequenting cheap entertainments; and no assembly of cognoscenti could show a sounder or more discriminating taste. The consequence is, that the Monday Popular Concerts are now attended by the most musical people in London."—Spectator.

In confirmation of all this, I certainly must testify, with regard to the last concert (July 1), that the hall was filled (though not to overflowing — for overflow, thank decency, is not allowed in Europe, neither in concerts nor conveyances, in theatres nor railway trains, in oratorios nor omnibusses); that the company appeared composed equally of the wealthier patrons of music and of the music-lovers of more modest rank, who have not much to spend; that all listened most attentively, and looked intelligent, applauding warmly what was really best; a well-pleased, sympathetic, encouraging audience, and yet, in large part, not ignorantly pleased, but musically experienced and critical. Whether the things performed were really "classical," whether the feast was fit for cultivated taste, whether genius played a larger part in it than hum-drum or clap-trap, the reader shall judge for himself; here is the programme:—

Part I.—Quartet, in E flat, No. 12, MM. Wieniawski, Ries, Webb, and Piatti (first time at the Monday Popular Concerts), Beethoven. Song, "Le Secret," Miss Banks; Schubert. Suite de Pièces, containing "The Harmonious Blacksmith," Miss Arabella Goddard; Handel. Song, "Pria che spunti," Mr. Sims Reeves; Cimarosa. Prelude, Sarabande, and Gavotte, for violoncello solo, Sig. Piatti; with pianoforte accompaniment, Mr. Benedict; Bach. Song, "Name the glad day," Miss Banks; Dussek. Sonata, in G major, Op. 69, No. 2, for pianoforte and violin, Miss Arabella Goddard and M. Wieniawski (first time at the Monday Popular Concerts); Dussek.

Part II.—Quartet in D, Op. 63, MM. Wieniawski, Ries Webb, and Piatti; Hadyn. Song, "Adelaide," Mr. Sims Reeves, accompanied by Miss Arabella Goddard; Beethoven. Harpsichord Lessons, Mr. Charles Hallé (first time at the Monday Popular Concerts); Scarlatti. Song, "The Hunter's Song," Mr. Sims Reeves; Mendelssohn. Duet, for two pianofortes, in D major, Miss Arabella Goddard and Mr. Charles Hallé; Mozart. Conductor, Mr. Benedict.

Not one of these choice selections but what shone by excellent performance. Especially the opening string quartet of Beethoven, the first of the five belonging to his latest period, and called, without reason, "posthumous;" a work requiring true artists to seize its spirit and rightly render its design. The four interpreters could scarcely have been better. Wieniawski proved himself an admirable quartet leader; Piatti's bass was worthy of his reputation; and the middle parts were such as it is a comfort to hear. That a mixed public should be readily impressed by a symphony concert (like those of Liebig, for instance, in Berlin) is not so remarkable; a fine orchestra, by mere mass and brilliancy, by wealth and variety of tone-colour, arrests and captivates; great thoughts are greatly enforced by such large utterance; the profoundest and most complicated tone-combinations tell upon the crowd by the mere might of volume and of euphony; a symphony, too, has something dramatic and exciting in its progress. But that a violin quartet, the pure outlining of the intrinsic musical thought, with all its inmost subtleties laid bare to close attention, but not enriched by accessories of various instrumental colour, not massed into large orchestral proportions so as to arrest attention at a distance—that a quartet of such a man as Beethoven, and in his least understood and latest manner, and, stranger yet, heard for the first time by most, and played in a large hall, should be listened to with eager interest through all its movements by so large an audience, and be in fact appreciated (if attention and applause and manifest delight are any signs), is certainly a fact worth chronicling, and should give encouragement to concert-givers and societies who care for art as well as money. After Beethoven, there was no risk in venturing a quartet by "Father Haydn," whose cheerful face and easy elegance of manner, let him present himself in what form he will, are always welcome and familiar. This was one of the least well-known, and yet one of the most original and piquant of his eighty and odd quartets; and its effect on all faces was as of fresh air and sunshine.

I was much interested in the selections from Dussek; the Bohemian composer, contemporary with Mozart, who has been famous in his day, and now has his day again in England. The sonata duo was worthy to appear in the same programme with the great names, and it was elegantly rendered by both artists. The song, "Name the glad day," was much in the same style with Haydn's canzonet: "My mother bids me bind my hair," and quite as beautiful. The singer (Miss Banks) has a fresh and lovely voice, good style, and entered into the spirit of the song; and she was no less winning in the more serious and fervent melody of Schubert's song: "The Letter,"—why metamorphosed into the French "Le Secret," I know not. One of the pleasantest and most novel features of the evening was the set of "Harpsichord Lessons" by old Domenico Scarlatti, a contemporary of Bach and Handel, and a great admirer of the latter, as he knew him in his young days in Italy. They are full of difficult and graceful passage-work, a sort of delicate melodic arabesque, sparkling and lifesome, and Hallé played them to a charm; one smiled at the perfection of the thing. The union of two such pianists as Hallé and Miss Arabella Goddard, in the duet by Mozart, ensured that most satisfactory conclusion of a good feast, from which all rise with an appetite. It was in the Suite by Handel, containing the well-known variations on "The Harmonious Blacksmith," that I have had as yet the clearest instance of the pianism of Miss Goddard. I never heard it played more perfectly, perhaps never quite so well. In all respects of facile, finished, clear, expressive execution, it was faultless. It has not been my fortune yet to hear her play Beethoven; it is in the great sonatas that she has chiefly won her laurels. The prelude and quaint old dance movements by Bach, for violoncello, were played con amore by Signor Piatti, and won new admiration for the happy, inexhaustible invention of the genial, learned, wonderful old master. It only remains to speak of Sims Reeves. But he was ill, and did not sing; an agreeable substitute appeared in Mr. Santley, the baritone.

The beauty of the whole thing was, that here were the best artists performing (and let us not forget among them Mr. Benedict, who was the masterly accompanyist), not to exhibit themselves, but to draw attention to the great composers. If I have given more space to the record of this one concert than I have left for others equally important (the reader can imagine that he reads this part through a magnifier), it is because of the "Popular" claim, which has been so well vindicated by these Monday Concerts, without any compromise of high artistic tone. I would commend the example to our music managers at home, so soon as we shall have time again to think of music; so soon as our distracted country shall have come out from her great struggle, with her free institutions nobly saved, her vigorous system purged for ever from the treacherous poison so long secretly imbibed from contact with a principle as opposite to its own as darkness is to light; and shall enter upon a new era of real liberty and lasting peace, released from all old blind and suicidal pledges to the only alien and weakening element in our grand symphony of states, to slavery, the natural enemy of freedom and of civilisation, the sleepless traitor to the general cause; the curse that clung to all our aspirations; the monster that has been weaving round us a most specious web of "compromises" in the full hope of devouring us! So soon as this good fight shall have been won (as most assuredly it will, since God is just); so soon as the Union shall have saved itself, and shall have guaranteed its own existence by refusing henceforth every guarantee to slavery, beyond that of non-interference (except where it deprives a citizen of his constitutional right to free institutions, free speech, &c., rights for which the Union was made); so soon as peace and plenty shall return again; then certainly will come a great reaction in behalf of art and music, and of all ideal and harmonious pursuits. With the new sense of freedom and of union based upon the solid rock of principle, these things will not be despised as trivial pastimes of the "piping times of peace," but will be more respected and more earnestly pursued than ever, as belonging to that real education of humanity for higher spheres of being, to secure liberty and room for which is just the motive of all patriotic struggles. This day will soon return to us, if we are true—the day when we shall again have leisure for the true ends of our national and social existence. Music, no more than religion, is to be silenced or put out of thought for more than a short day by the din of war. So that it may not be idle, even now, to be holding up good examples and suggesting useful hints to the peace-makers and the peace improvers, to the educators and the wielders of refining influences, to those who arrange for our natural supplies of art and music when their time comes.

And so, with this little parenthetic burst of patriotism, here endeth the lesson for to-day.

MADAME GRISI'S FAREWELL TOUR.

THE performances this week will have been given in the following order:—Monday 21st, Norma and the last scene of Sonnambula, at Exeter; Tuesday, Don Giovanni; Wednesday, Lucrezia Borgia; Thursday, Trovatore, and Friday, Norma and Sonnambula, at the Theatre Royal, Plymouth; and Saturday, a morning concert at Torquay.

The success of the undertaking seems to increase as it progresses. Mad. Grisi's reception on every occasion is most enthusiastic, a proof, if any were wanting, of how dearly the public prize their favourite, and of the regret that is universally felt at the retirement of the eminent prima donna.

The representation of an Italian opera in Exeter was a novelty to the lovers of music in that city, which fact, combined with the interest excited by the announcement of Mad. Grisi's last appearance, attracted a large audience. The opera was admirably performed in every respect, the band and chorus travelling with the party doing very efficient service under the direction of Signor Vianesi. The expense incurred of moving about such a numerous company as that engaged in the present instance must be considerable, and it is satisfactory to see that the enterprise meets with that support from the public which it so thoroughly deserves. Mlle. Dario, since her auspicious début at Bath, has completely confirmed the favourable impression she then made. She has gained confidence upon the stage, and promises to take a prominent position among the soprani leggieri of the day. She is invariably encored in the Rondo finale of the Sonnambula, which she sings with the refinement and aplomb of an accomplished artist. Mlle. Dario is, we believe, of English extraction. She commenced studying singing in Milan, and has lately had the advantage of instruction from Signor Vianeri, to whom is due the honour of having completed her musical education. Signor Cresci having learnt his part in Don Giovanni, that opera was given in Bath on Saturday evening, 19th, and repeated, as will be seen above, on Wednesday, in Plymouth. It was thus cast:—Donna Anna, Mad. Grisi; Zerlina, Mad. Lemaire; Donna Elvira, Mlle. Dario; Don Ottavio, Signor Galvani; Don Giovanni, Signor Cresci; Commendatore, Signor Fallar; Leporello, Signor Ciampi; and Masetto, Signor Bellini.

It is needless to recal the beauties of Grisi's impersonation of Donna Anna; they are too well known. Suffice it to say, they were as remarkable as ever — no diminution in their power or charm, whether vocal or dramatic, being in the slightest degree perceptible.

The Don Giovanni of Signor Cresci will bear comparison with that of many of the most successful representatives of the past. He sings the music well, and if there was a lack of "dash and devilment" in his acting, it was, perhaps, more attributable to the evident care he was obliged to take upon these, the two first occasions in which he appeared in the character, than to any deficiency of dramatic talent. Mlle. Dario was charming as Donna Elvira, as correct in her singing and playing Mozart's music as the severest critic could desire. Mad. Lemaire, as usual, was thoroughly artistic as Zerlina; while Signors Galvani, Ciampi and Fallar very materially enhanced the completeness of the performance by the admirable manner in which they impersonated the rôles respectively allotted to them.

Mr. Swift joined the party on Thursday, to take the place of Signor Galvani who proceeds to Dublin. Of Mr. Swift's appearance in Trovatore as Manrico we shall have occasion to speak more fully next week.

THE NATIONAL CHORAL SOCIETY.—Mr. G. W. Martin, conductor of the above choral society, on meeting the members of the choir for the first time this season, explained the general plans to be carried out by the officers and members, and gave an interesting account of a project to introduce a greater and more general taste for music among the private soldiers in our various garrisons. The following is the official form in which a circular presented the subject to the choir:—

In addition to the usual performances, your assistance will be solicited at a series of Grand Concerts to be given in Exeter Hall, to the soldiers quartered in London and its vicinity. On these occasions the Hall will be occupied entirely by the officers and soldiers of the different garrisons, no persons being admitted except in full uniform. These performances, instituted with a view of creating an interest in the study of choral music in the army, and of placing within the reach of soldiers a means of musical recreation of an elevating order, will be under the highest patronage both civil and military.

MISS ELLEN CONRAN, a young lady who some six or seven years ago made a favourable début as soprano singer in Dublin, is about to make her reappearance in her native city, being engaged to sing with the Grisi party at the Theatre Royal in December. Miss Conran comes directly from Rio Janeiro, where, according to the local journals, she sang with immense success.

MR. WILBYE COOPER has returned to London from the Continent.

LONDON: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1861.

ONE of the acts of grace of the season 1862, we are informed, will be the presentation by professionals and amateurs of a memorial to Mr. Costa for his long and eminent services in the cause of music in this country. This coming event—which we feel confident will cast no shadows before—is thus chronicled in the columns of a morning contemporary:—

We announced last week that Mr. Costa would lead the orchestra on the opening day in some music by Meyerbeer, Auber, and Verdi, written specially for the occasion. We are now informed that our great conductor will, during the season of the Exhibition, be presented with a substantial or an elegant testimonial as a mark of appreciation by the profession and by amateurs of his distinguished services to the musical art during his career, which has now extended over 30 years. We are sure that Mr. Costa has in the country so many admirers and so many friends who know how much he has done to popularise music, that the subscriptions to this testimonial will flow in neither slowly nor in too small sums. We are certain that the commissioners would be but too happy to permit the presentation to take place in Kensington among all the wonders of the world; but we think it would be better that the testimonial to Mr. Costa, whatever be the form which it may assume, should be presented either in Exeter Hall or in the Crystal Palace, the scenes of so many of his greatest triumphs. Let it, however, be in the Exhibition year, that the provincials, whom Mr. Costa has, as a conductor, so often delighted, may be able to prove that their satisfaction was neither selfish nor fleeting.

That Mr. Costa has done a good deal for music in this country, and endeavoured to do more, nobody will pretend to gainsay. He was the first, if we mistake not—certainly one of the first—to elevate the office of orchestral conductor into its present importance and to give it its real significance. Anterior to his time, at the opera and in the concert-room, the leader and conductor were merged into one. The first fiddle of the band acted as both, now playing, now directing, as he thought proper, using his bow for a bâton. Mr. Costa, a very young man, reformed or helped to reform this singular custom which prevailed time out of mind, and for that alone is entitled to no small consideration. But the reform acts of the Italian chef-d'orchestre did not halt with the conductor. He made alterations in the constitution of the band, and in the disposition in the orchestra, which were found to be serious benefits. As a general of an instrumental army, he was allowed to have no superior, if in leed an equal. His method of conducting the power he wielded over his forces, his industry, his energy, his enthusiasm, were almost unparalleled. No man, moreover, could claim more respect from artists placed under him, while no director ever looked with greater zeal to their interests and welfare. These were great recommendations and could not be overlooked. Mr. Costa shone especially in directing Italian opera. He had to deal with music of his predilection—with music he thoroughly understood and appreciated. That he was the most accomplished conductor of Italian opera this country has seen may be asserted without fear of contradiction. As director of the Philharmonic and Sacred Harmonic Societies he was not qualified in the same eminent degree. To one bred and educated in the Italian school of music, and with Italian feelings and tastes, the conducting of the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, and the Israel in Egypt of Handel, must have presented greater difficulties than Lucrezia Borgia or Norma. But if not trained and disciplined in the loftiest school of art, Mr. Costa had too keen a perception and too much talent, indeed, not to come through the ordeal with credit, if not triumphantly. He found admirers and supporters in his new calling, and patrons who adhered to him under all circumstances, and accepted all his acts for gospel. Never was reputation earned by harder work and greater perseverance, and the direction of the Birmingham Festivals and the great gatherings at the Crystal Palace followed of course his London fame.

Mr. Costa's position in this country has been an enviable one, and almost unprecedented. As a mere labourer in the art he has been one of the most indefatigable and persevering ever known. For this only, if for nothing else, the celebrated chef d'orchestre is entitled to a testimonial; and in giving publicity to the announcement we trust we shall be the means of creating an interest in the undertaking, and swelling the list of subscriptions.

To the Editor of the MUSICAL WORLD.

HERR ANTON RUBINSTEIN'S opera, in four acts, Die Kinder der Haide (the Children of the Heath), being on the eve of re-production (Herr Ander willing) at the Imperial Opera House, Vienna, you may like to hear a word or two about it. The plot (modelled after Karl Beck's Janko) is wrought out somewhat as follows:—

Isbrana, a young gipsy maiden, is in love with the spruce horseherd, Wanja. At the rising of the curtain we perceive her waiting for him. At length he appears, but his look is gloomy and severe. He says he has come for the last time, in order to break off a connection which has long rendered him an object of scorn to his relations and friends. Although thus humbled and repudiated by him, Isbrana, at the risk of her life, informs him that she has overheard the plan of some gipsies to steal his horse, and break into the inn kept by an old man named Conrad. Deeply moved by the noblemindedness of the poor girl, Wanja once again swears he will ever remain true to her, and then hurries off to frustrate the plans of the gipsy band. With the assistance of numerous herdsmen, called together by his horn, he drives the gipsies out of Conrad's inn, and brings in his arms the fainting Marie, Conrad's daughter, into the open air. The grateful father offers him her hand and half of what he possesses. Wanja is so fascinated by the appearance of the charming girl, that the final group enables us without difficulty to predict a speedy marriage.

The second act commences with festive preparations for Marie's wedding. But the blond German girl is not happy at the prospect; she nourishes in secret an ideal passion for a young nobleman who once honoured her with a few tender words. Scarcely have the young people returned from the church, scarcely has the deeply-injured Isbrana finished the marriage-song she has been compelled to sing them, before Count Wladimir appears in the midst of the marriage guests. Taking advantage of a moment when he is unobserved, he pours a passionate confession into Marie's ear. Wanja, flushed with wine, dares to step menacingly between them, a crime for which he is at once compelled to beg forgiveness on his knees. The Count is not too loath to pardon him, in order to render the poor fellow helplessly intoxicated and forgetful of Marie.

At the commencement of the third act we see Wanja sleeping on the bare ground in front of his hut. The faithful gipsy girl is watching over him, but, on awaking, he drives her away, and also upbraids her for her significant warnings with regard to the Count. The latter has, meanwhile, sent Marie a letter, making arrangements for an undisturbed interview. A cunning gipsy, named Gregory, is the bearer of the letter, but Isbrana manages to get it away from him, in order to save Wanja from the shame with which he is menaced. Moved, however, by the entreaties of the young bride, she conceals, at the decisive moment, the guilty passage in the letter, and, poor thing, has to hasten away in order to avoid Wanja's whip. Marie has hardly been alone a moment, before the Count appears, and receives from her the avowal that his love is returned. With his arm encircling her waist, he is dragging her, half forcibly, from the spot, when Wanja unexpectedly returns, and rushes wildly on him. The Count draws his sabre, but is disarmed, and falls under Wanja's avenging hand. Then follows the highly exciting scene (faithfully copied from Janko) where the murderer, with the bloody weapon still in his hand, presents himself to the crowd, who are transfixed with fear, and says: "Hört und lasst euch sagen; Ich habe den Herrn erschlagen!" ("Listen to what I have to tell you; I have killed our master!") The submissive multitude now pluck up courage, and resolve to avenge the murder of the young noble. They make an attempt to chain Wanja, and deliver him up to the officers of justice, but a signal given by the faithful Isbrana brings the gipsies in the neighbourhood to Wanja's assistance. After a short struggle, they rescue him from the peasants, and carry him off with them triumphantly. This concludes the third act.

In the fourth act we find the horseherd is the leader of his deliverers; he has become a captain of banditti. By Isbrana's side, he rules the brown "Children of the Heath"—the terror of the country people and of travellers. Among the latter, he one day unexpectedly finds some former acquaintances. The gipsies drag in old Conrad with his daughter, who has gone mad. Wanja, struck by remorse, sinks down before Marie, who, however, does not recognise him. By allowing father and daughter to proceed freely on their way, he lashes the gipsies into rebellion against him. Even Isbrana, most deeply wounded by his reviving love for Marie, resolves to be revenged. At a sign from her, Wanja sees himself surrounded and captured by the officers of justice, while Isbrana, horrified at her own deed, commits suicide.

Even from this hasty sketch the reader will guess that the book is planned with skill and poetic feeling; and that, moreover, in the third act, the dramatic interest is wound up to an unusual pitch. But the fourth act tacks on to the preceding acts a conclusion which is as obscure as it is capricious. If the four-act form is, as a rule, the most unfavourable for opera, it becomes nothing less than absolutely ruinous, when the concluding act, which ought to work all the strength and meaning of the opera up to a climax, is flat and tame. That Isbrana, after sacrificing herself in the noblest manner during three acts for her lover, should, in the fourth act, quietly deliver him up to the gendarmes, is as deficient in motive and unpoetical as the reappearance of Marie bereft of her reason, and as Wanja's whole course of proceeding. Even in the first three acts, the dramatic motives, properly so called, are not especially abundant or novel; but they combine naturally and with skilfully graduated effect with each other, crystallising into happily conceived and genuine musical situations. The great charm of Beck's Janko—that lyrico-epic poem, glowing with rich colour—most certainly does not consist in the impetuous power of the events depicted.

Though too scanty for a drama, the subject seemed in many ways well adapted for an opera, since the latter, like the epic poem, requires a calm extension of representable reality. Mosenthal—whom, to all intents and purposes, we may consider to be the author of the first three acts—has seen the matter in its proper light, and, by the unmistakeable contrast between the four principal characters, the touches of nationality in his pourtrayal of gipsy life, the scene of the marriage festivities, &c., played admirably into the composer's hands. The real hero of the piece is Isbrana; the original titular hero, Wanja, is of far less importance. This personage confuses us by his continuous vacillation between Isbrana and Marie, and shocks us by the Sclavonic brutality with which he first throws himself on the ground before the nobleman, and then raises his whip against the defenceless gipsy maiden. Without doubt this is a genuine Russian trait, but in the ideal sphere to which opera belongs, and must belong, in so far as it does not admit of a detailed exposition of dramatic motives, such a trait has a repulsive effect. Count Wladimir ought to have taken a somewhat more prominent part in the action; he would then have produced the effect of a common-place stage figure less than he now does. The two female characters, on the other hand, are happily hit off, and by the contrast between them, afford a fine field for musical treatment.

The libretto of Die Kinder der Haide exhibits one negative merit, which does credit to the composer as well as the author, namely, that it never aims at mere outward show. We all know how librettos are manufactured now-a-days. The first things taken into consideration are the costumes, scenery, processions, &c.; the author selects knightly or oriental costumes, dazzling equipments, and magnificent robes. After all this display in the way of dress, the attention of the composer is turned to the most popular musical forms—such, for instance, as the march, the drinking-song, and the prayer. The action, properly so called, is something quite secondary, and is cut out, like a garment, to fit these more important requirements. There is, however, almost nothing of this kind in the book of the Children of the Heath, which invariably displays an endeavour to exhibit dramatic character and action. It can only be regretted that Herr Rubinstein, influenced partly by his own opinion, and partly by that of various officious individuals, should have made some highly inappropriate alterations in the original story of Janko. At first, he actually wanted to transport the action, which is laid in Hungary, to—Mexico! When the author pointed out to him, however, the impracticability of granting his desire, he agreed at last to lay the scene in the south of Russia, where he felt most at home. Rubinstein appears to have been ignorant—nay, not to have entertained the slightest presentiment—of his strongest point, to which his music will owe its greatest and best merited success. This point is its nationality, of which, however, more in another letter. H. H.

EXETER HALL.

THESE spacious old head-quarters of Oratorio were in all their glory again last Tuesday evening. More full of light and life, and thrilling resonance, they never were. An audience of the best kind, as numerous as the place can hold, were drawn there by the threefold interest of charity: of hearing Jenny Lind sing once more, after five years of resolute retirement in domestic life; and of hearing that great work—perhaps the most welcome of all oratorios next to the Messiah—Mendelssohn's Elijah, done so conscientiously and so inspiringly as it surely would be under her auspices, she sustaining all the leading soprano parts, and Sims Reeves (for the first time cooperating with her) all the tenor, with worthy associates in the other solos, with a thoroughly drilled choir and orchestra, on the scale of the Sacred Harmonic Society, and with her husband, Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, for conductor, and the accomplished organist of the Temple Church, Mr. E. J. Hopkins, to play the organ accompaniments. Here was an appeal to love of music and humanity quite irresistible; and it is no wonder that for some days before the concert there were no seats to be had for love or money. The sum raised must have been a solid furtherance to the philanthropic work of the Rev. Mr. Douglas—enough to "tide over" many of the difficulties he has had to encounter in his efforts to improve the spiritual, social, and material condition of the dense population of the district lying around the Victoria Docks, or "London over the Border." It was simply characteristic of the great singer to signalize the opening of a new career of her artistic triumphs by a splendid gift to society, setting apart the entire first-fruits thereof for the good of her fellow beings. Such good deeds require no appreciation here; our business is with the musical event as such.

It is understood that this performance of Elijah is the grand prelude to a series of performances which Mad. Jenny Lind Goldschmidt, with Mr. Otto Goldschmidt as director, and with Mr. Sims Reeves, Signor Belletti, &c., as her principal assistants, proposes to give in Liverpool, Manchester, and other great towns. Such a reappearance, after such long silence, of course excites great joy and curiosity. There may have been some doubts, some fears, too, whether the great singer would be found the same; whether that wonderful voice had not lost much of its charm. But these, we may safely say, were happily dispelled on Tuesday night. The great soprano of our day is as supreme as ever; as full of penetrating power and beauty; the clearest, purest, truest, largest, and most musical of all high voices. Possibly, the delivery of it costs somewhat more effort than in former years; but it is not painfully visible, and the effect is smooth, spontaneous, expressive art. As first heard, in the double quartet, "He shall give his angels charge," it soared above all, with a triumphant fervour that seemed to carry the whole up with it, and lend a clear seraphic temper to the harmony, as Mendelssohn intended. Never were those highest phrases touched so satisfactorily—so proudly lit upon—not struggled up to. And she was well supported in the other parts, including as they did Sims Reeves, Miss Palmer, &c. &c.

In the scene of the widow, "What have I to do with thee?" her delivery was the perfection of dramatic pathos. Here you felt one, perhaps the central secret of the singer's power, which is her earnestness. She sings with her whole soul, and with determination to convey the whole reach and meaning of each phrase of text and music in her tones. Still more powerfully was this felt in her great song, "Hear ye, Israel," followed by "Thus saith the Lord," and "Be not afraid." Nothing could be more touchingly beautiful than the first sentence; nothing more grandly declaratory than the last. This is just the music for Jenny Lind; one can readily believe that Mendelssohn wrote it for her. But perhaps here is the fittest place to suggest the only question that occurred to us as to the otherwise faultless perfection of her singing. Was it not perhaps too uniformly excellent? that is to say, too uniformly earnest — always strained up to the full bent of expression — every phrase and every note charged to its full capacity — all, as it were, emphasized, so that you needed some repose, some level places to recover in? But nothing of this sort could one feel in the succeeding pieces. In the angel trio, "Lift thine eyes" (sung to perfection with Miss Cole and Miss Palmer, and encored enthusiastically); in the angel's message to Elijah, "Arise now! get thee without;" above all, in that crystal clear, etherial quartet, "Holy, holy" (with Miss Cole, Miss Palmer, Miss Eyles, and chorus); in the recitative, "Behold, God hath sent Elijah;" and in the exquisite quartet, "O come, every one that thirsteth" (with Miss Palmer, Mr. Reeves, and Mr. Lawler), her voice was the impersonation of that high seraphic temper, that worshipping, Miltonic ardour, that sympathy as from above — purified, not passionless, which the situations and the words suggest, and which so truly inspired the composer. Perhaps tenderness, in the common sense of the term, is not so remarkable among the native graces of the Lind voice or art as some others. Yet no one sings with more feeling. Her noblest manifestation is, however, in a piece like "Holy, holy." Was ever Sanctus so sustained and grand! That high voice sounded like one that had led in the angelic choirs, with still increasing joy and fervour, since the stars first sang together.

Mr. Sims Reeves, as we have said, sang all the tenor solos; and every reader will know what we mean when we say that he sang his best. Indeed, in his two great airs—"If with all your hearts," and "Then shall the righteous shine,"—he fairly shared the first honours of the evening. In the recitatives, too, he maintained his consummate mastery, as in song. And what could one want more to have coupled with the Lind voice in those beautiful quartets than the voice of Sims Reeves? Only the warm, rich, large contralto of Miss Palmer, who also surpassed herself that evening. There was a fine purity of style, a simple, unaffected fervour in all that lady's singing. She has a comforting quality of voice, that suits that particular angel who bore messages to Elijah; and she seemed steeped in the music, even when she was not singing, or only joined unconsciously in the chorus. In "O rest in the Lord," she was most heartily and deservedly encored. In the denunciations of Jezebel she showed a dramatic energy which we had hardly expected. The silvery high soprano of Miss Cole was admirably suited to the part of the boy sent out to look for rain; and she did good service: as did also Miss Eyles, contralto, in concerted pieces. The same must be said of Mr. Lawler, bass, and Mr. Cummings.

Mr. Weiss sustained the difficult and all-important part, which he had made his own, that of Elijah, with great power and dignity, and like a thoroughly artistic singer. We might particularise many fine points; but what need when all was admirable and worthy of the occasion. Orchestra and choir were all that one could wish, entering into the work with a will, and marring or obscuring none of the beauties of this magnificent composition under the firm, intelligent baton of Mr. Goldschmidt, who at once took a high position thereby among good conductors.

There was no instance in which one could find fault even with a tempo, unless it were that the "Blessed" chorus was taken up a little faster than the instruments could play with ease. On the whole it was a triumphant, and will remain a memorable performance of Elijah. J. S. D.

[The above very interesting report, forming part of a letter addressed by the writer to Dwight's Boston Journal of Music, will, we are sure, be as acceptable to the readers of the MUSICAL WORLD as any editorial notice of Mad. Goldschmidt's concert that could by any possibility be furnished.—ED. M. W.]

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—These admirable and now firmly established entertainments commence (for the fourth season), on Monday, April 18th, at St. James's Hall. M. Vieuxtemps is re-engaged by Mr. Arthur Chappell, and will appear at the first concert. Mr. Charles Hallé is to be the pianist.

ROYAL ENGLISH OPERA.

THIS Theatre commenced proceedings on Thursday night, in a manner which promises well for the season to come. A new Opera was produced — Mr. Howard Glover's Ruy Blas — with triumphant success. Our own report must be deferred until next week. Meanwhile we append notices from two of the principal morning papers.

(From the Daily News.)

Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. Harrison have made a good beginning of their winter campaign. No theatrical managers have ever deserved success more than they have done. They have from first to last laboured most conscientiously in doing their duty to the public; and the public, in requital, owe them every encouragement and support. Their present company is even stronger than it has hitherto been; they have made an ample and varied provision of new works by our most distinguished composers to be produced in the course of the season. Their chorus and orchestra are superior to any thing we have ever heard in an English theatre; they have provided all the means of giving splendour and magnificence to their performance; and in Mr. Alfred Mellon they have a musical director whose ability and energy are not to be surpassed.

The theatre opened with Mr. Howard Glover's new opera Ruy Blas. Much was expected from this work, and no disappointment has ensued. On the contrary, it was performed to an audience who crowded the theatre to the doors, and from whom it met with an enthusiastic reception. Its success, indeed, has been triumphant, and such as will give it a permanent place among our standard English operas. No account of the drama is necessary. It is Victor Hugo's famous romantic tragedy, translated, scene for scene, from the original, with no other alterations than such as are requisite to give it the lyrical form. The libretto is by Mr. Glover himself. It is exceedingly well written, and such as might be expected from the pen of a gentleman who has a literary as well as a musical reputation. If we have any fault to find with it, we may say, perhaps, that the original piece is too closely followed, the dialogue not having always undergone that condensation which is desirable in the process of turning a play into an opera. Hence, as it appeared to us, some of the scenes, both of spoken dialogue and concerted music, were somewhat verbose, and moved heavily. A little improvement in this respect might be made; and we have no doubt it would give, in some places, greater concentration and spirit to the action of the drama. The subject is a very happy one, and we wonder that it has not before now been brought on the opera stage. The original play, though deeply tragic, is more in the style of melodrama than of regular tragedy. Its whole construction is melodramatic, and its situations and incidents constantly suggest musical treatment. Mr. Glover has found them rich in the materials of expression and effect; and the musical ideas suggested by them are not only striking and beautiful in themselves, but always in perfect accordance with dramatic truth. We can, at this time, only mention a few passages which seemed to make the greatest impression.

The opening scene of the fête in honour of the King's birthday is a most happy mixture of brilliant music, gay spectacle, pretty dances, and lively action. It prepared the audience for being amused and excited by what was to follow. The first of the dramatis personæ who appeared was Don Sallust, personated by Mr. Santley, who was received with the honour due to so excellent a performer. His air, "My heart with rage is swelling," was greatly applauded. When Mr. Harrison appeared shortly afterwards, he was greeted with acclamations from all parts of the house. He performed the part of the hero, which he sustained most admirably, showing the powers of a great tragedian as well as of a great singer. His ballad, "Beside her lattice every night," a charming melody (the theme of which we had already heard in the overture), created a great sensation. It was loudly applauded and encored, but though the call was persisted in, it was not responded to. We afterwards found, to our satisfaction, that both Mr. Harrison and Miss Louisa Pyne had adopted the resolution to decline all encores; a resolution which we hope they will have the firmness to adhere to, and thus contribute to do away with a senseless practice which has become an absolute nuisance. The duet between Don Sallust and Don Cesar de Bazan (Mr. Santley and Mr. St. Albyn) is dramatic, and was delivered with much spirit, but it is too long, being too full of words. In the scene which opens the second act there is an exceedingly pretty part-song for female voices, "We have wandered through the gardens," which had a most pleasing effect, and ought to become popular wherever part-singers "do congregate." Miss Louisa Pyne now made her first appearance, in the character of the Queen. She was exquisitely attired, and looked both charming and queenlike. The sight of her produced a tumult of enthusiasm in the house, which was heightened by the manner in which she warbled her delightful ballad, "A trusty heart in sorrow's need," which, though applauded loud and long, was not repeated. In the same scene there was a playful trio, "Beauteous lady," sung by Miss Thirlwall as Casilda, Miss Jessie M'Lean (a most promising débutante) as the Page Oscar, and Miss Susan Pyne as the antiquated Duchess of Albuquerque, the Queen's duenna—very comic and clever, and admirably sung. Casilda's subsequent air, "'Tis sweet to roam," a little Spanish ditty, redolent of Andalusia, enabled Miss Thirlwall to appear to great advantage; and Miss Susan Pyne was equally happy in a lively song, "Where a husband's eye must fail," which she sang with great spirit and quaintness. But our time and space admonish us that we must, for the present at least, pass over many things well worthy of special notice. We must, however, mention Miss Louisa Pyne's air, "Why then for such loving care," a rondo in the bravura style, full of rapid passages in the highest regions of the scale, which she sang with that bird-like clearness, brilliancy, and ease, of which she alone is capable. The house rang with applause, after its conclusion, for several minutes. We can only further mention the last act, which (unlike the last acts of many operas) is the best and most effective portion of the work. The acting of Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. Harrison, in the scene of the terrible catastrophe, was above all praise; and the music of all this act is full of beauties of the highest order.

The whole performance was admirable. Miss Susan Pyne's truly artistic personation of the pompous Duenna was genuine comedy joined to clever and musicianlike singing. Miss Thirlwall maintained the character she gained last year; and Miss Jessie M'Lean (a young American, we understand) showed that she will prove a valuable member of the company. When the curtain fell there was the usual ovation which attends a successful performance. After the principal performers had appeared before the curtain the author was loudly called for, and on presenting himself was greeted with the warm and unanimous plaudits which he so well deserved.

(From the Times.)

A very few lines must suffice at present to chronicle the reopening of this national establishment last night, in presence of a crowded audience, with an original grand work in four acts, from the pen of an English composer. Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. Harrison could not have commenced their "season" more auspiciously. The new opera achieved a brilliant and well-merited success, and the enthusiastic applause bestowed upon its composer, who was unanimously called for at the end, after the principal singers had been summoned, was a spontaneous tribute on the part of those who had experienced such hearty gratification from his music. Although the only dramatic composition of his which had been previously represented on the London boards was an operetta called Aminta, produced at the Haymarket Theatre a good many years since, Mr. Howard Glover has long held a conspicuous place in the ranks of English musicians, and by musical amateurs is popularly recognized as the author of Tam O'Shanter, one of the most characteristic works of its class ever written for the concert-room. His new opera, the book of which, prepared by himself, derives its materials from Hugo's celebrated play of Ruy Blas, is a more ambitious effort than any that has yet proceeded from his pen; and it is only just to add that increase of endeavour has been accompanied by a proportionate amount of success. But of the merits of Ruy Blas, libretto and music, we must defer speaking till a more convenient opportunity. Enough just now to say that it is placed upon the stage with that completeness in every department for which the Royal English Opera has earned honourable distinction; that the cast comprises the strength of the company; and that the orchestra and chorus, under the vigilant direction of Mr. Alfred Mellon—who seldom fails to secure by indefatigable zeal and talent an eminently satisfactory "first performance," and has maintained his reputation on the present occasion—exhibit all their well-known efficiency. The character of Ruy Blas falls to Mr. Harrison, that of the Queen of Spain to Miss Lousia Pyne, and that of Don Sallust to Mr. Santley (whose return to the Royal English Opera is a manifest gain to its interests); while the subordinate parts are in the hands of Miss Susan Pyne, Miss Thirlwall, Mr. St. Albyn, Mr. Patey, and Miss Jessie M'Lean, a young and highly promising débutante, for whom a personage has been invented, something akin to the page in the Huguenots, Gustave, or the Ballo in Maschera, wholly foreign to the drama of M. Hugo. The performance did not terminate till a late hour; but the good sense of the principal singers in respectfully declining "encores" prevented the slightest feeling of tedium among the audience, who consequently remained, with scarcely a single exception, until the last note of the opera. As there were a great many songs, all more or less attractive, and some eminently beautiful, had "encores" been accepted, the fall of the curtain might have been postponed till considerably past midnight. In the instance of two ballads, nevertheless, "A sympathizing heart" (Act ii.), and "Could life's dark scene be changed for me" (Act iii.), both sung to the utmost degree of perfection by Miss Louisa Pyne, and the last especially, one of the most expressive and unhackneyed compositions of its class that we remember, the sensation created was so remarkable, and the demand for repetition so thoroughly genuine and unanimous, that the stringent regulation now for the first time adopted at this theatre of resisting such demands on the part of the audience, was regarded—not altogether unreasonably, perhaps—as somewhat of a hardship.

After the opera, the National Anthem was sung by the entire company, Mr. Henry Haigh (tenor), and Miss Louisa Pyne taking the solos. Ruy Blas is to be repeated, as a matter of course, this evening.

Provincial.

MUSIC is beginning to be heard again at Manchester. Mr. Hallé has begun his new campaign. Of his first grand concert the Manchester Guardian writes as follows:—

"The first of Mr. Hallé's projected series of twenty concerts took place at the Free-trade Hall last night, and attracted a very large audience. The reception given to the talented maestro, on his stepping upon the platform, was enthusiastic, amounting, indeed, to an ovation. This concert was the first of the twelve miscellaneous ones, intended to form part of the series (the remaining eight being choral); in which twelve Mr. Hallé intends to rely mainly upon his band, his own pianoforte performances, and solos and concerted pieces by the élite of the band; the vocal element, which is intended to be represented by the highest available talent, in each case varying the programmes, and relieving the instrumentalists. The band is thus a most important feature in the concerts, and we understand that neither pains nor expense have been spared to make it efficient in every department. It consists, as we have already stated, of sixty-five instruments, of which forty-two are strings, the remainder being wind instruments and instruments of percussion; thus forming a force which, in a room so admirably adapted for sound as the Free-trade Hall, is amply sufficient for the production of the greatest orchestral effects; and in order to secure beauty of tone and proportion amongst its different sections, care has been taken to fill the leading posts with artists of ability and experience. The twelve first violins are headed by Mr. C. A. Seymour, whose name, not to mention the other eleven, who are all excellent players, is a guarantee that this all-important section of the band will be efficiently represented. At the head of the twelve second violins is Mr. L. Goodwin; M. Baetens leads the six tenors; M. Vieuxtemps, an orchestral player of the highest rank, is chief of the six violoncellos; and Mr. Waud, equal to any three ordinary players, is foremost amongst the double basses. The efficiency of the wind instruments is secured by the following well-known names, who figure as principals of their respective instruments—namely, Mr. De Jong (flute), Mons. Lavigne and Mr. Jennings (oboes), the former being perhaps the best player of the day; Herr Grosse (clarinet), Signor Raspi (bassoon), Herr Grieben and Mr. L. Edwards (horns, with two others); Mr. Richardson (trumpet), Mr. R. Richardson (cornet), Mr. W. Philipps (trombone, with two others), and Signor Medina (ophicleide). Two experienced players, Mr. Yardley and Mr. Batley, are at the drums, Mr. Lockwood is the harpist, and Mr. Holt occupies the by no means unimportant post of librarian. Weber's magnificent overture to Der Freischutz, which opened the concert, tested at once both the power and quality of the band; the effect of the mass of strings being rich, solid, and sonorous, tempering the power of the wind instruments, which are all in every way admirable. The overture was played throughout with great precision and effect; and, if any special praise is due, it is to the horns and the clarinet, which were excellent. The brilliant Guillaume Tell was given with so much fire and precision as to call for a demand for a repetition, which Mr. Hallé unhesitatingly complied with so far as to repeat the latter part. The great instrumental piece of the evening was, however, Mendelssohn's Symphony, with its rich and varied poetic colouring. This, infinitely more difficult than the overtures, was the real touchstone for the band. They were, however, thoroughly up to the mark, both strings and wind, and gave a performance of the symphony that left nothing whatever to be desired. The march from Tannhäuser, one of the clearest and best we have heard of the school to which it belongs, completed the band performances. We believe it was the general opinion that the present band surpassed any that Mr. Hallé has hitherto organised; and much gratification may be expected from the numerous orchestral works that are to be produced in the course of the season. Of Mr. Hallé's own performances it is difficult to speak. He is so uniformly excellent in everything that he does, and playing every style with the same facility, from the mighty and profound Beethoven to the light and graceful bagatelles of the day, that criticism has nothing to do but to record its admiration. The brilliant Concertstück was never better rendered, nor Thalberg's popular "Home, sweet home." The latter elicited immense applause, which Mr. Hallé acknowledged by performing one of Stephen Heller's tarantellas. A solo of Mr. Lavigne was an admirable performance. In the hands of this accomplished player the oboe becomes, what it has rarely ever been before, a pleasing solo instrument. Mr. Lavigne appears to have immense command over it, developing its powers of expression, however, rather than displaying much executive dexterity, though in this he is evidently a master. The vocal performances of Mlle. Parepa were in every way worthy to be combined with the instrumental. In Auber's grand aria from Le Serment, in the air from Queen Topaze, and in the "Il bacio" of Signor Arditi, her vocalisation was really superb, and apparently feeling how admirably she was sustained by the band, she gave open rein, and fairly revelled in the exhibition of vocal power, finished and perfect in the highest degree. She also sang "I dreamt that I dwelt in marble halls."

Our own correspondent at LEEDS sends us the following:—"At the popular concert in the Town Hall, last Saturday, "Spring" and "Summer," from Haydn's Seasons, were performed. Mrs. Sunderland, Mr. Inkersall, Mr. Brandon, and the Choral Society being the vocalists. The accompaniments were played by Dr. Spark on the organ, and Mr. Burton conducted.

The eleventh annual general meeting of the Leeds Madrigal and Motet Society was held in St. George's school-room, on Wednesday evening. Mr. J. W. Atkinson, Vice-President, occupied the chair. There were between seventy and eighty members present. The committee, in their report, congratulated the society on its prosperous condition, the number of members on the books being about 140. Dr. Spark's resignation as conductor was alluded to with regret; but in his successor, Mr. Bowling, the committee had found a gentleman of energy and talent, and one who was determined to do all in his power to maintain the prestige of the society. The following gentlemen were unanimously elected on the committee for the ensuing year:—Messrs. J. W. Atkinson, J. Bowling, J. Burras, J. D. Fowell, M. Hall, W. H. Johnson, Josh. Rider, Fred. Spark, C. Wardell, C. Wurtzburg, J. H. Walker, and A. Williamson. Mr. Bowling was re-elected conductor, and Mr. Fowell as honorary secretary and treasurer. A rehearsal of Bennett's May Queen occupied the remainder of the evening.

From the Worcester Journal we learn that Mr. Haynes gave a concert on Wednesday evening, the 2nd inst., at Haynes's Concert Rooms, MALVERN. The room was filled with the élite of the town and neighbourhood. The artists were Mrs. Haynes, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Miss M. Moss, and Mr. G. Perren, vocalists; M. Sainton, with M. Paque and M. Ritter (pianoforte), instrumentalists. The duet, "Dolce Conforto," was charmingly sung by Mrs. Haynes and Mad. Dolby, their voices blended together extremely well. Mrs. Haynes sang Rossini's aria "Di piacer," with refinement and true artistic feeling, and received from the audience vociferous applause.

From the Dublin Evening Packet we glean the subjoined:—

"Mr. H. St. Leger, a well-known musical amateur, yesterday invited several professors and lovers of music to hear some pianoforte works and new songs, in one of the saloons of Bussell's pianoforte warerooms. Among those who performed, Miss Flynn and Mr. Theodore Logier claim special notice. On playing the fine duet, composed by Moscheles for two grand pianos, called Homage to Handel, the applause was so great that they were obliged to repeat the piece, which they did with increased effect. Miss Flynn then charmed her audience with several solos by Chopin, Mendelssohn, Gottschalk, Mayer, &c., which she performed with exquisite taste and brilliant execution. Mrs. Lumsden and several amateurs then sang some of Mr. and Mrs. St. Leger's new songs, including 'The angel mother,' 'You still may trust me,' 'Somebody is waiting for me.' We were much pleased with the two new songs composed by Mrs. St. Leger for the occasion, called 'The Colleen Bawn,' and 'Dew is gemming flower and spray.' The matinée was concluded by Mr. Theodore Logier performing several solos on the piano by Chopin, Liszt, &c. We were particularly struck with Rigoletto by the last-mentioned composer, and a prayer and march composed by Mrs. St. Leger expressly for the band of the 60th Rifles."

An occasional correspondent gives us the following account of musical and theatrical doings in the Irish capital:—

Claremont, Howth.

DEAR WORLD,—The weather continuing very fine, and my friends not willing to let me return to the gay metropolis; here I am still. The Italian troupe is gone, the last night of the Opera was most brilliant, Verdi's Ballo in Maschera was performed, and all the best pieces encored most rapturously. Tietjens, Giuglini, Delle Sedie, Lemaire, &c., were called before the curtain after each act, and at the conclusion of the opera the stage appeared like a flower garden, the number of bouquets was so great. Great praise is due to Mr. Levey, the leader of the orchestra, not only for his energy on all occasions when novelties are produced at the Royal Theatre, but for his steady leading and admirable execution on the violin. His Excellency the Lord-Lieutenant, and a large party were present, and his Excellency (who is well known as a great lover of music) applauded the principal singers frequently and warmly. Mr. Gustavus V. Brooke appeared on Monday. He has been in Australia for seven years. The part he chose was Othello, which he performed with his accustomed ability. He has since appeared in the Hunchback, and in A New Way to pay Old Debts. His acting in the latter produced an effect that never will be forgotten by those who were fortunate enough to be present. Theodore Logier, son of the celebrated contrapuntist, who wrote the Logierian system, is here; he is going to play for me to-day some of Alkan's new pieces. In my next I will tell you my opinion of his playing. I was at the exhibition here on Monday night, and heard the band of the rifle brigade; it is first rate, the cornet-a-pistons player is a stunner.

P.S.—Our matinée musicale is just over; Mr. Theodore Logier having played to some of the most enthusiastic musical amateurs I ever met. Each piece was given in first-rate style, and received with acclamations of the highest favour. The selection comprised Rigoletto, by Liszt; Beethoven's sonata, Op. 111; Vaghezza, by Alkan; Troisième Ballade, by Chopin; Waltz in A flat, by Chopin; "La Jeunesse dorée," by Egghard; and the Sonata-Pathétique. Mrs. Emily Lumsden (late Miss Serle) varied the entertainment most agreeably by singing in a manner that called forth repeated plaudits, "Birds blithely singing," by Lindblad; "The Guardian Angels," by Kücken; "When I was young," from Chappell's old English ballads; "The Angel Mother," by Mrs. St Leger; and "The Rhine Maiden," by H. Smart. Two amateurs, Mr. Edmund M'Dernott and Mr. Ward also gave compositions of their own; but I can't tell you the names of their songs.

FANATICO.

ROSEMARY BRANCH, PECKHAM.—(From a Correspondent). — Mr. Howard Herring, organist of St. Mary's, Peckham, gave his annual concert at these rooms on Monday, Oct. 21; and, to judge from the number of visitors, we should say the result must have been very satisfactory. The room was crowded to excess, even the passages being occupied by the audience. The artists were Miss Rebecca Isaacs, Miss Palmer Lisle, Mr. G. Tedder, Mr. Charles Fabian, Mr. G. T. Smith, Mr. H. Buckland, Mr. Becket, Master Tolkien, and Mad. Loder. Among the best pieces may be mentioned "I'm a roamer," sung by Mr. Smith, and deservedly encored; and Mr. G. Tedder's rendering of a new song, "Be true," composed by Mr. Herring, which also obtained a genuine encore. Mr. Charles Fabian, who possesses a voice of good quality, sang Balfe's very popular "Fresh as a rose," with true expression. In his next song, "Maiden, I will ne'er deceive thee," being encored, he substituted M. Ascher's new song of "Alice, where art thou?" which delighted the audience. Miss Palmer Lisle obtained an encore in "I waited till the twilight," but contented herself by bowing her acknowledgments. The concerted pieces, especially "The last Rose of Summer," by Mr. H. Herring, Master Tolkien, Mr. Becket, and Mr. Buckland, were extremely well given. An apology was made for Miss Rebecca Isaacs, who, though suffering from a severe cold, was not absent from her post. The concert concluded with some pieces by the so-called "Kentucky minstrels."

ORGAN PERFORMANCE AT BRUNSWICK CHAPEL.—Last week (on Friday night) Mr. Albert Lowe, before a select audience, performed the subjoined list of pieces with his accustomed ability and success:—

PART I.—(A) Andante con moto, (B) Allegro non troppo, Mendelssohn; Gloria (1st Mass), Haydn; Agnus Dei (1st Mass), Mozart; Total Eclipse (Samson), Handel; "In a gondola," Mendelssohn; Prelude and Fugue (G minor) Bach; March (Eli), Costa.

PART II.—Prelude (B flat), Rink; Selection, Bellini; (A) Benedictus, (B) Gloria (12th Mass), Mozart; "O thou that tellest" (Messiah), Handel; "Be not afraid" (Elijah), Mendelssohn; "The marvellous works" (Creation), Haydn; Selection, Rossini.

PORTLAND, UNITED STATES.—A musical entertainment whose almost sole attraction is the performance upon the church organ, is somewhat of a novelty in Portland. The full powers of this noblest and most imposing of musical instruments are seldom revealed to our concert-going public. We listen to the organ as playing a subordinate part in divine service, without always remembering that it is an instrument requiring the highest powers to call forth its finest effects. To many, we doubt not, the performance of Mr. Paine afforded a new revelation of the majesty of tone and grandeur of effect which the skilful musician may call forth from the organ. He certainly exhibited remarkable skill in the handling of the instrument, as well as complete knowledge of the most difficult compositions. The result of his years of study abroad was quite apparent. The clever boy who went forth from among us has returned a thoroughly educated and accomplished musician. We are no musical critic, and cannot speak of this performance in the terms most befitting it, but we know that persons whose musical knowledge entitles their opinions to respect, declare that nothing like it was ever before heard in this city. As the principal attractions of his programme Mr. Paine chose several of the works of the great master, John Sebastian Bach. He has evidently made the works of this great musical genius a subject of close study, and the fact that he has attained to a knowledge and full appreciation of their marvellous invention, extraordinary power, and science is the best evidence of his own advanced position as a musician. The Prelude and Fugue in A minor, was played on the full organ throughout. It is a most elaborate composition, yet moving with the most perfect harmony. The manner in which the pedal movement came in was exceedingly neat, and won the applause of the highly cultivated and fashionable audience. The Trio Sonata in E flat, also by Bach, was well chosen to follow the Prelude, its soft and vivacious movement contrasting finely with the solemn grandeur of the first piece. The pedal performance here was quite extraordinary, the feet being continually employed. The solemn "Agnus Dei" was sung by Miss Cammett and Messrs. Dennett and Thurston with fine effect. These performers always do justice to whatever they undertake. In the variations and the Austrian National Hymn, and the Star Spangled Banner, our young townsman displayed his powers as a composer in a highly creditable manner — especially in the former piece. In the latter variations a passage occurred which is played by the feet alone. Mr. Paine must take high rank as an organist, and we congratulate our citizens upon having among their number one whose example must do much to elevate the standard musical education among us.—Portland Transcript.

MUSICAL WORLD

Reviews.

A LARGE instalment of the music of Mr. Howard Glover's new and successful opera, Ruy Blas (Boosey and Sons)—en attendant, we hope and presume, the remainder—lies before us. Ruy Blas looks just as well on paper as it sounds from the stage and orchestra, and, the arrangements being almost in every instance effectively done, the instrumental accompaniments lose less than is too frequently the case by transference to the keyboard of the piano. A glance at each of the pieces will suffice.

The plates of Miss Louisa Pyne's uncommonly popular ballad, "A sympathising heart," to judge from the printed impression, must already be somewhat worn by repeated service; and no wonder, if it be true, as we have heard, that not fewer than 20,000 copies have already been struck off, and for the most part disposed of. It is certainly one of the most attractive things of the class to which it belongs, whatever reservation may be made with respect to the class itself.

"Home of my youth" (also Miss Louisa Pyne's)—which begins with the unusually graceful ritornello for cornets-à-pistons—notwithstanding that it fell a victim to the castrating knife, after a few nights, during which it had charmed the audience, is indisputably a ballad of a higher stamp than the other, while containing within itself the same elements of popularity in an equally remarkable degree.

"Holy Mother, Virgin mild!" (again Miss Louisa Pyne) is the beautiful and pathetic prayer of which so much (not a bit too much) has been said and written.

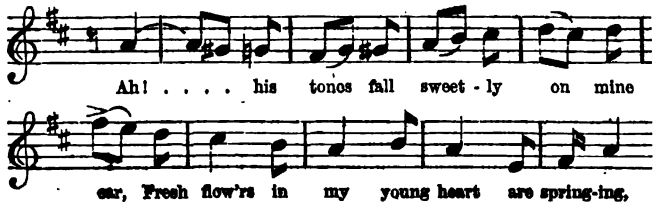
"Why, then, for such loving care" (Miss Louisa Pyne), though a little out of place, according to our notion, in the position assigned to it in the opera, offers a brilliant and animated medium for vocal display in the concert-room, and will no doubt, if on that account alone, find universal favour with singers who possess the art of fluent execution.

"My heart with rage is swelling" (Mr. Santley) is a song of a more elevated order, and in the present scarcity of good new concert-pieces for the baritone voice, should be in general request. The more familiar we become with the song, the more we find to admire in it.

"The Flower she loves" (Mr. Harrison) is, in a word, one of the freshest and most engaging ballads with which we are acquainted. The melody is as insinuating as the harmony is elegant and expressive.

"Could Life's dark Scene" (Miss Louisa Pyne) is the most exquisite little song in the whole opera, and one of the most exquisite we remember. Expression in so limited a sphere could scarcely be carried further.

The only vocal "concerted piece" in the selection with which we have been favoured is the fine and eminently dramatic duet between Ruy Blas and the Queen—"Madam, if I have striven well"—in the third act of the opera—the same which contains the very original, melodious, and well-developed phrase beginning thus:—



Two of the instrumental pieces only have reached us. The first and most important is the "Grand March" from the finale to Act 3—a showy, brilliant, and pompous military strain, which can hardly have failed to win attention at the theatre, and here is so carefully adapted for the pianoforte, that it lies within reach of the most unpretending executive force, which will doubtless add to the number of its admirers. The second is the quaint and charming mazurka, transposed (with no evident advantage) from F sharp minor to A minor.

We are still in expectation of the Tarantella and the overture, in the instrumental department; the delicious romance in F sharp minor—"In the stillness of night" (Miss Louisa Pyne's first air)—the fresh and graceful part-song for the Queen's ladies—"We have wandered through the gardens"—and a great number of almost equally attractive pieces, solo and concerted, in the vocal.

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

November 7.

The sort of success which Glück's Alceste has attained at the Imperial Opera, and of which I endeavoured to give you a notice in my last, continues unabated, indeed rather increases. The audiences are swelled by the presence of many earnest lovers and eager students of musical art not only from the provinces of France (departments is the right expression, as the Saturday Review unnecessarily remarks), but from abroad. To these of course this great work is an interesting and no doubt to some extent profitable field of study;—to the dilettante, however, and the ordinary public, who require to be pleasurably excited, or folded into a web of powerful interest—as I before intimated, it is nought. The Opera has done, nevertheless, a worthy thing in producing Alceste; the resources of such an Imperial establishment cannot, indeed, be better employed than in presenting to the public, independent of the money question, the acknowledged models of art, and, indeed, in some cases mere antiquities only so long as they are something more than simply curious. But, if Alceste were played regularly once a week, for some time to come, it would draw on each occasion a large enough audience of that select kind to which it addresses itself, to repay a great part, if not all, the expense, of its production.

The new ballet by Mad. Ferraris, L'Etoile de Messine, is definitively announced for the 15th of this month. It is out of the hands of that mystic weaver of footsteps, the "choregraph" Borri, and is on the stage for rehearsal, which is the next stage to its being on the stage for performance. It is to be played as an after piece to Alceste, alternating in this service with a two act production, announced as forthcoming by Signor Alary,—the desecrator of Don Giovanni. Mr. Gounod's new opera, La Reine de Saba, is said to be in process of study, the first three acts having been read at the piano last week. M. and Mad. Gueymard, however, have had their parts for some time, and are said to be already up in them. The following is a list of the principal characters of this opera, the book of which is by MM. Carré and Barrière, and I add the performers to whom they have been cast according to present arrangements:—

King Solomon, M. Belval; a sculptor in the temple, M. Gueymard; a young sculptor, Mlle. Hamakers; the Queen of Sheba, Mad. Gueymard; a confidant to the Queen, Mlle. de la Pommeraye.

Digitized by Google

There are besides three workmen in the temple who bear a strong resemblance to the three anabaptists—in the Prophète, I mean, of course, and not in the Pantagrueliad—precious fragments of which appeared in the MUSICAL WORLD some time since, leaving all true matagrobolisators to sigh for the remainder. Said anabaptistish craftsmen are allotted to MM. Marié, Coulon and Grisy.

I told you in my last of the production of Marta at the Italian Opera here, and how the chief female character had been played by a débutante, Mlle. Volpini, who made a favourable impression on the audience, as the stereotyped phrase goes. I have now to record that the favourable impression remains undiminished and rests on something more than the indulgence of the public on a first night and more especially towards a lady. Not that "the Volpini" is an artist of the highest class — nor that she has drawn the next prize in the lottery of theatrical life by being a lovely woman. But she most unquestionably asserts a claim to place No. 3 by the possession of a voice of soothingly agreeable quality, which she manages with a nice taste and thorough consciousness of the extent of its resources, while there is in all she does a charm not to be described and as little to be resisted, — and which extending to the person actually produces the impression of physical beauty. If I were a woman I should like to have this kind of charm as well as positive beauty of features — for what a reserve it is to fall back upon, should the small-pox, for instance, open its masked battery and destroy your principal force! Well then the new Marta will do. Signor Delle Sedie gets more and more firmly established in the good graces of the Parisian public, and great expectations are entertained of him in Il Barbière, which he is to do next — poor Beneventano of the swelling port having been, as I informed you, politely evicted. This it is to be over-puffed;— if you have not ballast — I speak morally, of course, and not of the "too too solid flesh" — you are blown into infinite space. Sig. Mario, need I say, is well again, and the stereotyped "ægrotat" is again removed from his name. He sang in Marta the other night quite marvellously. What is this curious ailment which leaves no traces behind it and yet is so malignantly sudden in attack, and overwhelmingly prostrating in effect? Why does not the Academy of Sciences propose for a prize a treatise on this inscrutable complaint? What is its origin? is it the auri sacra fames or the aura sacra famæ? Physicians, moralists, mystic seers, perpend, perpound! "The foul fiend haunts poor Tom in the voice of a nightingale" — no, certainly not a nightingale — a croaking bull frog, rather — one that blows itself to convulsions not to swell into an ox but to counterfeit the sweet piping of Philomel. "Hop dance cries for two white herrings! Croak not, black angel, I have no food for thee!" I allude to that most unmelodious of Princes who must have attuned his ears to discord by the constant utterance of that avalanche of conflicting consonants — that prolonged compound of sneeze, cough and eructation — which he is pleased to consider a name, and, no doubt, to rejoice in as a noble one. Poniatowski — Poniatowski — who will deliver me from Pon — no, I can't write it again! Having at the Grand Opera produced a most humorous work in five acts, he has now as a pendant endowed the Opéra Comique with a lugubrious, funereal and most ponderous trifle called Au travers du Mur, which is only more endurable in so much as it is shorter. The muse of comedy was never so insulted. And were one forced to sit out such a production more than once, melancholia, in its most rooted form, must ensue.

Death has again robbed the French stage of one of its most prized artists, and the theatrical profession of a most amiable and esteemed member. Leclère, the comedian of the Variétés, died last Tuesday week, after a short illness. He played so recently in London, during M. Talexy's management of the St. James's, that it is not necessary to describe his merits at any length. His forte was in delineating the lower class of bourgeois, with all their solidity and absurd pomposity of phrase, clothing the most abject platitudes. He was what we call a thoroughly legitimate actor, and his humour never degenerated into buffoonery. His death is an undoubted loss to the dramatic art, which, as times go, can but little afford it. The respect in which Leclère was held was testified in the numerous body of fellow-actors and literary men who attended his obsequies, which were conducted with all due honours. Beyond this sad event I have no theatrical news worth recording; except indeed it be that we are to have another attempt to interest the Parisians in a company of German actors. The Salle Lyrique is to open on the 11th with a series of German plays. The troop is a comic one, and its chief reliance will be on the talents of its manageress, Madame Ida Bruning, who, with what justice I cannot say, has been called the Déjazet of Germany. Such an appellation seems indeed a contradiction in terms, so opposite is the French esprit which the celebrated successor of Sophie Arnoult so brilliantly represented to the peculiar notions entertained by Germans generally both of wit and humour. For my part I do not believe the affair will answer, however great the intrinsic merits of the artists who are about to appeal to the public of Paris. In England, although the language is cognate to ours, and a knowledge of it more general among us, German plays (even German operas) do not answer. The French will laugh at the harsh sounds of the German accent, and being particularly jealous of what they regard as their exclusive privilege to be funny or witty, no foreigner has any chance of making them laugh except in derision.

The first of the series of popular concerts of classical music, in imitation of those at the St. James's Hall, which I told you were about to be given under the direction of M. Pasdeloup, has taken place. M. Pasdeloup, you are aware, is the founder of the Société des Jeunes Artistes, and is a very fit person for the direction of the present undertaking. The popularisation of good music, in which the French had been long far behind us, has lately, so far as regards vocal music, made immense strides in France, through the Orpheonist societies, of which M. Delaporte has been so active and successful an organiser and stimulator. It remained to render the instrumental music of the great masters of composition equally familiar; and the present enterprise may be regarded as a first and very important effort in that direction. Well, this first concert, it must be admitted, as far as the programme goes, its execution, and the attention with which the large audience gathered together received it — they filled the spacious arena of the Cirque Napoleon — is of most favourable augury for the success and influence of the movement. As many as 6000 persons were present at the opening concert, and this fact certainly testifies to the existence of an enormous public in France who take an earnest and elevated view of musical art. I confess I did not anticipate this result, and — Messieurs les Français, je vous en fais sincèrement mes compliments. C'est beau! C'est très beau! The progamme of the next concert exhibits a tendency, I am sorry to observe, to take liberties in interpreting the word "classic," in the composite significance of which term, I take it, one essential ingredient is a strict adherence to the exact text, and perfect integrity of the master's work. It means the work — the whole work — and nothing but the work. Now, in this second programme we have two violations of this golden rule, which unobserved makes the use of the word "classical" a false pretence. First, we have a fragment of a concerto for the violoncello by Molique. Why a fragment? Fragments let us have of great works, by all means, when the whole has disappeared; but wantonly to mutilate Apollo of Belvidere or Venus of Medici, in order to show us a nose or a thumb, which may or may not be beautiful, as it harmonises or not with the remainder of the figure — such an act is barbarous, and not to be classed among civilised and civilising proceedings — therefore not "classical." Next we have the Invitation à la Valse, by Weber, "orchestrée par M. Berlioz." With all due respect to M. Berlioz and his powers of orchestration, this annexation of himself to Weber is not "classical," excepting so far as it reminds us of Achilles dragging the dead body of Hector round the walls of Troy. Weber is classical; but not Weber cum Berlioz. So Berlioz may possibly be considered classical; but, if it were not, Berlioz cum Weber, paradoxical as it may seem, would be even less so. A musical composition is not like a treatise of law, and capable of subsequent engraftings by other and later pundits. Coke upon Littleton, and Stephens's Blackstone, have not their parallels in the Temple of the Muses, or "Kolley Kibber" and Tait might have a place elsewhere than in its obscurest crypts. Dixi.

In London you all are familiar with the Flemish breed of horses; their stalwart proportions, drawing the drays and carts of Barclay, Meux, or Hanbury, are the pride of the London streets. But as yet you know not whether the Flemish jackass is of equally Brobdignagian stature. Well, I am led to conjecture that he is even more monstrous. Onager elephantinus would be a proper title for him, judging purely from his bray, of which a contemporary has furnished us with a specimen. The quadruped calls himself for the present Le Guide Musical Belge, and putting his head over the hedge, which for the present makes two kingdoms of France and Belgium, shakes his long ears on which he rests his title of musical guide, we suppose, opes his jaws, and hee-haws bravely to an effect which I will not repeat in extenso. It is enough to say that he pretends to describe how the principal nations of Europe listen to music. The English, he says, talk when the music begins, and leave off in the pauses; the French talk all the time, through pause and performance; the Italians listen only to a tenor or a prima donna; and the Germans deliberately dwell upon its flavour, digest and meditate over it. What the Belgians do he omits to say, perhaps because he is afraid to class the Belgians among the nations of Europe. In so far his long ears belie him, and for this modesty and discretion he shall go without further punishment. But let him not attempt satire again, or stray from his native pasturages—his Brussel sprouts of homely dullness, or the stripes of our indignation shall transfigure him into a very zebra.

MUSIC IN VIENNA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Singacademie lately held its annual general meeting, and elected its officers for the ensuing year. Prince George Czartoryki was elected president, and Herr Stagmayer chorus-master, by eighty-one votes out of eighty-two, a pretty good majority. The first concert of the Society will take place in the Redoutensaal, on the 15th instant, when the programme will include choruses by J. S. Bach, Lotti, Durante, Benevoli, Eccard, Calvisius, Michael Haydn, Handel, Mendelssohn, and Blumner, as well as a "bass-arioso" with chorus out of the last-named composer's new oratorio, Abraham.—You may, possibly, recollect another Society here called the Bachverein, which was founded by the late Herr Fischof, and which Herr Selmar Bagge made an ineffectual attempt to keep up. It appears that a quantity of music belonging to it remained, after its dissolution, in the hands of Mad. Mauthner—in whose house, by the way, its first meetings were held—and, also, of Herr Bagge. The lady has since died, and her heirs have presented the Singacademie with the valuable music in her possession. In consequence of this, Herr Bagge, too, has made the Singacademie a present of the rest of the music which formerly belonged to the Bachverein, and which had long been lying in his house.—The committee of the Gesellschaft der Musik-freunde have just issued their programme for the ensuing season. It has met with almost universal approbation, but the Society will have to exert themselves to the utmost, in order that their efforts this year may not be eclipsed by what they have already done. After a series of victories, the danger of a diminution in the favour of the musical public is not so distant as people are inclined to believe. The spirit of rivalry, too, which has of late years given such a reassuring and hopeful impulse to musical Vienna, is evidently on the increase, so that the old Imperial city no longer merits, as far as music is concerned, to be stigmatised as an "intellectual Capua."

Schubert's charming operetta, with Castelli's amusing libretto, has at length been given at the Opera-house, under the double title of Die Verschwornen (Der häusliche Krieg). This opera, as I informed you at the time, was just revived last year by the Gesellschaft der Musik-freunde, and most warmly welcomed. It was not as successful as it should have been at the Opera-house, not from any shortcomings in the music, nor want of talent in the libretto, but simply because the performance was, for several reasons, not what it ought to have been. For instance, it was a mistake to cast the part of Astolf to Herr Erl, who has long since ceased to be a satisfactory representative of youthful lovers. The mise-en-scène, moreover, was bad, and the chorus, with their stupid conventional attitudes and groupings, anything but delectable to behold. It is but just to say, however, that, as far as regards the musical getting-up of the operetta, Herr Dessoff had done all that lay in his power to ensure a hit, but, as we say here, "Der Mensch denkt; Gott lenkt." I must state, by the way, that, with the exception of Herr Erl, the artists were well suited to the parts assigned them, and both sang and acted with great spirit.—In the course of the last fortnight we have had two performances of Les Deux Journées, the German for which is, Der Wasserträger, in which Herr Beck is particularly good, and well supported by Mlle. Hoffmann, Herren Mayerhofer, Erl, Lay, Walter, and Liebisch. The orchestra, under Herr Dessoff, played with great spirit.

Paris is not the only capital which has taken to building new theatres. Although not going into bricks and mortar — or rather stone and mortar, perhaps — to lodge the Muses of Poetry and Music, on so grand a scale as her sister on the banks of the Seine, Vienna, also, will soon have a new Imperial Opera-house. Without counting those appropriated to the Court, there will be ninety-eight boxes, each box being calculated to hold six persons. Thirty-six of these, including those for the court, will be on the first tier. The house will, in addition to this, contain 690 reserved seats (of which 430 will be in the pit), 930 unreserved seats, and standing room for 500 persons more; for, as your readers are no doubt aware, there is in all German theatres a large vacant space at the back and round the sides of the pit, where when it is not too full, the spectator may walk about as at a Promenade Concert. Thus the new edifice will hold conveniently 2740 persons, while the present Kärtnerthor-Theater can contain only 1650. There will be four galleries. By not having a fifth tier, not only will the height be more in keeping with the breadth, but the theatre will be far superior in its acoustic qualities.

Leipsic.—Herr Hauptmann has received the Guelph-Order from the king of Hanover. The following was the programme at the second Gewandhaus concert: overture to Les Abencerages, by Cherubini; concert-aria by Mozart, sung by Herr Schnorr von Karolsfeld; concerto for the piano, by Schumann, played by Herr Dreyschock; songs by Schumann, and nocturne by Dreyschock. Second part: Beethoven's Symphony in B flat major. Annexed is the programme of the third concert: Part I. Symphony No. 3 (C minor), by Spohr; Aria, "Ah perfido," Beethoven; Concerto-allegro, for violoncello, composed and played by Herr R. Davidoff. Part II. Overture to Medea, by Bargiel (first time); Cavatina from Bellini's Sonnambula; fantasia on one of Schubert's waltzes, by Servais, performed by H. Davidoff, and overture to Ruy Blas, by Mendelssohn.

Stuttgardt.—Herr Eckert has commenced his duties as Capellmeister by getting up Auber's Gustave III., which had not been performed for some twenty years. Hitherto he has afforded great satisfaction by the zeal and activity he has displayed in his new office. By the way, the public has now been made acquainted by Herr Kücken himself with the reasons which induced him to resign his office as Capellmeister. He felt grieved at a second Capellmeister, in the person of Herr Eckert, being appointed without his knowledge, and, so to say, behind his back. He looked upon this as a personal insult, and, in order to avoid being exposed to such in future, sent in his resignation on the 26th of September, and, on the 30th, received official notice that it had been accepted.

St. Petersburg.—The foundation of a Conservatory of Music by the members of the Russian Musical Society has at length received the sanction of the proper authorities. Herr Rubinstein has been requested to undertake its organisation and management. This has induced him to abandon the idea of making a professional tour for the next three or four years, and to return at once to the banks of the Neva. The new Conservatory, fashioned on the model of the Conservatory at Paris, will not only provide a complete course of instruction in all the branches of vocal and instrumental music, as well as of composition, and every accomplishment for the concert-room, but will adopt proper measures for the æsthetical and scientific education of the pupils. An "Operatic School" will constitute an integral and prominent part of the institution. It is moreover intended to establish, at some future time, schools for drama, ballet, and scene-painting.

THE OPERA COMIQUE.

ITS RISE AND PROGRESS.

BERTON.

HENRI MONTAN BERTON, born in Paris on the 17th September, 1767, was a son of Pierre Montan Berton, conductor of the orchestra at the opera, and composer. Like Méhul, Cherubini, and Lesueur, Henri Berton wrote at the same time for the Opéra and the Opéra Comique, and he is therefore not so strictly within the scope of this history as the early composers whose biography I have written in some detail, namely, Monsigny, Grétry, Dalayrac, &c.

He had lived amidst the world of music from his infancy, and at six years of age could read off a sonata at sight. At an early age he went into the orchestra over which his father presided, as a violinist, and it was by accompanying the masterpieces of Glück and Piccini, far more than from the few lessons of harmony he obtained from his associates in the orchestra, that he gained his musical education.

At fifteen he fell in love with the prima donna, Mlle. Maillart, who from a ballet dancer had risen to the position of principal singer at the Opéra. A son was born to them, who bore the name of François Berton, and became a composer of some promise, but died prematurely of cholera in 1832.

Henri Berton had adapted music to a libretto entitled, La Dame Invisible, and was anxious to know whether what he had produced had any merit in it. Mlle. Maillart undertook to show it to Sacchini, who, detecting in it the germ of a genuine talent, consented to give the young artist some advice. Thanks to this patronage, Berton was enabled to get several oratorios, the result of his handiwork, executed at the Concert Spirituel. Finally, in 1787, an Opéra Comique, called Les Promesses de Mariage, and shortly after La Dame Invisible, which he had re-touched since it was first written, were produced by him. After bringing out a few insignificant works, he produced at the Comédie Italienne, on the 23rd August, 1790, Les Rigueurs du Cloître. The success of this work, the libretto of which was written by Fiévée, was marked and well deserved. The score commences immediately after the overture with a brilliant and spirited duo between Lucile and the Count, "Ah! de grâce." The chorus of nuns, "Ah! quel scandale abominable," is comical and effective; the allegro agitato of Lucile in the second act: "Où fuir?" and the chorus, "Grand Dieu, reçois ce sacrifice!" are extremely pathetic, and fully answer the intention of the composer.

After this Berton gave forth several works, which met with an indifferent reception. During the reign of terror the taste of the public scarcely affected comedies interspersed with songs, and the only pieces which attracted were those on patriotic subjects, and slight productions inspired by passing events, which cost their authors but little pains, and were only performed a very limited number of times. The most popular writers would no longer take the trouble to write libretti with any care. Meanwhile Berton had given up his connection with Mlle. Maillart, who still reigned supreme at the Opéra, troubling herself very little about her former friend, who had got married, and having a family to maintain was in the most straitened circumstances. Unable to obtain a subject he resolved to write one himself, and thus establish a twofold claim to the authorship of Ponce de Léon, an opéra comique in three acts, performed for the first time in 1794, and obtained a considerabe succès d'estime, but which did not produce sufficient money to rescue him from his embarrassments.

In 1799, Berton, while living in a garret furnished with severe simplicity, was called on by a then celebrated writer of words, who had collaborated with him on a former occasion, Le Nouveau d'Assas, played in 1791, being their joint work. This was the poet Dejaure.* He had brought with him the libretto of Montano et Stéphanie, which was accepted at the Favart, and had been offered to Grétry, who had, however, then given up writing, and replied, "You require a musician who is still of an age to feel the influence of passion, and has yet experience of the stage. The man who fulfils at once both these conditions is little Berton. Take my advice, take your book to him, and he will give you back a chef-d'œuvre." This prediction was well verified; Berton fell in love with the subject he had to treat, and his score was finished in a month. It was in very fact a masterpiece. The intelligence of dramatic effect and the originality of style which assign to Berton a separate place among the musicians of France shine in it to an eminent degree. In order to enter more completely into the poem he had to set to music, Berton endeavoured to represent the characters to himself as actually present, and he himself says of a situation which he had to conduct by means of music in the introduction,—"I had to make five principal characters act and speak. So I chose out five large corks: the first to the left of the spectator was Stéphanie; the second Léonati; the third Salvator; the fourth Montano; and the fifth Altamont. The small corks which I placed behind these represented the officers and the persons of their suite. This exact statistical diagram of the picture which I desired the stage to present was of great assistance to me, for by bringing forward or throwing back this or that personage, when any one of them appeared to have been too long silent, I more completely identified myself with the interest and the eminently pathetic character of this fine dramatic situation."

The first performance took place on the 26th of May 1799, and was crowned with immense success, notwithstanding the fearful uproar which burst forth on the appearance of the singer Solié upon the stage in the garb of a priest. The riotous shouts of the republicans drowned the voice of Gavandau, who played the part of Montano, as well as that of Jenny Bouvier*, the representative of Stéphanie. It was found necessary, however, to withdraw the piece, which was only performed thrice. The causes alleged for this sacrifice are stated by a contemporary critic to have been "because it required the presence upon the stage of personages wounding the susceptibility of republican eyes and ears." It was not revived until 1804, when Dejaure was dead, and Legouvé made some changes in the third act which were deemed necessary. Among the pieces of music in this work which deserve mention, besides the fine overture, which Berton wrote on the very day of performance, are "Oui, c'est demain que l'hyménée," the melody of which is broad and full of sentiment; the graceful duet "Venez, aimable Stéphanie!" and the trio "O mes enfants." But the palm over all is to be given to the finale with its celebrated crescendo, which never yet failed to carry away the audience.

After Montano, Berton's best work was Le Délire, in one act (1799), which exhibited the faculty possessed by this composer of throwing a varied colouring over his music, and adapting its style to the subject he was handling.

Two works, very different in merit, succeeded each other in 1802 and 1803: 1st, Le Concert interrompu, in one act, and containing two pretty soprano airs, "Jeunes beautés, craignez les tristes chaînes," and "Oui, fuyez loin de mon âme;" 2nd, Aline, Reine de Golconde, which, of all Berton's operas, has been most frequently revived. The composer has studiously sought, and often with felicitous success, to give a local colouring to this score. We have only to read the first and second acts to perceive this to be the fact, for they are marked with an original oriental character, while the second act sparkles with provençal gaiety.

In 1806 Berton adapted music to Elleviou's opera, Dellia et Werdi Kan. In the same year also he produced the score of Les Maris Garçons, so full of easy gaiety, and an excellent type of the French comic opera. Elleviou, in singing, "Pour triompher de la beauté," in which he was admirably seconded by Martin, invariably brought the house down.

In 1809 Berton brought out Françoise de Foix in three acts, containing a trio, "A mon aspect," which was much applauded.

In his later operas we miss the fire of Montano et Stéphanie. His mind had grown dull under the effect of a succession of misfortunes, for his career had been anything but a prosperous one. He had survived his reputation, though it is even now great. At any rate his pieces ceased to be in vogue, and the disappointment

* Jean Elie Bendenc Dejaure, born in 1761, died December 5, 1799. He was the writer, as will be seen hereafter, who most commonly supplied words to R. Kreutzer.

* Jenny Bouvier was the daughter of a violin player in the orchestra; she sang with taste, but her voice was feeble.

was bitter to him. His old age was rendered sad and gloomy by the continued poverty which clung to him through life. To go back to the time when Dejaure sought him out in his attic, and brought him the libretto of Montano et Stéphanie, he was in the deepest despair, and on the point of giving up the subject which had captivated his enthusiasm, from the want of a few francs to buy music paper with. A friend procured him work of a slavish description, which enabled him to keep life and soul together until his opera appeared; but scarcely had his work won the favour of the public, than the republican government prohibited its performance. Ever afterwards it brought him in scarcely anything.

At a later period, in 1820, when he was quite forgotten, in order to bring his name back to the memory of the actors, Berton gave up the copyright of his work to the Opéra Comique, then managed by an association of artists, for a life annuity of three thousand francs. But the theatre failed, and Berton was robbed of his last resource. He died in April, 1842, having lost every one of his children.

MAD. GRISI'S FAREWELL TOUR.

(From our own correspondent.)

The artists seem to derive as much pleasure from their tour, as they afford the public by their performances in the different towns they visit.

Travelling evidently agrees with them, and apparently tends to develope their individual resources of fun and amusement: all they have, in fact, to think about, provided their voices are in good tune, the cares and petty annoyances incidental to travelling being thrown upon the shoulders of the managers, whose particular task it is to pay railway fares, hotel bills, and to find the means of doing so.

If the curtain were to rise after Norma had made the last unavailing appeal to her stern parent, or Amina had done rejoicing so wildly over Elvino, Norma would very probably be found in capital spirits, enjoying a bon-mot with Oroveso, or receiving a warm embrace from Adelgisa, who had been waiting for the Diva to finish the opera, in order that they might go home in the same carriage to the hotel; and Amina might be seen skipping merrily to her dressing-room, delighted with the success of "Ah! non giunge."

Good humour pervades the party generally. A passing cloud of anxiety may darken the radiant brow of the Diva, if the daily letter from her family in Paris should happen to be delayed. The telegraph is then quickly brought into requisition—a message transmitted requesting immediate explanation of the silence, and before the answer is received, or even time elapsed for the despatch to have reached its destination, the anxiously awaited letter makes its appearance, bringing back smiles and sunshine by the good news it contains. In such moments of uncertainty and expectation, the whole party exert themselves to mitigate the anxiety of the prima donna. One starts off to the post-office, another to the telegraph-station, messengers are sent to the theatre, inquiries are made in every possible direction where the missing letter might have strayed. Ciampi is invaluable on such occasions. He is the buffo par excellence before the public as well as among his compagnons de voyage, who sometimes try his patience by the practical jokes they play off upon him. Orders are given to "boots" to wake him at the most unseasonable hours. "No. 40 to be called at five o'clock," is written upon the porter's slate, in the hall of the hotel, according to which instruction, the pleasant dreams of Ciampi are disturbed by the most tremendous knocking at his door, which does not cease until "boots" is satisfied at having done his duty. Occasionally great pains are taken by some of the most mischievous of the set (which, strictly speaking, includes all of them), to prepare a surprise for the buffo comico, in the shape of a bed commonly known as apple-pie. When such a plan is in progress it is necessary to divert the attention of the intended bénéficiaire, and he is prevented by some means or other from going to his room until the arrangements are completed. To enjoy the result of their operations, the compagnons de voyage assemble, "with stealthy step and bated breath," in the corridor near to their victim's chamber. They wait in silence. Presently growling, indicative of wrath, accompanied by sundry mysterious sounds, is heard from within the room. "Che diavolo! che cosa è 'sta roba!" is the sentence first indistinctly heard. The conspirators betray themselves in a laughing chorus, and Ciampi opens his door threatening all with vengeance on the morrow. His troubles are not, however, at an end, for notwithstanding that he has succeeded in remaking the bed, he has not removed the fire-irons which have been cunningly concealed therein, and with which he comes violently into contact when he lies down. "Per bacco!" he screams, "è troppe forte!" an assertion which is answered by shouts of derision from the demons of torment outside, who, now that their machinations have had the desired effect, retire triumphantly for the night. But Ciampi will have his revenge, and very likely will completely turn the tables upon the ringleader of the conspirators for the following two or three days. The performances, during the past week, will have been

Monday, Nov. 4, Norma, and last act of Sonnambula. Tuesday, Nov. 5, Don Giovanni—Theatre Royal, Shrewsbury.

Wednesday, Nov. 6, Evening Concert, at Chester.

Thursday, Nov. 7, Norma, and last act of Sonnambula, at Liverpool.

Friday, Nov. 8, Lucrezia Borgia. Saturday, Nov. 9, Acts from Don Giovanni, Sonnambula and Barbière—Free Trade Hall, Manchester.

Strange, to say, Don Gionanni does not seem to be so attractive to the supporters of Italian Opera in the provinces as Norma. The latter invariably draws the most crowded houses, perhaps attributable to the fact of its being more identified than any other opera with the name of the eminent prima donna, and this being the last opportunity of seeing her in the rôle she has made so entirely her own. Nevertheless, it is surprising, considering the fame of Mozart's masterpiece, and how seldom it is given in its integrity out of London.

Brilliant success has attended the party wherever they have appeared. Great interest has been excited by the announcements of the operas for the first time, at the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, an experiment under the dramatic licence which has recently been granted to the indefatigable manager of the oratorios and popular concerts hitherto given in the same locality.

The Hall has been adapted to the performances; a stage erected, and appropriate scenery painted, so that the operas will be represented quite as effectively as in any theatre, while greater perfection in the ensemble than has as yet been heard in Manchester may be expected.

Letters to the Editor.

MEYERBEER'S BIRTHDAY.

Sir,—Your last week's impression contained a remarkable effusion from the pen of a gentleman professing to give the exact date of the above-named composer's birth-day.

With the logic and grammar of that effusion I have nothing whatever to do. The date 1791 is however not correct, and without attaching so much importance to it as A. H. appears to do, I think it is just as well to have correct data upon which future historians may base their calculations. Meyerbeer was born in 1794; but the day and month are unknown to me, to all his biographers, and, judging from his silence on the subject, most likely to himself.—Yours, &c. JOHN TOWERS.

"Opera Habitué" is anxious to know if any arrangement is in progress for the re-opening of Her Majesty's Theatre next season? Is there any chance of Mr. Lumley becoming once more the lessee?

[Lumley, you're wanted.—Ed. M. W.]

Sir,—Will you tell me Signor Giuglini's address in London? Do you know if Mlle. Tietiens will sing at any of the Sacred Harmonic Society's Concerts during the ensuing season? Will the above-mentioned singers appear in Italian Opera in London before next season? Hermine.

[To the first question—not knowing, can't say; to the second—we hope, yes; to the third—we believe, no.—Ed.]

BRESLAU.—Herr de Ahna, the violinist from Coburg, has been playing compositions of Ernst and Bassini with success. He has produced a favourable impression. The operetta of Fortunio's Lied is the principal attraction, for the moment, at the theatre.

COLOGNE.—The Gürzenich concerts began on the 22nd ult. with Haydn's Creation. Mad. Rübsamen-Veith, from Cassel, Herr Schneider, from Wiesbaden, and Herr Becker, from Mannheim, were engaged to sing the solos.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

DIRECTOR — MR. S. ARTHUR CHAPPELL.

IN announcing that the Fourth Season of the Monday Popular Concerts (established Feb. 7th, 1859) will commence on the evening of Monday, Nov. 18th, the Director has again to tender his thanks for the liberal and unremitting support with which his undertaking has been honoured, and again respectfully to solicit its continuance.

The plan upon which the Monday Popular Concerts were instituted, and their form and character as musical entertainments, are now so widely known, that it is unnecessary to add anything to the explanations already published. It was originally intended, in 1859, to give six performances, and to repeat the experiment, should it turn out successful, from year to year. So warm and unanimous, however, was the response to this first appeal—an appeal based no less upon a faith in the ability of the general public to appreciate than in the power of genuine music to attract and charm—that during the first season the proposed six concerts were increased to eleven, during the second to twenty-seven, and during the third to twenty-four. The programmes of these sixty-two concerts (to which must be added eleven, held in Liverpool, Newcastle, Edinburgh, and Glasgow) have included nearly all the trios, quartets, quintets, and double quartets of Mozart, Beethoven, Spohr and Mendelssohn, many quartets by Haydn, Dussek, Cherubini, Schubert, Spohr, E. J. Loder, A. Mellon, &c., the most celebrated sonatas and other compositions for pianoforte, solo or concerted, by Mozart, Beethoven, Weelli, Steibelt, Dussek, Clementi, Pinto, Hummel, Weber, Schubert Mendelssohn, Sterndale Bennett, Macfarren, &c., and several of the harpsichord works of Handel, Scarlatti, and Sebastian Bach, together with a large number of songs, duets, and other vocal pieces from the ancient and modern schools of Italy, Germany, France, and England. As executants, in every department, the most eminent artists have been provided, and engagements contracted with renowned performers abroad as well as at home. A constant attendance at St. James's Hall, throughout a series of Monday Popular Concerts, was, therefore, equivalent to a varied course of lectures on the chamber-music of the great masters, with practical illustrations by the first professors of the day.

In the forthcoming series, while many of those pieces, vocal and instrumental, which have met with the greatest amount of favour will, from time to time, as a matter of expediency, be repeated, a fair proportion of novelty will help to strengthen the attractions and enrich the repertory of the Monday Popular Concerts. The programme of the first (sixty-third) concert, as may be seen by the subjoined, combines a due admixture of both elements:—

PART I.

Quartet, in A minor, for two violins, tenor, and violoncello ... MENDELSSOHN.
(First time at the Monday Popular Concerts)
Song, "Now Phœbus sinketh in the west" (Comus) ... ... ARNE.
Song, "Se il padre perdei" (Idomeneo) ... ... MOZART.
Sonata, in E flat, Op. 7 ... ... BEETHOVEN.

PART II.

Sonata, in G, Op. 62, for pianoforte and violin ... ... DUSSEK.
Song, "The three ages of love" ... ... E. J. LODER.
Song, "Zuleika" ... ... MENDELSSOHN.
Quartet, in F major, No. 48, for two violins, tenor and violoncello ... ... HAYDN.
(First time at the Monday Popular Concerts)

 First violin—M. VIEUXTEMPS. Second violin—Herr RIES. Viola—Mr. WEBB. Violoncello—M. PAQUE.
Pianist—Mr. CHARLES HALLÉ.
Vocalists—Mlle. FLORENCE LANCIA and Mr. WINN.
Conductor—Mr. BENEDICT.

The quartets are now heard for the first time at St. James's Hall, and consequently for the first time at these concerts. That of Mendelssohn belongs to the astonishingly fertile period of his early youth which gave birth to the quartet in E flat (op. 12), the quintet in A, and the octet in E flat (all of which have been given more than once at the Monday Popular Concerts), and immediately preceded the overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the first published orchestral symphony (in C minor) and the first pianoforte concerto. Like the earlier quartet in E flat, it contains a quaint middle-movement—this time not "canzonetta," as in the other, but "intermezzo"—in which one of the most individual phases of Mendelssohn's genius is vividly predicted. Among the eighty-two string quartets of Haydn, all that need be said here of the one in F major, is what has been said so often of so many of its companions—"that it is one of the very best and most genial of the numerous family." Beethoven's sonata in E flat, for pianoforte alone—a bright example of his early genius—will doubtless be recognized by a large part of the audience as an old and valued acquaintance; Dussek's in G, for pianoforte and violin (the fellow of the one in B flat, which has taken such a stand at the Monday Popular Concerts), as a more recent one, losing nothing by closer familiarity. This sonata was first performed by Miss Arabella Goddard and M. Wieniawski, at the twenty-third concert of the third season, July 1st, 1861; and, as it possesses the same genuine and brilliant qualities as its better-known companion, promises, like that companion, to win back all the popularity in the present day which it can hardly fail to have enjoyed in the zenith of its composer's fame. The vocal music must speak for itself.

The reception accorded last season to M. Vieuxtemps justified the Director in offering that distinguished violinist a fresh engagement, which he has accepted. M. Vieuxtemps will lead the five concerts preceding Christmas. At the second (Nov. 25th), Signor Piatti, and at the fourth (Dec. 9th), Miss Arabella Goddard, will respectively make their first appearances.

 In the course of the ensuing series of concerts, the whole of the Posthumous Quartets and last pianoforte sonatas of Beethoven will be given; besides some revivals from Dussek and other great pianoforte composers; a trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, by Auber (composer of Masaniello); and vocal pieces by Italian, French, German, and English composers of the last and beginning of the present century.

The Musical World.

LONDON: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1861.

IN a musical sense the season of the New Exhibition promises to be more interesting and more important than that of the old Exhibition. Everybody believes beforehand that the year of grace 1862 will eclipse that of 1851 in all that relates to the glorification and furtherance of Music. The notes of preparation already sounded seem like flourishes that directly herald such a result. The great Handel Commemoration of 1851 at the Crystal Palace, with large reinforcements in the band and chorus, and with serious modifications and improvements in the construction of the orchestra, will be repeated, and will constitute the special feature of the season. Even now the Festival is announced, and the sixteen hundred amateurs that make up the metropolitan contingent of the choir have been summoned by Mr. Costa to Exeter Hall for preliminary rehearsals. The success of the Handel Commemoration in the Great Exhibition Year was not likely to be overlooked by the general manager, Mr. Robert Bowley, who is so keenly alive to the interests of the Crystal Palace, and who never loses an opportunity of turning chances to the best account. That the performances this year will surpass those of 1851 we have every reason to expect. From the increase of the choral and orchestral forces a vast deal may not be anticipated. In the disposition of the orchestra and the prevention of the sound from being lost in the surrounding aisles much may be effected. At present the addition of numbers to the singers and players will but lead to confusion and tumult. What should be done we cannot advise, but that something must be done to keep the sound within a certain area, and render it audible in more than one position we feel convinced.

What is intended to constitute the particular musical feature in the new building at Kensington Gore has not transpired, beyond the performances of the new pieces written expressly for the inauguration by Auber, Meyerbeer, and Sterndale Bennett. If nothing else, however, be presented, no small interest will attach to the execution of these original works by such eminent composers.

Of the Italian Theatres almost all is yet surmise. That Her Majesty's Theatre will open for the season we have no doubt, but whether under the management of Mr. Lumley or some other impresario we cannot say. Should this time-honoured establishment unclose its doors, not only will several of the recognised stars of Italian song shine conspicuously — among whom we need hardly name Mlle.

Titiens and Signor Giuglini — but a new artist, of the highest talent, histrionic and vocal, is expected to appear in the person of Madame Galetti, about whom Italian journals and Italian audiences are extremely enthusiastic. Madame Galetti is described as a singer of the Pasta school, with a powerful mezzo-soprano voice and great tragic powers — just such an artist, in fact, as is wanted in the present day. At the Royal Italian Opera unusual interest attaches to the rumour — well founded, we believe — of the engagement of Sophie Cruvelli (Madame la Baronne Vigier), who has yielded to Mr. Gye's entreaties to leave for awhile her domestic retirement, and will appear in several of those parts which she may be said to have made her own some years since; such as Fidelio, Elvira in Ernani, Abigail in Nabucco, &c. &c.

The prospectus of Mr. Henry Leslie's choir, just issued, contains some interesting particulars. The performances will take place in the Hanover Square Rooms, a site which, for many reasons, we consider better adapted to the celebrated choir than St. James's Hall. Several novelties will be produced, among which we may mention Handel's Chandos Anthem, "The Lord is my light," which has not been executed in public since 1786, when it was given at the Ancient Concerts, and Sebastian Bach's motett for double choir, "I wrestle and pray." On the whole, Mr. Henry Leslie seems determined to keep pace with the exigencies of the time and the occasion, and we have little doubt that the performances of the choir will, as they have done for several years past, be reckoned among the most striking and finished musical achievements of the season.

Some talk there is of Drury-Lane being opened with English Opera, and even with Italian Opera. Mr. E.T. Smith, we understand, has made an offer to Miss Louisa Pyne to appear in a series of operas during the season. If Miss Pyne does not accept, he may be driven to Italy for his musical company. One thing is certain; Mr. Smith will not be idle in so tempting and exhilirating a juncture. as the Exhibition year.

The Monday Popular Concerts, which commence the winter season on Monday week, will, we have no doubt, be extended farther than last year into the summer. The performances of these admirably conducted concerts, with their rich and rare variety of music of the highest order, cannot fail to create a greater interest than ever, and, indeed, as they are entitled to do, divide attention with the choicest and most recherché entertainments provided elsewhere.

To conclude for the present,—we have advanced enough to prove that the forthcoming season is full of promise, and that the musical art, if not directly represented at the Great Exhibition, is likely to uphold its prestige and its pre-eminence, in spite of the fact of its being all but ignored by the Committee of the New Palace. Let music not despair because circumstances are adverse and directors are ignorant. Magna est musica et prevalebit!

IT is scarcely forty years since, even among musicians whose position demanded that they should be thoroughly educated in their art, anything like an intimate acquaintance with the works of Sebastian Bach was a fact of uncommon occurrence. To many the old master was known by name alone. Only a very few persons were acquainted with certain of his productions, and even those persons not unfrequently attached nothing more than a historical value to what he had written. The majority of German musicians had almost entirely forgotten one of their greatest and most important masters, without ranging themselves more particularly under the banners of any more modern composer.* Let it not be said that Beethoven became, immediately afte Sebastian Bach, the popular hero of the period. Although, even during his lifetime, he had no lack of admirers and sincere followers, there were many, on the other hand, who could not reconcile themselves to the eccentricities and oddities which marked the last period of Beethoven's productive activity. Those who, for such reasons, did not then worship him, inclined as a rule much more to Haydn and Mozart than to the old "Cantor" of the Thomaskirche at Leipsic, whose long-tailed periwig, strange to say, was, in the eyes of many, the image of his "rococo-music." It is true that, by musicians who, in their day, really understood Haydn and Mozart, the influence exercised upon the writings of the latter by Sebastian Bach was not ignored. It is also well known that, in the course of their education, Haydn and Mozart were made acquainted with Sebastian Bach's compositions, although it cannot be denied each of these masters pursued a path of his own, and only now and then walked a short distance with old Sebastian. Beethoven† is, in our opinion, more nearly allied than his predecessors to Bach, although, in virtue of his creative powers, he asserted his freedom from any authority, recognising it only when it in no ways impeded the lofty flight of his fancy and his invariably genial aspirations. To this we attribute the fact that even Beethoven did not effect as much for the full and universal appreciation of Bach's works as he might, and that in his time there were many who did not feel inclined to accord the great contrapuntist and church composer that rank to which he had a just claim. Hence an intimate acquaintance with Bach's works was still rare in Beethoven's time, and hence at that period we actually find Bach's disciples only among musicians scattered here and there as organists and directors of Singacademies, or such as had been fortunate enough to know some of Bach's own pupils, and by them have been inspired with a taste for his music.

Things looked decidedly better when Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy appeared upon the scene. With him a new era commenced for the Bach-school. Excited thereto by his master, Zelter, he became more intimately acquainted than any other composer of modern times with Bach's works. Even when only twelve years of age, endowed with a truly miraculous power of reproducing the longest and most complicated compositions, Mendelssohn would play any fugue of Bach from memory. His love and partiality for Bach increased to such a degree, as he attained the ages of boyhood and manhood, that he felt it incumbent on him to use his great official influence, in various ways, for the Bach-school of music. Who is not acquainted with his efforts to procure a worthy performance in public of some of Bach's previously unknown compositions? Was it not Mendelssohn, also, who erected, in honour of the old master, at Leipzig—the principal scene of Bach's labours—a monument, thus giving his veneration material consistency? And is not the early death of this gifted master all the more to be deplored, inasmuch as, had the period of his labours been prolonged, he would have exerted himself still more to promote the study of Bach? But let us cease regretting;—even in this respect the labours of Mendelssohn brought forth a splendid harvest. While it is now almost universally acknowledged as absolutely indispensable that every thoroughly educated musician should be acquainted with Sebastian Bach, and have studied the inmost meaning of his compositions, no musical school of any importance neglects the great fugue-writer, and no Singacademie omits to perform his works,—nay, several have, during the last forty or fifty years, produced them very often, and thus facilitated the appreciation of his worth by the professional and non-professional public in an equal degree.

* Thibaut, in his work, On Purity in Music (page 9), says—"Thus our so-called virtuosos, musical directors, and teachers, steal carefully away from what is old, and endeavour, by every means, to bring into disrepute the endless musical treasures of which we can boast, and they succeed only too well." At page 34 of the same work we read, "There is not the slightest chance for church music so long as we are compelled to admit that organists, such as our Apel, Ett, Rink, Umbreit, are to be regarded as rare phenomena. To what have our organists reduced us? To nothing more or less than this: that every half-judge of music but too frequently leaves the church, thoroughly disgusted at the musical trifling and bad taste of what he has heard." A similar opinion was pronounced at the same epoch by Carl Maria von Weber. At p. 70, vol. III. of his posthumous works he utters the following complaint: "The art of performing Sebastian Bach's compositions effectively, is, probably, altogether lost, since the enjoyment to be thence derived does not lie on the surface, while, on account of the richness of the harmonic structure, the external melodic contour does not stand out with that prominence which our vitiated ear requires."

† It was more especially at Vienna, in Van Swieten's house, that Beethoven became acquainted with Sebastian Bach's works. The music played was almost exclusively that of Handel, Sebastian Bach, and the great Italian masters, up to Palestrina, Beethoven seldom missing a performance. The company frequently kept on playing far into the night; and there is a story current that old Van Swieten would very often not allow young Beethoven, whom he had taken under his especial protection, to leave the house until, in addition to everything else, he had played him some half-dozen fugues by Sebastian as "an evening blessing," or parting benediction.

In the first rank of the institutions which can boast of having promoted and spread a love and knowledge of Bach's music, stand the Singacademie of Berlin, and that at Breslau, under the direction of Mosewius *; Stern's Verein, at Berlin; Riedel's, at Leipsic, &c. Connected with the foregoing are, also, those musical associations which perform exclusively Bach's music (like the Bach-Verein, founded at Vierling's suggestion, and conducted under his management, in Berlin and Frankfort-on-the-Oder), or disseminate better editions of his works, like the Bach-Society in Leipsic, the object of which is eventually to publish a complete edition of all that has proceeded from the old master's pen. While mentioning what has been done, in recent times, to diffuse a feeling of appreciation for his music, we must not forget the very great services rendered by the most celebrated teachers of musical composition. Thus, thanks to all these combined efforts, such a pitch has been attained, that the number of musicians who can appreciate and perform satisfactorily Bach's works is becoming greater every year; a result, by the way, in which the music-schools founded, during the last thirty years, at all the principal centres of musical intelligence (such as Berlin, Leipsic, Vienna, Cologne, Dresden, London, and even Paris), have had their share. In all probability, Weber would no longer, at the present day, give utterance to the complaint, that the art of performing Bach's compositions effectively was lost, since first-class organists now enable us to hear his most difficult works for the organ, rendered in a style which cannot leave a doubt on our minds that the performer thoroughly understands them;—nay, even first-class violin-players already take a pride in studying his violin sonatas, which, difficult as the latter are, they not unfrequently master skilfully and happily. These are all convincing proofs that the old master is beginning to make his way, and that, in many circles, musical taste is not at such a low ebb as several persons have thought themselves called upon to assert. In conclusion, we cannot help expressing a wish that Sebastian Bach may some day find a biographer who shall, as Otto Jahn has done in his biography of Mozart, critically sift the materials at his disposal, and fashion them into an artistic whole. Forkel's book on the Life, Art, and Productions of Sebastian Bach, although a valuable addition to the literature of the period at which it was written, will not do for the present age. The great activity recently manifested in this department, more especially, of musical literature, induces us to indulge in the hope that we shall not have to wait much longer for a comprehensive work on Sebastian Bach and his productions. For many musicians such a book has become a pressing necessity.

A. T.

* Mosewius occupies a very high place among those who exerted themselves to spread a taste for Bach's music. He founded the Breslau Singacademie, where he produced many of Bach's works, and, both by tongue and pen, has greatly extended the comprehension of them.

MR. F. SCOTSON CLARKE is, we are given to understand, engaged upon the composition of an opera, the libretto of which is from the pen of a well-known and popular writer. It is not impossible that the opera, if completed, may be produced at one of the principal metropolitan theatres early in the season. Mr. Scotson Clarke, who, as a pianist and composer, has obtained a considerable share of publicity, is also a diligent professor of the organ, for which he writes and upon which he plays with equal readiness.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—The first of a series of vocal and instrumental performances, in which the musical frequenters of the Crystal Palace during the winter months have found such varied and healthy enjoyment, took place on Saturday afternoon—Herr Auguste Manns conductor. These concerts have taken as firm a hold in their way as the Monday Popular Concerts in St. James's-hall, and upon equally solid and legitimate grounds. That they now form a conspicuous attraction among the many attractions of the unique building in which they are held is universally acknowledged; and that the eminent position they have attained in the estimation of all true amateurs as—bonâ fide "classical" performances, carried out in the same spirit of enterprise and good faith with which they were originally instituted—is mainly attributable to the untiring exertions of Herr Auguste Manns, who directs them with such energy and talent, will not less readily be admitted. Herr Manns, indeed, besides having gained a musical reputation for the Crystal Palace, has earned an honourable place for himself by the side of the few whose proceedings exercise any visible influence on the progress of the art in this country. His Saturday Winter Concerts have done already a world of good, and are likely to effect as much more. They are essentially "Philharmonic" in style and purport, like the time-honoured entertainments which next year are to celebrate their Jubilee in Hanover-square, or the famous subscription concerts at Leipsic, Paris, and Berlin; and, though the means of development are at present somewhat restricted, there is no reason whatever why they should not be gradually extended, until all the conditions of a philharmonic concert on a grand and comprehensive scale are realized. The symphony, in the hands of Herr Manns, has been the most effectual instrument of success. "The symphony, the whole symphony, and nothing but the symphony," is now, as it was from the first, his motto, and so long as he adheres to the policy it suggests his concerts must continue to increase in respect ability and importance; for, with the advantage accruing from the same body of players incessantly practising together under the same conductor, it is manifest that the execution of the great orchestral works must, year after year, gain something both in precision and refinement. The programme of Saturday's concert was on all points attractive, and in its prominent features uniformly consistent with the plan which has elicited the unqualified approval and sympathy of those who prefer good music to indifferent, and who condemn that which is bad, no matter under what pretext (commercial, or as with a cynical and unwarranted contempt for the great public, it is sometimes denominated, "conciliatory") it may be brought forward. If any composition by a great master could persuade the "masses" into the firm belief that an orchestral symphony effectively performed is the highest and purest source of musical enjoyment, it is undoubtedly Beethoven's No. 2 in D major—an inspiration from beginning to end, a sort of "last look" at all that had gone before, and a magnificent prophecy of the new ideal art-world which the unrivalled genius of its composer was destined to create. From this symphony to the overture, called La Chasse du jeune Henri, by Méhul—a composer who, while French, was too solid, conscientious and independent (like his contemporary, the "Italian Mozart," Cherubini) to win the favour of Napoleon I. in art, very frequently prone to despise what he was incapable of understanding,—although the respective dates of their production were not very far apart, it was almost equivalent to travelling backwards half a century, so much was Germany at this particular period in advance of France as a musically productive nation. Nevertheless, this hunting overture of Méhul (whose Adrienne and other operatic preludes are well worth the attention of Herr Manns) is a masterpiece in its way — full of spirit, bright in colouring, and rich in melodic invention. Of the romantic overture to Weber's Oberon (like Beethoven's symphony and Méhul's overture, in the key of D major) nothing need be said; while of the so-called Jubel overture, by M. Flotow, which came at the end of the concert, nothing could easily be said that would be worth discussion. Suffice it that the band, directed by Herr Manns, maintained its well-earned reputation in all four pieces, and played so well as to afford promise of a rich and varied feast of orchestral harmony for the winter season.

The singers were Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington—who, besides a somewhat hackneyed air by Haydn, introduced a new song, à la valse, the composition of Herr Manns, which she gave with so much brilliancy that she was called upon to repeat it; Miss Susanna Cole—who in a cavatina by Rossini, and a ballad by Macfarren ("The beating of my own heart") showed herself a mistress of two very opposite schools, her proficiency in the last of which, to judge from the "encore" awarded by the audience, was most heartily appreciated; and Herr Reichardt, the German tenor, whose pure classical style and fervid expression—still remembered, in spite of two years' absence — were displayed with the utmost effect in an exquisite air from Handel's Acis and Galatea ("Love in her eyes sits playing"), and in a characteristic song from his own pen, entitled "Are they meant but to deceive me?"—which exhibited more than one touch worthy the composer of that deservedly popular romance, "Thou art so near and yet so far." Altogether the concert was thoroughly appreciated by an audience less numerous than would undoubtedly have been the case had the weather been more propitious.—Times.

Provincial.

About the miscellaneous concert which took place on Tuesday evening week we make a transcript from the Liverpool Mercury:—

"There was a larger attendance at the concert last evening, and particularly in the boxes and body of the hall. In addition to Mad. and Mr. Goldschmidt, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Sig. Belletti, as principals, there were included in that category Sig. Piatti, solo violoncello, and Mr. H. Blagrove, violin. Mad. Goldschmidt sang splendidly, and we may remark, that her reception was of a more enthusiastic character than on Monday, and there was a greater evidence of appreciation of her powers. Her first essay was in the scena from Der Freischütz, and she gave it with enchanting pathos and expression. In Mozart's ronda, "Il Re pastore," she had ample opportunity for the display of her execution, of which she availed herself to the admiration of the audience. The well-known 'Bird Song,' and the 'Swedish Echo Song,' both of which may be said to be essentially her own, were executed with brilliancy of style and peculiar effects that reminded us more than anything she sang of the palmy days of Jenny Lind. Each was rapturously applauded; and at the close of the 'Echo Song,' there was almost an ovation by orchestra and audience, who rose en masse and cheered her, which she acknowledged by waving her adieu. One of the best features of the concert was the duet from Lucia, sung by her and Mr. Sims Reeves. The same remark will apply to the trio 'Fia gratia al ciel,' from Fidelio. Mr. Sims Reeves sang even better than he did in The Creation. He gave Molique's beautiful song, "When the moon is brightly shining," splendidly, and was encored, with which demand he for once condescended to comply, and was absolutely cheered as he returned to the orchestra. Sig. Belletti shared largely in the honours of the evening. His rendering of the air 'Bravo, bravo, il mio Belcore,' from L'Elisir d'Amore, was a most finished vocal effort, and the pure style in which he executed the florid passages, stamped him as an artist of the first rank. The song was re-given. Sig. Piatti's performance consisted of two fantasias, in which he displayed marvellous execution, and great purity and delicacy of tone. In Beethoven's Choral Fantasia the vocal portion was not characterised by sufficient steadiness. The chorus sang Mendelssohn's part song, "Praise of Spring," well, with the exception of the trebles being a little flat; but in Mr. Goldschmidt's 'Summer evening,' there were several hitches, and the piece is of too classical a style to be appreciated by a general audience. The overtures to Oberon and Figaro were creditably given by the band."

The Shrewsbury Philharmonic Society inaugurated its eleventh season on Monday, the 21st ult., as we learn from Eddowes's Journal:—

"The Shrewsbury Philharmonic Society inaugurated their eleventh season by one of the most brilliant concerts they have ever given. At intervals of years we have had the immortals Lind, Piccolomini, Sophie Cruvelli, Grisi, Novello, Alboni, and Castellan, as the attractions of the inaugural concert of the society, but never has a greater success been achieved by the society or by the artist than was witnessed by the audience on Monday night, when the appearance of Mlle. Patti on the orchestra was the signal for one of the most enthusiastic ovations which we ever remember to have witnessed. The little prima donna's first piece was the duet with Mr. Weiss, 'Dunque io son,' during the first bars of which she showed to the audience that they were listening to an artiste with prodigious vocal facility, with an attaque unrivalled, a fioriture as faultless in conception as in execution, an enunciation as distinct as expressive, and a finish such as we have never before heard, not even in Persiana. Add to this a face in which the artiste shone forth radiant, an expression naïve and charming in the extreme, and a diminutive but elegant figure, and the effect which Mlle. Patti has caused upon the polished audiences of the metropolis or the less refined masses of our large manufacturing towns is at once and easily accounted for. In a word, the success was transcendent. Mr. Weiss—England's glory as a genuine bass—exerted himself prodigiously; in fact, he had the lion's share of the work. He sang, among a host of other things, his own song, 'We were boys together,' and supplemented the achievement by giving as an encore his 'Village Blacksmith.' We must not omit to say that Patti, by special request, sang 'Sweet Home,' a ditty which in even mediocre hands is charming. To Mr. Walter Hay and the committee of management the public are deeply indebted for one of the most splendid and intellectual entertainments musical annals can boast of."

A Correspondent from Hastings writes as follows:—

By what I gather from the natives of this place it appears that musical entertainments are not very well supported, and the indifferent attendance at Herr Liebich's soirée last week seems to warrant the assertion, the Music Hall being anything but well filled, despite the attractive names of Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Augusta Thomson, and Signor Piatti, being held out as an inducement. The latter artist being unfortunately unable to appear, and the want of adherence to the time announced for opening the doors, and commencing the performance (which seems so frequent a feature of provincial concerts), did not put the audience in a very good humour, although applause and encores were not wanting. A child three years of age, son of the concert-giver, who, I am given to understand, is a local professor, was set down for a pianoforte duet with his father. Knowing that your opinion coincides with my own, and the reflective portion of the public, on the subject of such precocious exhibitions I content myself with chronicling the fact.

If musical entertainments are not encouraged, performances, which can in no sense be said to be either musical or entertaining, seem to find their supporters; for from early morn to dewy eve (and a great deal later) open air concerts are rife, the materials and executants being many and various. Of course, there is the inevitable German brass-band, of some ten or a dozen individuals, with caps of a uniform pattern, and the equally inevitable band, brazen enough though it consist of but a clarionet and ophicleide, each asserting its independence by playing in a different key. Other minstrels are there, boasting of nothing uniform but their discord. An elderly Frenchman with only one arm, thrumming a cracked guitar, and with an equally cracked voice chanting a lugubrious ditty, to which an unfortunate dog grotesquely attired walketh about moodily on his hind legs; a family of Swiss, dressed in the conventional costume of their country, comprising father, mother, daughter and two sons playing, and very well too, upon instruments called by the paterfamilias, melophon, of which he styles himself professor and inventor, said melophon somewhat resembling in appearance an overgrown guitar with a huge protuberance where the strings are ordinarily placed, and the finger-board covered with an eruption of pimples, after the fashion of a concertina, the internal mechanism being worked by a handle moved saw-wise, backward and forward, by one hand, while the other hand produces the notes from the key-board. In addition to playing overtures, waltzes, &c., the mother and daughter sing songs in German and French patois. As a remarkable instance of what one has to submit to here I may mention, that one of the mixed bands the other evening favoured me with a set of quadrilles, of which the first figure was based upon "Beautiful Star," and the last compounded of "I wish I was with Nancy," and—Mendelssohn's Wedding March! After this you will not be surprised when I tell you that they played a most trivial waltz, which was solemnly ushered in by "See the conquering hero comes!" C.

We have abridged the following from the Brighton Herald:—

"The concert of Mr. and Mrs. Bond, at the Town Hall, on Monday evening, was attended by a numerous audience. M. and Mrs. Bond were assisted by Miss Leffler, Mr. H. Whitehouse, and Herr Pollitzer. The chief feature of the concert was the appearance of Mr. G. Herbert Bond, a son of the beneficiares, as a public singer. This gentleman has gained laurels elsewhere, but had not appeared in Brighton. He sang, 'If with all your hearts,' from Elijah, and 'Then you'll remember me,' both of which he executed in a style to prove him a very promising singer. He possesses a rich voice; his style and expression are pleasing; and he throws animation into his words. He was encored in both his solos. He also took part in two quartets, in a duet with Miss Leffler from Il Trovatore, and also with Mrs. Bond in 'Parigi, o cara,' from Traviata. Mrs. Bond's rendering of 'With verdure clad,' was all that could be desired. In the quartets and in the duets with her son, Mrs. Bond's voice was also heard to advantage. Miss Leffler's pleasing voice and easy style were suited to the air of 'O rest in the Lord,' from Elijah. This lady also sang Wallace's 'Gentle Troubadour' in a charming manner. Mr. H. Whitehouse sang Callcott's 'Last Man,' and Leslie's 'Speed on, my bark,' with considerable taste. Herr Pollitzer was warmly applauded for his execution of a fantasia on airs from Lucia di Lammermoor, his own composition. The first part of the concert was devoted to sacred and the second to secular music. It concluded with the Miserere scene from Trovatore, a party of local amateurs assisting in the chorus. The concert was skilfully conducted by Mr. Bond, who also played a pianoforte solo. The concluding recital of Mr. Kuhe took place at the Pavilion on Wednesday afternoon. The compositions were Beethoven's andante in F; Heller's improvisata, 'On song's bright pinions;' Weber's Rondo brilliant; two compositions of Moscheles; a selection from Mendelssohn's 'Songs without words;' an impromptu (in A flat) and a valse (in E flat) by Chopin; and a fantasia, on Mosé in Egitto, by Thalberg. To this wide range of musical illustration Herr Kuhe added a study of his own composition, called 'Silberstrahlen' (silvery-shower), which will, without doubt, become a general favourite. Where all was distinguished by skill and taste, it is difficult to mark a preference; but the andante in F, the 'Silberstrahlen,' and the compositions of Chopin struck us as best. The vocal services of Signora Badia, who made her first appearance this season, were fully appreciated; her style of singing the national songs of Italy is full of grace and spirit.

Our MANCHESTER correspondent informs us that at Mr. Charles Hallé's second concert, Handel's Judas Maccabeus was given. The performance is criticised by the Manchester Guardian as below:—

"The following artistes were engaged:—Miss Banks, Miss Palmer, Miss Armstrong, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Thomas, with a newly-organised chorus of 200, composed of Manchester professionals and a body of amateurs, the united body taking the designation of 'Mr. Hallé's Choir.' If Judas may be accepted as a sample of their ability, the talented maestro is at the head of a choral body upon which he may safely rely in the production of his choral concerts (of which the one last night was the first of eight); the performance of the choruses of Judas, and two or three of them are of a character to try the best-trained chorus, showing not only accurate knowledge of what was wanted, but also power to accomplish it. The opening chorus of lamentation, the heroic response to 'Arm, arm ye brave,' 'We come, we come,' and the curiously-mixed chorus 'Hear us, O Lord,' at the close of the first part, in which supplication and firm resolve alternate with each other, and the response to 'Sound an alarm,' 'We hear the pleasing dreadful call,' were all given with energy and effect. The band was thoroughly up to the mark in the accompaniments, and Mr. Walker rendered efficient aid on the organ. Miss Banks in 'Pious Orgies,' 'O Liberty,' and 'Ah, wretched Israel,' was everything that could be desired; her beautiful voice, skilful vocalisation, and expression combining to make them pleasing and interesting in the highest degree; at the same time it was impossible not to feel that her powers were altogether inadequate to express the burst of exultation embodied in 'From mighty kings,' or the bounding joy of 'So shall the lute.' Miss Palmer had not much to do, but that little was well done, indicating a great advance since last we heard her. This advance is especially observable in her elocution, which is clear and emphatic. As examples we may point to the two recitatives 'O Judas, O my brethren,' and 'Down with the polluted altars.' Miss Armstrong rendered efficient service in the ducts and in the trio, 'See the conquering hero comes,'—the chorus of which we may state in passing was enthusiastically re-demanded and repeated. Mr. Thomas, in the air, 'The Lord worketh wonders,' was vigorous and effective. Mr. Sims Reeves was in excellent voice, and sung with more than his ordinary power. His first air, 'Call forth thy powers my soul and dare,' was given with much vigour and expression; so also was the second, 'How vain is man;' but his greatest effort, one in which he fairly outdid himself, was 'Sound an alarm.' The really splendid manner in which this song was given, called forth an amount of enthusiasm from the large audience rarely witnessed. It was in vain that the chorus endeavoured to make themselves heard in the succeeding chorus, 'We hear the pleasing dreadful call.' The audience would hear nothing but Mr. Reeves. The conductor made the signal to the chorus to stop, and the great tenor immediately gave the song again, with as much vigour and effect as before. This great song fairly belongs to him, there being no other tenor that can hope to rival him in singing it."

The third Concert seems to have been as well attended as either of its predecessors. The following is an extract from the report of the same contemporary:—

"Weber's overture to Euryanthe opened the concert. We could not detect one fault in its execution. Nor less creditable to the band was the dashing performance of the overture to Fra Diavolo, which opened the second part. Mozart's Jupiter symphony was the special work assigned to the orchestra. The whole performance, and especially the last movement, reflected great credit on the orchestra. In Berlioz's Ballet des Sylphes the determined encore was well deserved. To speak of Mr. Hallé as a pianist is to repeat oft told praises. This evening he seemed even more than to maintain his reputation. His execution of Mendelssohn's concerto in G minor was marked by a vigour and delicacy only equalled by his conception of the composer's meanings. Such an union between composer and player is as perfect as it is rare. The closing movement was a brilliant achievement. Countless melodies, like rays of light radiating from one common centre, flash and sparkle from the instrument — the eye pursues in a vain effort to overtake the flying fingers — now dashing down in cascades of sound, now like falling snow descending noiselessly on the keys. The two Morceaux, by Chopin and Heller, in the second part, were given in Mr. Hallé's most piquant manner, exhibiting unrivalled delicacy of touch — delicate even to dantiness. A perfect storm of applause, and a tumultuous encore resulted, in reply to which Mr. Hallé gave one of Mendelssohn's 'Songs without Words.'

"The vocal element at these orchestral concerts is not prominent. Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington's selections were favourably received. Her unusual facility in vocalising was exhibited in 'Variations,' by Adam, a French composer. Let us close with a warm compliment to M. Lavigne, for his brilliant and telling fantasia on the oboe. The airs from Traviata narrowly escaped an encore. Mendelssohn's March to Athalie, fitly closed this brilliant concert.

"At the next concert Beethoven's 'Pastoral Symphony' is to be given, and Mr. Hallé will perform Mendelssohn's 'Rondo-Brillante,' in B minor, and Thalberg's grand fantasia in 'Mose in Egitto.'"

PRAGUE.—The committee for building a new national theatre here, have come to the determination of commencing operations in the spring.

Berlin. — At the Italian Opera, a number of new-comers have been introduced as candidates for public favours during the last week. Among them may be mentioned Signora Rideri, who appeared as Norma, in scenes from Don Pasquale. The general opinion is that her voice is far too small and thin for the stage, but admirably adapted for the stage concert-room. Her bravura singing took the house by surprise. Another fair débutante was Signora Tiberini, who made her curtsey in Lucia di Lammermoor. Her style was much admired, particularly her execution of an introduced cadence in the mad scene, where she alternates with the flute. This was a masterpiece. Her voice itself, however, failed to give satisfaction. Signor Tiberini was not successful either as Edgardo or Count Almaviva. The popular favourite is Signora Trebelli, whom the local critics place in the same rank as Catalani, Pasta, Sontag, &c. — Herr Wachtel has left the theatre in the Friedrich-Wilhelmstadt, after fulfilling a most successful engagement, and Mlle. Augusta Qeisthardt has gone there to fill up the place he has left vacant. It is the intention of the gentleman to drop the German singer for awhile, and appear, in a day or two, as a full-blown Italian at the Victoria Theatre. The lady has captivated most hearts by her impersonation of Rosa in Fioravanti's opera Die Dorfsängerinn. She was effectively supported by Mlle. Härting, Herren Winkelmann Abich and the other members of the company. By the way I may mention that the members of the band and chorus serenaded Herr Wachtel, the other morning, at his hotel, as a mark of their appreciation of his kindness in suggesting and singing at a benefit got up for the band. — The Sisters Marchisio have left the Italian Company for the present and proceeded to Hanover and Magdeburg. They will, however, shortly return. — Spontini's widow, who is very advanced in age, and who resides in Paris, is now here. She came to be present at the representations of the opera of Nurmahal. Herr A. von Kontski, also, the pianist, from Wiesbaden is here. So much for the Past and Present. As far as the Future is concerned, you must know that the new season of the Singacademie will be inaugurated to-night, the 2nd inst., by a mass of J. S. Bach. The next works on the list for performance are Haydn's Creation, Blumner's Abraham (an oratorio) and Handel's Solomon. About the middle of this month, Herr Hans von Bülow will commence a series of concerts, at which he himself will, of course, metaphorically if not literally, play first fiddle. — From an occasional Correspondent.

Mayence.—An organ concert was lately given in the Stephanskirche, by Herr Lux, to an audience of at least 2000 persons. Herr Lux performed a prelude and fugue by Bach, a fugue of his own composition, and three fantasias also of his own composition, namely, one on a romance by the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha; one on the prayer from Der Freischütz, and one on "O Sanctissima." He was ably supported by the Verein für Kirchenmusik, who sang the "Ave Maria" of Arcudelt (died 1570), two songs from Schneider's Weltgericht, and Haydn's motet "Des Straubes eitle Sorgen."

ST. JAMES'S HALL—PRINCE GEORGE GALITZIN'S PROMENADE CONCERTS, commencing this evening at 8 o'clock. Band of eighty performers. Vocalist, Miss Augusta Thompson; Cornet-à-piston, Mr. Levy; Flute, Mr. S. Pratten.

The Programme will include — Overture, Ruy Blas, Mendelssohn; Song, "Could life's dark scene," from the new opera, Ruy Blas, Howard Glover — Miss Augusta Thompson; Herzen Waltz, Prince G. Galitzin; Waltz, Arditi—Miss Augusta Thompson; Russian quadrille, Galitzin. &c.

Admission: Promenade, 1s.; Balcony, 2s. 6d.; Reserved Stall, 5s.

MLLE. FLORENCE LANCIA'S

NEW SONG,

"A THOUSAND MILES FROM THEE,"

THE MUSIC COMPOSED EXPRESSLY FOR

MLLE. FLORENCE LANCIA,

BY

FRANK MORI.

Price 2s. 6d.

CHARLES MACKAY'S Poetry possesses a charm particularly acceptable to Composers. "A thousand miles from thee," is acknowledged to be one of his most elegant thoughts—

"Upon the wide, wide sea,
A thousand miles from thee,
I sit alone upon the deck
And dream of Love and Home;
And bless the steady gale,
That fills the spreading sail,
And the deep furrow of our keel
That curls the sea to foam.
For thought is fond and free,
Here on the wide, wide sea;
And travels faster than our ship,
A thousand miles to thee."

"Criticism owes a word of praise to Mr. Mori's graceful and very expressive ballad, 'A thousand miles from thee.' The composer has not, we think, appealed so successfully to the popular taste since he produced his 'Who shall be fairest?' which barrel-organs have rendered so familiar to the town."—Morning Post.

The Morning Chronicle, alluding to the same song, writes, "Mlle. Lancia gave Mr. Frank Mori's new and highly captivating ballad, 'A thousand miles from thee'—composed expressly for her—with a fervour of sentiment and refinement of expression which demonstrated that she sings from the heart."

MADAME LAURA BAXTER'S

NEW SONG,

"THE FAIRY'S WHISPER,"

THE MUSIC COMPOSED EXPRESSLY FOR

MADAME LAURA BAXTER,

BY

HENRY SMART,

Price 2s. 6d.

MR. DOUGLAS, the Author of the words, has elegantly told in verse the legend of "The Fairy's Whisper"—

"In a glen, far off and lonely,
Where the rose and violet wave;
Maidens, in the purple twilight,
Wander to the Fairy's Cave.
There they breathe their hearts' fond passion,
Which from other ears they keep;
And the fairies waft the secret
To the loved ones in their sleep."

"Madame Laura Baxter's fine voice was never better fitted to music than Mr. Henry Smart, in 'The Fairy's Whisper,' which we must say, en passant, is one of the most elegant ballads we have ever listened to. Madame Laura Baxter was enthusiastically and deservedly encored."—(From a notice of Mr. Alfred Mellon's Concerts at the Royal English Opera House.)

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

November 14.

A FRENCH musical critic of some note, who delivers himself in a contemporary on the subject of the revival of Alceste, has made some remarks which curiously coincide with those of your correspondent, published almost simultaneously. "It must be granted," he says—

"That to the national theatre of the opera it in right belongs to assume the part of conservator of great classical works. Like as the French theatre (Théâtre Français) a certain number of representations are allotted to the works of Corneille, Molière, Racine, Voltaire, even so the stage of the Imperial Academy of Music should be on certain evenings reserved for the old masters in that kind, for Rameau, Piccini, Glück, and Spontini. The subvention paid to the opera, as well as to the Français, imposes this office upon it as a duty; and in music as in literature our youth needs to be moulded by contact with consecrated masterpieces and with pure and primitive forms."

That, in point of fact, no state can be justified in subsidising a place of amusement on any other ground must be obvious, and equally so that the attainment of such an end deserves alike the consideration of all states — despotic or constitutional — but more the latter than the former, because with the latter the arts generally run greater risk of deterioration and even neglect, for reasons too abstruse to enter into at present. The French critic winds up his observations with this exordium, to which all who have considered the subject will append a mental "hear, hear!" "Away, then, with all petty considerations of receipts and subscriptions. The Opera will live whether or no, because it is a theatre as national as the Comédie Française itself. Who knows, moreover, whether the public may not acquire a taste for these retrospective performances? Orpheus is there to witness, if needful, that such a fact may be." If I quote a gentleman sagacious enough to have been writing down at the same moment thoughts almost identical with those which were occurring to my own mind on the same subject, it will, I doubt not, be attributed to egotism on my part by your candid readers, rather than the humble desire to seek corroboration for opinions which, being formed on many subjects in which I am not so well versed as I should wish, and often heartily expressed, do not inspire me with all the confidence I may seem to feel in them. Nevertheless, I will cite the same authority again, and this on a point which I have not yet noticed, nor, truth to confess, till just now thought of, but on which, nevertheless, I shall have something to say quite impromptu, and with all that freedom from bashful restraint proper to an "Our correspondent." He speaks of the comparative artlessness of melodic writing as exhibited in the works of Glück, compared to the present state of things. "Certes," he says, "melody has made an immense stride" (melody strident would be a good heraldic blason for some modern musicians), "since the day of the illustrious protégé of Marie Antoinette. She hath accustomed herself to walk straight" (straitened, haply), "to count her periods and her measures as verse counts its hemistiches. From the young girl she was of uncertain and hesitating gait, she hath now become a grown-up woman, endowed with every description of beauty, possessed of every seductive grace. But what a charm, what simple grandeur, existed in that very melodic irresoluteness, and how frequently, though the general colouring may pall in the comparison, to make up for it the expression is of double force." To these very judicious observations, I would add, that not only has melody grown up into a mature woman capable of walking straight and resolutely, but that she has used her power of resolute walking to diverge with shameless front from the path of continence and rectitude — has become, in too many instances, a reckless Traviata, whose dangerous blandishments have led, and are yet destined to lead, many an estimable youth irrecoverably astray. Who will reclaim her? If it be to be done, possibly holding the picture of her former innocent self constantly before her may have some beneficial effect. I don't think the Wagnerian process will do; for, hitherto his preaching to the poor misguided girl has simply tended to make an idiot of her, and sent her howling and gibbering through the wilderness.

Last week the Opera produced Guillaume Tell, to continue what are absurdly enough called the débuts of M. Faure. This term is applied indistinctly to a series of first appearances on any stage, to a series of first appearances on any particular stage, and to a series of first appearances after an absence, or at the commencement of a fresh season. I see no reason for using the word out of its original sense—a first appearance on any stage, or in a particular city where the artist was not previously known. These subsequent and extraneous applications of the term are only some of the multifarious and odious contrivances invented to swell the self-importance, — sufficiently boursoufflé — inflammatorily swollen as it is — of performers. But to return to M. Faure. Greatly as the sterling qualities of this artist are admired, as regards the bold clearness of his voice, and the finish of his style, he is blamed here, as I understand he was likewise in England during his late engagement at the Royal Italian Opera, for the disastrous excesses into which his ambition leads him, by prompting him to wander beyond the natural, or rather the well ascertained, compass of his voice, as well as to generally exaggerate its power. Bogs and quagmires lie in the way of such errant spirits, and when they fall into them sympathy is the last thing they meet with. On the whole, eminently fitted, as by his fine voice and finished execution, this artist is for the grand arena into which he has with justifiable, and it may be said, justified ambition, cast his gauntlet, he may yet cogently ask himself whether he has done wisely. We are no admirers of the satanic maxim, "Better to reign in hell than serve in heaven;" but a man may consider whether, for the sake of art, as well as for his own reputation, it were not better to remain in a humble sphere, and there set an example of comparatively absolute perfection, than to seek a wider and higher field, where, in order to assert and maintain his claim to be numbered in the list of first-class champions, he must resort to efforts which compromise that equilibrium of his powers and qualities, and mar the harmony of effect, without which there is no art high or low. Did the example of M. Roger serve for nothing, who returns, after years of doubtful combating under the heavy panoply of the Grand Opera, to wield the lighter accoutrements and weapons of the minor list, where he earned his knight's spurs, glad to find that—though he is short of his due complement of hands,—in his audience there is not one less to welcome back the truant, and weave again his laurel crown, somewhat the worse for wear. On Friday last the Trouvère was given, and that in the most satisfactory manner, which will occasion no surprise, when it is added that the cast of the four principal chrracters fell upon Mad. Tedesco, Mlle. Sax, and MM. Mideot and Bonnehée.

At the Italian Opera, Marta has given way, as she must be content to do in all respects and for all time, to Don Pasquale. This graceful offspring of a master, in his happiest and most graceful mood, lives in the memory of most of us, allied, as it seems, quite indissolubly, with the memories of Grisi, Lablache, Mario, Tamburini. But only works of an inferior stamp are completely dependent on the greatness of their interpreters, and such is not Don Pasquale. Mlle. Marie Battu and MM. Zucchini, Belart and Delle Sedie were barely up to the mark, yet the music they had to sing floated them merrily along like so many quite golden fruit of the Hesperides. Of Signor Delle Sedie it must be said that he would have far outshone his companions, but that his music was too low for his voice. By marvellous tact and skill he surmounted the difficulty. No doubt when he is more firmly established in the public favour, following the example of other great artists, he will economise his pains and transpose the score. By the way a very just estimate of this singer's merits has appeared in the Moniteur. It is signed M. de Rouvray, a name which by the initiated is pronounced as if it were written Fiorentino. The Moniteur alone is privileged to act on the principle of "what's in a name?" The laws which Napoleon III. makes he disdains to set the example of observing. But as M. Fiorentino is waiting to say his say, je lui cède la parole:—

"An artist of such excellence that not from Italy come many like him, and out of France none at all, the débutant appears to us to have been trained up in that grand and admirable school which disdains to sacrifice expression, style and taste to effects of coarse reverberation of sound or goat-like vibrations to feats of strength and evolutions of the throat. He knows what he is saying, a rare matter! He is gifted with common sense, an extraordinary merit! His phrasing is correct, the production of tone pure and natural; his diction of irreproachable purity, and his accents never jar against each other; his action, measured and sober, accompanies and sustains his singing; he has the air neither of begging for "bravos" nor of challenging the spectator.

No doubt his is not one of those prodigious voices which, by their beauty, their freshness, their timbre, relieve the artist fortunate enough to possess such a one from all further trouble. Each of his victories is the result of searching study and consummate art; he leaves nothing to chance; always master of himself he restrains his emotion within due bounds, equally aloof from either of the two extremes into which the majority of artists are betrayed,—icy coldness or headlong bursts and convulsions of fiery zeal. He never confounds one style with another; dramatic and touching in serious music, playful, light and supple in the buffo style, he assigns to each phrase its proper colouring and value. Lastly, all his pieces do not finish off with the same point d'orgue; he has a choice of cadences remarkable for their variety and freshness, perfectly adapting themselves to the air to which they form as it were a brilliant peroration and a bright crown. The sensation produced by so rare a subject, and one so completely in contact with the common run of singers, may be easily conceived. Delle Sedie, was extremely applauded, adopted by unanimous consent as one of the most valuable acquisitions of the Théâtre Italien."

The following letter from Meyerbeer to the celebrated French critic, Jules Janin, has appeared in the papers here, and may prove interesting to your readers:—

"Your last letter was directed to me at Kœnigsberg while I was still in Berlin, where I am working like a youth, notwithstanding the three score and ten years kindly allotted me erewhile by people whose liberality seemed to me to be without limits. As it is not till the 18th of this month that I am expected at Kœnigsberg, where I am to organise the grand Court concert, I have time to answer you, and I shall tell you at once how astonished I was at the little sympathy and forwardness (empressement) which the name of Rameau has elicited among you; he was, nevertheless, one of the glories of your Opera; one of your masters in the art of music; he afforded you a relief from Lulli and prepared the way for the advent of the chevalier Glück.

"Thus his family had every right in the world to meet in Paris itself with that assistance and support which have not been refused on several repeated occasions to the descendants of Racine, to the grand daughters of the great Corneille. To a certainty, had I been in Paris, I should have incognito paid 200 francs for my stall, and I rely on your kindness to forward that sum to those good people who must be so unhappy at finding themselves deceived in expectations so justly founded. I send you at the same time a written authority for M. Gazot, the author's agent, by which I renounce all my dues for the fragments of my operas played on the benefit night of the illustrious and unfortunate family of Rameau.

"Why are you not at Kœnigsberg for the day of the coronation? Why are you not even simply at Berlin? What splendid musical festivals are in preparation! As for me it is my pleasure as well as my duty in the office I hold to compose the Grand March which will be executed at Kœnigsberg at the moment when the royal cortège proceeds from the castle to the church for the coronation. I intend in addition to write a hymn, which is to be executed on the day of the King's, our sire's, return into his good city of Berlin. Add to this that I have promised to compose an overture for the grand concert of the four nations which the London Exhibition is to give next spring in the Crystal Palace at the opening of the Great Exhibition.

"This is what detains me here, what has occupied me this autumn, and will occupy me this winter and the beginning of next spring; but, my dear friend, if God will grant us to live, we shall meet again, I hope, next year, relieved of all anxiety in that hospitable city, that gentle Spa, all resonant with the plash of fountains and the murmurs of green oaks. — Your affectionate MEYERBEER."

If post boys never die, no more do sirens, being of no mortal clay compact; but the difference is this, that whereas the one grows older and more tiresome every year, the other sings as freshly and sweetly year after year as when first encountered by that musical Ulysses Auber, as anybody may bear witness if they will visit the Opéra Comique, where Roger is now calling himself Marco Tempesta, and Mlle. Marimon goes for the nonce by the name of Zerlina, and few have ever more gracefully justified their claim to be so identified. To this artist we would also address the same remonstrance as to M. Faure, to rest satisfied with the possibilities of her voice, and not to seek to do things which are not within its limits.

Mad. Cabel is sufficiently recovered from her recent illness to resume her duties at the Théâtre Lyrique, consequently the long-promised revival of Jaguarita will now take place forthwith.

There has been nothing done worth recording in the theatrical world, save a new comedy in three acts, entitled Les Parens Terribles, by Mads. Belot and Journault at the Odéon. It is one of those attempts so fashionable now of placing before us the minute and absolute realities of life; but the result of the attempt is a caricature, rather than a faithful picture. There has also been a new vaudeville at the Variétés, in which the veteran Arnal has just made his re-appearance. It is called Les Voisins de Molinchart, and Arnal's part is said to be very good in it. The company of the Gymnase have been summoned to play at Compiègne.

I hear from St. Petersburg that the Italian company there, of whom Signors Tamberlik and Graziani and Mlle. Lagrua are the chief stars are meeting with the most brilliant success. When are you to hear the last-named much-talked-of prima donna? Has she made a vow never to visit London, as Mad. Goldschmidt is said to have done with respect to Paris? Or are her terms beyond the means of Mr. Gye, even assisted by the wealth of his repudiated partner, Colonel Knox? Why is this? I pause for a reply.

AIGRE DOUX.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—It is the intention of Herr August Buhl to give four concerts illustrating the history of pianoforte music, from the time of Scarlatti and Couperin to that of Beethoven, Chopin and Liszt.

ZURICH.—Herr Alfred Jaell is at present here. On leaving he will make a professional tour through Switzerland, and then, about January proceed to Northern Germany and give concerts in Berlin, Hamburg, Hanover, Dresden, Leipsic, &c.

MUNICH.—All the principal singers at the theatre are ill. In consequence of this the opera of Don Sebastian had to be postponed the other day. The members of the Musical Academy gave the first of a series of concerts on the 1st of November, at the Royal Odéon.

MUSIC IN BERLIN.

(From our own Correspondent.)

THE first public performance of Spontini's revived opera, Nurmahal, took place on the 25th ult., in the Royal Opera-house, after having previously been given on the 23d, in the presence of their Majesties, the King and Queen, and a select audience of reigning princes, ambassadors, diplomatists, extraordinary plenipotentiaries, and the host of chamberlains, equerries, et hoc genus omne, who, in greater or less numbers, are to be found at every German court. It would have been impossible to put the opera on the stage with greater splendour. O, shade of Farley, famous among stage-managers, and great in the getting-up of Easter-pieces, why wert thou not there! I ask the question, perhaps, unadvisedly. You may have been there, after all. Some one or other of your friends, given to spiritualism, may, peradventure, have rapped you to the gay gathering, or, if he has not already done so, he may still take a hint from this letter. Venerated spirit, I can assure you that Nurmahal, as a spectacle, is well worth looking at, with its cascades of real water, its splendid scenery, its astonishing changes, its marvellous electric-light effects, and its gorgeous processions. Everything is redolent of Eastern luxury and grandeur. Even Calcott or Beverley, Grieve or Telbin, might learn something from their German colleagues. It is, as every one admits, a great pity that the subject of the piece, which is an admirable one in itself, should have been so clumsily handled. As it is, it drags its slow length along in the most wearisome and uninteresting manner during three mortal acts. In this opera, as in many others which I could mention, the working out of the story and the development of the characters, which should be the first consideration, are degraded into matters of the most subordinate importance — if, indeed, they are looked upon as being of any importance at all — and sacrificed for mere show and glitter. The action is continually stopped to afford the stage manager an opportunity for showing off the legs of his ballet-girls to the best advantage, or for parading a more than usual number of the gentlemen called "supers" before the float. The consequence of this is that the attention of the public is not sufficient fixed by the various characters in whom no real interest is taken by any one. For these reasons, I think — and I am confirmed in my opinion by the sentiments I have heard expressed by many most competent judges, as well as by the published criticisms of some of the first critics here — that Nurmahal will not keep its place in the bills for any very long period, but soon be quietly consigned once more to obscurity. With regard to the music, it is no secret that even the most devoted friends of the composer confessed, in his life-time, that this was one of his weakest compositions. A writer of one of the principal musical periodicals published here observes that, in addition to its other defects, "the music is distinguished, from the beginning to the end, by a degree of excitement and an amount of eagerness to employ, whenever there is the slightest chance of doing so, the most unusual orchestral resources; that there is no end to the noise; and that the auditor involuntarily asks himself whether certain pieces were written by a master or a mere learner." With all this, however, we must not fail to acknowledge what is good. The ballet music, and choruses with ballet are, as a rule, treated with great grace and freshness. The whole of the finale of the second act, too, shows plainly the hand of an experienced master. The slumber-scenes, as they are called, in the third act, are exceedingly beautiful. The opera was well cast. Mlle. Lucca, as Nurmahal, sang and acted with great energy and excellence. Mad. Harriers imparted unexpected importance to the insignificant part of Zelia, just as Signor Tamberlik lends an importance, which it never possessed before his time, to the part of Pollio in Norma, or, to leave opera an instant for drama, just as Macready convinced every one who witnessed his impersonation of Friar Lawrence, that the latter was by far the finest character in Romeo and Juliet. Such is the power of real art. But the gem of the evening was, perhaps, Mlle. de Ahna's Namuna. Compared with this young lady's performance — a high standard, I grant — the efforts of the gentlemen were not first rate. Herr Woworski's voice is not equal to the music of Dschehangir. Herr Fricke displayed abundance of zeal as Bahar, but, unfortunately, did not invariably sing in tune, a defect which, as you must admit, does not produce a favourable impression in opera. Herr Betz, although possessing a fine voice, made nothing of the part of Atar. Herr Solomon, as Mullah, and Mlle. Münster, as the Genius, were satisfactory, which, by the way, is more than can be said of the chorus, who have many shortcomings to answer for. Herr Dorn is entitled to great praise for the manner in which he got up the opera.

It may, perhaps, interest you to know the cast of this work, when first produced at the Royal Opera-house in 1822. It is as follows: — Nurmahal, Mad. Seidler; Zelia, Mad. Schutz; Namuna, Mlle. Eunicke; Dschehangir, Herr Bader; Bahar, Herr Devrient; Atar, Herr Blume; and Mullah, Herr Hildebrand.

Meyerbeer's Huguenots was given a few nights ago, and, as usual, filled the house to overflowing. Pit, boxes, galleries, were all filled with delighted spectators, who expressed their satisfaction in the most unmistakable fashion. The performance was exceedingly good, every one concerned exerting himself to the utmost of his abilities. Mad. Köster and Herr Formes were grand as Valentine and Raoul, respectively, and achieved a tremendous triumph in the fourth act. They were called on, at its conclusion, three times, to such a pitch had they excited the enthusiasm of the audience. Mad. Harriers-Wippern was a highly pleasing, if not quite perfect, representative of Marguerite de Valois. This lady would do well to impart a little more vivacity to her acting. Mad. Bötticher was the page; Herr Fricke, Marcel; Herr Salomon, St. Bris; and Herr Betz, Nevers. The choruses and orchestra were admirable.

Mlle. Geisthardt is still "starring" at the Friedrich-Wilhelmstädtisches Theatre with great success. As I have before remarked—at least, I fancy I have—she possesses a strong, full, powerful, and pleasing voice, which she knows how to use to the best advantage. In my opinion she is one of the best German bravura singers of the present day. The next novelty at this theatre will be a comic opera, entitled Das Gespenst (The Ghost), composed by Herr Ad. L'Arrange, son of the manager of the Cologne theatre, where it has been already successfully performed.

The concert season will soon have commenced in earnest. Already are the walls decorated with posters, and the columns of the papers full of advertisements, announcing concerts of all kinds and descriptions.

According to report, the new Order of the Crown (Kronen-Order), of which, as you are, no doubt, aware, Meyerbeer has received the Commander's Cross, has been conferred on Herr von Herzberg, director of the Royal Dom Chor. Herr Anton Rubinstein has left for St. Petersburg. Signora Trebelli, I am very sorry to tell you, is ill, and, in consequence — as I am not sorry to tell you — Mlle. Barbara Marchisio has sustained the part of the heroine in La Cenerentola at the Royal Opera-house. By the way the Italian company at the Victoria theatre have commenced their season. I have not, as yet, had leisure to go and hear them, but will do so at the first opportunity, and let you know what I think of them. The following are engaged: Signore Artôt (for six weeks only), Cordier, Majo and Dori. Tenors: Signori Stechi-Botardi, Malgieri, Herr Wachtel. Baritone: Signor Merly. Basses: Signori Nanni, Odizeni; and bass-buffo, Signor Mazatti. Signor Bosoni is the musical director. The chorus, according to report, is doubled. I see it announced in the musical periodicals here that, in addition to Meyerbeer, Auber, and Verdi, Sterndale Bennett has been requested to write one of the pieces for the Grand Exhibition in London next year. Is this true, or is it merely a canard? I trust, for the sake of good music, and the lovers of good music, that, in this instance, report is correct.

I regret to say that, for the present, I have exhausted my budget of news; but, as I stated a few lines previously,

> The concerts are coming, oh dear and oh dear!
> The concerts are coming, oh dear!

and, when they have set in with regular winter severity, I shall send you more "copy" than you may perhaps choose to insert. En attendant,

VALE.

FRANZ LISZT has been in Paris. Very few have heard him play. He played at the Tuileries, at Count Walewski's, Mad. Erard's, Halévy's and Charles Gounod's. At the Tuileries the Empress asked for Chopin's "Funeral March," the favourite piece of her deceased sister, the Duchess of Alba. Liszt acceded to the request, when her Majesty's tears came thick and fast and she left the apartment overcome by emotion. At table the Emperor observed, incidentally: "It seems to me sometime that I have lived a hundred years." Whereupon Liszt quickly rejoined, "That does not astonish me, because — vous êtes le siècle." The Emperor forthwith decorated the smart pianist with the Cross of the Legion of Honour. Rossini is reported to have said: "Liszt dit toujours qu'il ne joue plus, moi je trouve qu'il joue trop." However as everything of this kind is attributed to Rossini, the authorship of the "bon mot" is doubtful.—("Fudge" from the fudging "Signale," edited by Mr. Mustard.)

KÖNIGSBERG.—In commemoration of the late coronation, the Sing-academie have had a grand concert at the new hall in the Börsengarten, where the entertainment given by the town took place. It is said that Herren Laule and Grimm intend giving concerts this winter.

STETTIN.—Herr Kossmaly's Symphony Concerts have commenced for the season; they have now been given for ten years, and afford the greatest delight to all lovers of high-class music. The royal coronation was celebrated at the theatre by a grand performance of Le Prophète.

LETTERS FROM AN AMERICAN IN LONDON.*

No. 7.

London, Aug. 3.

THE Opera of Covent Garden, after prolonging its season through a great many "extra nights," outlasting all the concerts for about a month, will close to-night with a performance of the Prophete, I am not dying to hear that again, and had rather let last evening's fresh impression be the last of my operatic memories in London. For then we had something worthy to conclude a "season;" something to remember the opera by so satisfactorily, that one cares not to have that memory overlaid by anything of Meyerbeer or Verdi. It was the opera of operas, the one which wears best with true music-lovers — and with no public more than with that of London—Don Giovanni. This shall be my last, as it had been my first, opera in London — the alpha and omega, and likewise the middle of my Covent Garden record. Eight times has Mozart's master work been given here since the commencement of the season, in the first week in April, and every time to crowded and enthusiastic audiences.

And such an audience is a sight to see! From the hospitable box in the corner by the stage your eye commands the whole; you look down on the brilliant rows of comfortable "pit stalls," guinea seats, all elegantly occupied, which take up the whole width and depth of the parterre, except a starveling segment in the very rear, where thirty or forty stall-less people can have "pit" pur et simple, the condensed quintessence of it, for seven shillings; a few feet higher, the enclosing circle of "pit boxes," nodding and smiling and fanning with beauty and with fashion; then, just below you, the "grand tier" of nobility, et cetera, a sacred circle, closed to the non-elect, a broad, bright zodiac that hoops the heavens round at mid height, beginning over the way there with the Royal box, which (to the credit of all concerned) is distinguished from the others only by its width, and not, as on the continent, by tawdry display of crowns and other gilding, to remind you that the house and the fulness thereof are the King's or the Grand Duke's; then lifting your eyes (or lorgnette) to their natural level, you may contemplate another circle of which you are a happy atom, called the "first circle" (of mere humans), and which vies in animated charms with either sphere or circle of the blest below, whether they be noble or be human: and then upward to another lustrous circle; and uppermost of all, most noteworthy of all, and most significant, a great space opening far back behind the sun (read chandelier), row rising behind row as far as glass can reach, all densely packed with heads, like seeds in the capsule of a sunflower, the "amphitheatre," where sit the people. There are the real lovers of Don Juan: these taste an immortality in Mozart's music; it hath a zest of present heaven for them, and causeth their faces to shine; there is more meaning than we think in the theatrical cant term "gods of the gallery." Not that other portions of the house were dull or inaccessible to Mozart, or that musical motives were not the ruling ones in more than one of the fashionable constellations hanging in those circles, but the focus of appreciative response and enjoyment was evidently up there among "the gods;" and it is a curious fact, and creditable to English musical taste, that on the Don Giovanni nights, the Tell nights, &c., the amphitheatre is always crowded, while the Traviata, Rigoletto, and that sort of thing, are taken under the more exclusive wing of rank and fashion which "subscribe" and call for such. A Don Giovanni night is emphatically a people's night. What I have chanced to witness has, I am told, been equally characteristic of the entire season; of the seventy-four performances, the eight of Don Giovanni, the nine of Guillaume Tell, the five or six of Il Barbiere have been those which have seen the amphitheatre and all the cheaper places the best filled. Of course the attraction of favourite singers—especially of the rising star, the "bright particular," young Adelina Patti, has also had its influence on the popular tide, apart from the intrinsic interest of the composer and the piece. But most preferred to hear and see this gifted maiden as Zerlina, as Rosina (in spite of some defects), or as Amina — in three operas whose charm as music never can wear out — to being made patient with the platitudes of Marta and La Traviata by the redeeming personality of such a pleasing little body. And who compose the crowd up there? Partly, largely no doubt, the Germans, who seem to be almost as numerous in London as in New York; for they have heard Mozart's great work more times in their life perhaps than any other class, and therefore love it better; but also a great many, a majority of English born. It is no mob, answering to the "ground-lings" of the theatres of old; they are well-dressed, respectable and polite people; the front rows indeed present a goodly show of elegance and beauty. There are three grades of seats there, at prices of 7*s.* 5*s.* and 2*s.* 6*d.*

The theatre itself is well suited to the display, as well as to the convenience, of such a brilliant audience. Although it is said to be architecturally inferior to the house that was burnt down and which it suddenly replaced, and although the auditorium has no peculiarly artistic aspect, yet it is spacious, elegant, light, cheerful, well ventilated and comfortable. The stage arrangements of course are on a very grand and complete scale, and vie with those of any other theatre in Europe.

And now for Don Giovanni. A magnificent orchestra, to begin with; and such a rendering of the overture, that no one could choose but listen and be penetrated, filled with the rich music and with unwillingness to lose a single note of what would follow. There is no orchestra in Europe more complete and choice in its material, or which gives out a more rich and beautiful ensemble of tone. The quality of the instruments, of the strings especially, is remarkably fine; every player is a virtuoso and happy in the possession of an instrument worthy of him, such as contributes a pure, warm, sympathetic tone to the euphonious whole. Such fine violas, cellos, double-basses, violins, taking the mass of them together, I think I have heard nowhere else, unless it were in Dresden, and there not so many of them. The average style of performance, too, at least in point of spirit, brilliancy, precision, power, richness of colouring, is not surpassed in Paris, Berlin, Dresden, or Vienna. The only fault is, that it rolls on in the glory of its full tide too triumphantly sometimes, and does not readily and instinctively subdue itself to the singer's voice. It is a brave orchestra, however, in the good senses of the word. And it has Michael Costa for conductor, who is a monarch in his way, and whose celebrity requires no justification. His air of quiet self-possession and authority, his ease and dignity of manner, albeit mingled with a little Neapolitan conceit, always give assurance. Although an Italian, long experience has made him cosmopolitan in music—has be not written an oratorio quite à la Mendelssohn? We have heard his tempi sometimes criticised; and so it has been with I dare say all conductors, not excepting Mendelssohn; and they do say that he is prone to hurry music which he does not like—a weakness which, considering how much trash he has at times to preside over, can be easily excused. The Verdi-ites, however, take it seriously. But, as the most nearly related sects in religion or politics quarrel the most sharply, so it is no wonder that South Italian and North Italian musicians do not belong to the same "mutual admiration society," and that Milan and Naples each regard the other as a Nazareth whence no musical good thing can come. But Costa not only possesses in himself the secret of musical expression, the true tradition of the Italian cantabile; he is a complete musician, and hence, on neutral ground, at least, in the great works of Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Mendelssohn, &c., you can rely on his intelligent and conscientious and even con amore rendering. And to this neutral ground belong also such works of universally acknowledged genius as Rossini's operas, for it is a cheering fact that, as far as regards real masterworks of genius, all controversy of "schools" is soon forgotten; it is only while the lesser deities reign, while second and third-rate composers occupy the stage, while Meyerbeer and Verdi, Donizetti and Flotow, and Auber and Balfe, &c., are in question, that we hear or care about the Italian and the German school, the new school and the old school, and what not. At all events, Don Juan is not an opera that would be likely to suffer under Costa's hands; it is a feast always for musicians like him and the members of his splendid orchestra; and doubtless every individual of those eighty or ninety knows every note of it by heart and could have played it through without a sheet before him. Of course the overture was played with unction. A good overture, as played by the Covent Garden orchestra is not a thing to go unheeded; it enforces attention; people cannot talk through it until the singers come.

And what a cast! In the ensemble, orchestra, chorus, stage effect, &c., the London opera may have competitors in other cities; but not in the principal singers; London wealth and musical ambition draw and keep here the greater number of the best. As Donna Anna we had Mad. Penco, a bright and spirited Italian woman, with considerable dignity of person, and face resembling Tedesco, only not so fleshy. She has a good rich, even quality of voice, and sings all in an artist-like and well-schooled manner; not a great singer, but one in whom such a part does not essentially suffer. Grisi took Donna Anna in a preceding performance, and, worn as her voice is, and obliged as she was to transpose some of the music, she was really superb in it. She will never come upon the stage here again to sing it less well, having at last really taken her farewell both at the Opera and at the Crystal Palace. The Elvira this time was indifferent: a young and pretty figure with a bright and pretty voice,—Mad. Ortolani-Tiberini. Mad. Csillag, her predecessor in this rôle, made, on the contrary, the most effective, finely conceived and ladylike Elvira I have ever seen upon the stage. Csillag has rather an unmanageable organ, and is hardly a finished singer; but there is soul and passion in her every tone, look and motion; an artist in a high poetic sense, who never fails to interest. But the chief delight and admiration of the audience was "little Patti," as the clever little witch and coquette of a peasant bride, Zerlina. And justly so. It was the most charming of all her charming impersonations; decidedly the most fascinating Zerlina, musically and dramatically, I have seen since Bosio. It would be folly to expect in her the perfect singer we have lost in Bosio; yet she sang all the music simply, with pure style and expression, and with most felicitous and characteristic touches. The voice, which we had feared was growing old too fast from too much work in public, and too little time for rest and private study, had a delicate, fresh bloom upon it, that was delightful. It was only once, I think, that she indulged in an unmeaning cadenza or "embellishment" on Mozart's perfect melody; and that, probably, was the fault of some adviser; she seldom deviates from good taste and artistic truth where she is allowed to go alone; her instinct seems unerring. In recitative, in the easy, conversational Italian parlando, she is singularly fine for such a child. Her acting of the part was full of life and nature, amusingly original, the by-play incessant, and helping out the significance of every scene in which she was on the stage. For instance, the wonder and delight with which she (and her Masetto with her) gazes round on the splendours of Don Juan's ball room, and the timidity with which she sinks into the luxury of one of those incredible chairs! Best of all, her exquisite coquetry in "Batti, Batti," with her offended simpleton of a bridegroom. Happy for her here to be so exquisitely mated! Happy for the public too! Is not that a nice cast indeed, in which the commonly considered small part of Masetto is given to no less an artist than Ronconi? In his hands it becomes really a great serio-comic part. His voice to be sure is passe, painfully "dilapidated" (to use a common figure of critics, who seem to suppose that voices are built up like stone walls, or put together like mosaics). But as a singer he is thoroughly an artist; and as an actor, especially in comdey, he is inimitable and irresistible, as full of the quick "heat lightning" of suggestion as if he were always improvising his part under a happy inspiration. Yet it may be a question whether he is not prone to run it into too broad farce. But he contrives to maintain his dignity with refined publics, and no one thinks of Ronconi as a buffoon. He has earned and is not likely to forfeit the character of artist, and is mentioned as among his peers with Mario and Tamberlik and Lablache, &c. Such an old Masetto and such a young Zerlina were natural provocatives of many happy, unexpected traits of naturalness and humour.

It would be superfluous labour for me here to enter into a detailed analysis of Patti's Zerlina, or of any of the parts, since the Journal of Music has no doubt copied some of the very just and graphic remarks of the Times and other London critics. A few words only of the other leading singers. The Don Giovanni was M. Faure, a refined, effective baritone, who always sings and acts well, and whose impersonation of that most difficult rôle has more life and gentlemanly ease, is more free from absurdity, vulgarity, overdoing or underdoing, than any one that I remember. Not a great singer, but a sterling and invaluable one for parts like Tell and Don Giovanni. The familiar figure of Carl Formes was the first to greet us when the curtain rose. His Leporello is after the common German fashion, capital in all the earlier scenes, but altogether too farcically grotesque in the last scene to comport with the sublime terrors of the supernatural visitation and the music. He sang as we have heard him "on the other side." The old commander, the Man of Marble, was most impressively represented by Signor Tagliafico, who seems to be clever in all sorts of parts suited to a baritone, or even ponderous basso. The Don Ottavio was Tamberlik,— next to Mario the greatest of all the Italian tenors I have heard; but very different from Mario. His chief power lies in strong, declamatory, impassioned, heroic parts; he is greatest in the Tell music, or as Jean of Leyden, in the Prophet. His voice is not as well preserved as Mario's, not as fresh and juicy, by no means as fine in its whole compass; but the tone is very resonant and marrowy and manly when he chooses, and he has the art to save his strength so as to strike with certainty in the important crisis. His "Il mio tesoro" was very admirable; but his best service was in the accompanied recitative dialogue, and in the interwoven ensembles, where his rich crisp tone always tells, and contributes its full worth to the harmony. He has a manly presence and a gentlemanly action. Such an Ottavio is not a nobody, and certainly Mozart has not given him the music of a nobody to sing.

The chorus, the mise en scène, ballet, and general treatment of the opera as a whole was splendidly complete, and worthy of such orchestra, such singers, such audience—and prices! I missed the usual inconsistencies and dead, unmeaning places in the action and stage presentation — usual, I mean, in America. The thing was a consistent whole; and more than ever did Don Giovanni seem to me the universal opera, typical of the whole story of human life. It has spun itself into altogether too long a story in this letter, so I must leave Guillaume Tell, the Barbière, &c., with a general summary, to another.

WESTBOURNE HALL, BAYSWATER.—The first of a series of six subscription concerts was given at the above new Music Hall on Wednesday evening, the 6th instant, by Mr. William Carter, a professor of the pianoforte. The programme was well devised and rich in matter—indeed too rich, we are inclined to think, for any but a strictly classical concert—comprising for the graver pieces, Mozart's quartet in G minor, No. 1, for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello; Beethoven's trio in E flat, Op. 1, for piano, violin, and violoncello; and the Moonlight Sonata of the same composer —enough in all conscience of instrumental music for one miscellaneous concert — together with a "Grand Duo" for piano and harp, by Herr Oberthur; two solos on the harp and two on the piano — more than enough in verity to weary the most rampant admirers of piano or harp, notwithstanding the excellent playing of Herr Oberthur and Mr. William Carter on their respective instruments. The vocal music commanded the services of Mlle. Florence Lancia, who sang the cavatina "Ah! fors 'e lui," from La Traviata, and Mr. Frank Mori's new and popular song, "A thousand miles from thee;" Mad. Weiss, who gave Mr. Hatton's "Her heart was in the song," besides taking part in duos, &c.; Mad. Laura Baxter, who introduced Mr. Balfe's ballad, "If I could change as others change," and the song of the goat-herd, from Dinorah; Mr. Weiss, who sang his own "Blacksmith" and Mr. Edward Loder's "Martin, the man at arms;" and Mr. William Evans, who sang, "My own, my guiding star," from Robin Hood. All was good, but decidedly best were Mlle. Lancia's two songs, which were vociferously applauded. Mad. Laura Baxter's songs, too, were honoured with emphatic demonstrations of approval. A strong word of commendation must suffice at present for the performance of the Herren Albert, Otto and Ferdinand Booth, very young artists, who play respectively on the violin, viola, and violoncello, and to Mr. Frank Mori for the admirable manner in which he accompanied the vocal music.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

DIRECTOR — MR. S. ARTHUR CHAPPELL.

IN announcing that the Fourth Season of the Monday Popular Concerts (established Feb. 7th, 1859) will commence on the evening of Monday, Nov. 18th, the Director has again to tender his thanks for the liberal and unremitting support with which his undertaking has been honoured, and again respectfully to solicit its continuance.

The plan upon which the Monday Popular Concerts were instituted, and their form and character as musical entertainments, are now so widely known, that it is unnecessary to add anything to the explanations already published. It was originally intended, in 1859, to give six performances, and to repeat the experiment, should it turn out successful, from year to year. So warm and unanimous, however, was the response to this first appeal—an appeal based no less upon a faith in the ability of the general public to appreciate than in the power of genuine music to attract and charm—that during the first season the proposed six concerts were increased to eleven, during the second to twenty-seven, and during the third to twenty-four. The programmes of these sixty-two concerts (to which must be added eleven, held in Liverpool, Newcastle, Edinburgh, and Glasgow) have included nearly all the trios, quartets, quintets, and double quartets of Mozart, Beethoven, Spohr and Mendelssohn, many quartets by Haydn, Dussek, Cherubini, Schubert, Spohr, E. J. Loder, A. Mellon, &c., the most celebrated sonatas and other compositions for pianoforte, solo or concerted, by Mozart, Beethoven, Woelfl, Steibelt, Dussek, Clementi, Pinto, Hummel, Weber, Schubert Mendelssohn, Sterndale Bennett, Macfarren, &c., and several of the harpsichord works of Handel, Scarlatti, and Sebastian Bach, together with a large number of songs, duets, and other vocal pieces from the ancient and modern schools of Italy, Germany, France, and England. As executants, in every department, the most eminent artists have been provided, and engagements contracted with renowned performers abroad as well as at home. A constant attendance at St. James's Hall, throughout a series of Monday Popular Concerts, was, therefore, equivalent to a varied course of lectures on the chamber-music of the great masters, with practical illustrations by the first professors of the day.

In the forthcoming series, while many of those pieces, vocal and instrumental, which have met with the greatest amount of favour will, from time to time, as a matter of expediency, be repeated, a fair proportion of novelty will help to strengthen the attractions and enrich the repertory of the Monday Popular Concerts. The programme of the first (sixty-third) concert, as may be seen by the subjoined, combines a due admixture of both elements:—

PART I.

Quartet, in A minor, for two violins, tenor, and violoncello ... (First time at the Monday Popular Concerts)	MENDELSSOHN.
Song, "Now Phœbus sinketh in the west" (Comus)	ARNE.
Song, "Se il padre perdei" (Idomeneo)	MOZART.
Sonata, in E flat, Op. 7	BEETHOVEN.

PART II.

Sonata, in G, Op. 62, for pianoforte and violin	DUSSEK.
Song, "The three ages of love"	E. J. LODER.
Song, "Zuleika"	MENDELSSOHN.
Quartet, in F major, No. 48, for two violins, tenor and violoncello ... ... (First time at the Monday Popular Concerts)	HAYDN.

 First violin—M. VIEUXTEMPS. Second violin—Herr RIES. Viola—Mr. WEBB. Violoncello—M. PAQUE.

Pianist—Mr. CHARLES HALLÉ.

Vocalists—Mlle. FLORENCE LANCIA and Mr. WINN.

Conductor—Mr. BENEDICT.

The quartets are now heard for the first time at St. James's Hall, and consequently for the first time at these concerts. That of Mendelssohn belongs to the astonishingly fertile period of his early youth which gave birth to the quartet in E flat (op. 12), the quintet in A, and the ottet in E flat (all of which have been given more than once at the Monday Popular Concerts), and immediately preceded the overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the first published orchestral symphony (in C minor) and the first pianoforte concerto. Like the earlier quartet in E flat, it contains a quaint middle-movement—this time not "canzonetta," as in the other, but "intermezzo"—in which one of the most individual phases of Mendelssohn's genius is vividly predicted. Among the eighty-two string quartets of Haydn, all that need be said here of the one in F major, is what has been said so often of so many of its companions—"that it is one of the very best and most genial of the numerous family." Beethoven's sonata in E flat, for pianoforte alone—a bright example of his early genius—will doubtless be recognized by a large part of the audience as an old and valued acquaintance: Dussek's in G, for pianoforte and violin (the fellow of the one in B flat, which has taken such a stand at the Monday Popular Concerts), as a more recent one, losing nothing by closer familiarity. This sonata was first performed by Miss Arabella Goddard and M. Wieniawski, at the twenty-third concert of the third season, July 1st, 1861; and, as it possesses the same genuine and brilliant qualities as its better-known companion, promises, like that companion, to win back all the popularity in the present day which it can hardly fail to have enjoyed in the zenith of its composer's fame. The vocal music must speak for itself.

The reception accorded last season to M. Vieuxtemps justified the Director in offering that distinguished violinist a fresh engagement, which he has accepted. M. Vieuxtemps will lead the five concerts preceding Christmas. At the second (Nov. 25th), Signor Piatti, and at the fourth (Dec. 9th), Miss Arabella Goddard, will respectively make their first appearances.

 In the course of the ensuing series of concerts, the whole of the Posthumous Quartets and last pianoforte sonatas of Beethoven will be given; besides some revivals from Dussek and other great pianoforte composers; a trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, by Auber (composer of Masaniello); and vocal pieces by Italian, French, German, and English composers of the last and beginning of the present century.

The Musical World.

LONDON: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1861.

THE Royal Academy of Music has at last met with an antagonist. A new school has just been founded at St. James's Hall, under the title of "The London Academy of Music." The prospectus looks formidable and imposing. Dr. Henry Wylde is Principal; Herr Molique, Professor of Harmony and Composition; Sigs. Schira and Manuel Garcia are appointed heads of the Italian vocal classes; Herr Janza appears as teacher of the violin, M. Paque of the violoncello and Herr Oberthur of the harp; Sig. Maggioni is set down as instructor of the Italian language; and Mr. Ryder of the Princess's Theatre is engaged to give lessons in elocution. Other professors, in various branches, we are informed, are in contemplation; while a governor and superintendent for the ladies loom in perspective. The special object of the new Academy is to impart "a complete musical education to vocal and instrumental students, by means of the best London professors, on the moderate fees of the Continental institutions." This, although it might have been more euphoniously expressed, is sufficiently clear. The best musical instruction, at the cheapest charges, will, no doubt, prove a desideratum, cannot fail to excite attention, and must end in receiving universal support and patronage. The appointment of Dr. Wylde, as principal, or head of the Academy, is perfect guarantee that there will be no lack of energy in the management; while the engagement of Herr Molique, as Professor of Harmony and Composition, proves that the very highest talent in the most important department has been secured.

For further particulars we must refer those interested in the matter to the preliminary announcement which appeared in last week's advertisement, pending the issue of a complete prospectus which may be shortly expected. In the meanwhile we feel called upon to make a few remarks respecting the establishment of a school which aims at indoctrinating the youths and maidens of England in every branch of a musical education, and in competing with, if not endeavouring to supersede, a well-grounded and time-honoured institution, which has found favour in the highest quarter, and which has never wanted a helping hand from those who could best afford to give it.

We cannot pretend to throw dust in the eyes of our readers. They as well as ourselves know that the London Academy of Music has been started in direct opposition to the Royal Academy of Music—just as the New Philharmonic Concerts were intended to rival the Old Philharmonic Society. Dr. Wylde is the great musical reformer of the day, and no doubt thought that the old Conservatory in Tenterden Street was capable of being improved upon. So we think; but since reformation involves greater difficulty and more responsibility than conservation, it behoves the director of the New Academy to be heedful that he promises no more than he can carry out, and that the changes and innovations he contemplates on the old régime may be such as everybody can understand and appreciate. If better teaching be proffered at less charges in the London Academy, the inevitable result will be that the Royal Academy must succumb, in spite of prestige, and the power that years and acquaintance never fail to confer. If, on the other hand, the instructions indicate no improvement, and the terms are not more economic, the elder conservatory must triumph. In short, the amelioration must be obvious and positive to effect any good.

It seems somewhat strange that while, in the furnished programme of the new Academy two Italian singing-masters are named, no name of an English master appears. Is there any dearth of English vocal teachers in the metropolis? or is English singing at a discount? We could supply some half-a-dozen eminent names as a satisfactory answer to the former question; while the establishment of the Royal English Opera of late years and the rapid rise of Music Halls in all directions, if proof were wanted, would demonstrate that the national song is more in favour than ever. We must suppose, then, that the English vocal teachers are included in those "other professors in various branches," upon whom Dr. Wylde has not yet affixed the seal of his selection. In the prospectus of an English Academy, however, it would have read better had the Italian masters been overlooked.

To the Editor of the MUSICAL WORLD.

AT the *fêtes which formed part and followed the coronation, of the King of Prussia at Königsberg, music occupied a prominent position. This was as it ought to be, for to music belongs the task of rendering those sublime feelings which words are unable to express.

I must first speak of the Coronation March, the composition of which, at the express desire of the king, was confided to Meyerbeer. Let us transport ourselves for an instant to the scene of the solemnity—the vast courtyard of the palace of Königsberg, with its Venetian marts, dressed out in the colours of the various provinces of the kingdom, and distinguished by the grandiose flights of steps, at the top of which stood the throne. The people, the members of the different trades and professions, with their flags and emblems, and the soldiers drawn up on each side of the way from the covered gallery, and connecting the palace with the church, formed a crowd which filled every available nook and corner. In the church, a host of officials; the representatives of foreign powers; and the foreign princes with their suites, awaited the commencement of the ceremony. All of a sudden, the murmurs of this brilliant assemblage were drowned by the pealing of bells, and the cheers of the crowd collected outside. This was succeeded by silence both within and without, while the bands played the March, to the sounds of which the royal procession descended the flight of steps on its way to the church. Two military bands—infantry and cavalry—performed this work, worthy in every respect of so great an historical solemnity. The march resembles, as far as form is concerned, the "Fackeln-Märsche," from the same pen. It is composed of three themes, followed by as many trios. After, so to speak, haranguing each other, the two bands end by uniting in a most majestic crescendo, in which Neidhard's Hymn holds a prominent place. The finale is harmonised as admirably as the national hymn in the celebrated opera of Struensée. I cannot award a higher eulogium to this magnificent march than by saying that even the grandeur of the surrounding spectacle in no way diminished its effect. Severe indisposition had prevented the composer from going to Königsberg, but the king rewarded him in a fitting manner, by forwarding him the Cammander's Cross of the new Order of the Crown, founded on the occasion of the Coronation. The march was played the entire time the procession was proceeding from the palace to the church, as well as on its return.

For the ceremony in the church, the cathedral singers had been ordered to attend from Berlin. They were 80 in number; 25 sopranos, 25 altos, 10 tenors, and 10 basses. They had been provided with new costumes, consisting of red tunics and caps, edged with various silver braid. During the service, they sang Mendelssohn's setting of the 100th Psalm, the liturgy, with the melodies of the Greek church, choruses by Mendelssohn and Bortniansky, Jomelli's "Domine, salvum fac regem," and the psalmody. Everything was admirably executed.

The Königsberg fêtes were brought to a conclusion on the 19th, by a Court concert, given in the famous "Muscovite Stall" of the palace. The entertainment consisted exclusively of German music. The overture to Egmont, the triumphal choruses of Judas Maccabæus, Mozart's "Ave verum," the scene in the infernal regions from Glück's Orfeo, Meyerbeer's overture to Struensée, the chorus: "Voilà le Jour du Seigneur," by Conradin Kreutzer, Mendelssohn's march of the priests from Athalie, and, lastly, Handel's Coronation anthem, "Zadok the Priest," were included in the programme. In the place of Meyerbeer, Herr Taubech, conductor at the Royal Opera house, Berlin, conducted the concert, for which more than three thousand persons received invitations.

With regard to the fêtes at Berlin, I must direct attention, in a musical point of view, to the gala representation at the Opera house and the concert at Court. Nothing can be more splendid than the aspect of the Berlin Opera house. At the very first glance, the house strikes the visitor as if it had been built expressly for such royal fêtes. One hardly dares enter it clad in the usual modest costume of everyday life. On the evening in question, all the places had been taken by the King. No one was admitted unless invited by the Grand Chamberlain, and thus, for this once, the ladies could be admired in full ball costume, even in the highest places of the house. Spontini's Nurmahal was performed. There is nothing new to be said about this work, which is one of its composer's very best. The magnificence of the scenery and costumes was in keeping with the splendour of the Court and its guests.

It was Meyerbeer who conducted the concert given in the White Hall of the palace. The following was the programme:—

Festival Overture, by the Count von Redern; Fantasia on themes from Norma, by Thalberg, for two pianos, performed by Herren de Kontski and von Bülow; Coronation Hymn, by Meyerbeer; Cavatina from Mercadante's Giuramento, sung by Signora Trebelli; duet from Rossini's

Semiramide, sung by the sisters Marchisio; Scherzo for orchestra from Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream; and finale of the third act of Ernani, sung by Signore Marchisio, Brunetti, Signori Pancani, Montanari, Squarcia and Agnesi.

It is superfluous to state that the honours of the evening were lavished upon Meyerbeer's hymn. This new composition is conceived in a majestic and solemn style. The words are by Dr. Köster, who is, as you are aware, one of the best modern German poets. The hymn commences with a chorus of maidens and youths, which precedes a recitative for the tenor. This is followed by a sextet for three male and three female voices. The last morceau, one of the most successful in the whole work, is distinguished by its suave and graceful melodies, as well as by the ingenious combination of six voices. Then comes a piece perfectly novel in its form, and for which we cannot hit upon any title altogether exact. We have the eight provinces of the Prussian monarchy, each, in a solo recitative, offering its homage to the King, while the orchestra accompanies them with a march, which seems to indicate their triumphal entry into the Royal capital. The morceau goes on continually crescendo, until after the words of the eighth province, the chorus, representing the people, bursts out into a song of joy. At the same time we hear, in the distance, a second chorus chanting the hymn of "God save the king,"* while the orchestra continues to play the march which has accompanied the recitatives. Thus three themes are at last united in a most grandiose and moving ensemble. The presence of their Majesties, of course, prevented the audience from displaying their enthusiasm. During the interval between the first and second part of the concert, however, the King, going up to Meyerbeer, shook hands with him warmly, and assured him he had never experienced deeper emotion than while listening to this patriotic composition. I have been assured that the Queen had deigned to be present at the rehearsal in the morning, and had spoken to the composer, in the most flattering terms, about his work and his health. I must add that the hymn was admirably sung by Mesdames Köster, Jachmann-Wagner, Böttcher, Herren Formes, Kruger and Fricke.

I have already informed you that the King bestowed a fresh mark of his favour on Meyerbeer by sending him the Commander's Cross of the new Order of the Royal Crown.

THE REV. R. R. CHOPE, B.A., formerly of Upton Scudamore, Warminster, has been appointed curate of Brompton, London.

ROYAL ENGLISH OPERA.—Robin Hood and Lurline have been decided "hits," and Madame Guarabella, in the heroine of the former, has achieved an inimitable success. Of both performances and of the fair debutante's claims to popular favour, we are prevented from saying more this week, but shall speak at length in our next impression. We may state just now, however, that Mr. Howard Glover's Ruy Blas will be performed—revived immediately, and alternated with the operas of Messrs. Macfarren and Wallace.

MISS ARABELLA GODDARD—has returned from the continent. She was to perform last night at a concert given by Mrs. Martha Blundell, at Brighton.

MADAME LIND GOLDSCHMIDT.—"As a proof of the estimation which this distinguished vocalist holds," writes the Liverpool Albion, "the members of the Philharmonic Society of this town, we mention with pleasure that she has arranged to give them a private concert on the 10th of next month."

A YANKEE PRIMA DONNA.—A Miss Kellog is highly spoken of by the American papers as an operatic singer, whose performances in New York have caused considerable attention. This young artist, we hear it rumoured, is in treaty with Mr. Gye for an appearance at Covent Garden next summer.

* Or, rather: "Heil dir im Siegerkranz."

MAD. GRISI'S FAREWELL TOUR.

THE operas in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, went off with great éclat. Whether from some misapprehension on the part of the public, the attendance at the first performance was not so great as might have been reasonably expected. When, however, it became generally known that the operas were given with the scenic appliances and effects incidental to a dramatic representation, and that the ensemble was more perfect than had perhaps ever before been heard in Manchester, public curiosity was excited, and the Hall was crowded upon the second and third nights. Lucrezia Borgia was the opera announced for Friday, Nov. 8th. The Free Trade Hall has long been noted for its fine resonance, and it was more than usually evident in this instance by the power and purity of tone exhibited, not only by Mad. Grisi but by the rest of the vocalists engaged. Mad. Grisi's singing of certain portions of "Come è bello" was as fine as ever, and she was greatly applauded. In the great scene with the Duke and Gennaro, the trio was beautifully given, and the acting, not only of herself, but of her companions, very fine, calling down enthusiastic applause, which did not cease until they reappeared before the curtain. In the last scene, where Gennaro dies, and she throws herself in despair upon the body, there was not the mere conventional stage trick but one of the purest touches of nature. At the conclusion, she was called before the curtain, amidst great applause and cheers from the audience. Mr. Swift made his first appearance in Manchester on this occasion. His manly figure, voice pure in tone and fine in compass, took the audience by surprise. We rarely remember a vocalist making a more decided impression on a first appearance. Such a tenor, comparatively unknown, was not expected, and we are sure he will become a great favourite in Manchester. His "Di pescatore" was sung not only with good taste but with feeling also, and his singing in the concerted music was altogether musicianlike. Signor Cresci was the Duke, and possesses a really noble face and voice, and sings with fine expression. He was much applauded throughout the performance. We must not overlook Mad. Lemaire, who, as Orsini, sang and played as a true artist. Her singing of the celebrated Brindisi, "Il segreto," met with a storm of applause, and was most warmly encored. She forms a most valuable portion of the company. The orchestra consisted of nearly thirty performers, including a portion from the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, at the head of whom is the talented violinist, Mr. Carrodus; and the whole admirably conducted by Signor Vianesi. From first to last during the performance there was not a single blunder, which, considering the difficulties of the situation, is most creditable. We think there would be few present who did not consider the experiment a successful one. Of the performance on Saturday, 9th, the Examiner and Times, Manchester paper, speaks in the following terms:—

"Instead of a complete work, we had on Saturday selections from various operas, including Don Giovanni, La Sonnambula, Il Trovatore, and Il Barbiere di Siviglia, which drew a large attendance, evidently gratified by the performance throughout. Mad. Grisi had less opportunity for the display of her peculiar artistic qualities than in the Lucrezia or the Norma (the latter of which is to be given this evening); but whatever she attempts is always accomplished with the evidence of the highest skill. The scene in Don Giovanni where Donna Anna describes the brutality of the libertine, and the beautiful 'Miserere' scene from Trovatore, were remarkable for their dramatic effect. This latter scene was rapturously encored, the compliment being deservedly shared by Mr. Swift, whose singing of the air 'Ah! che la morte,' proved not only a fine quality of voice, but good taste and feeling. Under judicious management, Mr. Swift has evidently a fortunate career before him. Signor Ciampi and Signor Cresci are both vocalists and actors of no ordinary merit, and whether in Leporello and the Don, or in the Dottor Bartolo and Figaro, they exhibited considerable appreciation of character and high musical attainments. The aria of Bartolo has not often been given more effectively than by Signor Ciampi, whilst the 'Dunque io son,' by Signor Cresci and Mad. Lemaire, it would be difficult to improve, whether as regards vocalisation or dramatic power. Indeed Mad. Lemaire has given evidence on this occasion of remarkable ability. She was the true peasant in Don Giovanni, the lively coquette in Rosina, and all that could be desired in Orsini, which she played with more than usual energy on the previous evening. There is something very like genius in this lady, and she has secured a position in our musical city. The last scene of La Sonnambula introduced Mlle. Dario, a very young singer, who, we are informed, makes her début in this town. She is interesting in appearance, and has been judiciously instructed, overcoming by this means a certain want of power. Mlle. Dario sang the 'Ah! non credea' with a nice feeling, and showed also considerable facility in the execution of the brilliant finale, 'Ah! non giunge,' though we should have preferred a stricter adherence to Bellini. There is much promise in this young artist. We ought not to overlook the services of Signor Fallar, more particularly as Basilio, in which character he gave the celebrated 'Calunnia' very creditably. The band and chorus were quite up to their duties; and we heard but one opinion as to the general impression made by the performances throughout the evening. We deed scarcely name the importance of such a violinist as Mr. Carrodus, in the position of leader, nor the invaluable services as conductor of Signor Vianesi, who stands so high in the estimation of all musical men. With much individual talent, the most important feature in this troupe is its admirable combination, accompanied by an evident desire to work together with the true artistic spirit."

On Monday, 11th, Mad. Grisi took her farewell of the Manchester public in Norma. Though suffering from a cold, she refused to disappoint her many admirers, who had crowded the Free Trade Hall, and exerted herself to the utmost. For pathos and intense beauty of vocal declamation, she never excelled her delineation of the priestess in the last act; and when the curtain passed before the scene, by cheers and waving of hats and handkerchiefs, the audience demanded another sight of their long-established favourite. She was obliged to appear before the curtain twice, and each time received a perfect ovation. Mr. Swift assumed a part which the profession generally think most arduous, that of Pollio. He played with remarkable conscientiousness, and his voice resounded with that manly intonation which we have before noticed. His acting equalled his singing. By his acting each evening, Mr. Swift has taken a position in Manchester which, we feel confident, he will be able to maintain. Mad. Lemaire made an excellent Adelgisa. Her voice blended well with that of the prima donna in the duets; and throughout the opera she was effective in all she undertook. Signor Ciampi was a fine Oroveso, his deep bass voice being very telling. The chorus on each of the three evenings was superior to what might have been expected in an undertaking which, to a certain extent, was experimental. Of the band we must speak in the highest terms; and as warm must be our commendation of Signor Vianesi, the conductor. The opera went perfectly from beginning to end, and was the theme of praise with all the musical men present. Without any great attempt at scenic effect, the decorations of the stage in the several scenes were appropriate and efficient. From the extensive patronage with which this experiment has been met, we may anticipate that the future will not be without a repetition of such performances After the opera, Mlle. Dario appeared in the last act of La Sonnambula. At the close of the performance she was honoured with a call, no slight compliment in Manchester to so young an artist. The performances of the party during the past week will have been given in the following order:—

Monday, Nov. 11, Norma, and Sonnambula—Free Trade Hall, Manchester.
Tuesday, Nov. 12, Norma and Sonnambula—Theatre Royal, Preston.
Wednesday, Nov. 13, Lucrezia Borgia—Theatre Royal, Preston.
Thursday, Nov. 14, Don Giovanni—Theatre Royal, Liverpool.
Friday, Nov. 15, Trovatore—Theatre Royal, Liverpool.
Saturday, Nov. 16, Selections from Lucrezia Borgia, Sonnambula and Barbiere—Royal Amphitheatre, Liverpool.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—The first chamber concert for the winter season took place on Wednesday evening, the 6th inst., at the Academy, in Tenterden-street. These entertainments must not be confounded with the more ambitious orchestral morning concerts organised by the institution. The chamber concerts were only commenced in the term before last, but their success is already established, The crowded state of the rooms, indeed, cannot be taken as a criterion of their success, for they are so sadly limited in space, that they never afford sufficient accommodation for the numerous friends of the pupils who are anxious to test the improvement of their protégés. The rooms, indeed, which were sufficient for the requirements of the Academy at its origin, forty years ago, are now quite inadequate. The instrumental part of Wednesday night's programme comprised a quartet by Mozart, ous piano and strings, a MS. pianoforte duet by H. C. Bannister, another by Mr. Walter Macfarren, and a set of three charmingly graceful duets for violin and pianoforte concertante by Herr Molique — in which pieces Miss Brinsmead, Miss Augusta Ball, Miss Thomson, Mr. J. Hill, Mr. F. Westlake, Mr. Harper, and Mr. G. H. Thomas were all efficient, while Mad. de Grau distinguished herself in an effective allegro de concert by Charles Mayer. Miss Robertine Henderson, the reigning prima donna of the Academy pupils, was deservedly encored in a graceful MS. "gondoliera" by Herr Pauer; and Miss Westbrook sang with unimpeachable expression another new setting, and a very elegant one, of Mr. Monckton Milne's favourite ballad, "The beating of our own hearts," by Mr. Bradbury Turner, the able and industrious conductor of these chamber concerts. Miss Armytage rendered Agatha's romance, "Einst traumte," from Der Freischutz, exceedingly well; nor were Miss Bramley's singing of Edward Loder's "Invocation to the Deep," and Miss Walsh's ballad, "The Mother's Grief," of her own composition, undeserving of praise. The duet, "O lady moon," given by Miss Robinson and Mr. Wallace Wells, was scarcely adapted to test their ensemble singing, the voices being so little combined; but in all the choruses selected the general proficiency of the pupils and their careful training were abundantly proved. In the characteristic ballad from Robin Hood—"The hunters wake," very well sung by Miss Frewitt, and cordially encored, the quaint choral burden was given with capital effect.

Provincial.

A Correspondent writes from Nottingham as follows:—

"The fifth season of chamber concerts was opened on Friday, the 8th inst. with the subjoined programme. The instrumental pieces were executed with great vigour and precision, and proved the careful study bestowed upon them by the executants. By way of experiment, vocal music will be introduced during the present season, and promises to be an attractive feature. The audience, although not numerous, comprised all the devotees to music of a high order. The programme was as subjoined:—Part I.: 'Trio, in E flat,' for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, Messrs. White, H. Farmer, and T. L. Selby, Hummel; Four-part Song, 'Autumn Song,' Mendelssohn. Part II. 'Duo, in E flat,' for violin and piano, Messrs. H. Farmer and White, Marschner; Four-part Song, 'The Vale of Rest,' Mendelssohn. Part III. 'Quartet in E flat,' for two violins, tenor, and violoncello, Messrs. H. Farmer, Kirkby, Myers, and T. L. Selby, Spohr.

We read in the Western Daily Mercury (Plymouth) the subjoined:—

"There was a good house last night to witness the performance of Faust and Marguerite, and the curtain fell amidst the unbounded applause of the audience. Between the pieces Miss Kate Ranoe sang her well-known song, 'Crabbed Age,' with the flute obbligato, most beautifully. Her warbling at the end of the song vied in sweetness with the charming delicacy of the flute which accompanied her, and her well sustained and sweetly prolonged trills drew down enthusiastic applause. A ballet divertissement entitled La Danse des Nations followed, and we had some remarkably pretty dancing — Scotch, Spanish, a Polka Militaire, a double hornpipe, by Mlle. Louisa Lauri and Mr. John Lauri, and a splendid finale,—all excellent in its way, and especially that of the two last named. The Bonnie Fish Wife, a capital afterpiece, brought the entertainments to a close."

A Belfast paper has the following:—

"Yesterday a large number of ladies and gentlemen, and several professors of music in Belfast, assembled at St. Malachy's Church to hear a selection of music played by the organist, R. Sutton Swaby, Esq.—The organ is by Telford, has three sets of manuals, and a pedal organ. The selection was as follows:—1. Offertoire (No. 5), (Lefebure Weby); 2. Slow Movement (Haydn); 3. Andante (Beethoven); 4. Toccata and Fugue (D Minor), (Bach); 5. Overture (Athaliah), Handel; 6. Romance (Mozart); 7. Fugue ("The Giant"), (Bach); 8. Sancta Maria and Marcha Religioso (Meyerbeer). Each of the foregoing pieces was played beautifully; and the contrasts of the soft and loud stops were classically marked. Bach's Fugue in D Minor was executed without a fault. The audience were highly pleased with the music, and Mr. Swaby was warmly complimented by his numerous friends."

The Rochester, Chatham and Stroud Gazette gives us particulars about the fifth annual Concert of Herr Kappey, the Bandmaster of the Royal Marines, given on Wednesday week at the Lecture Hall, Chatham:—

"The attendance was such," writes our contemporary, "as only entertainments like Herr Kappey's can produce. Mlle. Anna Whitty sang 'The Angels whisper,' which was encored. Mrs. Tennant too was encored in 'Within a mile of Edinboro' town.' Herr Formes caused a great sensation. His portly form, his flowing locks, his Teutonic features, and his magnificent voice, were all impressive and suggestive. Mr. Tennant has developed greater powers than he formerly displayed. M. Ole Bull and his violin seemed alike possessed with the spirit of fun. His variations in the 'Carnival of Venice' rivalled those of Paganini, and his personnel contributed highly to the effect. Mr. Berger, the pianist, played a composition of his own, 'Les echos de Londres,' with the greatest animation. But the most original feature of the entertainment was a new 'Potpourrie,' by Herr Kappey, in which, starting with 'Rule Britannia,' he introduced a selection of popular airs and glees, interspersed with vocal accompaniments. A choir sang with the band, 'The Red Cross Knight,' 'Here's a health to all good Lasses,' &c., with remarkable effect. The playing of the band in this piece and the opening overture was superb. The solos were given in excellent style, and a rapid passage for cornet and clarionet was beyond all praise. But the skill of the musician was best shown in the manner in which the several melodies were introduced and harmonized, and in the mode in which he gathered up the chords of the National Anthem and Rule Britannia, and wove them into a brilliant finale. The applause was unbounded; and well indeed was it deserved by a musician who embraces the most complete control over his forces. The band of the first Division of Royal Marines possesses a high character, and its continued efficiency is proved every day, and more publicly displayed every year at these annual Concerts."

From the Manchester Guardian we transcribe the annexed account of the fourth of Mr. Charles Hallé's Concert:—

"Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, which was the most prominent feature of the concert, from its picturesque beauty and rich variety, is pretty certain to charm an audience whether learned or unlearned in the art. The band brought out the various beauties of this fine composition most admirably. The performers fully understand one another, and play with great precision, power, and beauty of intonation. The wind instruments are especially excellent. The overtures to Semiramide, and (Rossini and Auber) Zanetta, and the March from Meyerbeer's Prophète, were all played in superb style. Mr. Hallé was, of course, thoroughly au fait in the pianoforte solos. Mendelssohn's Introduction and Rondo Brillante in B minor, a composition full of genius, was played with remarkable fire and spirit, the accompaniments imparting a beauty to it not found in Thalberg's solo, though this last (Mosè in Egitto) was received with great enthusiasm by the audience, and an attempt was made to get the accomplished pianist again to his seat, an honour he felt obliged to decline, owing to the lateness of the hour. The other instrumental solo of the evening, that of Mr. Lazarus (an air from the Puritani) was also a masterly performance, and elicited much applause. Mlle. Agnes Bury, the vocalist of the evening, will be recollected by many of our readers as forming part of a German Operatic Company which performed here a few years since. She returns now, however, with improved powers, and made a corresponding impression. She gave an air from Figaro 'Ernani involami,' and a song by Balfe, with great expression, delicacy, and finish. The last named elicited an encore, which was complied with as far as the repetition of the concluding portion of the air; while Lieder by Mendelssohn and Grell were both sung with feeling and taste."

The Jenny Lind Goldschmidt party has penetrated as far north as Newcastle, the local papers of which town give lengthy accounts of two concerts, the one consisting of an oratorio, the other miscellaneous, which took place on Thursday and Friday in last week. From the Northern Daily Express we extract the following:—

"We have heard of a Jenny Lind night at Exeter Hall, as being something of an extraordinary character, requiring almost superhuman strength to withstand, as something in fact with which was associated the idea of the compression of large bulk into a small amount of space. If such be the case, then certainly we can for the future boast of a Jenny Lind night in Newcastle. Long before the time for opening the doors of the New Town Hall, they were besieged by parties anxious—as, of course, everybody is anxious on such occasions—to secure a front seat. When the doors were opened there was a general rush for the much coveted place. The hall was rapidly filled, and never was enthusiasm more justly merited, or more cordially bestowed, than was accorded to the gifted cantatrice when she made her appearance on the platform, leaning on the arm of her husband, Mr. Otto Goldschmidt. The applause was loud and continued, in which the band and chorus took part, and for which she gracefully bowed her acknowledgments, first to her patrons, the audience, and then to the choir. Mr. Sims Reeves followed immediately after, and shared the delight with which the people of Newcastle, as there represented, welcomed the two greatest singers in the world. Never, perhaps, since the erection of the hall, has so large, influential, and enthusiastic an audience assembled within its walls. Every available nook and corner was filled, even to the very orchestra itself, the band and chorus on this occasion being unusually strong, and certainly a more pleasing and more imposing spectacle could scarcely be imagined.

"We question whether ever Madame Lind Goldschmidt rendered those passages of The Creation which fell to her share with greater effect and charm. Her execution of the air 'With verdure clad,' was sublime; and the plaintive sweetness with which she warbled the reference to the 'nightingale's' delightful notes affected many present to tears. In the 'Marvellous work,' there appeared a slight huskiness of voice and tremulousness of manner; but in 'On mighty pens,' she more than once brought out her exquisitely clear upper C with fine effect. At the end of the piece, where she took the concluding cadence an octave higher than written, the effect was electric, and the applause overwhelming, the band and chorus joining in most vociferously. Nor was she less successful in the concerted pieces, either as ducts or trios. As proof of this we may refer to the terzetto, 'Most beautiful appear,' the trios 'The Lord is great,' and 'On thee each living soul awaits;' and her duets with Signor Belletti in the third part, 'By thee with bliss,' 'O star the fairest,' and 'Graceful consort.' The earnest and devotional feeling imparted to these was perfection.

"Never was that prince of English tenors, Mr. Sims Reeves, in better voice. His rendering of the recitative and air, 'In native worth,' was chaste and finished, the difficult passages being given with an ease, grace, and precision which enraptured the audience, and produced a long and continued round of applause, which he gracefully acknowledged, but could not be drawn into repetition. In the concerted pieces both he and Signor Belletti shared the applause bestowed upon their performance.

"The band and chorus, stronger in point of numbers than any we have previously heard in oratorios here, had likewise the additional attraction of being thoroughly up in their respective parts. When we add that Mr. Rea presided at the organ, our readers will be of opinion that a more competent cast could scarcely have been employed upon the Creation than that of last night."

The Daily Chronicle and Northern Counties Advertiser furnishes an elaborate and interesting report of the miscellaneous concert, from which we can afford space for a very brief extract only:—

"The second evening of Mad. Lind Goldschmidt's reappearance in Newcastle Town Hall was not a whit less brilliant, in point of attendance, than was the first. Every part of the hall, with the exception, perhaps, of a few chance seats on the tiers of the orchestra, was closely packed, and packed, too, by a fashionable and critical auditory. Seldom, indeed, does the occasion occur when the wealth and beauty of the northern metropolis are so fully and fairly represented as on last evening. The programme for last evening, if of a less exalted cast, was of a considerably more varied character.

"PART I.—Motett, 'Ave Verum,' Mr. Rea's choir, Mozart; Duo (Elisa e Claudio), Mr. Sims Reeves and Signor Belletti, Mercadante; Scena ed Aria, 'Ma la sola,' Bellini; Violin Solo, on a Theme of Beethoven, Mr. H. Blagrove, De Beriot; Aria, 'Sorgete,' Signor Belletti, Rossini; Duo, Theme and Variations, pianoforte and violoncello, Messrs. Goldschmidt and Piatti, Mendelssohn; Duet 'Sulla tomba,' Mad. Goldschmidt and Mr. Sims Reeves, Donizetti.

"PART II.—Rondo, for voice and violin (Il re Pastore), Mad. Goldschmidt, violin Mr. H. Blagrove, Mozart; Ballad, 'My own, my Guiding Star,' Mr. Reeves, Macfarren; Fantasia on Themes from 'Linda di Chamouni,' violoncello, Signor Piatti, Piatti; Terzetto (Roberto Devereux), Mad. Goldschmidt, Mr. S. Reeves, and Signor Belletti, Donnizetti; Part-Song, 'The Healing Flower,' O Goldschmidt; Part-Song, 'On a Lake,' Mr. Rea's choir, Mendelssohn; Tarantella, 'La Danza,' Signor Belletti, Rossini; Ballad, 'John Anderson my Jo,' and Norwegian melody, 'Echo Song,' Mad. Goldschmidt.

"Mr. Rea's choir took a somewhat prominent part in the concert; and if on the score of appearance alone, the ladies and gentlemen of the choir are deserving of compliment. But they are equally entitled to commendation for their performances. Mozart's 'Ave Verum' was a tasteful performance. The appearance of Sims Reeves was the signal for a warm ovation, and as Signor Belletti was in admirable voice, their duet was sung by both artists in unexceptionable style. The aria selected for Madame Goldschmidt was admirably adapted for displaying to perfection her rare vocal qualities. After the violin solo by Mr. H. Blagrove, and the aria nobly sung by Signor Belletti, Messrs. O. Goldschmidt and Piatti performed a duet on the piano-forte and violoncello. The skilful fingering of Herr Goldschmidt was heard to the greatest advantage in this, as in the ordinary accompaniments to the vocal performances; while amateurs must have been delighted with the masterly manipulation of the violoncello by Piatti, and heard the dulcet notes that he produced from the instrument. If Madame Goldschmidt be accepted as the primary vocalist of the evening, Sims Reeves being of fame scarcely secondary, may fairly take the next rank; therefore the performance of a duet by these eminent artists was justly regarded as one of the most interesting items in the programme. Nor could expectation be raised too high for realisation in such a case; and it may suffice to say that part first of the concert was brought to a delightful conclusion by the harmony of soprano and tenor, each of too rare a quality to be frequently heard combined. Sims Reeves is now almost as strictly identified with Macfarren's Robin Hood, as is the Little John of tradition with the Robin Hood of Sherwood Forest; and the ballad of 'My Own, My Guiding Star' is inseparably associated with his name. This was sung in tones so refined, and with pathos so delicate, that the listener was for the time entranced and spell-bound by each succeeding note; and when, at the conclusion of the song, the charm was broken, there was such a unanimous demand for an encore, that the singer had really no alternative but to repeat the performance. The introduction of 'John Anderson my Joe' was a compliment to this north country; the latter reminded us of the home of Jenny Lind, the Swedish Nightingale. It was her concluding song at the Assembly Rooms in 1856, and now, as then, was, to our thinking, rather better expressed than it would have been by an accredited native of the land o' cakes. The 'Norwegian Echo Song' was given in the Norwegian dialect, and in this language of a country closely connected with her fatherland, Madame Lind Goldschmidt warbled the conluding notes of this her third concert in Newcastle."

The Athenæum Concert, given at Sheffield recently, is thus alluded to by the Sheffield Daily Telegraph:—

"There were two features worthy of special mention, the appearance of Mlle. Anna Whitty and M. Ole Bull, neither of whom have been heard in Sheffield. Mlle. Whitty's voice, which is of the soprano quality, is completely under control. Her style is easy and graceful. The Rondo of Paesiello, 'Nina pazze pen amore,' gave scope for the display of her leading characteristics. It was received with a determined encore. Her singing of 'Somebody is waiting for me,' was equally successful. Mrs. Tennant is a singer of established reputation, but was evidently labouring under hoarseness. Herr Formes, who, if we mistake not, appeared for the first time in Sheffield, made an immense impression. His voice is of surprising quality, and in the lowest notes is full and sonorous, and peculiarly effective in slow passages. He was vociferously encored in the ballad, 'In sheltered vale.' Mr. Tennant's songs were well received. Ole Bull we consider to be the greatest violin player the world has heard, save Paganini, and it is doubtful which of the two, if they could be heard together, would command the greatest admiration. His intonation in double stops, in which he executed a complete duet, embracing every shade of expression and nicety of tone; his double harmonics, which are in themselves a feat of execution, so true, so fine, so delicate; his dexterous fingering and the rapidity with which he executed the bizarre and extraordinary sounds of the 'Carnival,' as well as the majesty and dignity with which adagio movements flowed from his bow, all alike stamp him as the greatest maestro living. Those who have not heard Paganini or Ole Bull do not know of what the violin is capable. His rendering of the 'Mother's Prayer' was exquisite as an illustration of pathetic melody, while in 'Di tanti palpiti' he was equally happy in illustrating music of a more sprightly character. This was re-demanded, but the artist substituted a few bars of music more quaint and original than anything we previously heard."

From our own Correspondent at Belfast we learn that—Mr. R. Sutton Swaby gave an organ performance at St. Malachy's on Friday last, when a most respectable audience, including several professors of music, assembled to hear his excellent playing of the following programme:—Offertoire (No. 5), Lefebure Weby; slow movement, Haydn; Andante, Beethoven; Toccata and Fugue in D minor, Bach; Overture to Athaliah, Handel; Romance, Mozart; Fugue (the Giant), Bach; Sancta Maria and March Religioso, Meyerbeer.

The Anacreontic Society opened their season on Tuesday, for which occasion they secured the Sainton-Dolby party. The Classical Harmonists open their season on Thursday, the 21st, with Mlle. Anna Whitty, Herr Formes, Ole Bull and party. To the latter society the honour has been conferred of opening the new Ulster Hall, which event is expected to come off either a little before or after Christmas. The building is nearly completed, and its beautiful proportions and excellent arrangements are the admiration of all who see it. To the architect, Mr. Barre, the profession are much indebted for his careful attention to their requirements and comforts

EMILE BERGER'S NEW PIANO SOLO, "LES ECHOS DE LONDRES."

This new fantasia was composed expressly for M. Ole Bull, Herr Formes, Mr. and Mrs. Tennant, and Miss Anna Whitty's provincial tour. It has been played by Mr. Emile Berger (as well as the transcription of Ferrari's popular serenade "Vieni, Vieni") every where with the greatest success, and has invariably been encored.

"The introduction of the two popular melodies, 'Gentle Annie' and 'Dixy's Land,' was a happy idea of Mr. Berger. The audience were delighted, and the applause was so great that the talented pianist was obliged to return to the platform and repeat the fantasia, to the great delight of the audience."—Sheffield Paper.

HERR REICHARDT'S NEW SONG, "ARE THEY MEANT BUT TO DECEIVE ME?" Mazurka-Polonoise.

The Poetry adapted by JOHN OXENFORD.

Price 2s. 6d.

Sung at the Crystal Palace Concerts on Saturday by HERR REICHARDT, with immense success.

The Times says: "Herr Reichardt, the German tenor, whose pure, classical style and fervid expression—still remembered, in spite of two years' absence—were displayed with the utmost effect in a characteristic song from his own pen, entitled 'Are they meant but to deceive me?' which exhibited more than one touch worthy the composer of that deservedly popular romance, 'Thou art so near and yet so far.'"

WANTED, a Situation in Town or Country. Age 27.
Can be highly recommended. Salary required not large.
Address A. Z., at Mr. Giles' Music Warehouse, Brighton.

THE HANOVER-SQUARE ROOMS.—In consequence of a rumour, very generally circulated, to the effect that the above celebrated Rooms are to be pulled down, and houses built on their site, it becomes necessary that the musical public should be made aware that no such intention has existed; but that, on the contrary, the Rooms are now in a course of restoration and redecoration, and will continue to be used for their original purposes. The fine acoustic properties of the great hall, together with the associations of a century past, connected with the most remarkable musical meetings, would have made it a matter of universal regret that the building should be destroyed. The Rooms will be ready for concerts, &c., in a few weeks. For terms and other particulars apply to Messrs Robert Cocks and Co., New Burlington Street, Regent Street, W.

Reviews.

A second instalment of Mr. Howard Glover's new and successful opera, Ruy Blas (Boosey and Sons)—en attendant, we hope and presume, a still further instalment,—lies before us. Ruy Blas looks just as well on paper as it sounds from the stage and orchestra; and, as we have already insinuated, the arrangements being in almost every instance effectively done, the instrumental accompaniments lose less than is too frequently the case by transference to the keyboard of the piano.

First and not last (why not?) we are charmed to welcome under its new physiognomy the Duchess of Alberquerque's quaint and characteristic little song, "When a husband's care must fail," which certain critics, and among them, by the way, some who hold their heads the highest, have unscrupulously, and unsupported by any argument to be deduced from the notes of either piece, declared to be a plagiarism from Bertha's romance in the Barbiere—"Cerca Moglie." We shall not specify these aristarchi, but advise them gently to examine first Rossini's song, then Mr. Howard Glover's song, and place a finger on any bar in the one which shows any kind of resemblance to any (pass the three "any's"—one at least twom' "any") one bar in the other. So much, then, the more genuine is the claim to admiration of the more modern effusion.

No less pleased are we to find included in this new batch the very graceful, melodious, and ingeniously-constructed romance and trio, "Beauteous lady, list my strain"—in which Oscar, the page ("why?" asks the Times,—and "why?" asks the Musical World—must an operatic page be as a matter of necessity styled "Oscar?"), expresses in piteous verse his admiration and passion for the Queen, and in the sequel is reproached in indignant terms for his temerity and insolence, not by the Queen, who, like other mortal women, is more or less sensible to flattery, but by her watchful duenna, the Duchess before mentioned (the Duchess of Alberquerque, we mean, not of Before-mentioned).

Another welcome acquisition is the first "scena" of Ruy Blas, "Ambition's early dreams had flown," which, in spite of its somewhat fragmentary form, is musically interesting from end to end, contains melodious phrases enough to make at least three scenas, and is everywhere thoroughly expressive of the sentiment that moves the heart of the aspiring valet and future Prime Minister. This is the scena which commences with the same quaint and beautiful point for wind instruments which first attracts attention to the overture, and now derives additional interest from being associated with the king (or queen) of instruments, the human voice.

Last, not first, we are not surprised, nor are we sorry (if not altogether exultant) to receive the fifth edition of Miss Louisa Pyne's ballad, "A sympathising heart," for which (or we are mistaken) the publishers have made engrave new plates, or, at any rate, for which (or we are mistaken) they ought.

In the instrumental departments we find—first a "transcription" of the ballad "A Sympathising Heart" for the pianoforte, by M. Emile Berger ("to Miss Rose Higgins"). This consists of an introduction, one page in length—too good to be so short; a modest and faithful arrangement of the melody, with the additional and too infrequent advantage of preserving the key of the composer's own choice; and the whole terminating with a graceful variation in the arpeggio form, in the course of which the enunciation of the melody is, for the most part, co-intrusted to the thumb and remotest digit. This piece will find, we have no doubt, a multitude of admirers, inasmuch as it lies within reach of the most moderate executive capacity.

Secondly, we have to acknowledge a fantasia brillante on some of the most conspicuous melodies—from the fluent and experienced pen of Mr. Brinley Richards. The airs selected by Mr. Richards are "The flower she loves" (Ruy Blas); "Gaily have the jocund hours" (choral introduction to the first act); "Home of thy youth" (ballad for the Queen); and, as finale, "Why then such loving care?" (florid rondo sung by the Queen in the third act). These are knit together with the masterly clearness which we have been taught to expect from the arranger, compiler, or fantasist, whichever we may call him, and otherwise so happily conducted that the fantasia is not only showy, brilliant, and effective, but forms a lucid and consistent whole.

COLOGNE.—The members of this justly-celebrated Society gave a grand vocal and instrumental concert last Tuesday, under the direction of their talented conductor, Herr Franz Weber. For the first time the programme bore the heading, "Under the Patronage of his Majesty William I. of Prussia." A part of the receipts were set aside for charitable purposes. Beethoven's overture to Egmont, and Cherubini's overture to Les Abencerrages, were exceedingly well played by the town band. In the first part, the members of the Verein sang three songs (by Franz Otto, C. M. Von Weber, and Felix Mendelssohn) and Lenau's "Sturmesmythe," set for a chorus of male voices and a full band, and composed expressly for the late grand festival at Nuremberg, by F. Lachner, and, in the second part, Wolfgang Müller's cantata, "An das Vaterland," set to music by Herr Ferdinand Hiller.

To the great delight of all lovers of male choral singing, the Verein once more distinguished itself by the style in which it gave the various pieces set down for it. The term "precision" is far too weak to describe the perfect exactitude with which all the members, as though they were but one man, gave the most delicate touches of light and shade, and that, too, with the most faultless intonation and purity, free from anything even approaching harshness; in a word, the singing of the Verein afforded every one an artistic treat, which was the best possible proof of the zeal and earnestness with which the members devote themselves to their task. The two festival compositions had been well rehearsed, and were, consequently, executed in a most admirable manner. Lachner's work is an unusually taking composition, and testifies to the profound skill of its composer; the hand of an old and experienced maestro is visible throughout. The instrumentation is first-rate, and must mollify even those who object to a full band with male choral singing. Now, it strikes us that the employment of stringed instruments, especially violins, is exceedingly appropriate in the accompaniment of male choruses, because they tend to act as a relief to the lower male voices, and thus prevent the latter from appearing too sombre and monotonous. Ferdinand Hiller's cantata has simply an accompaniment of brass instruments, which is, undoubtedly exceedingly well adapted for large masses. Mendelssohn, for instance, had only a brass accompaniment for his work, "An die Künstler," which he composed for the grand German and Flemish Vocal Festival in Cologne. As a matter of course, this style of writing does not produce a good effect in a small room, simply because it produces—too much. The Cantata is a valuable addition to the compositions we already possess for male voices. The first and last strophes, in which the poem is naturally adapted to the requirements of the composer, are most effective and full of dash. But the work is, as a whole, too long, a fault occasioned, despite certain highly clever thoughts, principally by the middle portion, which Herr Hiller could hardly have treated save, as he has done, in a declamatory style. With regard to the words, we would simply observe that it is a difficult task to compose music to an abstract of the history of Germany.

Mlle. Amalie Bido had been invited by the committee to perform the instrumental solos, which constituted one of the chief attractions of the concert. This amiable young lady is making such rapid advances on the road to real fame, that it is rather a difficult task to follow her, in all her triumphs, through the Rhenish provinces and Westphalia. She played Vieuxtemps' violin concert, No I.; the first movement before, and the last two movements after the three songs. She was at first a pupil of Mayseder, in Vienna, but, as she owes her progress in the higher branches of the art to the Belgian school, her selection of the works of Vieuxtemps, Léonard, &c., springs from a kind of reverential feeling, which we cannot help respecting, especially, as Vieuxtemps' work, already named, by its style of composition, by the extravagant length of the whole, and by the spinning-out of certain enormously difficult passages, renders the achievement of success a task which is by no means easy for the artist. Mlle. Bido's play is distinguished by purity and volume of tone, by perfect power in overcoming all technical difficulties, and by a degree of vigour and endurance for which we should hardly have given one of the fair sex credit. Mlle. Bido differs most favourably from ordinary virtuosos by the partiality she displays for what is really serious and noble in art. The way in which she performed Beethoven's Romance, in the second part of the concert, convinced us most satisfactorily of her ability to conceive and interpret classical music of the very highest kind. R. F.

VIENNA.—At the Imperial Opera House the programme for the last week has included, among other pieces, Le Nozze di Figaro. It will, perhaps, scarcely be believed that the representation of such a work as this is anything but a triumph for the grand lyric establishment of the Hapsburg capital. Some of the characters are respectably supported, but, as a whole, the performance is, as I have already intimated, far from satisfactory. In the first place, Herr Esser, although a good practical musician, is not the man to conduct Mozart's music. He is far too plodding and dry for the task. With regard to the singers, Herr Draxler is quite out of his element—a regular fish out of water—as Figaro, the joyous, the careless, light-hearted, and astute. The same may safely be affirmed of Mlle. Liebhart as the page, Cherubino, although it is but an act of justice to state that she sings every note set down for her. What is wanting is soul and spirit. I cannot say much in praise either of Mad. Ellinger as the Countess, or Mad. Dustmann as Susanna, a part formerly sustained by Mlle. Wildauer. The other characters were played and sung rather better. But if Mlle. Liebhart does not make a good page, she is admirable as the coquettish farmer's wife in Das Klöckchen des Eremiten, a part in which she has made a decided hit. Mlle. Wildauer plays Rose Friquet, but her appearance is not youthful enough, and her acting wants individuality. The male personages are well represented by Herren Mayerhofer, Walter, and Hölzel. I have just witnessed the début of a new tenor, Herr Morini by name. He selected the character of Arnold, in Guillaume Tell, for his coup d'essai before a Viennese public. He certainly was not a failure, but as certainly he is not the man to figure as first tenor at the Imperial Opera. He has many qualities to recommend him, but he fails in one most essential particular, which is nothing more or less than his voice itself. It is really painful to hear him attempting to "pump up" the higher notes. I am very apprehensive that Herr Morini is not destined to take possession of the vacant tenor-throne.—Herr Hans Schläger, the newly appointed director of the Mozarteum in Salzburg, has just left this capital. The Männergesang-Verein, whose chorus-master he had been for many years, got up an entertainment in his honour, on which occasion the Committee presented him, as a mark of respect, with a valuable ring, set with turquoises, diamonds, rubies, and amethysts, representing the colours of the Verein.—From an occasional Correspondent.

HOMBURG.—The new theatre is commenced, and will be completed by next summer.

BRUNSWICK.—The new theatre, built by Herren Wolff and Professor Ahlburg, is situate on the further side of the ramparts, opposite the Steinweg, and is surrounded on three sides by the ducal park. By the demolition of some houses, and the alteration of others, the Steinweg has been so widened, that it now leads directly up to the theatre. The arm of the river Oker, which runs just before the latter, has been bridged over, and thus hidden. The foundations of the building are of slabs of dolomite; the outer walls of stone, quarried at Lutter, near the Baronberg; and the inner ones of brick. The theatre is 258 feet (German) long, 164 feet broad, and 110 feet high, from the cellars to the roof, which is covered with zinc. Opposite the Steinweg is a covered way with a balcony; at the back of the latter is a group representing two sphinxes holding a lyre, on which a swan is sitting. This is intended to typify the union of poetry and music. On either side are the masks of Tragedy and Comedy. In addition to the Duke's entrance, which is covered with a cast-iron roof, there are eight doors for the admission of the public, three for the members of the company, &c., and two leading to the residences occupied by the various officials and servants. The entrances to the pit and to the first and second tiers of boxes, are under the balcony on the west front, while those to the third tier and the gallery are on the north side, but so arranged that all the tickets are procured from one large pay-place. The staircases to the first and second tiers lead as far as the gallery, in case of need. All the corridors, staircases and vestibules are fire-proof. The stairs are formed of sandstone and iron. In case of fire, the audience part of the house can be cut off from the stage by an iron-wire curtain. The stage is 88 feet deep and 84 feet wide from wall to wall. The proscenium opening is 46 feet broad. The ducal state box is in the middle of the first tier. The various tiers are supported on cast iron columns, decorated with gold ornaments on a white ground. The curtains and cushions of the boxes are red. The house, which will hold about 1500 persons, is lighted by a chandelier with 150 gas-burners. On the ceiling are the Muses, painted in fresco. There are about 1200 gas-burners altogether in the house, which is heated by steam. Every precaution has been taken against fire.

MUNICH.—Herr Christian Seidel, a promising young composer, died here on the 18th September.

DRESDEN.—Glück's Iphigenia auf Tauris has been revived with the most cheering results. Everyone is delighted with the manner in which it has been produced, and is loud in praise of the conductor, Herr Rietz, for the care and energy he bestowed upon the rehearsals. Mad. Bürde-Ney, as Iphigenia; Herr Schnorr von Carolsfeld, as Pylades; and Herr Miterwurzer, as Orestes, were all that could be desired, and were frequently rewarded by the applause of a house crowded to the ceiling. Herr Degele was not, by any means, suited to the part of Thoas. The orchestra, chorus, and ballet contributed their fair share to the success of the revival.

FLORENCE.—Miss Allen Macleod, who will be recollected as a very charming concert singer, has recently made her appearance at the Pergola Theatre with unequivocal success. She sang in the Puritani, and is spoken of in the most eulogistic terms by the Florentine critics. As an actress Miss Macleod seems to have evinced a talent equal to that she is so well known to possess as a vocalist.

PRINCE GALITZIN'S CONCERTS.

A "MOZART NIGHT" was given on Wednesday, and attracted an unusually large attendance. So successful indeed was the performance, that it was repeated wholesale last evening, and again brought a crowd. The selection from Mozart included the Symphony in C, No. 1; the pianoforte concerto in C; overture to the Zauberflöte; and songs, "the very Angels weep, dear," and "Batti, Batti." The symphony is too seldom heard; if it cannot bear comparison with the Jupiter, the G minor, or the E flat, for power and grandeur, it is lovely throughout, and is as fresh as the song of a lark. It was most admirably executed, under the energetic direction of Prince Galitzin — who seemed as thoroughly au fait with classic music as with the lighter compositions of the modern school —and was, perhaps, the symphony best calculated to interest and enchain a mixed audience like that assembled at St. James's Hall on Wednesday. The overture, too, was played with remarkable fire and precision, and Miss Julia Woolf did her best to recommend the power and beauty of the pianoforte concerto to her hearers. Miss Augusta Thompson gave both the songs with much point and neatness. The second part was miscellaneous. Among the choicest features were a quadrille on Russian airs and a valse called "St. James's," both the composition of Prince Galitzin, and both to be counted among the most spirited examples with which we are acquainted of modern dance music. Another capital contribution to the repertory of Terpsichore was a new galop entitled "the Reindeer," written by Mr. Louis Diehl, descriptive of "sledging" in Russia, in which the crack of the whip and ringing of the bells play a prominent part. The galop pleased immensely and was loudly cheered at the end.

A Grand Ball is announced for Wednesday next.

DUSSIK, DUSSEK, DUSCHEK.

Mad. Corri-Dussek, wife of J. L. Dussek and daughter of Corri the musicseller, was born in Italy — married —died.* She was one of three (or four?) sisters, all of whom gained more or less reputation in England and on the continent. One of them was so much of a singer as to be taken by the "Great Cat—Little Cat—Great Catalina" (as the comic song of that day had it, to the exceeding indignation of the said "Great Cat—Little Cat—Great Catalani") to the continent to sing in her concerts. Of course, any adequate notice of these sisters—and they seem to be worth one—can only be drawn up from English authorities. According to Gerber and the Leipzig Musik-Zeitung (Dec. 15, 1802), Mad. Corri-Dussek was at that time in the first rank in London as a singer, pianist, and harpist—being in the former capacity prima donna in the professional concerts. She was also a composer, and Gerber gives the following list of works which had come under his notice in the catalogues of the firm Corri and Dussek :—

Three Sonatas for pianoforte, Op. 1; three do. for harp, Op. 2; three do. do., Op. 3; three do. pianaforte, Op. 3 (?); three do. for pianoforte, Nos. 1, 2, 3; Duchess of York's Waltz; German Waltz for the Harp; Rondo for do.; another Rondo for do.—Queries: Did Dussek desert his wife, or she him? Had they children? Who was Olivia Dussek, authoress of an arrangement for pianoforte and harp of "Rule Britannia?" (see "Harmonicon," vol. ii. p. 8). From a communication by Mad. de Fouche, of Brighton, it appears that Mrs. Dussek married the tenor Morant as second husband.

Franz Benedict Dussek, brother of J. L. Dussek, was born at Czaslau, March 13, 1766. According to Dlabacz, he was equally great as violinist, violoncellist, and pianist. "Already in his tender childhood," says Father Dlabacz, "he was so thoroughly taught the elements of music by his discerning father, as very often to take his father's place at the organ, when the latter was necessarily absent. Supplied with all needful musical knowledge, he some years later entered the service of the Countess of Litzau (Litzow), pupil of his father, with whom he also made the so profitable journey into Italy. There he found opportunity for higher culture, made the acquaintance of the principal Italian artists, and performed with applause in a great many concerts upon the violin, violoncello, and pianoforte, gaining thereby, at Mortara and at Venice, engagements as concert-master in the opera-houses, with a handsome salary. Having passed some years thus, he returned to Germany as a perfect artist, and was engaged in the cathedral at Laibach, first as violinist and then as organist. In 1790 he was still there in the latter capacity, and paid a visit to his parents in Czaslau, where he gave his friends many a beautiful proof of his musical powers. He has written many concertos, sonatas, and solos for his three instruments, which thus far, however, have remained in manuscript."

Such is the scanty account given by Dlabacz.

Gerber (New Lexicon) gives his name by mistake as Franz Joseph, and says merely that he was then residing in Milan, "where several of his vocal compositions had become known," and that in Leipzig had just appeared from his pen a trio or notturno for three flutes, and a sonato for pianoforte and violin.

The Leipzig Musik-Zeitung (Feb. 18, 1801), contains a long notice of music in Breslau, in which this sentence occurs:—"In the orchestra of the theatre the most notable are Herr Dussek (the younger), a good composer, and at present the first director; Herr Janetzek, a fine violinist, and second director," &c. Dussek could not have remained long in Breslau, but when he left the place I cannot determine; in fact, he disappears from the ordinary books of reference until 1816, when the Leipzig Musik-Zeitung of July 17, in a long article upon Italian theatres and composers, produces his name once more. Here is the passage:—"Herr Dussek, a Bohemian, and brother of the deceased Parisian pianoforte composer and virtuoso, produced at the last carnival in Venice a very fine farsa seria, 'L'Ombra, ossia il save dimento,' which pleased exceedingly. This talented artist has been for more than twelve years in Italy, and has composed nearly an equal number of operas and farces for Turin, Milan, and Venice, all of which had more or less success. At present he is in Venice, in the position of capellmeister to the Austrian regiment of infantry known as the Davidoritch—a very profitable situation. I neither know Herr Dussek personally nor anything of his music; but so much is certain, that here he is a great favourite, and Herr Orlandi, the composer, described him as a man of very superior talent. For instance, he had been known to compose overtures on the day when the operas were to be given without scoring them, but writing the parts separately, and giving them at once to the orchestra. Relatu refero."

Some months later (March 12, 1817) the Leipzig Musik-Zeitung gives us in its Milan correspondence a "List of Operas composed by Herr Franz Dussek," with the remark that "this talented artist plays almost all instruments skilfully."

Opere Buffe.—La Caffetiera di Spirito; Il fortunato Succeso; La Feudataria; L'Impostere; Voglia di dote e non maglie; Il Trombetta; Matrimonio e Divorzio in un sol Giorno.

Opera Seria.—Roma Salvata.

Farse.—Il fortunato Succeso; L'Incantessimo; La Ferita mortale; L'Ombra, ossia il save dimento.

In which list it will be noticed that the same title appears in one case both as an "opera buffa" and as a "farsa." The correspondent adds, that Dussek had also produced several pieces of instrumental and church music.

It is true that these are scanty notices of a man who, at a time when Winter, Simon Mayer, Guglielmi, Paer, Nicolini, Cherubini, Coccia, Vaccai, and their contemporaries, were still writing for the Italian stage, was popular enough to have engagements annually at Turin, Milan, or Venice, for the composition of operatic works; but is it not strange that the writer who noticed him in Schilling's Lexicon (vol. ii. 1840), could only give the following paragraph?

"Dussek, Franz Joseph (should be Franz Benedict), brother of Johann Ludwig Dussek, but an artist of less importance, lived at Milan, and published there several minor compositions, such as trios, sonatas, &c., for flute and pianoforte, which however did not succeed so well as his vocal compositions, which consist of songs of all kinds, romances, canzonets, also a few ballads more ambitious in form, &c. Nothing more is known of him, but that is no loss to the history of music."

Veronica Rosalia Dussik-Cianchettini, sister of the preceding, was born at Czaslau in 1771, and taught singing and the pianoforte by her father. After being favourably known in Bohemia, her brother called her over to London, where she appears to have gained a good deal of reputation, and where any one anxious about her subsequent history must naturally seek it. Dlabacz gives 1795 as the date of her emigration to England; and as in the few notices of London musical matters, which are to be found in any authorities previous to that date, she is not mentioned, it is natural to suppose him correct. In Spazier's Berliner Musicalische-Zeitung, July 6, 1793, for instance, the Professional Concert is noticed, and it is said, "the principal soloists are Dussek, who makes a great sensation here; Mad. Dussek (formerly Miss Corri) is the principal singer; Mad. Storace, a good actress on the English stage, sings here also," &c.; but no mention is made of Fraulein Dussik.

She married Pio Cianchettini, a music dealer in London, not long after. In the autumn of 1804 she was in Leipzic, and the Leipzig Musik-Zeitung (Oct. 17) gives us this much about her and her doings:—

"Mad. Dussek-Cianchettini, pianiste, sister of the celebrated composer-virtuoso, played a concerto of her brother, not without skill, and another; as also a quartet of her own composition; her little five-year-old son also played several little pieces very prettily."

March 16, 1805, she gave a concert in Berlin, at which she gave a concerto of her own composition; her brother, his great concerto in G minor; and the child, with his mother, variations for four hands upon "God save the King."

Franz Duschek (properly Dussek), the friend of Mozart, was born at Chotieborek, in the circuit of Königsgrätz, in Bohemia, Dec. 8, 1736. He was the son of poor parents, and the notices of his birth in various authorities make it at least probable that they were peasants, in something like the condition of serfs, on the domain of the Sporck family. Dlabacz quotes from a Prague newspaper, which calls Duschek "a subject of Herr Johann Karl von Sporck, Count of the Empire." This count put him to school — why this peasant boy rather than others is not mentioned — or, at all events, "had him taught reading, writing, and music, and then sent him to study at the Jesuit seminary in Königsgrätz. Here, however, he remained but a few years, because his well-formed and sound body was so disfigured (verunstaltet) through an unlucky fall, that he saw himself forced to give up study, and seek his fortune alone in music. His Mæcenas, however, did not desert him. He called him to Prague, had a masterly musical education given him, and made his wonderful skill in teaching known to the high nobility of Bohemia. He was one of the first to introduce a delicate and pleasing style of pianoforte playing. He has been the teacher of most of our young nobility, and has formed several of our musicians. Among the latter are Kozeluch and Massek (Maschek), and his (own) wife Josepha, so much admired also in countries outside Bohemia." (Dlabacz).

Gerber adds a particular or two in the few words devoted to Duschek in the New Lexicon: — "Count J. C. von Sporck took him up a poor peasant boy, on account of his good musical talents, and sent him to Vienna to Wagensail. Here young Duschek made such improvement that, upon his return to Prague, he was not only then considered the best pianist there, but retained this reputation through life."

A correspondent of Cramer's "Magazin," dating August, 1783, notices him as deserving the first place among the "best composers and worthiest men of Prague." "He has lived here," says he, "for many years as professor of music, and has educated many skilful pupils. His principal instrument is the pianoforte, which he plays as one of the very first artists. His compositions mostly 'go upon this instrument.' He has set many excellent pianoforte concertos, quartets, trios and sonatas, which have been well received everywhere. He has also, as you perhaps know, composed many symphonies for the full orchestra, with or without obbligati instruments, quartets, and the like. Various and entirely new works, which as yet have come into nobody's hands, are to be had of him at a reasonable price. His new pianoforte sonatas, for four hands, are particularly fine. Besides his talents as an artist, he is everywhere known as an honest and, in every sense, great virtuoso, and as a man of noblest, worthiest character, free from all pride and selfishness. He embraces every opportunity for benevolence, exhibits ever a noble and magnanimous spirit, is very fond of society, and has often been a father to the unfortunate and deserted.

There is, of course, little to relate of a man living in the exercise of his profession. Two or three visits to Salzburg with his wife, where he became acquainted with the Mozarts, one of these visits being when the Mozart was but a child, an occasional journey to Vienna and Dresden — such seem to have been all the interruptions to his uniform course of life. When the Mozarts were in Prague they were much with the Duscheks — I think they stayed at their house; at all events, they often come up in Mozart's letters and in the history of his visits there. He died on the 12th of February, 1799. In the obituary notice of him which appeared in the Leipzic Musik-Zeitung, there is nothing to add to the foregoing. His relations with Mozart are fully enough discussed in the biographies of the latter.

Josepha Hambacher Duschek, wife of the foregoing, was born at Prague, March 7, 1753. She was the pupil of her husband, and became distinguished both as a singer and as a pianist. Gerber, writing before 1790, says, "she was not only distinguished in Prague for her beautiful voice and excellent method, her bravura singing both in German and Italian, and her very fine recitative in both these languages, but was before most of her sex in her taste and insight in vocal composition, and by her masterly pianoforte playing."

Cramer's Prague correspondent (Magazin der Musik, i. 998), writing in August, 1783, when she was thirty years of age, is quite enthusiastic about her and her husband. He calls her "one of our first female musicians, who surpasses many of the Italians both in power and in artistic qualities—both in delivery and method. She combines with a round and full voice a style pleasing, beautiful, and highly cultivated. In difficult and passionate bravura singing she has such facility, that every hearer must acknowledge her worthy the first place in the service of the most splendid court. Her recitative, both German and Italian, cannot be surpassed in expression and correctness by the first Italian songstresses. She composes also, and, in case of necessity, with little preparation, very correctly, and for all sorts of voices. She plays the pianoforte masterly. The house of these two worthy virtuosos is one of the favourite rendezvous of musicians here, and is open to all who are distinguished in art or science. Every stranger artist is received at their house, and is introduced by them into society. Every Friday they give a private concert, and all strangers (artists) are invited. Large offers have been made her to join the opera in Vienna, but the Duscheks prefer their still quiet life to a theatrical career, and remain in Prague, where they are honoured and admired by all friends of music."

Out of Prague she was not rated so high, although her concerts seem to have been always well attended. Jahn (Mozart, vol. iv. pp. 285 et seq.) gives a sketch of her, and cites some of the opposing opinions; especially that of Leopold Mozart, who did not like her at all as a singer. Schiller and Koerner's father are also quoted.

Mozart's reception by Duschek in Prague, in 1789, and by Mad. Duschek soon after in Dresden, is described by him in letters to his "Wifeling Stancere," which are given by Jahn (vol. iii. 476—478).

As early as 1777 when the Duscheks were in Salzburg, Mozart wrote for her the air, "Ah! lo prevedi," and a rondo; and when in Prague, to bring out Don Juan, the recitative and aria "Bella mia fiamma." It was this air which he composed in durance vile, as his own son has stated, which puts an end to the old story of some nobleman having locked him up in a room to get an air from his pen. The relations between the Duscheks and the composer were such that a joke of this kind might be perpetrated without causing hard feelings (Jahn, iv. 304).

When Beethoven was in Prague, in 1796, he composed the "Ah, perfido" for her; at all events, in a concert which she gave in Leipzig, in 1798 (if my memory serve), she sang an "Italienische scena und aria, componist für Mad. Duschek by Beethoven," which must have been this one.

In 1800 (printed April 23) the Leipzig Musik-Zeitung's Prague correspondent writes, "In the art of singing, the celebrated Josepha Duschek still stands at the head. She is in this branch still our first female artist." When about fifty years of age she ceased to sing in public, as we see from this passage in the Leipzig Musik-Zeitung's Prague letter (Sept. 3, 1806): "Since Mad. Duschek—an artist in the full significance, who, in a more favourable position, would long since have filled all Germany with her fame—closed her public career, Prague has had to do without the advantage of a good native singer," &c. When she died I have not been able to learn, but it is stated that she lived to be quite aged.

In addition to the Dussiks, Dusseks, and Duscheks already sketched, one more appears in the musical journals of 1831—5. whose name is variously written Duchek, Düsseck, and Duscheck. He was, and for anything I know still is, a concert flutist, who played publicly in Prague, Munich, Stuttgard, Zurich, &c. What his parentage was I have no means of knowing.

WHAT I have said of Don Giovanni will give some idea of the superb style in which great operas have been presented this year in the theatre at Covent Garden. At least it will confirm what most have read about it—if, indeed, there has been any disposition, or any chance to read the musical journals at all during a rebellion and struggle for our Union, and for all that freemen hold dear. But I have spoken only of one opera among the eight or ten that I have heard. A yet more memorable experience, considering how comparatively rare have been the chances to hear such a work, was Rossini's Guillaume Tell, which I had finally the good fortune to hear here twice, after having missed it everywhere upon the continent. The impression this great work has made this season in London, shows how mistaken was the indifference with which it was dismissed after two or three performances some years ago in Boston, and never again revived or called for, except by a few now and then of the more earnest music lovers, who are ever in the minority. It was pronounced heavy, tedious, too much abounding in great choruses and complex ensembles, and not allowing sufficient prominence to individual singers (for the crowd always think more of what is personal), too clumsy in its dramatic structure to be saved by even the best of music, and so on; it drew a full house once, and the public fell off the next time; there was in fact too much in it, too much musical matter, too many ideas, too much subtle beauty, too much truth, to win the lazy admiration of those who get all they want in the simple and direct plots and climaxes of Donizetti and Verdi. The habitués of modern Italian opera found such a work as Tell as "slow," and foreign to their tastes as a grand symphony or an Israel in Egypt oratorio; and the ephemeral critics, who never lack opinion and assurance, did not hesitate to pronounce the masterwork of the greatest lyric genius that Italy has ever produced, a failure! Those who had studied and who knew the music apart from the performance, knew that the failure lay in the performance, and in the unprepared sense of the audience, and not in the composition. But Tell was laid upon the shelf and not again attempted, any more than was Fidelio, while the Trovatore continued in perpetual demand. And so it ever has been in England until this season just past. Probably it never had such justice done it in the presentation before. But now that it has been seen and heard with competent singers, superb orchestra and chorus, perfect scenery, ballet, &c., now that it has been thoroughly learned and mastered, all co-operating con amore in a complete ensemble, the London public have at once recognised its beauty and its grandeur, the rare originality, the rich and exquisite invention, the fresh, true local colouring of the music. Nine times during the season has Tell been given, and always to the most crowded and enthusiastic houses. It takes its place now among the prime favourites, the standard works, like Don Giovanni and the Barbiere, and will have to take its turn in every coming season. To the credit of English taste—is it not?—and to the justification of a genuine great work of genius against the superficial fashions of the day.

The last performance was in every respect magnificent. Those lovely choruses of the first act, so fresh and pure in their expression, so free from cheap sentimentality, from what is common place, and from what is overstrained, so natural, yet of such wondrous art, so thoroughly Swiss in tone and sentiment, where else in Italian opera, and in how many German operas, is there anything comparable to them? What has Meyerbeer done, with all his ingenuity, all his wealth and novelty of instrumentation, that can charm and go right to the heart, filling us with genial warmth, and bathing every sense in morning freshness, like unto these? You can never grow weary of their sound. It is like walking through the Alps themselves, and sailing on the blue lakes. More than ever, since I have been in Switzerland, have I felt how truly all that nature is reflected in Rossini's marvellous tone-pictures; how its very atmosphere and echo, its lights and shadows, its essential characteristic, which all travellers feel and no one can express—at least not better than Schiller, who was never there—have impressed their subtlest and most delicate vibrations as it were upon the sympathetic medium of his music. Constantly, while upon or about the Lake of the Four Cantons, would snatches of these Rossini melodies and choruses float unconsciously into my mind. And vice versâ, the singing of them, on the rich background of so glorious an orchestra, and such poetically complete and truthful scenic suggestion, brought back the real scene, the real breath and touch of mountain presences, in the most vivid manner. A stereoscopic view is nothing to it; that gives the outward form, but this gives the soul of Alpine nature.

I need not say how finely all the choruses were sung. And what an exquisite and holy charm was breathed in all that music of the wedding episode, where the three couples of young mountaineers are united by the good old pastor in the presence of their kinsmen and neighbours, and amid those eternal hills! How faithfully the music mingles the sense of peaceful happiness and sad presentiment! The chorus is positively religious. The dance which follows, hardly less so: lovely as it is, and full of grace and novelty, it is yet a minor strain, and seems to anticipate the trials and tragedies in store for the peaceful and free-souled dwellers of those picturesque and wholesome vales. All the music of this part is innocence and chastity itself, and full of unaffected love and piety. Passing to the great act, the second, where the patriots (we will not call them "confederates" now!) of the three cantons meet at Rütli, we have perhaps the grandest and most sustained climax in all lyrical music. Some of the passages are worthy of Beethoven. The trio of the three leaders; the triple chorus, into which tribe after tribe enter as they arrive in their boats (first seen afar on the moonlit lake), or down the mountain passes; and, finally, the oath of federation, with its tremendous orchestral accompaniment—those double basses speak like a voice from Horeb—are thrillingly sublime, delivered as they were on this occasion. The only things in opera to be compared to this grandeur are, perhaps, some passages of Glück, and in the last part of Mozart's Zauberflöte—and yet these are too different in character to be compared to it. The charmingly Swiss prelude to this act, too, was made thoroughly appreciable, both musically and scenically. I did not suppose it possible to put upon the stage so beautifully true an image of Swiss scenery; and when the groups of old and young descend the mountains, towards the moonlit lake and the little church with lighted windows on its edge, amid chimes of bells and all the mountain sounds, and ringing horns of hunters nearing and receding on the other shore, it requires but little imagination on your own part to find yourself back there.

Of the last two acts, which were judiciously abridged, I need not speak; for everybody knows that there is a great fault in the dramatic structure, the plot of the piece, whereby the climax of its interest is over with the second act. Much fine music remains, though; and wonderfully fine is all the music of the dances in the festival in Gessler's presence in the square of Altdorf. Pity only that it was not all given. When one sees graceful and characteristic dancing to such music, he cannot help wondering what it would be to witness an entire dramatic ballet, such as lasts through an evening, wholly set in motion by music so significant and full of genius, instead of by such unmeaning prettiness of poor Frenchy melody as are commonly danced to.

The principal singers were all good. In the first place Tamberlik, who was the Arnold. A glorious tenor, although past the prime. No man could be better suited to this noble part, both to its wooing and to its heroic side, but more particularly to the latter. He is the greatest of declamatory tenors (I must except Sims Reeves in the oratorios). No other has such crisp and manly resonance in the recitative. Every tone stands forth so round, distinct, and positive—the musical "large utterance" of the gods. The tones, too, are pure gold in their substance; warm, rich, sound to the core. He is very great in the superb bursts and climaxes of the principal arias, "O, Matilda," in the second act, and in the patriotic rally in the last act, where he makes the famous ut de poitrine so effectively—whether it be really a chest tone with him or not. His performance was thoroughly inspiring that night, and carried all before it. But in the purely singing style, sustained cantabile, he is not to be compared to either Mario or Reeves. M. Faure made an excellent Tell, as he did Don Giovanni. Sig. Polonini made the part of the old Melchthal remarkably impressive; and Herr Zelger, a giant of a German, with a ponderous basso, did good justice to the music of Walter. The picturesque and difficult little high tenor part of the fisherman, who opens the first scene, singing as he mends his nets, was beautifully given by Sig. Neri-Baraldi; and Tagliafico, the baritone, of Protean cleverness in all sorts of characters, was Gessler. The ladies have less to do in Tell than in most operas; love, here, must be secondary to country. The part of Matilda was filled, in the former instance, by Mad. Miolan-Carvalho, a serious, quiet-looking Frenchwoman, who sings very nicely as to style and method; and the last time by the pretty young wife of the tenor Tiberini, née Ortolani, of whom I have before spoken. The brave boy of Tell, rejoicing in the name of "Jemmie," was very well personated by Mad. Rudersdorff, who has plenty of bright execution, with a rather worn and uninteresting voice.

LONDON: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1861.

To the Editor of the MUSICAL WORLD.

SIR,—There is a preface to certain "Hefts" of national songs, with accompaniments by Beethoven, published recently by Peters of Leipzig, and edited from MSS. in the Royal Library at Berlin, by Franz Espagne, who now has charge of the musical department of that institution. It may seem rather late to be making notes upon something which appeared nearly a year ago; but as it never met my eyes until a few days since, owing to my absence from Germany, the delay must be excused. Although not yet fully prepared to go into the history of Beethoven's national song arrangements, nor feeling called upon to correct every error which I detect in the constantly increasing Beethoven literature,* still, on the general ground, that every one able to do so is bound to correct mistakes and misapprehensions which affect the reputation of others, especially of the deceased, and that too as soon as possible, I make these few notes: for M. Espagne—of course unintentionally—has done the late George Thomson great injustice in some of his remarks upon that gentleman's publications of national songs and melodies.

Not to do M. Espagne injustice, in turn, here is his preface translated entire:—

"The songs which appear in this publication are taken from the original manuscript of Ludwig von Beethoven, which, in the year 1846, passed from the possession of Professor Schindler into that of the Royal Library in Berlin. This MS. contains in all seventy melodies of different nations, arranged for one, two, and three voices, with an accompaniment for the pianoforte, violin, and violoncello; of these a few appeared in the '25 Schottischen Lieder, op. 108,' published by Schlesinger; others in the collections of English, Scotch, and Irish songs, published by G. Thomson in Edinburgh, the rest still remaining unprinted. Those in Thomson's collections are, in regard both to text and music, not only incorrectly printed, but altered and abbreviated at will. To give but two examples; in the song, 'Charlie is my darling,' the last eight bars are omitted, and in the 'Miller of Dee,' the last fifteen, so that both end in a minor instead of a major key. Besides, Thomson's collections have long since disappeared from the book trade, while in Germany, owing to the high price, they were never widely diffused. Hence there has long been a want of a correct and complete edition of these arrangements, which Beethoven undertook with so much zeal. (The number already known to me is 157.)

"That this has not been long since undertaken, especially with the still unprinted songs, is owing mainly to the circumstance that in the MS. of the composer the text is always wanting. Now, though there is no difficulty in finding the words to single well-known airs (as Nos. 1, 3, 4, of the first, and No. 1 of the second "Heft"), yet it was by no means easy to find them for the old Irish and Scotch melodies, and most difficult indeed to obtain those belonging to such as are superscribed by Beethoven, 'German,' 'French,' 'Spanish,' 'Portuguese.' To many of the old Irish airs the original texts are lost; also to many of the Scotch. As Thomas Moore wrote new songs to 124 Irish airs, so Thomson procured for a great number of popular melodies new songs from Burns, William Smyth, Walter Scott, Joanna Baillie, Thomas Campbell and others. A part of these lay before Beethoven, while engaged upon the melodies; others not, as appears from the composer's directions for the "tempi" and execution, his notes as to the number of stanzas, and especially from the rhythm.

"Whenever doubts as to Thomson's texts came up (as in case of almost all the airs to which Moore wrote songs), I have sought in older collections of Scottish, Irish, &c., popular melodies, for the most part printed in the last century, the original text, which, owing to the difficulty of obtaining such materials, has proved no small labour.

"The translators of the English texts, Herr Hüffner and G. Pertz, have made a special point of retaining the original rhythms, so as to give the completest possible imitation of the originals; and I hope that their efforts, compared with those of others in the same field, will be found decidedly successful.

"The deciphering of Beethoven's MS. was a task of no small difficulty, especially certain passages, which had been repeatedly corrected, crossed out, or altered with lead pencil. But the experience of several years, during which these and other MSS. of Beethoven have much occupied me, has made me sufficiently master of their peculiarities. I have added nothing but a few necessary directions for execution—have changed nothing but a few false notes, evidently arising from haste in writing.

"My particular thanks are due to Herr Professor Jahn for his kind loan of a copy of forty songs carefully corrected by Beethoven himself, and to Professor Schindler for his friendly communications upon several matters involved in my work.

"FRANZ ESPAGNE."

"Berlin, Dec. 1860."

In perusing the foregoing, we cannot avoid the inference that the writer has never seen a complete copy of Thomson's publications; or if he has, that he has not read with due care the prefaces to the three collections. Else, how could he have failed to know that all the songs published by Schlesinger are among the thirty-nine (out of 300) arranged by Beethoven, and printed in Thomson's Scotch songs? And how, too, could he have spoken of Thomson's "English" songs, there being no such collection? It is, however, with the charges against Mr. Thomson that we now have to do—strictures which, it is hoped, will be clearly seen to be undeserved, and based upon mere mistake and misapprehension. These strictures are twofold in character: those which relate to the text, and those upon Thomson's treatment of Beethoven's instrumental accompaniments.

As to the text, M. Espagne evidently supposes the collections of Mr. Thomson to be antiquarian in character and purpose. This, however, was not the case. Mr. Thomson was neither a publisher nor a musician by profession. He was simply an enthusiastic admirer of Scotch national melodies, and so much of a musician as to have composed himself some very beautiful airs, of which No. 215 of the Scotch collection is an example. His object was to rescue from oblivion the old national airs by giving them new texts; the character of most of the old songs being such as to exclude them from cultivated circles. Here are his own words:—

* What a task that would be in relation to the last new volumes of Lenz!

"To furnish a collection of all the fine airs, both of the plaintive and the lively kind, unmixed with trifling and inferior ones, — to obtain the most suitable, and finished accompaniments, with the addition of characteristic symphonies to introduce and conclude each air; — and to substitute congenial and interesting songs every way worthy of the music, in the room of insipid or exceptional ones, were the great objects of the present collection."

But while it was an express object of the publisher to give to the old melodies new texts, he had so much regard for the archæological side of the question as to print in every case possible the old title of the air, thus giving to the antiquary the necessary clue to the old text where any existed. If M. Espagne had, therefore, a complete set of Mr. Thomson's volumes at his command, he would at once have seen what text belonged to each melody (in all cases of British and Irish airs), and not found it necessary to consult the collection of Thomas Moore, which was but an imitation of Thomson's work, and subsequent to it. Moore did himself for his old national melodies what Thomson engaged Burns, Scott, Byron and others to do for them,—that is, write new texts.

As to the texts, then, the question resolves itself simply into this, viz.:—has a collector the right to give a new text to an old melody? The success of both Thomson's and Moore's collections shows how the public has judged on this point. Moreover, as the antiquarian interest has been principally begotten by that success, and as our language has been enriched by a vast number of beautiful songs,—100 from Burns alone, and more than that number from Moore, called out in this manner,—I submit that praise rather than blame is to be awarded to the generous Scotchman who so largely sacrificed time and labour during half a century, and who paid Beethoven alone more than 550*l.*, nearly all of which was on account of his share in the publications under notice.

But a more serious charge against Mr. Thomson is that of not having printed Beethoven's arrangements in their integrity, and of altering and abbreviating the music at will. To this it would be a sufficient reply to say that M. Espagne has never seen the manuscript from which Thomson printed. But as this might seem to be rather evading than answering the charge, the following facts are added, to prove that no single manuscript, either in Beethoven's hand or that of his copyist, is a sufficient basis for such an assertion.

1. A proof of this is to be seen in the very MS. in the Berlin Library, in which the Scotch air, No. 10 in Schlesinger's publication (203 Thomson) in E flat, is found to be in F.

2. Another proof may perhaps be seen in the following citation from a letter of Beethoven to Thomson:—"Comme les trois exemplaires de ces cinquante trois chansons écossaises que j'ai vous envoyé il y a longtemps se sont perdu, et avec eux la composition originale de ma propre main, j'étais forcé de compléter mes premières idées que me restaient encore dans un manuscrit, et de faire pour ainsi dire la même composition deux fois."

3. Several of Beethoven's arrangements were found to be unsuited to Thomson's work, and the melodies—in one case nine at once — were sent back to Vienna to be recomposed. Beethoven executed the order, wrote them a second time, and was paid in full as for the original arrangements.

4. Beethoven, in some cases, sent Thomson two different arrangements of the same air—and here is a citation from a letter to this point:—"J'ai composé deux fois le No. 10 des derniers dix airs. Vous pouvez insérer dans votre collection lequel de deux vous plaire le plus."

5. Thomson was so scrupulous in his determination to do Beethoven no injustice in printing his arrangements, that, in those days of difficult communication between Great Britain and the continent (owing to the "Napoleonic ideas,") he was at the great trouble and expense of sending the two volumes of Irish airs in print to Vienna, to receive there Beethoven's last corrections. These corrections were made, sent to Edinburgh, and the plates corrected accordingly.

6. As to the "Charlie is my darling" and "the Miller of Dee," it may be replied, in general, that Mr. Thomson, a Scotchman and an enthusiast for his national songs, may be supposed to have been a better judge than the German Beethoven, whether these songs should end in a minor or a major key. But I will add that in my carefully made thematic list of all the songs printed in Thomson's collections, with Beethoven's accompaniments, neither of these two is to be found. One might easily have been overlooked —hardly both of them. I think, upon examination, it will appear that Thomson has printed these songs with the accompaniments of Haydn or some other composer.* At all events, from the considerations above given, it is clear that M. Espagne goes too far, when he makes these two songs the basis of so severe a charge against the late Mr. Thomson.

Again, M. Espagne says, a part of the new songs written for Mr. Thomson's publications lay before Beethoven while at work upon the melodies, and a part did not; and then he proceeds to prove the latter part of the assertion. He has here taken much needless pains, for a glance at the correspondence shows that no texts were sent to the composer. The reason was this, that as new songs were to be written to the melodies, it was necessary that the music should first be complete, as the poetry was to be adapted to the music—not the music to the poetry—a method of proceeding which, after it was explained to Beethoven, received his hearty approval, as is clear from the last of the following citations from his letters.

To the letter announcing that in eight days the first forty-three airs will be published and ready to be sent to Edinburgh, there is the following postscript:—

"Une autre fois je vous prie aussi m'envoyer les paroles des chansons comme il est bien nécessaire de les avoir pour donner la vrai expression Ici on me les traduira."

Again, the next year, after finishing another set, he writes:—

"Je voudrais bien avoir les paroles de ces airs écossaises, pour en faire usage en Allemagne, des que vous les aurez publiez en Ecosse. . . . . Je vous prirais de m'envoyer les paroles notées sur la simple mélodie."

At a still later date Beethoven goes so far as to threaten to arrange no more of the melodies unless Thomson sends him the texts. This called out a letter from the publisher (which is lost, unless a copy is retained in Edinburgh), in which the matter was explained. This is clear from the following passage in Beethoven's reply:—

"Pour la reste j'approuve fort votre intention de faire adapter les poésies aux airs, puisque le poëte peut appuyer par le rhythme des vers sur

* I was indebted to Mr. R. E. Lonsdale for a complete set of Thomson's volumes. As I have no object but truth in this matter I should be thankful, if any one will consult the work, and give the fact in relation to these two songs whether for or against my view.

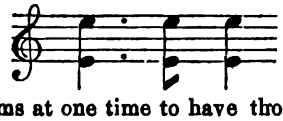
quelques endroits que j'ai élevé dans les ritornelles, par exemple, dans l'une des derniers ou j'ai employé les notes de la mélodie au ritornel."



Thomson seems at one time to have thought of adding a volume or two of other national melodies to those which he published, and to have written to Beethoven about it. The following passage from a letter of the composer, viewed in connection with the arrangements of such airs, found among his papers, seems to prove this:—"Quant à chansons," says he, "de divers nations, vous n'avez que prendre des paroles en prose, vous y réussirez parfaitement. Quant à vos autres propositions," &c. &c.

I conclude by expressing my thanks to M. Espagne for undertaking a work which I urged upon him in January 1860, and the hope that he will recall his preface and insert a new one in its place. A. W. THAYER.

IT would now seem altogether superfluous to assert that the Monday Popular Concerts are among the surest and best aids to the advancement and dissemination of good music. Each succeeding year has demonstrated the power they exercise in promulgating a sincere admiration and a refined taste for all that is real and beautiful in the art; and universal opinion has decided that no superior school exists in England for obtaining a knowledge of the graver works of the masters, or of directing that knowledge to a more beneficial result. At no former period, however, could the Monday Popular Concerts have proved of greater utility than the present, or their services have been more earnestly required to act as a counterpoise to the unwholesome influence engendered in certain establishments purporting to instruct and amuse the public through the instrumentality of music. Those brilliant and lordly temples, falsely erected to the Muses, yclept Music Halls, have proved the greatest enemies on record to true art. They foster a spurious taste and an unhealthy feeling, and do a thousand times more injury to the cause of music than the direst hostility. When the youth of London resort to these free-and-easy places of amusement, where they can enjoy their pipe, their glass and their song in unison, at charge of the smallest possible fee, they insensibly lose all interest for higher entertainments, even though a real appreciation of what is good may be latent in their composition, and work themselves into that state of semi-brutishness that would be satisfied with the dullest music interpreted by the most incompetent singers. Under the influence of such strong stimulants as tobacco and alcohol, criticism falls asleep, and taste dies a natural death. The sublimest inspirations and the most worthless efforts are inseparable and indistinguishable, and noise and vociferation become the only desideratum. And how have managers brought things to this pass? One or two popular names are required to attract a crowd to the hall. No further heed is taken; bitter beer and tobacco accomplish the rest. Even the "popular" artists may have won their celebrity by any other means than the strictly legitimate. One may play the fiddle in the most remarkable manner, standing on his head; a second may transcend by singing through his nose; a third may recommend music by gesticulation rather than vocalisation; a fourth excel in blacking his physiognomy; a fifth in the rapid clattering of bones, &c. All artists of this eccentric kind are immense favourites, are extravagantly paid, and are invariably received with greater applause than Mario, or Adelina Patti. Now, when we remember that some twenty or thirty of these flaunting gin-and-music palaces are every night, Sunday excepted, offering their tinsel attractions to the listless youths and fragile maidens of the metropolis, need we be surprised that true places of art entertainment are deserted, and that music stands in need of some counteracting influence to protect the community from imposition and to knock the impostor on the sconce? It would be absurd to attempt to put down Music Halls. Let them burn in their own sphere. They have perhaps their uses, and may help to thin gambling houses, and entice "gents" to less objectionable places of recreation than those they might otherwise frequent. We only find fault because the directors pretend to have music executed in a creditable manner, which is not the case, and because the performances create a false taste in weak minds, which can never be eradicated. The mischief these saloons do is incalculable, and we should, therefore, hail with delight the establishment of concerts like the Monday Popular Concerts in the neighbourhood of every one of them, assured that in the end good music would prevail against ebon complexions, acrobat accompaniments, bones and banjos.

The Monday Popular Concerts have their distinct mission, and are carrying it out with every prospect of eminent success. Let no music hall dare to come within the sphere of their attractions. Before their steady and pure light its false lustre would grow pale, and expire like an ignis fatuus before the full glory of the risen day.

MLLE. PATTI.—At Dublin, this young artiste has recently had quite an ovation; the horses being taken out of her carriage by the crowd as she left the Theatre Royal. They dragged the vehicle from the theatre to Morrison's Hotel, several mounting to the roof and others clinging to the back. The shouts of the populace followed them to their destination, and when they arrived there, they begged, or rather insisted, that Mlle. Patti would address a few words to them from the balcony. This she very graciously agreed to do, and presenting herself in the balcony, notwithstanding the drenching rain, she thanked her Dublin friends cordially for their generous patronage, and showered upon them the bouquets she had previously received from the audience.

MADEMOISELLE PATTI left London on Tuesday for Berlin, where she is engaged to appear at the Royal Opera House in a series of Italian operas.

MR. GEORGE FREDERICK GRAHAM, son of Mr. T. Graham, organist and choirmaster of the parish church at Wigan, has been unanimously elected to a similar appointment at the parish church of Holywell, in Flintshire, out of thirty-nine candidates.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—At a general meeting held on Monday evening at Messrs. Broadwoods' the nights on which the concerts for the ensuing season of the above society are to be held, were arranged to take place as follows:—March 10, 24; April 7, 28; May 12, 26; June 9, 23; the Jubilee on the 14th of July, 1862.

MR. MYERS'S EVENING WITH TOM MOORE.—On Monday evening, at the request of the Committee of the Working Men's Association, Mr. Myers gave a reading of his interesting "Evening with Tom Moore," at Stormont House, to a most appreciative audience. It was gratifying to see the avidity and intensity with which every anecdote and incident connected with Erin's greatest bard were listened to. It was read so distinctly, earnestly, and graphically, that it was frequently applauded in the course of its delivery. Mr. Myers had the assistance of Mr. Morant, Mr. East, and Mr. Aspull, who accompanied the songs and glees with his usual tact and skill. A vote of thanks was proposed by Mr. Anketelle of Ladbroke-square, who, in a speech of considerable length, commented with much historic ability upon the state of Ireland, from the time of King John, through the Cromwellian period, the rebellion of 1798, to the present tim . The motion was seconded by Mr. Pitman of Ledbury-terrace, who observed that a repetition of the glee of "Row, brothers, row" would be another addition to the gratification they had received. It was immediately complied with, and the vote of thanks was awarded with acclamation to Mr. Myers and the gentlemen who so kindly assisted him. —Bayswater Chronicle.

CONCERT OF THE BROTHERS BOOTH.—We were much pleased to find Westbourne Hall well filled with a fashionable audience on Monday week, when the Brothers Booth gave their first grand concert. These young and talented candidates for musical fame have been for some time located in our district, and have silently and surely worked their way, not more by their musical abilities than by their modest and unassuming manners, and their evidently amiable dispositions. The whole concert was given with an éclat worthy of note. One of Beethoven's trios (Op. 2) was played con amore. The variations were well brought out and displayed the respective powers of the brothers to great advantage. Herr Lehmeyer's tone and touch were much admired, as well as his conception of the part assigned to him. Mrs. Alexander Newton sang "Qui la voce," with an artistic finish that reminded us of former days, when she was more before the public. The solos for violin, violoncello, and guitar were beautiful in style and character; that for violin, from Beatrice di Tenda, being peculiarly distinguishable, as well for executive facility as breadth and purity of tone. Messrs. Kiallmark and Lehmeyer, on the pianoforte played their respective parts with great effect. Both received warm and genuine applause. The vocal music was ably sustained by the Misses Mascall, Mr. Reilly, and Mr. George Tedder, the latter of whom sang with great force and vigour the "Death of Nelson," as well as a new ballad by Ascher, called "Alice where art thou?" The words of this ballad are eminently poetical and beautiful; while the melody is just one of those that "take and imprison the rapt soul in Elysium." Though Mr. Tedder was suffering from severe cold, he sang with equal taste and feeling.

ROYAL ENGLISH OPERA.

THE introduction of Mr. Macfarren's opera of Robin Hood into the repertory clearly points out that the directors are determined to secure the best works for their theatre, and that novelty is not to be depended on as the sole attraction. In transferring Robin Hood, however, from Her Majesty's Theatre to Covent Garden, the loss involved by the substitution of any other artist for Mr. Sims Reeves would be almost incalculable. Mr. Henry Haigh has a fine voice and is no incapable actor, but we cannot pronounce him the beau idéal of the celebrated outlaw. Mad. Guarabella, on the other hand, made a worthy successor to Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington in Maid Marian, and won a legitimate triumph. Mad. Guarabella possesses a capital soprano voice of the brilliant kind, vocalises with great fluency, and has both dramatic fire and taste in abundance. She is a striking rather than a finished singer, and for that reason commands greater attention. No success could be more legitimate and universal than that of the fair débutante, and Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. Harrison may congratulate themselves on the acquisition of an accomplished artist. If the cast of Robin Hood at Covent Garden has lost its chiefest ornament in Mr. Sims Reeves, it at all events retains in Mr. Santley as the Sheriff, and Mr. G. Honey as the Sompnour, two of the characters which enhance the attractions of the performance in an eminent degree. The re-engagement of Mr. Santley and Mr. George Honey was a wise, indeed a necessary, step on the part of the management. The restoration of the part-song in the third act, omitted after the first night at Her Majesty's Theatre, was considered a decided improvement, as was also the addition of the original trio in the first act. Altogether, the performance of Robin Hood at Covent Garden is entitled to warm commendation.

The revival of Mr. Wallace's Lurline does not demand so detailed an account, since the principal characters, except in one instance, have undergone no change, the exception being Miss Jessie M'Lean as Ghiva, in the room of Miss Leffler of last year, who replaced Miss Pilling of the previous year (1859), when Lurline was first produced. On the first night of the revival, Mr. Santley being indisposed, Mr. H. Corri took his place as Rhineberg, while Mr. Eugene Dussek undertook the Gnome, vice Mr. H. Corri. Mr. Wallace's music has lost none of its charm and grace, while Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. Harrison are as admirable as before in their respective parts of Lurline and the Earth-lover. On Tuesday evening, Miss Jessie M'Lean being indisposed, Miss Leffler kindly and readily undertook the part of Ghiva.

An operetta in one act entitled the Toymaker, words and music by Mr. George Linley, was produced on Tuesday last. The piece is founded on the French operetta La Poupée de Nuremberg, the music by Adolph Adam. The music is pleasing, and was well recommended by the singing of Miss Susan Pyne, Miss Thirlwall, Mr. Henry Haigh and Mr. George Honey.

The performances of Ruy Blas have been resumed, and the opera is now being given twice a week, in alternation with Robin Hood and Lurline.

Mr. Balfe's new opera is in active rehearsal, and is expected to be ready about the end of the month. A new operetta by Mr. Tom Taylor (words) and Mr. Frederick Clay (music) is in preparation.

MADAME GRISI'S FAREWELL TOUR.

SIGNOR GALVANI having terminated his Dublin engagement with Mlle. Patti, has rejoined the party, and again taken the position of primo-tenore, a position which in his temporary absence has been so very successfully filled by Mr. Smith.

Signor Galvani pleased greatly in Dublin, where the repertory in which he appeared was perhaps more suited to him than that of the operas requiring a robust tenor. There are few tenors who can boast of knowing so many operas of such entirely different styles as Signor Galvani. He acquits himself artistically in all.

The Count in Il Barbiere perhaps affords him better opportunity for the display of his peculiar vocal and dramatic talent, than almost any other part. He acts and sings it admirably, and with the serenade especially, in which he accompanies himself upon the guitar, invariably produces great effect.

The performances this week have been as below:—

Monday, 18th, Norma and Sonnambula—Tuesday, 19th, Don Giovanni—Wednesday, 20th, Selections from Trovatore, Traviata and Barbiere—St. George's Hall, Bradford.

Thursday, 21st, Norma and Sonnambula—Friday, 22nd, Don Giovanni—Theatre Royal, Leeds.

Saturday, 23rd, Grand Evening Concert, Hull.

The operas at Leeds will have been the last performed by the party before proceeding to Dublin, and positively the last time Madame Grisi appears on the stage in England. On their way to Ireland, the artists will sing at concerts in Scotland, and commence, as announced, a short series of operas at the Theatre Royal, Dublin, on Tuesday, December 3rd.

On this occasion Miss Ellen Conran will make her first appearance in her native city since her return from America, and after an absence of nine or ten years. From the very flattering accounts of her career in Rio Janeiro and the United States, great expectations have been raised of the ability of the new prima donna. Since Catherine Hayes, Miss Conran is the only "genuine Irish girl" who has appeared upon the Italian stage. Her reception from her warm-hearted countrymen may easily be expected to be enthusiastic. Miss Conran will make her début as Adalgisa to Madame Grisi's Norma.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

THE first concert of the fourth season was fully up to the standard of what the musical public have been accustomed to expect from these entertainments, which, through good management and liberal enterprise, have in a very brief space of time attained such a height of popularity. It is unnecessary to add anything to what has been written about the origin of the Monday Popular Concerts, or about the general objects for the promotion of which they were established. A short extract from the prospectus issued by the spirited director, Mr. S. Arthur Chappell, may, nevertheless, serve as a recapitulation of what has already been accomplished, and will be perused with the greatest satisfaction by the patrons of music, inasmuch as it does not contain one word of exaggeration: —

"It was originally intended, in 1859, to give six performances, and to repeat the experiment, should it turn out successful, from year to year. So unanimous, however, was the response to this first appeal—an appeal based no less upon a faith in the ability of the general public to appreciate than in the power of genuine music to attract — that during the first season the proposed six concerts were increased to 13, during the second to 27, and during the third to 24. The programmes of these 64 concerts (to which must be added 11 held in Liverpool, Newcastle, Edinburgh, and Glasgow) have included nearly all the trios, quartets, quintets, and double quartets of Mozart, Beethoven, Spohr, and Mendelssohn, many quartets by Haydn, Dussek, Cherubini, Schubert, Spohr, E. J. Loder, A. Mellon, &c. the most celebrated sonatas and other compositions for pianoforte, solo or concerted, by Mozart, Beethoven, Woelfl, Steibelt, Dussek, Clementi, Pinto, Hummel, Weber, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Sterndale Bennett, Macfarren, &c., and several of the harpsichord works of Handel, Scarlatti, and Sebastian Bach, together with a large number of songs, duets, and other vocal pieces from the ancient and modern schools of Italy, Germany, France, and England. As executants, in every department, the most eminent artists have been provided, engagements having been contracted with renowned performers abroad as well as at home. A constant attendance at St. James's-hall throughout a series of Monday Popular Concerts was, therefore, equivalent to a varied course of lectures on the chamber-music of the great masters, with practical illustrations by the first professors of the day."

The "Lecture" on the present occasion, the 65th in London, brought, as usual, a vast crowd of amateurs to St. James's-hall, and proved as delightful as any of its predecessors. Although, shortly after the commencement of the last movement of the final quartet, "Professor Vieuxtemps" was compelled to give out a strong hint that music, and especially good music, was intended to be heard, and could only be heard properly in the absence of disturbing elements, a more attentive audience has rarely been assembled. We should be the last to advocate any official or officious meddling with the privilege of "those who pay" to sit out just so much and no more of an entertainment than may afford them satisfaction; but we cannot but think that the subjoined "notice," included in the "analytical programmes," suggests an expedient the due observance of which would not only be easy in itself but meet every emergency.

"It is respectfully suggested that such persons as are not desirous of remaining till the end of the performance can leave either before the commencement of the last instrumental piece, or between any two of the movements, so that those who wish to hear the whole may do so without interruption."

Now, as something like a majority of ten to one were anxious to hear the quartet to the very end, it was hard that their enjoyment should be interfered with by a noise of receding feet, when such an interruption might have been rendered altogether unnecessary had the very reasonable petition above cited been complied with. That the feeling was unanimously in favour of Mr. Vieuxtemps when he arrested the progress of the finale was shown by the loud and prolonged plaudits that greeted him for this act of artistic courage from every part of the hall. The programme was as follows: —

Part I. — Quartet in A minor, Op. 13 (strings) Mendelssohn; song, "Now Phœbus sinketh in the west," Arne; song, "Se il padre perdei," Mozart; sonata, in E flat, Op. 7 (pianoforte) Beethoven.

Part II. — Sonata in G major (violin and pianoforte) Dussek; song, "The Three Ages of Love," E. J. Loder; song, "Zulcika," Mendelssohn; quartet, in F major (strings) Haydn.—Conductor, Mr. Benedict.

Each piece in the foregoing being a chef d'œuvre in its way, and the whole so well balanced that one work formed an agreeable relief to the other, the selection was one of varied and continuous interest; so much so that in the course of a performance two hours and a half in duration there was not a dull moment. Perhaps among all the extraordinary achievements of Mendelssohn's early youth, the quartet in A minor—which begins and ends with the expressive little ballad, "Ist es wahr?"—is the most extraordinary. The first and last movements are more than remarkable enough to have been produced by one so young; but the adagio and intermezzo (the first of the Mendelssohnian "scherzos"), viewed under the circumstances, are really prodigies. Throughout the quartet we cannot fail to observe the strong influence exercised by Beethoven's later writings on the mind of the young composer; and, perhaps, if we except Schubert's quartet in the same key, no composition on record presents (without plagiary, be it understood) so many features in common with the so-called "Posthumous" quartets of the author of Fidelio as this very work of Mendelssohn. Its first introduction at the Monday Popular Concerts was a brilliant success. The "intermezzo" was rapturously encored, and every movement applauded with enthusiasm. M. Vieuxtemps (first violin) never played more magnificently. By this one performance—which exhibited intellectual culture and executive proficiency in equal proportions—he justified all the praises that have been lavished on his talent, and stamped his reappearance among us as a legitimate artistic triumph. He was most admirably supported by Herr Ries (second violin), Mr. Webb (viola), and M. Paque (violoncello). The cheerful and masterly quartet of "Papa Hadyn," with which the concert terminated, was forcibly contrasted with the more passionate and soaring inspiration of Mendelssohn, was just as finely played, just as warmly received, and showed that the powdered wig of the staid sexagenarian when covering a head full of poetry could exercise as great a charm in its way as the flowing locks of the aspiring and romantic youth.

M. Hallé was the pianist, in stating which we have said enough to convince our musical readers that the beautiful sonata of Beethoven (played, as usual, from memory) was given throughout with the facility of a practised master and the reading of a profound musician. The favour which this gentleman enjoys with the public was manifested in the tremendous burst of applause that awaited him on his appearance in the orchestra, and was renewed at the end of every movement of the sonata. One of the greatest treats of the evening was the execution, by MM. Hallé and Vieuxtemps, of the fresh and vigorous sonata of Dussek, for the rescue of which from unmerited oblivion the director of the Monday Popular Concerts is as fully entitled to the gratitude of musicians and lovers of good music as for the same good office rendered some time since to its companion (in B flat), belonging to the same "Op. 69," which now, after half a century of silence, is probably as often heard in public as any composition for pianoforte and violin extant. Mr. Chappell may be reminded that there is a trio in F, and also a quartet in E flat, from the same pen, which have not yet been introduced at the Monday Popular Concerts.

The vocal music was capital. Mademoiselle Florence Lancia (her first appearance at these concerts) is an artist in the truest sense of the word. In the fine air of Ilia, from Mozart's Idomeneo (to which the great composer makes special allusion in one of the interesting letters to Leopold Mozart, his father), and in Mendelssohn's plaintive "Zuleika" (No. 1), she elicited, by her chaste and expressive singing, an equal measure of sympathy and applause. In the first she seemed a little nervous; but in the last she was completely mistress of her powers. Mr. Winn, one of our most talented and improving bass-singers, was also deservedly successful, not only with the genial and melodious air from Dr. Arne's Comus (which has a touch of Handel, his giant contemporary, about it, but with the poetical ballad of Mr. Loder. The task of accompaniment at the pianoforte was, as from the first institution of the Monday Popular Concerts, undertaken by Mr. Benedict, to replace whom with advantage would be simply impossible. At the next concert (November 25th) the programme is to be exclusively selected from the works of Mozart.

Provincial.

The Manchester Guardian has the following:—

"At Mr. Charles Hallé's last concert in Free Trade Hall the overture and incidental music to A Midsummer Night's Dream formed the chief attraction. Mr. Hallé has once or twice before introduced this beautiful music, but never with so admirable a band. From the character of the work it must be obvious that the means brought to bear upon it with a view to its full realisation must be of no common order, and we pay Mr. Hallé's band no ordinary compliment when we say that they did realise the composer's conceptions in a degree that reflects the greatest credit upon them. The scherzo, the nocturne, the movement representing the search of Hermia for Lysander, and the 'Wedding March,' were all represented with great intelligence and skill. The vocal music was allotted to Miss Banks, Mrs. Warren, and a chorus selected from Mr. Hallé's choir, who performed their parts worthily. Two movements from Hummel's Septet stood next in importance to Mendelssohn's work. With a pianist of Mr. Hallé's calibre, supported as he was by six such accomplished performers on their respective instruments as MM. De Tong, Lavigne, Grieben, Baltens, Vieuxtemps (violoncello), and Waud, the scherzo and andante were sure to lose nothing; and the only feeling at the close was that of regret that the whole composition had not been played. The overture to Oberon, and the Sirène (Auber), were all that could be desired. Mr. Hallé's two solos—S. Heller's Wanderstunden and one of Liszt's Valses Caprices (or Schubert) — he has often given before, but never better. With what poetry he invests Heller's little composition, and how brilliant and varied the valse! The oboe solo of M. Lavigne was fully equal, if not superior, to any of its predecessors, which is saying no little. Miss Banks sang three pieces with her usual care, finish, and delicacy, 'Come per me sereno,' especially showing considerable fluency as well as expression. Mr. Hallé intends, at the next concert, to introduce the whole of the music to Der Freischütz."

The Brighton Guardian writes of Herr Derffel's "Second Pianoforte Recital" thus :—

"The second of Herr Derffel's 'Recitals' took place on Thursday afternoon, and, though the programme contained less attractive because less well-known compositions, the performance was equally striking and admirable as on the occasion of the previous 'Recital.' In music of so high a class as Herr Derffel makes his study, the ear requires the education of years to appreciate the execution of such intricacies of art and sound, and therefore the Sonata in E minor, Op. 90, and the Fantasia, Op. 77, were less effective than more familiar favourites would have been, though the interpretation of their beauties by Herr Derffel was so masterly as to leave nothing to be desired. A selection from Mendelssohn's Songs without words was exquisitely played. We hardly know which to praise most, the Presto in E No. 3, book 3, with its fire and vigour, or the Duetto, so full of feeling and expression. One of the richest treats was Chopin's Grand Polonaise in E flat. 'La Campanella,' by Taubert, was a most brilliant and charming 'étude,' and the 'Recital' terminated with Beethoven's Mercia alla Turca, from the Ruins of Athens. Signor Pietro Fortuna was the vocalist, and was encored in the 'Tarentella' of Rossini, the brilliant accompaniment of which was delightfully played by Herr Derffel."

Mr. John Towers, musical critic of The Brighton Gazette, gives a long and interesting report of Mrs. Martha Blundell's concert, from which we extract the following :—

"Mrs. Blundell, organist of St. Andrew's Chapel, Waterloo Street, gave her annual concert last Friday evening, at the Town Hall, on which occasion she was honored with a numerous and fashionable attendance. The star of the evening was Mad. Arabella Goddard, who has reached the highest pinnacle of fame as a pianist. Only two pieces were put down for her. In the first she played two of Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte — in E flat, No. 1, Book 6, and in A major, No. 6, Book 5. In the second part she performed a solo of Liszt on airs from Rigoletto (better suited to the 'classical taste of the Brighthelmstonian dilettanti'), in which she poured forth all her great powers of execution, displaying an amount of mechanical skill rarely heard in the present day. The working-up of the crescendos was equal to anything we have ever heard, and finely contrasted with the delicacy she displayed in the piano passages. Whether we regard the rapidity and clearness with which she ran the chromatic scale, her powerful double octaves, the lightness of fingering with the right hand, sweeping over the keys with almost lightning rapidity, or the shower of notes she occasionally produced — they were alike astonishing, and at once stamped the artist as a performer of transcendent talent. All this was accomplished without the slightest apparent effort, and we need scarcely say that her hearers were enraptured, and the exccutant was rewarded with an unmistakeable encore. Mad. Goddard obeyed the request, and then treated her hearers to some variations on Scotch melodies. Some of the upper notes we could compare only to the trickling of drops of water. She retired from the platform amidst a storm of applause. The fantasia of Liszt is immensely difficult. It was, we believe, the last composition of Liszt, and M. Edouard de Paris was the first to perform it in England, at his concert last year. M. de Paris was one of the conductors of the concert, and played a fantasia of his own from Martha. Though late in the evening, he was listened to with very great pleasure, and received a full share of applause. The only other instrumental soloist was Signor Regondi, who performed two solos on the concertina and one on the guitar. A greater genius than Regondi, as an instrumentalist, never lived, but we have sung his praises so often that we have no more words to express our admiration of his wonderful talent. He was immensely applauded. Mad. Badia contributed two or three pieces; though her voice may be deficient in roundness of tone, she is an artist in the fullest sense of the word. Mrs. Blundell gave a recitative and rondo of Paesiello. Her voice was scarcely equal to the recitative, the mezzo being too weak to produce effect, but in the rondo some of her upper notes told very well, and she was much applauded at the close of the piece. She also sang, with considerable expression a ballad called 'The Forsaken.' Mr. Wilbye Cooper sang Benedict's recitative and scena from Undine, 'From worldly cares and toils afar,' in a manner that would have done credit to Giuglini. Mr. Lawler sang Mozart's 'Qui sdegno,' from the Flauto Magico, with considerable expression and depth of tone. Some concerted pieces were given, and Signor Badia took part as a conductor."

A Correspondent from Cheltenham sends us the following :—

A Concert was given at the Assembly Rooms on Monday evening last, by Messrs. Hale and Co.; Miss Anna Whitty, Miss Reeves, Herr Reichardt, and Herr Formes made up the vocalists, and M. Ole Bull and M. Emile Berger the instrumentalists. The performance was excellent throughout, and the audience were thoroughly pleased. Miss Whitty sang a brilliant rondo of Paesiello's with great effect. She has a capital voice and a good style, with a dash of the dramatic in her singing, which commends it strongly. Miss Reeves, too (Mrs. Tennant, if I mistake not, wife of the popular tenor, Mr. Tennant, and sister of the great tenor, Mr. Sims Reeves), sang very charmingly Mr. Hatton's ballad, "The Sailor's Wife," and the old Scotch song, "Within a mile o' Edinbro' Town." Herr Reichardt sang three songs of his own composition—"The golden stars," "Are they meant but to deceive mē," and "Thou art so near." The last was encored unanimously. These songs indicate a genuine mine of tune in the admirable German tenor, who is now turning his newly-discovered talent to eminent advantage. "Thou art so near, and yet so far," has become one of the most favourite songs of the day, and we feel confident the popularity of Herr Reichardt as a composer will not halt with that. "The golden stars" is a highly attractive air of a solemn and abstract character; while "Are they meant but to deceive me," is a sort of Mazurka Polonoise highly attractive and catching. Herr Reichardt sings these songs to perfection. His style is purity itself, and if some tenors can surpass him in power and quality of voice, few, indeed, display such artistic capabilities, and such fine feeling and expression. Herr Formes, of course, was the great gun of the concert. His magnificent voice and very grand singing were exhibited in the air from the Zauberflöte, "In diesen heil'gen Hallen," and in a ballad of his own composing, called "In sheltered vale," both of which were applauded to the echo. Among the ensemble pieces, a new trio by Signor Randegger, entitled "I Naviganti," capitally sung by Miss Anna Whitty, Herr Reichardt, and Herr Formes, is worthy of especial mention. M. Ole Bull played two pieces with wonderful mechanical skill and immense effect; while M. Emile Berger, in addition to accompanying all the music, played his own pianoforte solo, "Les Echos de Londres." There was a very large attendance.

From the Western Morning News of Plymouth we learn that :—

"Miss Julia Bleaden, Messrs. Alfred and Henry Nicholson (oboe and flute), and Mr. G. Collins (violoncello), gave a concert, at the Globe Hotel Assembly Rooms, on Monday evening. Both music and singing were excellent; in fact, superior to anything ever heard here. A rather curious occurrence took place whilst Miss Bleaden was singing 'Ye banks and braes;" the gaslights began suddenly to dance, and after continuing to jump and flicker for some two or three minutes, the lights were extinguished, but did not leave the audience in total darkness, for the moon, which was at full, shone brilliantly into the room. A fantasia on the violoncello was played by Mr. Collins."

TRIESTE.—Meyerbeer's Prophet was produced at the Opera House on the 17th inst. The mise en scene was not such as to meet with the approbation of the audience. A rebellious sun that refused obstinately to shine at the right moment, and when it did, gave but a spasmodic illumination, excited loud expressions of discontent. Mad. Csillag and Signor Negrini, who sustained respectively the principal soprano and tenor rôles, were immensely successful and greatly applauded whenever they appeared, the audience apparently wishing to show that they fully appreciated the talent of these artists, while they condemned the false economy of the management.

EMILE BERGER'S NEW PIANO SOLO,

"LES ECHOS DE LONDRES."

This new fantasia was composed expressly for M. Ole Bull, Herr Formes, Mr. and Mrs. Tennant, and Miss Anna Whitty's provincial tour. It has been played by Mr. Emile Berger (as well as the transcription of Ferrari's popular serenade "Vieni, Vieni") every where with the greatest success, and has invariably been encored.

"The introduction of the two popular melodies, 'Gentle Annie' and 'Dixy's Land,' was a happy idea of Mr. Berger. The audience were delighted, and the applause was so great that the talented pianist was obliged to return to the platform and repeat the fantasia, to the great delight of the audience."—Sheffield Paper.

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Nov. 28, 1861.

GLUCK'S Alceste continues to attract the truly musical public, not only from all parts of France, but from the principal cities of Europe; and so marked and evident is the attraction which it exerts, that special trains are organised for the purpose of enabling the inhabitants of the various departments to pay a visit to the Imperial Opera and return to their homes at a small cost and without delay. This exemplifies a curious feature in modern theatrical history, which is, that the theatres of the capital, both in France and England, are now almost entirely supported by country visitors. The influence, therefore, exerted on them formerly by the taste of the élite of the intellectual part of the nation supposed to reside in the metropolis is swamped by this ever-changing and indiscriminate multitude. Hence the manifest decadence in the quality of the dramatic productions of the day. Why is music by the same general causes a gainer, and evidently in the ascendant as regards quality? A nice question this for æsthetical and philosophical analysis. But to return to Glück. An interesting letter has just been published, addressed by the great classic to "l'Anonyme de Vaugirard," under which name Suard was wont to address the public. Here is a translation of this epistle:—

Monsieur,—When I had learned to regard music not only as the art of amusing the sense of hearing but as one of the most powerful means of touching the heart and stirring the feelings, and that I consequently adopted a different method of writing, I turned my attention to the stage, I sought to attain power and grandeur of expression, and I especially endeavoured to connect all the separate parts of my works as one whole. I saw arrayed against me the singers, male and female, and a great number of professors; but all the intellectual and lettered world of Germany and Italy without exception quite compensated me by their praises and by the marks of esteem which they bestowed upon me. This was not the case in France. If indeed there are some men of letters here whose support should certainly console me for the loss of that of the rest, yet a great number have declared against me.

It must be taken for granted that these gentlemen are more felicitous when they treat of other matters; for if I am to judge by the reception with which the public has been good enough to greet my works, the said public does not take much account either of their phrases or of their opinions. But what think you, Monsieur, of the late sally which one of them, M. de la Harpe, has made against me? A pleasant fellow is this same learned Doctor de la Harpe. He talks of music in a way to make all the singing boys of Europe shrug their shoulders with contempt; and he says "I require," and he says "my doctrine."

Et pueri nasum rhinocerontis habent. Are you not going to address a few words to him, Monsieur—you who have defended me against him with such marked success? Ah! let me entreat you, if my music has afforded you any pleasure, to put me in a position to show my connoisseur friends in Germany and in Italy, that there are among the literary men of France some one or two who, when treating of art, know at any rate what they are writing about.

I have the honour to be with great esteem and gratitude, Monsieur, your very humble and obedient servant,

CHEVALIER GLUCK.

We would like to see the answer of Suard to this characteristic letter. The musical critic who furnishes the composer's appeal to his defender promises some day to publish the response. M. d'Ortigues, if the public are good children, will give them this treat. So let us be patient and wait,

M. Dulaurens, a new tenor, who made his début in the summer of this year in Guillaume Tell and in Robert, has apparently been definitively engaged by the manager of the Imperial Opera, as he has been singing in the former opera with M. Faure. It is said that this engagement has been made at the cost of no little difficulty and expense. The Strasbourg theatre, it would seem, had established a prior claim to the services of the fortunate tenor, and after a trial the Imperial Opera have had to pay 20,000f., the forfeit stipulated in the articles of his previous engagement. He is very young, and has yet to work hard before he can take his stand as a really first-class tenor. At present neither his style of singing nor the quality of his upper notes entitles him to such a rank; but with pains and considering the opportunities now before him, much may be hoped for.

At last "Choregraph Borri"—that mysterious entity whose advent was to work a complete revolution in the world of pink muslin and entrechats by the marvellous novelty of his conceptions—has made himself manifest in the work on which he has been so long engaged—the ballet of L'Etoile de Messine, which was produced last week—and may be said to have quite fulfilled the prophecies which announced his superiority to all choregraphs his predecessors. In the first place, Choregraph Borri deserves a testimonial from all civilised communities in which ballet has hitherto been cultivated, for the simple act of banishing from his resources the male solo dancer, that abomination of abominations—that revolting libel on the sex with which he so shamefully equivocates. His place is taken by a woman,—a very pretty and graceful one in this instance,—Mlle. Schlosser, and, if she assume in her fantasy the male habit or a sort of Amazonian version of it, we are not shocked at the assumption, but take it as a compliment. The windings and interlacings customary between the principal danseuse and her partner, when the latter is one of her own sex playfully disguised, cease to nauseate, and the gushing joyousness of the ballerina's evolutions is not poisoned by that element of bitterness,—that amari aliquid in silken tights and flowing hair,—a male dancer. This, if nothing else, will endear the name of Borri to future generations. It is true that once or twice something very like a premier danseur whom we have before shuddered at under the name of M. Merante made his appearance, and pirouetted in a wild and abandoned manner; but this must have been a delusion, or an emanation from his indignant spirit, taking the likeness of his bodily self and protesting violently against the innovation. There is no necessity, I presume, to give the plot of this new ballet, which is much like all other productions of the same class. The scenery, however, and mise en scène are in many respects superior to the average of ballets in general. The groups and the dancers are in the highest degree ingenious and novel, and fully bear out the reputation of the ballet master by whom they have been devised. Mad. Ferraris eclipses all her former brilliant deeds, and shows herself both a danseuse of astounding gymnastic powers, combined with unfailing grace, and a pantomimist of real dramatic power. In short, L'Etoile de Messine, much as it has been talked about, has in no particular disappointed expectation. It may be brought forward as a token of the interest created by this work previous to its production, that the Maestro Rossini, who rarely visits a theatre, was induced to be present at the full dress rehearsal, when he was received with enthusiastic shouts and clapping of hands, and the orchestra played the overture to Guillaume Tell. To the composer of the music, Count Gabrielli, the greatest praise is due for the sparkling and graceful waltzes, polkas, and tarantellas which it introduces, and for the good taste with which he has sobered down the colouring of the whole, so as to challenge no rivalry, or attempt to divert attention from the splendour of the scene.

The Théâtre Lyrique has been reviving Halévy's opera of La Jaquarita, an event promised long since, but which had been continually postponed owing to the illness of Mad. Cabel, without whose exceptional powers of execution the revival would not have been compassable in the absence of any other prima donna capable of equal feats of vocal acrobatism. This opera is in fact one of the worst specimens of that odious tour de force school for which the Théâtre Lyrique became the arena from its commencement under Adolphe Adam, and to which, after an interval of pseudo Glückism, it now returns after the manner of the sow and the dog in the powerful figure of the Scriptures. Such perverted productions as these, in which the voice is treated as an instrument of brass or wood intended to obey merely mechanical impulses rather than the grand and noble organ of human emotion, have ruined all the best singers whom France has recently produced, and by all who have any regard for pure art ought to be energetically reprobated. Let the Blondins and Leotards astonish us with their physical agility—they are fit for nothing else; but let such singers as Marie Cabel delight us by the enforced beauty of their voices and the skill with which they can make them interpret the pure and undefiled language of music.

At the Italian Opera the production of Rigoletto has given the public an opportunity of judging of the extent of Signor Delle Sedie's dramatic powers by a test of no little severity, and he may be said to have triumphantly passed the difficult ordeal, for he surprised the audience by the power he exhibited both as actor and a singer. Mad. Alboni's impersonation of Maddalena, in which she makes up for the somewhat redundant charms with which she invests that treacherous damsel by her exquisite execution of the music, was as usual one of the principal features of the performance.

Mlle. Augustine Brohan, of whom an affection of the eyes has for some time mournfully bereft the Théâtre Française, has returned, and had the audience consisted entirely of sufferers optically afflicted as the bright and brilliant actress was erewhile, the sight of her would have effected an instantaneous cure. When she has sore eyes again—I hope she never may—let her look at her pleasant face in the glass, and set up a new school of medicine, on the principle of ipsa ipsissimis curantur.

MUSIC IN BERLIN.

(From our own Correspondent.)

DESPITE the fact that Spontini's Nurmahal is certainly not one of his best compositions, and that even his admirers do not pretend to claim for it a very high position among works of art, its revival has proved a hit, and must, by this time, have brought an exceedingly large sum into the treasury of the Royal Opera-house. The magnificence of its scenery, the splendour of the dresses, the pomp and glitter of the processions in it, and the extreme care with which it has been put upon the stage, have created quite a sensation among the worthy Berliners, and the consequence is that they, their wives, and little ones, flock to witness it, and fill the house at every performance. Verily, Nurmahal has proved a trump card for Herr von Hilsen, Intendant of the Theatres Royal appertaining to his Majesty of Prussia. It will be repeated a great many times yet, I should say, before it is again shelved, en attendant another coronation.

We have had an excellent representation of C. M. v. Weber's last opera — the song of the dying swan — Oberon, to wit. The orchestra, under the direction of Herr Dorn, interpreted this romantic and ideal composition in a most beautiful and admirable manner. Their execution of the first few bars of the overture showed how they were going to play on that particular evening, for you must, of course, have observed that orchestras, "like one man," have their good and bad days, just as singers, actors, preachers, and all other persons who occupy a conspicuous place before the public, not forgetting learned dogs, educated pigs, talking fish and — precociously clever children, who sometimes execute with wonderful success and talent — so their parents, at least, think — the tricks and accomplishments they have been taught (for the express purpose, I firmly believe, of annoying their visitors), while, at others, they stick fast and disappoint all the fond expectations cherished by the authors of their being. I am sorry I cannot speak highly of those behind the float, as of those before it. The part of Rezia is not suited to Mad. Köster, and, although she is too experienced and talented an artist to offend, she certainly failed to please. Herr Krause was Scherasmin, but he is not always equal to the music of the part. As Oberon, the Fairy King, Herr Krüger acquitted himself satisfactorily, which is more than can be said — with truth, bien entendu — either of Mlle. Pollak, as Fatima, once played so well by poor Mad. Vestris, or of Herr Woworski, as the gallant Huon. The ballet and chorus were, as, with rare exceptions, is always the case, deserving of high praise.

The programme for the week in the way of Italian opera has comprised La Cenerentola, La Traviata and Il Barbiere. Signora Trebelli was the Cinderella, and anything more maidenly, more charming, more entrancing, than her impersonation, it is impossible to conceive. Play and vocalisation were alike incomparable; at least, so I think, and I am not the only one of that opinion. In fact, it would be difficult to find anybody of the contrary one. But the Royal Opera-house is not the only establishment in this capital which now boasts of Italian opera. On the other side the Spree, the transpontine Victoria Theatre resounds with the voices of Signor Lorini's company, of which, if I am not mistaken, wenn ich mich nicht irre,—pardon me a bit of German,—I forwarded you "a full true, and correct list," as they say on the race-course, some short time since. The opening performance consisted of portions of Guillaume Tell, the police having forbidden the representation of the opera in its entirety. On the second night there was a very scanty attendance, either because the public did not approve of the pasticcio presented to them, because their favourite, Signora Artôt did not sing, or because, finally, they have lately had more than enough of Italian operas. There was also every chance of a "row," in consequence of all the scenes mentioned in the bills not being performed. For instance, in the third act alone, the Tyrolienne, the quartet and the finale were omitted, without the slightest preparatory notice, and, when the curtain fell upon the tenor air, every one looked round with astonishment at his neighbour. But surprise speedily gave place to indignation, when the musicians tumbled out of the orchestra, taking their instruments with them. If the management treat their audience in this fashion again, I should say that it is far from impossible, nay, that it is extremely probable, they will soon not have an audience at all, and may quietly bring their season to a close at once. Herr Wachtel made a hit as Arnold, and thus fully justified the expectations of his numerous admirers. One great element of his success is the extensive range of his voice, which enables him to give all the high notes on which the composer relied for such brilliant effects. He was greatly applauded. Signor Merly sung the baritone part exceedingly well, but played it execrably. The consequence was that he quite spoiled the touching scene before the shooting of the apple. Signora Cordier (Mathilda) possesses a sweet and agreeable voice, but she has yet a great deal to learn before she can be called a singer. The two darkest spots upon the performance were the band and chorus. For grand opera they both require augmentation, and many more rehearsals than they appeared to have had.

The annual Mendelssohn Festival which Herr Stern, with his Association celebrated, as usual, on the anniversary of the great musician's death, gave proof, like everything Herr Stern undertakes, of a course of preparation as conscientious as truly artistic. Besides the vocal pieces, executed by the Association, Herr von Bülow was especially engaged for instrumental music. This year Herr Stern had selected some of the less generally performed of Mendelssohn's works. The night-song, "Vergangen ist der lichte Tag," arranged for chorus by Herr Stern, and the eight-part psalm, "Richte mich, Gott," afforded the most satisfactory evidence of what the Association is capable in the way of a capella singing. The song and psalm produced a deep impression. The choral pieces were varied by vocal solos. Mlle. Biondini, from the Italian Opera, Paris, sang an Italian air with telling effect. Mad. Wüerst sang two songs, and then there was a duet from the grand Lobgesang. Mlle. Strahl and Herr Otto did justice to it. There were three accompanied choral pieces. A finale to the unfinished opera of Loreley, wound up the concert. This finale is particularly interesting on account of the doubts which, as we all know, were entertained by the critics of the day, as well as by Mendelssohn himself, with regard to his power of composing operatic music. By the way, before concluding my account of this concert, I may mention that the pieces played by Herr von Bülow were the Prelude and Fugue in E minor, and Liszt's fantasia on A Midsummer Night's Dream.

You know that Herr von Konstki has gone to St. Petersburg. Before setting out he gave a concert in the Singacademie, to a very crowded audience. Besides a number of "show pieces," belonging to the modern virtuoso school, he played, in a very satisfactory manner, fugues by Bach and Handel. Signora Biondini sang two songs, and Herr Stahlknecht performed two charming original compositions for the violoncello.

Herr von Bülow has given the first of his course of three soirées; he has no one to help him, and whatever is put down in the programme is executed by himself. The first concert was a historical one, inasmuch it introduced to the audience, in chronological order, pieces for the pianoforte by Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, Liszt, Paganini, Ehlert, and Raff. For a wonder, there was no work from the pen of Herr von Bülow himself, a fact for which, I frankly own, I found no difficulty in consoling myself; for, even as it was, the concert lasted two mortal hours, and toujours Bülow is too much of a good thing.

The king has been somewhat active in art matters lately. He has bestowed upon Herr von Kontski the Order of the Crown, third class; he has given Herr R. Wüerst the large gold medal for Arts and Sciences; he has granted Herr August Schöffer the title of Royal Musical director; and he has accepted the dedication of a "Coronation Song"—a vocal quartet—music by Herr J. Urban, words by the Rev. Herr Hanstein. I wonder when we shall hear the last of the Coronation. Parole d'honneur, although I am by no means a man of disloyal sentiments, I am beginning to find it rather a bore.

According to report, J. Bott's new opera, Actäa, das Mädchen von Corinth, will very shortly be produced at the Royal Opera house. The part of the heroine will be sustained by Mad. Harriers-Wippern. Weber's Euryanthe is to be revived, with Mad. Köster as Eglantine, and Mad. Harriers-Wippern as Euryanthe. The ballet entitled Die Liebeshändel, with music by Gährich, is to be revived—"and that's all!" as Buckstone says, in The Rough Diamond.

SALVE.

THE NEW CONCERT-HALL AT FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.

AFTER innumerable difficulties of all descriptions, the new Concert Hall, built by a Joint-stock Company, is so far completed as to be opened for public use. It has been erected by Herren Kayser and Schaffner, under the superintendence of Herr Burnitz, the architect, who carried out the plan sent in by a Hungarian confrère, Herr Skalniski, who gained the prize of 200 ducats awarded to the best design, and which had wisely been put up for public competition.

The following account of the building may prove interesting to our readers:—

Passing through a spacious vestibule, which contains the pay places, the porter's residence, and cloak rooms for some 1,600 persons, the visitor arrives at the grand stone staircase, the principal branch of which is 19 feet, and the side branches each 11 feet broad.

From a vestibule 42 feet broad and 16 feet deep, on the first floor, the visitor reaches the large concert hall, 150 feet long, 50 feet high, and 57 feet broad. Around it runs a gallery, under which are 26 boxes. The gallery is connected with the vestibule by a staircase 7 feet broad. Including the gallery, the hall is 177 feet long and 80 feet broad.

For the use of the singers at concerts there is a "podium," or platform, one part being permanent and the other removable at pleasure. Above it is the place of the orchestra; and opposite the latter, at the entrance of the hall, another gallery. Including the galleries, the hall is calculated to accommodate about 2,500 persons.

Both the hall itself and the galleries communicate with various cloak and refreshment rooms.

There is great facility of egress, since the nine outlets of the hall, besides being connected with the grand staircase, communicate with a so-called elliptic staircase, 7 feet broad, leading into the Schlessinger Gasse.

The principal building is surmounted by a flat roof, to which access is gained by a separate staircase, and from which there is a magnificent prospect. Besides the large concert room, there is a smaller one 36 feet broad, 62 feet long, and 36 feet high, and, also, placed over the carriage entrance, a third concert room, 45 feet broad, 57 feet long, and 25 feet high, lighted from above. The refreshment department is situate upon the ground floor, and comprises five rooms, one of which is 47 feet long and 27 feet broad.

The building was opened, on the 18th inst., with Haydn's Creation. Its acoustic qualities, as far as it is possible to judge from one performance, are satisfactory. The solos in the oratorio were entrusted to Mad. Zottmayer-Hartmann, Herren Schneider and Hill; while the choruses were sung by the members of the Cecilien-Verein and Rühl's-Verein.

BRUNSWICK.—Herr Richard Wagner's Tannhäuser has been played in the new theatre, but met with only moderate success.

VIENNA.—On the 10th instant, Haydn's Seasons formed the attraction at the first Subscription Concert of the Gesellschaft der Musik freunde, under the direction of Herr Herbeck. The selection of this work afforded universal satisfaction. The soprano part was undertaken by Mlle. von Leutner, a young lady who is a stranger to Vienna. She possesses a pleasing voice, and, although deficient in anything like depth of feeling, acquitted herself, on the whole, in a very creditable manner. Herr Walter was the tenor, and Herr Panzer the bass. Both these gentlemen were deserving of praise, which is more than can be said of the chorus. The consequence was that the audience were by no means in ecstacies with the performance in its integrity, although they manifested in an unmistakeable fashion their delight with the work itself. The season of the Singacademie, under the direction of Herr Stegmayer, began on the 15th instant, when the following was the programme: "Magnificat," by Durante; "Crucifixus," by Lotti; "Festlied," by Eckert; "Christe eleison," by Benevoli; chorus, by J. S. Bach; "Tenebræ factæ sunt," by M. Haydn; "Ave Maria," by Mendelssohn; "Weihnachtslied," by Calvisius; Aria and chorus from Blumner's oratorio Abraham, and fugue, by Handel. The execution of the foregoing works satisfied all reasonable expectations. The hair-breadth precision, so to speak, which is necessary to give due effect to some passages in the choruses, is not easily attained by a dilettante society; for though, as a collective body, it may be fired with genuine artistic enthusiasm, still the members, individually, do not look upon their appearance at the weekly practice as an absolute duty which they have imposed on themselves. However, they had indisputably made considerable progress since last winter. It was evident that they had not been idle, but had determined, by conscientious study, to do justice to the programme, and the spirit in which it had been composed. The attendance of the public was very large, and their satisfaction warmly expressed. The pieces most applauded were the "Crucifixus," the "Tenebræ factæ sunt," and the "Ave Maria," which were encored.—The Philharmonic Concerts, also, have commenced for the season. On the occasion of the first concert, the other day, a long file of vehicles and a dense crowd of well-dressed pedestrians, wended their way, at twelve o'clock, to the Spitalplatz, for the purpose of paying their homage to the "divine art," and, also, if the truth be told, to the nimbus with which the title, Philharmonic Concerts, is surrounded in the Austrian capital. It is a strange fact, but ever since the time when Nicolai produced such a sensation with his Philharmonic Concerts, the designation has been musically sanctified or consecrated, and, at present, exercises upon half critics and ignorant lovers of music a certain charm which remains unimpaired, even should the performance be not moderately good. The half-critics bow their heads with due reverence directly the Kärntnerthor Orchestra begin tuning their instruments, while the ignorant lovers of music aforesaid, intoxicated with ecstacy, revel in a source of enjoyment which they share with the élite of the fashionable and intellectual world, and the classical value of which is almost officially guaranteed. The power of custom and fashion combine to procure for the Philharmonic Concerts an audience, which, if chemically analysed, would be found not overwhelmingly actuated by a genuine love of music itself. However, it is a great thing to be able to attract, and the fact of the public flocking so eagerly to listen to concerts of this description, must inevitably end in giving them a taste for good music for its own sake, and thus advance the cause of the art. Thus, what would be a mere foolish fashion, will result in a great and permanent good, at which every true and loyal friend of art must sincerely rejoice. The programme of the first concert was thus composed: Overture, Op. 124, Beethoven; Concerto for stringed instruments, by Bach; Aria, with violin obbligato, by Mozart; overture to Anacreon, by Cherubini; and symphony in C, by Schumann. The way in which the above programme was executed redounded to the credit of everyone concerned, more especially to that of Herr Dessoff, who discharged the duties of conductor with even more than his usual ability and self-possession. The audience appeared highly pleased, although not enthusiastic. It is not often that members of the musical profession, especially those belonging to the fairer sex, get into trouble for mingling runs, shakes and other fioriture with politics. They do so sometimes, it would appear from the following little episode. Mlle. Rübsamen-Weith is engaged at the opera-house in Cassel. Having nothing to do there at the time, she took part in the concert given at Cologne, in honour of the King and Queen of Prussia. On learning this fact, the Elector became exceedingly irate, and, in addition to a sharp reproof, inflicted a fine of 50 thalers upon the fair political offender! This mark of Electoral displeasure must, doubtless, not only have caused Mlle. Rübsamen-Weith to tremble in her bottines, but have struck terror even into the bosom of the King of Prussia himself.—From an occasional Correspondent.

MANNHEIM.—M. Gounod's Fausto has been played four times with success.

LETTERS FROM AN AMERICAN IN LONDON.*

No. 9.

(See MUSICAL WORLD, Nov. 23.)

A LONG interruption! But, having recovered from the rollings of Leviathan, and having devoted a long and tedious episode to the monster—a readable story perhaps by way of change, but too subjectively told, I fear, in the effort to avoid repetition of the newspapers—I may now resume the record where it was rudely broken off. Or shall I say, my musical fruit gathering, after that equinoctial gale has shaken all the trees, until the late autumn only yields some dry and rustling leaves, to tell of green summer recollections! A ghastlier smile suggest itself:—is it not like grouping among antideluvian footprints, to go behind that Atlantic episode for musical impressions which it did its best to (literally) wash out? But, it may well be believed, one lofty chain of Ararats, those great Birmingham Oratorios, still reared their heads above the storm, and their bold image should survive the deluge.

Of Birmingham next time perhaps. We must first complete after some fashion, our notes of the summer operas at Covent Garden, of which we have told only the smallest, although the best part. The Don Giovanni nights have been dwelt on as a specimen of the fine way in which such master works are given in this theatre. Then Guillaume Tell was described as the freshest and most interesting event of the season. To me the next most interesting was the never failing old favourite, that sparkling spring of melodies which such as only the happiest genius is blessed withal, the same Rossini's early work, Il Barbiere di Siviglia, as different as can well be imagined from the Tell. This delicious music was rendered from beginning to end, by singers, orchestra and all, with real gusto and with rare perfection. The overture was the genial and bright one which commonly performed, and which was originally written for another opera, called Elisabetta. The real overture to the Barbiere in B flat, I have only heard in Munich (where, by the way, the whole opera was charmingly performed, and with none the less fun and sparkle that the action was not coarsely overdone, and Figaro trusted more to his own cleverness than to the dimensions of his razor, &c.). The warm and rich sonority of Costa's orchestra, the remarkably good tone of nearly every instrument composing it, could reproduce the brilliant, richly blended colours of the Barbiere music to the life. The hero of the evening was Mario. Some of our Boston readers have known what it is to hear the exquisitely florid melody of Almaviva sung by him, as only be can sing it. That was many years ago — not quite a decade—but his voice retains still all its power and sweetness, all its freshness and its manliness, all its delicacy and flexibility. Indeed, the great tenor is yet in his prime, and sings, if possible, with more effectiveness and more expression than ever. What sounds can fall upon the mind more deliciously, bringing back summer night's enchantments, than his hurried notes of recitative and his inimitable air, "Ecco ridente," with which he serenades his mistress in the opening scene? They are warm drops of satisfying golden tone, pure luscious tone, that sink into the soul and make one happy only to recall them—or wretched, that memory is so poor until refreshed by the real rain. Mario sang also in this first act a second senerade, of much more deep and tender quality, usually omitted in most theatres:—and, indeed, who else could sing it. It is interrupted by snatches of Rosina's voice answering, or rather singing to herself, from within. The melody is most unique and beautiful; full of delicate and quaint divisions, which, naturally as they came to Rossini, seem not in his usual vein, and even suggested (it may have been momentary fancy) something of the old Bach flavour. The Rosina was Adelina Patti, whose acting of the part was girl-like, graceful, pretty—a Rosina in the bud, as it were — bright, natural and well conceived, but not fully charged with all the espiègleries which a riper actress finds play for in the character. Musically she achieved a new success in it, although liable to some deductions. Her voice requires transposition of much of the music which is suited to a low mezzo soprano. But the more serious fault was, that she took great liberties with the text, embellishing what is originally as full of embellishment as it well can be. Even if the most finished artists, like Sontag, Alboni, Bosio, may be allowed to riot sometimes in a music so suggestive of the mood, it was hardly good taste for so young a singer to begin with variations on Rossini. Herein Patti had been unwisely advised; left to her own instincts she seems seldom to err against good taste and fitness. This part, of course, afforded fine play for those bright points of vocalisation, those staccato sparkles in the upper octave, &c., which she commands in such perfection, and with which the mass of any audience is sure to be delighted. Yet, on the whole, with all its errors and short comings, how many more fascinating Rosinas can we find? Measured by the maturest standard it lacked much; for such a girl it was wonderful. In some quarters she has been visited by a too severe and sweeping criticism; it can do her no harm if it saves her from her own common places—that is to say, from too frequent trying over of her old and easy triumphs, and provokes her to be earnestly true to herself, still studying what intrinsically is fit in every case, and still a learner. Nothing is more fatal to the real progress of an artist, than to keep pressing certain springs (be they ever so ingenious and peculiarly her own) which she has found are sure to "bring the house down." But Patti has it in her to be much more than a mere effect singer, a mere vocal virtuoso. She already sings with character and feeling; she will do more and more so, if she is not injured by success.

The other parts were: Ronconi as Figaro, nothing could be funnier—fun improved perpetually. His once fine baritone is a ruin, but the singer's art and style are his unmistakably, and the man is so irresistibly clever, every moment of his presence on the stage is full of life, that he is a "chartered libertine," who must be allowed as much farcical extravaganza as he pleases to introduce—perhaps cannot help introducing—into the Factotum's part. Dr. Bartolo was very well done by Signor Ciampi, who has a solid, generous voice; and Don Basilio, though not the unctuous rogue of a Jesuit we have seen sometimes, was another instance of the many-sided stage ability of Signor Tagliafico.

This exhausts the more important list of operas which I had a chance to hear. I find mere pocket memoranda of half a dozen other evenings. Three of them chiefly owed their interest to Patti. One was Flotow's light and pretty, but soon wearisome, opera of Martha. I do not like the character for Patti. To think of her appearing tired of life, an ennuyée (my Lady in the first scene)! And the music, taking the opera as a whole, is just sickening-sweet enough, to make it hardly worth her while to spend her faculties in it. Yet she did sing it marvellously well — especially the "Last rose of summer," which hacknied melody the most finished singer could scarcely make fresh by a more pure, expressive rendering. Mad. Nantier-Didiée made a good Nancy; and Mario put all the charm of sweetness possible into the sentimental part of the lover. Tagliafico was Sir Tristram. Signor Graziani, as Plunkett, did not relieve the dullness of the music. Another character for Patti I could not like: the Traviata; who cares to see the fresh virgin bud transferred into the full blown rose of such false hot-house life! But in the Verdi-an brilliancies and bravuras she astonished by her execution; and she made the sadder scenes and melodies quite touching—so they say — I did not sit through all. Tiberini (tenor) and Graziani (baritone) did not co-operate very inspiringly. But in the Sonnambula, in Bellini's pure and natural melody, the freshest which he wrote, our "little Patti" was at home, and now more fitly placed. It is, next to Zerlina at least, the most agreeable of all her parts, her best success. The music was delicious as she sang it; and every one felt happier and better for it. The house was very full, for this time there was the double charm of Patti and of music worthy of her, music which does not lose its freshness. Her "Ah! non giunge" was of course a brilliant triumph, doubly so on repetition with quite happy variations.

If there were time, I might speak of the wonderful performance of Tamberlik in the part of the Prophet, whose crisp and telling tenor, splendid declamation, and thoroughly manly impersonation, are all that the part could require; also of Czillag's beautiful and impressive rendering of Fides — Czillag, whose inspiration and conception are always in advance of her command of her voice, but who is a charming lyric artist in spite of that. Of the splendour with which this great spectacle opera was put on the stage, too, something might be said. I saw, too, twice the new thing of Verdi, Un Ballo in Maschera. Once at Covent Garden, when Mario not only sang delightfully, but looked most picturesquely, handsome rogue! in his Neapolitan fisherman's disguise. Penco, Didiée and Graziani in the other parts. Once at the Lyceum Theatre, which was opened for a few nights in June, expressly for the sake of trying this new work upon the public, and where the plot was most absurdly transferred to the colonial days in Boston, Massachusetts. (Some even asked if "Maschera" meant Massachusetts)! As for the music, it is neither the best nor the worst of Verdi's operas, and contains some of his most ingenious and unique things. But there were two, yes three, singers in it, whom it was worth while to hear. Mlle. Tietjens, quite young yet, has one of the largest, richest, purest soprano voices now existing, and her delivery is noble, as her whole appearance is lady-like and expressive of a true and generous nature. But more of her when we come to the Birmingham Festival. Signor Giuglini is a capital tenor for such music, and Mario himself did not surpass him in the most favourite tit-bit of the music. Then there was Signor Delle Sedie, who in the impassioned part of the dark skinned Secretary, a sort of musical Othello wrought up to jealousy, exhibited not only a rich and musical baritone, but a consistent intensity of pathos and of action, that was quite electrifying. It were no trifle to wrong such a man; the part seemed very real. M. and Mad. Gassier were also in that cast, so that it was indeed a very rich one.

Such was the amount of my experience of London opera. The Covent Garden manager, Mr. Gye, made a most successful season of it in a material point of view. He had several good turns of fortune to ensure that. In the first place, the failure of the plans at the rival theatre, Her Majesty's, gave Covent Garden the monopoly of opera, with power to avail itself of many extra nights. The same chance threw into Mr. Gye's hands the two capital and opposite attractions of the setting and the rising star, the farewell nights of Grisi and the début of Adelina Patti. Of the other wealth of this establishment in leading singers, chorus, orchestra and stage resources, I have already spoken. The programme of the season, after you deduct Tell, and the old standard favourites, Don Giovanni and Il Barbiere, was by no means so rich, either in novelties or in undying classics, as one finds commonly in theatres of far smaller means in Germany, especially in Berlin, Dresden, Munich and Vienna. No opera of Glück, one only of Mozart, nothing (if I remember rightly) of Weber or Cherubini, not even the Fidelio of Beethoven—while, for newer things, Verdi and Meyerbeer are still harped upon, while Lohengrin and Tannhäuser are eschewed with holy horror. The English taste has its strong prejudices; but no audience is so untiringly devoted to a good thing, repeating it with the same zest for ever, after it is once throroughly accepted; witness the repetitions of Don Giovanni.

COLOGNE.—At the second Gesellschaft's concert, in the Gürzenich, the following was the programme :—Part I. Overture to Uriel Acosta, by Schindelmeisser; Pianoforte-concerto in E flat major, by C. M. von Weber, played by Herr Isidor Seiss; "Opferlied" for one solo voice (Mlle. Lüdecke), chorus and orchestra, by Beethoven; "Othello-fantasia," by Ernst, played by Herr Jul. Grunwald; "Credo" and "Agnus Dei," from the Coronation Mass, by Cherubini.—Part II. Symphony in F major, No. VIII. by Beethoven. Herr Isidor Seiss, who has lately been appointed one of the masters of the Conservatory of Music here, was greatly applauded for his execution of Weber's concerto in E flat major, and Herr Grunwald met with an equally flattering reception. The great treat of the evening was the performance of the two movements from Cherubini's grand mass in A major, and the greatest praise is due to Herr A. Weber, who officiated—on account of the indisposition of Herr Ferdinand Hiller—for the manner in which he conducted this work, written by the composer at the age of sixty-five.—Herr Smétana, from Prague, lately played Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in C minor, at the Musikalische Gesellschaft, where he produced a most favourable impression. This gentleman has, for the last six years, filled the post of conductor at Gothenburg.

ST. PETERSBURG.—Herr Rubinstein is engaged upon a new three act opera. The libretto, which report says is exceedingly good, is founded upon Moore's poem of Lalla Rookh, long a favourite subject of the composer.

PRINCE GALITZIN'S CONCERTS.

WEDNESDAY night was devoted to Mendelssohn, when a first-rate selection was made, including the overture to Ruy Blas, symphony in A major, andante and allegro from the violin concerto, songs, "The charmer," by Mlle. Lancia, and "The first violet," by Miss Augusta Thomson. The symphony was capitally played; the first movement being perhaps taken too fast. The andante was played to perfection. Mr. Viotti Collins executed the allegro of the violin concerto much better than the slow movement. His quick passages were wonderfully brilliant and true. Why not have given the entire concerto? Mlle. Lancia, who made her first appearance at these concerts, sang "The Charmer" most delightfully, and created an evident sensation. This lady's taste is supreme, and her expression irreproachable. She is mistress, too, of all styles, as may be inferred from her success in pieces of such opposite characters as Verdi's "War Song," from Attila, and Mendelssohn's "Charmer." Miss Augusta Thomson, although hardly in her line in quiet chamber songs, gave the "First violet" with genuine artistic feeling. The second, or miscellaneous part, was brief, as it should be, and contained no point of special interest.

MADAME GRISI'S FAREWELL TOUR.

The excitement of the tour which, as far as the tourists are concerned, was somewhat beginning to flag, has been this week suddenly revived by an unexpected event—a railway accident, fortunately without any serious consequences, but sufficiently startling in its effect to afford the whole party a subject of conversation and discussion for a long time to come. They were proceeding from York to Durham, on Tuesday last, when the train by which they travelled came into collision, at about three o'clock in the afternoon, a few miles from Leamside, with some trucks carrying ballast. The shock was violent enough. Opposite neighbours were thrown into each other's arms,—Ciampi made a dive into the waistcoat of his vis-à-vis Galvani—the petits-paquets, Aspa's especial charge, and which he always so carefully stows away into the net-work placed for their reception in the railway carriages, flew wildly about, hitting every body on the head—there was a jerk, a jump, and a jolt, and the train came to a full stop, when the passengers, one and all, insisted upon getting out. "Apri la porta!" shouted Ciampi as soon as he could take breath, and no one coming to open the door, he scrambled through the window, his example being followed by the Diva herself, who made an exit from the next carriage in the same manner. The danger was over. Four trucks were thrown off the rails, and the passenger train evidently had the most narrow escape of sharing the same fate. It was impossible to continue the journey before the line was cleared of the débris of the trucks, which caused a delay of two hours. The rustic inhabitants of a cottage near the railway offered shelter and assistance to the travellers, some of whom, after they had satisfied themselves as to the extent of the disaster, stared in amazement at the stokers, and made signs of remonstrance to the guards, accepted the proffered hospitality, and crowding into the little parlour sat round the fire until the obstruction was removed, and they were told to take their seats again. They soon recovered from the fright, and began comparing notes and describing their different impressions of the shock. One thought it was all over with them, another that the engine had burst; this one had received a blow in his chest, the other declared his head was injured. After a short time, however, all apprehensions were allayed, and the result of the collision acknowledged by the party generally to be nothing more serious than a rather severe shaking. It had become known in Durham that an accident had happened on the railway Numerous reports were in circulation as to its result. According to some, all the passengers had been killed, the musical celebrities being among the number. The arrival of the train was awaited with anxiety. At the concert in the evening every member of the party was greeted most heartily in congratulation of the lucky escape they had had. The performance was attended by a numerous audience, and went off with great éclat. A national Italian melody, very skilfully arranged by Signor Vianesi for Mad. Grisi and the other artists in chorus, entitled "Giulia Gentil," has invariably great success at all the concerts in which it serves as a finale to the first part. The words are appropriate to the occasion of the farewell, while the melody is very pleasing.

The band and chorus left the party last Saturday, every member being presented by the kind-hearted Prima Donna with some souvenir of her Farewell Provincial Tour. The concerts this week will have been given thus:—

Monday 25th, York; Tuesday 26th, Durham; Wednesday 27th, Newcastle; Thursday 28th, Edinburgh; Friday 29th, Glasgow; Saturday, 30th, Edinburgh, morning.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

THE Third Concert of the Fourth Season.—Monday Evening, December 2, 1861, on which occasion Mr. Charles Hallé will make his last appearance, and M. Vieuxtemps his last appearance but two, before Christmas.

PROGRAMME.

PART I.—Grand Septet, E flat, Op. 20, for Violin, Viola, Clarinet, Horn, Bassoon, Violoncello, and Double Bass (Beethoven), M. Vieuxtemps, H. Webb, Lazarus, C. Harper, J. Hutchens, C. Severn, and Paque. Song, "Swifter far than Summer's flight" (J. W. Davison), Miss Leffler. Canzonet, "Now summer has departed" (Dussek), Mlle. Florence Lancia. Sonata, in E minor, Op. 90 (No. 27 of Hallé's Edition), (Beethoven), first time at the Monday Popular Concerts, Mr. Charles Hallé.

PART II.—Sonata, in G. Op. 69, (No. 2) for Violin and Pianoforte, "Monday Popular Concerts' Library," No. 2 (Dussek), Mr. Charles Hallé and M. Vieuxtemps. Song, "The young Nun" (Schubert), Mlle. Florence Lancia. Song, "The Savoyard's Song" (Mendelssohn), Miss Leffler. Quartet, in C, No. 39, for two Violins, Viola, and Violoncello (Haydn), first time at the Monday Popular Concerts, MM. Vieuxtemps, L. Ries, H. Webb, and Paque. Conductor, Mr. Benedict. To commence at eight o'clock precisely.

 MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—DIRECTOR, MR. S. ARTHUR CHAPPELL.—In announcing the Fourth Season of the Monday Popular Concerts (established Feb. 7th, 1859) the Director has again to tender his thanks for the liberal and unremitting support with which his undertaking has been honored, and again respectfully to solicit its continuance.

The plan upon which the Monday Popular Concerts were instituted, and their form and character as musical entertainments, are now so widely known, that it is unnecessary to add anything to the explanations already published. It was originally intended in 1859, to give six performances, and to repeat the experiment, should it turn out successful, from year to year. So warm and unanimous, however, was the response to this first appeal—an appeal based no less upon a faith in the ability of the general public to appreciate than in the power of genuine music to attract and charm—that during the first season the proposed six concerts were increased to thirteen, during the second to twenty-seven, and during the third to twenty-four. The programmes of these sixty-four concerts (to which must be added eleven, held in Liverpool, Newcastle, Edinburgh, and Glasgow) have included nearly all the trios, quartets, quintets, and double quartets of Mozart, Beethoven, Spbor and Mendelssohn, many quartets by Haydn, Dussek, Cherubini, Schubert, Spohr, E. J. Loder, A. Mellon, &c. the most celebrated sonatas and other compositions for pianoforte, solo or concerted, by Mozart, Beethoven, Woelfl, Steibelt, Dussek, Clementi, Pinto, Hummel, Weber, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Sterndale Bennett, Macfarren, &c. and several of the harpsichord works of Handel, Scarlatti, and Sebastian Bach, together with a large number of songs, duets, and other vocal pieces from the ancient and modern schools of Italy, Germany, France, and England. As executants, in every department, the most eminent artists have been provided, engagements having been contracted with renowned performers abroad as well as at home. A constant attendance at St. James's Hall, throughout a series of Monday Popular Concerts, was, therefore, equivalent to a varied course of lectures on the chamber-music of the great masters, with practical illustrations by the first professors of the day.

In the forthcoming series, while many of those pieces, vocal and instrumental, which have met with the greatest amount of favour will, from time to time, as a matter of expediency, be repeated, a fair proportion of novelty will help to strengthen the attractions and enrich the repertory of the Monday Popular Concerts. The programme of the second (sixty-sixth) concert, as may be seen on another page, combines a due admixture of both elements.

The reception accorded last season to M. Vieuxtemps, justified the Director in offering that distinguished violinist a fresh engagement, which he has accepted. M. Vieuxtemps will lead the five concerts preceding Christmas. At the third (Dec. 2nd), Signor Piatti, and at the fourth (Dec. 9th), Miss Arabella Goddard, will respectively make their first appearances.

 In the course of the ensuing series of concerts the whole of the Posthumous Quartets and last pianoforte sonatas of Beethoven will be given; besides some revivals from Dussek and other great pianoforte composers; a trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello by Auber (composer of Masaniello); and vocal pieces by Italian, French, German, and English composers of the last and the beginning of the present century.

NOTICE.—It is respectfully suggested that such persons as are not desirous of remaining till the end of the performance can leave either before the commencement of the last instrumental piece, or between any two of the movements, so that those who wish to hear the whole may do so without interruption.

Between the last vocal piece and the quartet, an interval of Five Minutes will be allowed.

LONDON: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1861.

To the Editor of the MUSICAL WORLD.

SIR,—"Reappearance" is calculated, under different circumstances, to create great delight, or intense dissatisfaction—even disgust. The reappearance of a soldier after a hard-fought campaign—during which life was not more likely to remain than death to succeed—would, in all probability, cause infinite contentment to the object in whom he had invested his heart. The restoration of a great statesman, whose abilities had been rendered for a time useless by indisposition, would be hailed—by those whose inferior judgment had been in the habit of relying on him for counsel and advice—with evident joy and satisfaction. The reappearance of a near friend or relative, with whom we had been associated from childhood, would awaken in our breasts that inexpressible pleasure which so many have experienced. In fact, meeting any one who on a former occasion had produced an impression which absence for a length of time had failed to obliterate, would arouse the latent warmth of a man's nature, which the continued mingling with those of an exclusive and cold exterior too frequently renders frigid and repulsive.

Of all reappearances perhaps that of a woman who had been endowed by nature with a faultless voice, before an audience which, times gone by, she threw into the wildest enthusiasm—produces the most touching emotion. To witness the infinite variety of expression which is unconsciously employed in giving vent to the different degrees of delight which are experienced, alone conveys an idea of the extent to which the human feelings may be aroused. The heedless and dauntless manner in which ladies will force their way into an opera-house, content to arrive at the place for which they have sacrificed far more than their means would allow, minus half their dress, and with scarcely any life in their half-crushed bodies—there to stand for hours, exhausted—to get one glimpse or hear one note of the songstress at whose shrine they are sacrificing themselves.

The human voice, after having been trained to the perfection which many great artists have reached, seems to exert a most unaccountable influence over its hearers. It appears to people who do not interest themselves in these matters, or who are prevented by nature from so doing, almost fabulous how the senses of a human being can be thus surrounded, and, as it were, charmed, beyond the possessor's control. Music appeals more directly to the senses than anything, and, unlike other branches of art, brings with it less delusion. As Goethe says, "The worth of art is most eminent in music, since it requires no material, no subject-matter, whose effect must be deducted: it is wholly form and power." Thus do we account for the extraordinary sensation caused by the reappearance of a vocalist, who, by her wonderful talent, penetrates to the innermost soul, and for the time charms away from her hearers the control of their emotions, till they burst forth in the most frantic applause. Some are to be found bathed in tears, others as if insane, so irresistible is the impulse which in many cases a sense of propriety would curb, but an unconsciousness of the position renders useless.

The reappearance of musical stars, whether vocal or instrumental, is allowed, only under certain conditions, without leaving an ineffaceable stigma on their career. An artist quitting the concert-room or stage with an unrevealed determination again to present him or herself for public favour, ought to be posted up in all operatic cities, like an offending mole, or a betting man, who does not keep his engagements, as a warning to all new comers against similar deception.

Take, for instance, the most memorable instance of this kind of thing on record — that of Mad. ——. No artist who has trod the English boards has received so much indulgence as this lady; and pray, has she deserved it? If you pay to see and hear the last of an artist, who by her great talent and dramatic power has risen to the highest point in the public favour, can any man assert that he is not sold? He has not had his money's worth! He finds, on examining her wares, that they are spurious! She has cheated him!—she is going to sing again!—he cannot now say that he heard her the last time. She has broken faith! and sinks in the public estimation in proportion. If —— could hear the opinion of some of her ardent admirers, who once little short of worshipped her, for her voice and splendid acting, she would doubtless give a trifle to be reinstated. Although hidden from the public gaze, the reflection can never cease to gall her, that she put to sea in a craft that served her well, and bore her through many an angry surge that tossed those struggling with her into cold oblivion—and how she abused it. She tried it too often. Your readers may call to mind that melancholy affair at Madrid. It is a lesson which rising artists should commit well to memory. Fortunately these cases are few and far between, as it is difficult to imagine even a woman, endowed with the genius which made —— so famous in her impersonation of Norma, finishing her brilliant career of over twenty-seven years by making such a "noodle" of herself. By such performances art is degraded. To see a girl's young and slender form, which once roused an audience to stultified enthusiasm, driven to death, till the haggard and worn aspect of the stage-underling is indelibly fixed on those once beautiful features—when she still attempts to call forth, from that gradually withering organ, those charming cadenzas which in bygone times brought her such rapturous applause—we can no more spare her. She is altogether blinded by her previous successes, and if she gets "more kicks than halfpence," at the termination of her career, she must blame no one but herself. She is, at this moment, dragging herself through the provinces to bid adieu to the English peasantry. Does she feel such a maternal interest in her old friends as all that; or is it only an indirect way of putting her hand into England's well-lined pocket? Surely she has had enough lucre showered on her, and enough applause.

In addressing a letter to her English patrons, she says "she has determined to bring her career to a close;" she should have said, "again determined." Further on she says, "In doing so I believe I am acting consistently." To be continually taking farewells is certainly consistent. She commences a system of deception, and consistently sticks to it. Since she first set foot on the stage she has performed some 900 times in London alone, spread over about twenty-seven operatic seasons. Such exertions in so noble a cause are worthy of a more artistic close. With an unpardonable thirst for notoriety she still pursues the course she has been advised to relinquish with honour. She declines, and prefers to remain croaking under the shadow of her old glory.

The reappearance of Madame ————, which took place on Tuesday, the 23rd of October, was occasioned by a different motive from those which on all occasions influenced Madame ———, although we may still condemn this style of thing, under whatever circumstances, judgment should be passed somewhat less harshly when an artist of the great repute of ———— comes forward by the desire of her friends, and a wish on her own part, to assist a charity. We cannot of course suppose that this lady reappears with the view of covering herself with fresh glory: this is simply an absurdity. In the first place, no one of any sense supposes she can sing as well as she did; and in the second place, if she could, it would not be thought so much of now as it was then. We cannot of course suppose that either Mr. ———— or his wife performed with the view of being remunerated, but we may have a strong idea that that gentleman does not see the peculiar advantage of doing the kind of thing for nothing. However, it is all over now, and we hope the "Charit" may rejoice over the result. Artists of any description certainly have a right to act as they please; but the system is radically wrong: they shut out rising "stars" from the hemisphere. They have had their day, and should retire, contented with what they have earned. If they, or their husbands, spend too rapidly, that is their affair; they have no business to come on again, whether to say farewell or not. Macready would not sully his name by such a thing; he had his day, and retired honourably, making room for those who had a prestige to establish. It is to be hoped that the British public may see, before long, the folly of encouraging this sort of thing. It damps the ardour of the rising generation to see those who have been looked upon as "shelved," coming back and snatching at the laurels preparing for those of the present day who may legitimately hope to win them.

[Is not "A. C." a wag?—Ed.]

THE great success of the new entertainment now being given by Mr. and Mrs. Charles Mathews at the Boudoir Theatre in the Old Opera House, demonstrates that the field of speculation in that direction has not been entirely occupied, and that the means of amusing in monologue and dualogue has not been altogether exhausted. Since the days of the elder Charles Mathews, by whom that species of recreation had been invented, and indeed perfected at the commencement, the world has been overrun with single and double-handed entertainments, performed by actors who thought themselves overlooked on the stage; by vocalists who preferred concentrating all applause to themselves, instead of sharing it with their fellows; by literary men of fame and no fame; even by men of no calling, except that which invited them to exhibit themselves in public. The "At Home" of the elder Charles Mathews was of that kind literally to deter others from undertaking anything similar.

Not only was he himself one of the greatest comedians of the day in an age of giants, but he was a profound humourist, and a scholar to boot, and as an anecdotist transcended even Percy wrapped up in twenty volumes. From such powers and such talents we can readily understand that few would have the courage to follow in so brilliant a wake; and consequently we find that the "At Homes" which succeeded the famous entertainment of Mathews—as we may suppose that fools will always rush in where competition shows its head—were utterly disregarded, or, at all events, left no trace behind them. Yates, we believe, did furnish some "Comic Evenings," which had many admirers in their day; but Yates and Mathews were contemporaries, and may be said to have rowed in the same boat. From Charles Mathews to Albert Smith—unless we make an exception in favour of the tenor singer, Wilson, with his popular "Nichts wi' Burns"—we remember no single entertainer working out a special reputation. Albert Smith supplied by variety what he wanted in interest. Half the globe was ransacked bodily to create surprise, and nature, part burlesqued, and part daguerreotyped, was made to sit smirking before simpering misses and hirsute "gents," to conciliate their insipidities. This was indeed the necessity of the times, rather than the bias of the entertainer. The elder Mathews, having to address himself to simpler tastes and keener understandings, spoke plainer, and had recourse to fewer themes. His audiences brought with them a finer relish for humour borrowed from theatrical representations. The entertainments of the present day, in short, are distinct exhibitions, which our forefathers would have hardly encouraged, probably not understood. It is, however, the test of an artist's power to please the living in all works except those which soar into the empyrean, and Albert Smith and Mr. Woodin are no more to be censured for conforming themselves to the puny requirements of the moderns, than Charles Mathews was for falling in with the better qualities and understandings of his audiences. That neither Albert Smith nor Mr. Woodin would have succeeded where Charles Mathews won renown, we believe; but this would arise as much from the difference of taste in the times, as from the difference of talent in the individuals.

Some persons, we dare say, who go to see "Mr. and Mrs. Charles Mathews at Home," in the Haymarket, may come away disappointed, because their expectations will have been founded on what they had formerly witnessed at the Egyptian Hall, the Gallery of Illustrations the Polygraphic Hall, and various other places. Mr. Charles Mathews, the renowned son of a renowned father, goes far beyond all modern lecturers in the aim and purport of his discourse; and, as he has constituted truth the basis of everything, renders it more interesting, and endows it with greater vitality. It must not be supposed, nevertheless, that the element of fun is wanting in the new "At Home." On the contrary, it abounds, and is of the best kind. Exaggeration and caricature are to a great extent eschewed, but their places are well supplied by real mirth and exuberant vivacity. There is, besides, sufficient variety to satisfy all except those who have a mania for novelty, and to whom nothing is commendable unless the fleeting and the changing.

In his new entertainment, Mr. Charles Mathews tells the history of his life ab ovo. "Nothing extenuate nor set down aught in malice" is his motto, which he carries out to the letter. Never did autobiographer make a cleaner breast; never did narrator more entirely sink all considerations of personal vanity in his story; never was man confronted before a jury more determined to abide by a plain unvarnished tale! Indeed the world may be said now for the first time to have obtained a true estimate of the character of Mr. Charles Mathews. The story told nightly in the Haymarket leaves it impossible to doubt any longer. The hero has been for half his life the victim of untoward circumstances, imprudent indeed and improvident, as he does not shrink from acknowledging, but upright in all things, exerting himself under every difficulty, never depressed, ever gay, always tempting fortune with a smile, buoyant with every change, hopeful in the thickest gloom, and exhibiting himself under every aspect, in all tides and tempests, the Gentleman and the Man. Is not this history, apart from its amusement, worth knowing, worth studying? Is there not an exquisite moral, if we would only chew upon it, attached to this eternal acting of Atlas with the world on his shoulders? Is not this never-ceasing toil of brain and body the true type of Sisyphus rolling back the ever-returning stone? Is not the entertainment calculated to teach endurance as well as exhibit the realities of life, to make us better and wiser men by instructing us what we are to expect and who we are to trust? A good book indeed may be read by hearing Mr. Charles Mathews narrate his autobiography.

SOCIETY FOR THE ENCOURAGEMENT OF THE FINE ARTS.—The rooms of this society, at 9 Conduit-street, were on Thursday evening filled with a company of ladies and gentlemen, met to inaugurate the opening of the fourth session, and also to hear a lecture on "Art Education," by Mr. James Dafforne. The prospects of such an institution as the Society for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts must be a subject of interest, not only to artists, but to all persons of cultivated ideas, especially on the eve of an international competition in various industrial works which involve artistic consideration. We are, therefore, gratified to learn that those prospects are most satisfactory, the number of members having considerably increased since this time last year. In the course of lectures commenced last evening matters relating to all the arts, including music and the drama, will be treated by Dr. Chr. Dresser, Mr. John Leighton, F.S.A., Mr. F. Y. Hurlstone, Mr. H. Ottley, Mr. A. Gilbert, Mr. J. A. Heraud, Dr. Jas. Peck, Mr. G. Montague Davis, B.A., the Rev. Hugh Hutton, and other gentlemen. It is also the intention of the council, in addition to the ordinary conversazioni, to give a special entertainment in honour of distinguished Continental artists who will visit this country in connection with the International Exhibition. Mr. Dafforne's lecture set forth the want of art-education in this country. He argued against the absurdity of neglecting to teach a child to draw, because it might not have exhibited a special taste for art—a reason which would never be admitted as against any other branch of education. The lecture was followed by an interesting discussion. The subject of next week's address will be "Decorative Art," and the lecturer will be Dr. Dresser.

BAYSWATER ATHENÆUM.—On Wednesday evening a lecture was delivered by Mr. Henry Ottley, at this institution, "On a new version of Othello, from a French point of view." A numerous audience was attracted, including many literary gentlemen. Mr. Ottley entered into a minute and critical examination of Mr. Fechter's personation of Othello, in the course of which he strongly condemned the wholesale omissions and mutilations of the text, and the extraordinary stage business which characterised the representation. The lecture was listened to with marked interest and attention, and elicited warm demonstrations of approval at the close. We understand that Mr. Ottley intends repeating the lecture in the course of the next few weeks in various institutions in and around the metropolis.

NEW PRINTING MACHINE.—A machine for printing music, and ensuring the constant repetition of the tones produced, is now on exhibition at Florence. It is said to have been invented at Padua, and executed for the Marchesa Barbo, to be affixed to one of Erard's grand pianos. Its construction is not made public, but it is said to be apparently simple and easy of application.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

The promised Mozart-selection was given on Monday night, and how great was its attraction may be gathered from the fact that the shilling places were occupied by upwards of 1,000 persons, while the stalls and "reserved seats" were crowded. The programme was one of the richest that could be devised. It began with the string quartet in C major, the last of the famous set dedicated to Haydn, a passage in the opening adagio of which elicited from the celebrated Italian composer, Sarti, the oft-quoted interrogatory,—"Si puo fur di più per stonare gli professori?" Long after the death of Sarti, however, Beethoven, in his quartets, showed that even more daring harmony might be used by a real inventor, without the slightest danger of putting the performers "out of tune." The quartet of Mozart, a masterpiece in every sense, was played to perfection by M. Vieuxtemps and his associates—MM. Ries, Webb, and Paque. The first part terminated with the solo sonata in D major (1798)—"No. 108" in the "Thematic catalogue," of works written between February, 1784, and November, 1791 (the year of Mozart's death), which the author of Don Giovanni has left in his own handwriting, and which reveals a fertility almost unparalleled in art production. This was simply, naturally, and irreproachably rendered by M. Hallé, who was none the less in his element, and none the less at his ease for having the printed music before him. Like the quartet, the sonata was applauded whenever a pause in the performance allowed of the audience giving expression to their delight, and the great German pianist was recalled to the platform at the end of the "finale." The next instrumental piece—that which ushered in the second part of the concert—was the justly-renowned quintet in A, for clarinet (principal) and quartet of string instruments (1787), a work over the composition of which the Genius of Melody would seem continually to have presided. The performers were the same as before-mentioned, with the addition of Mr. Lazarus. The execution of the quintet was in all respects first-rate, as might have been guessed from the names of the executants; but what chiefly demands acknowledgment, and is, indeed, the principal reason on the present occasion for noticing the second of the Monday Popular Concerts, was the performance of Mr. Lazarus, not only the ablest professor of the clarinet this country can boast, but possibly the best to be found in Europe. Avoiding details, we may single out the second movement ("larghetto") of the quintet for special praise. In this a lengthened and exquisitely wrought-out melody is allotted to the clarinet, which—though here and there interspersed with graceful phrases in "dialogue" for the first fiddle (M. Vieuxtemps, of course)—makes of that beautiful instrument, as it were, the "familiar spirit" of the movement. It has been urged by competent authorities that no musical instrument so nearly approaches the human voice in wealth and purity of tone as the clarinet, and certainly Mr. Lazarus, by his use of it would lead any poetical theorist to become obstinately prejudiced on that point. His phrasing is as refined as that of any singer, his tone as satisfactory as it is artfully graduated, his mechanism beyond the reach of criticism; while the extensive compass of the instrument enables him to exhibit such variety as would appear to comprehend all the registers and qualities that endow contraltos and tenors, barytones and basses with their distinctive appellations—the only "timbre" denied it being that of the soprano, which essentially belongs, in one sense, to the flute, and in another to the oboe. A more faultless performance than this slow movement was never listened to; but in awarding to Mr. Lazarus the praise which is his fair prerogative, we must add, that M. Vieuxtemps, as "first fiddle," was, without hyperbole, "a Juliet to his Romeo;" and that the subordinate parts, for second violin, viola, and violoncello, were rendered by Herr Ries, Mr. Webb and M. Paque with a softness and delicacy that brought out the melody of the most conspicuous instruments so prominently, and at the same time so unobtrusively, as may be said to have realised the beau idéal of accompaniment. The restoration of the "mutes" (Mozart has written "con sordini" in his score) to the "strings"—the omission of which was reprehended, on the occasion of the first performance of this quintet at the Monday Popular Concerts—was an immense advantage to the light and shade ("chiar 'oscuro," as musicians prefer to term it), and indeed to the general sentiment and expression of the larghetto which was listened to with breathless attention and encored with rapture. The last instrumental work was the genial and vigorous sonata in D major (No. 10), for piano and violin, superbly played by MM. Hallé and Vieuxtemps—a composition which, though not in the "Thematic Catalogue," triumphantly proves (in the last movement especially) that Mozart could compose just as finely before 1784 as after it. The attention with which this was heard, from first to last, may in some measure be attributed to a notice now added to the premonitory paragraph alluded to in our report of a recent concert:—

"Between the last vocal piece and the sonata for pianoforte and violin an interval of five minutes will be allowed."

This afforded ample time for those who were compelled to leave early, and permitted the large majority (who happily had more leisure at command) to enjoy the performance of the entire sonata without disturbance.

Nothing could be better in its way than the vocal music. Mr. Winn, who had already so favourably impressed the audience of the Monday Popular Concerts, confirmed the good opinion he had elicited by his unaffected and sensible reading of a spirited and capital air from Handel's Scipione—No. 16 of the Italian operas composed by the immortal author of The Messiah; and also in Mr. Loder's thoroughly English ballad "The Three Ages of Love," which he repeated by desire. Mlle. Florence Lancia, on the other hand, changed (wisely we think) both her songs. Her first was now a graceful and genuine ballad by Mr. Frank Mori "Where art thou wandering, little child?" her second Spohr's delicious canzonet "The Bird and the Maiden," clarionet, "obbligato," Mr. Lazarus, both of which she gave with an artistic feeling and a perfection of style that enchanted all her hearers and obtained for her the honour of a "recall." Mr. Benedict presided with his accustomed talent as accompanist at the pianoforte.

For the next concert, among other interesting things, the whole of Beethoven's celebrated Septet for wind and string instruments is announced, together with a pianoforte sonata of Beethoven and a quartet of Haydn, both for the first time. The plan now adopted of having two new pieces (that is, pieces hitherto unheard at the Monday Popular Concerts) in every programme, cannot fail to meet with unanimous approval.

Provincial.

From our Belfast correspondent we learn the following particulars:—

"The Classical Harmonists opened their eleventh season with a miscellaneous concert, on the 21st, for which they had secured the services of Ole Bull and party. The hall was crowded in every part, and the concert was very successful. M. Ole Bull's reception was most enthusiastic, and his magnificent playing was fully appreciated. The other instrumentalist of the party was M. Emile Berger, who played his own effective piece, 'Les Echos de Londres,' in excellent style. Miss Anna Whitty was the prima donna, and her rendering of 'Non più Mesta' at once placed her on a good footing with the audience; this, as well as her succeeding song, 'Somebody's waiting,' being encored. Mrs. Tennant's contributions were, 'Voi che sapeti,' and 'Within a mile of Edinbro' town.' The latter was sung so archly, that it drew down one of the heartiest encores of the night. Mr. Tennant is a favourite here, and the way in which all his songs were received, must have been very gratifying to him. Mr. Wallace's 'Annie, dear, good-bye,' was encored vociferously. Herr Formes was in splendid voice, and sang 'In diesen heiligen Hallen' with surprising grandeur and power; and his own song, 'In sheltered vale,' most charmingly. The Society performed Mr. Henry Leslie's arrangement of 'Rule Britannia,' 'Down in a flowery vale,' and Mr. Benedict's 'Blessed be the home,' all of which were, of course, unaccompanied. On the following night, the Society gave another concert 'for the People,' with the same artists, when the hall was again pretty full. Too much praise cannot be awarded to the Society for their earnest endeavours to popularise music, by giving first-class concerts at one shilling. To this Society is mainly attributable the erection of one of the finest halls in the kingdom—the Ulster Hall—and that upon it should devolve the inauguration, is, therefore, but fair and honourable to all concerned. The exact date of opening is not yet settled, but we believe it will be about the middle of January. Mr. George B. Allen is to conduct the festival. The Ole Bull party gave concerts in Dublin at the Rotundo (with great success), Enniskillen, Sligo, and Londonderry during the week, with Mr. Allen as their conductor."

The Cork Amateur Harmonic Society made a good display, if it did not provide a first-rate entertainment, in its opening concert of the fourth season, given at the Protestant Hall on the 21st instant. The Daily Reporter thus notices the performance:—

"The musical taste of our local public has rightly appreciated the first effort for the season of the amateurs, and welcomed their appearance with the approbation which they deserved. There was a very large orchestra comprising about fifty in number, assisted by the band of the 12th Regiment, and twelve lads belonging to the choir of the cathedral. The programme might have contained better selections, but too much cannot be expected from amateurs who have but inaugurated their fourth season. The concert opened with an overture by Mehul entitled Les deux aveugles, and was rendered in full chorus,* which produced a grand and powerful outpouring of harmonious melody, and its dying cadence at the close elicited a triumphant echo of applause. 'The Evening Star,' by Martin, followed, accompanied by the pianoforte, the violin, &c., and a few other instruments. Mr. Wm. Harvey, who displayed his vocal powers to their best advantage in Balfe's 'Fresh as a Rose,' won an encore. The glee of 'Chough and Crow,' from "Guy Mannering," was effective, as a trio, sung by Messrs. Harvey, Creighton and Hall, with orchestral accompaniment. The war song 'Banners waving,' by Werner, which Mr. Hackett sung in a masterly and correct style, was enthusiastically encored. Mr. Lambert deserves to be noticed for the song Vieni la mia Vendetta, the execution of which was most difficult. The concert was appropriately brought to a finale by the whole orchestra performing 'God Save the Queen.' The amateurs are deserving of patronage, and we need only wish that their success during the season may be as brilliant and encouraging as it was last night."

[*Does our contemporary mean in reality that the overture was sung by the chorus?—ED.]

An account of the second Philharmonic Concert, at Shrewsbury, is supplied from Eddowes's Shrewsbury Journal:—

"On Monday night the second of the series was given, and we had three notabilities in the musical world, Niss Anna Whitty, Herr Formes, and M. Ole Bull; also two other very good singers, and Mrs. Tennant, and the clever pianist, M. Emile Berger. The first-named lady is a sort of novelty, having been heard but very little on this side of the Channel. Her singing of 'Non piu mesta' showed the compass of her voice, and her controul over it; she also gave Mr. Walter Hay's 'Mignon's song,' from Goethe's Wilhelm Meister. As a legitimate basso, Herr Formes is, to our thinking, unapproachable. The delicate strains of Ole Bull's violin were charming as ever. For the production of a clear, pure tone he is almost unequalled, and his feats of dexterity are nearly marvellous. Mr. and Mrs. Tennant sang in a very pleasing style; the pianoforte solos were artistically played by M. Emile Berger; and we think the most fastidious must have been greatly pleased with the concert."

The performance of Der Freischütz at the Free-trade Hall, Manchester, under the direction of Mr. Charles Hallé is thus enlarged upon in the Manchester Guardian of November the 22nd.:—

"No wonder that a German musician like Mr. Hallé should desire to have the music of Der Freischütz worthily performed, which in any theatre, except the large metropolitan ones, is next to impossible. In provincial theatres the thing becomes a burlesque. Two or three mediocre principals, a chorus of ten or a dozen, and a band inadequate to produce the special effects designed by the composer, must fail in giving a proper conception of the opera. On the other hand, omission of the dramatic element of any opera, thus reducing it to a "recital," must have a damaging effect, and especially so in a work like Der Freischütz which is essentially melo-dramatic, and in which spoken dialogue takes the place of the recitative of grand opera. It will be observed from the following 'cast' that special care had been taken to secure efficient principals:—

"Agatha (Agnes), Mlle. Parepa; Annette (Ann), Mad. Rudersdorff; Bridesmaid, Mlle. Corelli; Max (Rodolph), Mr. Wilbye Cooper; Caspar, Mr. Weiss; Ottakar, Mr. Montem Smith; Kuno and Killian, Mr. Allan Irving.

"Mr. Hallé's choir, numbering 180 to 200, represented the chorus making, with the band, a total strength of something like 250. Such a performance of Weber's great work has rarely been given in England, certainly not in Manchester. Mlle. Parepa sung the music of Agnes admirably. Nothing was wanting, power, delicacy, and expression being always at command. The grand scena, and the less familiar but beautiful air, 'Though clouds by tempests,' were models of vocal art. Mad. Rudersdorff was perfectly at home in the music of Ann, and was in no wise inferior to Agnes. The charming duet in the second act, 'There rogue,' by both ladies, and the trio with Rodolph, were in every respect equal in point of excellence. Mr. Cooper has scarcely energy enough for the music of Rodolph. In the expression of the gentler emotions, as 'Through the forests,' he was highly satisfactory. The music allotted to Caspar, was well rendered by Mr. Weiss; the bacchanalian song and the revenge air being both most effectively given. The chorus acquitted themselves satisfactorily. We could have wished the laughing chorus given with a little more hilarity. The hunter's chorus was enthusiastically encored. Too much praise cannot be awarded to the band for the manner in which they gave the picturesque accompaniments."

From the same journal of a more recent date we make extracts of a lengthy article on Mad. Lind-Goldschmidt's Concert, which also took place at the Free-trade Hall.

"Many are asking why is Mad. Goldschmidt again exchanging a happy retirement for golden showers, or the bubble of applause? The question may be considered pertinent or impertinent, according to the spirit of its conception; suffice it she is here, and again exerting those powers which, of old, gained her a position she seems, to a large extent, still enabled to maintain. In the midst of her fame Mlle. Lind becomes Mad. Goldschmidt, and we are taught to wait patiently, and be thankful for these occasional visits, 'few and far between,' with which she vouchsafes to favour us. On the present occasion Mr. Sims Reeves and Signor Belletti complete the vocal trio; whilst amongst the solo instrumentalists are Mr. Henry Blagrove, Signor Piatti, Mr. Goldschmidt, and Mr. Hallé. Last night Haydn's Creation was selected—one of the oratorios in which, as Jenny Lind, she sang in the old Free-trade Hall in 1849. Perhaps this is a class of music more happily adapted to the particular gifts of Mad. Goldschmidt, whether we refer to quality of voice or artistic feeling. She seems to be thoroughly impressed with the grace of its melody; whilst, among other powers, there is a certain amount of the imitative faculty, of which she successfully avails herself, an experiment which some of the strictly legitimate school might condemn, but which we, of the heterodox party, accept as perfectly in keeping with art. The upper notes fall upon the ear with much of the silvery quality as of old, and there is, to a considerable extent, the same sustaining power as would be noticeable to many in the air 'With verdure clad,' into which she threw her acknowledged genius, and a fancy always in good taste. The same may be said of the great song 'On mighty pens,' to the interpretation of which she has always brought a reading peculiarly her own, and that, strange to say, no singer has attempted to imitate. This fairly drew forth the enthusiasm of the people, an attempt at an encore being, however, suppressed. The first song given by Mad. Goldschmidt, 'The marvellous work,' indicated, more forcibly than any other effort during the evening, the blemish to which we have ventured to allude, and as the voice warmed into the music—if such an expression may be permitted—there was a decided approach to the fine quality of past years—always so telling in concerted music—and this, again, was crowned by depth of expression which, in our estimate, makes up at all times for a multitude of defects. Signor Belletti sang with considerable judgment, and with that purity of voice and correctness of intonation for which he is noted. Of Mr. Reeves we have little to say that has not been said in our columns for many years past whenever occasion called his singing into question. His declamation of the recitative, 'In splendour bright,' was true to his dramatic instinct, whilst his energy and refinement—so rarely combined by our modern vocalists in general—fully sustained a great and well-deserved reputation. The band and chorus did all honour to the composer, and Mr. Goldschmidt conducted the oratorio in a musician-like manner, throwing into it truthfulness of character, and working out the chorusses, in more than one instance, with a spirit that showed a due appreciation of his task."

The Nottingham Chamber Concerts, we learn from our "exchanges," progress in a highly satisfactory manner. The following is from a correspondent:—

The second concert of the season (the 37th of the series), took place on the 22nd inst, when the subjoined programme was presented:—Part I. Marschner, "Quartet," for piano, violin, tenor, and violoncello, —Messrs. White, Henry Farmer, Myers, and T. L. Selby (first time). Mendelssohn, song, "The First Violet,"—Mrs. Gadd.—Part II. Kaliwoda, "Quartet in G," for two violins, tenor, and violoncello,—Messrs. Henry Farmer, Kirkby, Myers, and T. L. Selby.—Part III. Bache, song, "Farewell,"—Mrs. Gadd. Mendlessohn, "Duo, in D," for violin and pianoforte,—Messrs. Henry Farmer and White (first time). Marschner's quartet (Op. 167 in B flat) may probably not have been intended by the composer for the concert room. It is rich in pleasing melody, without pretension, and as an opening piece well suited to fix the attention of an audience. It was well associated with Kalliwoda's quartet in G, and Mendlessohn's "Sonato," Duo in D (Ferdinand David's arrangement for violin instead of violoncello). The pieces were all exceedingly well performed, and elicited the warmest acknowledgments from the audience. Mrs. Gadd, who kindly lent her services, sang with good taste, and that purity and correctness for which she is so justly admired. These entertainments might be denominated "The Nottingham Monday Popular Concerts,"—only that they take place on Fridays.

A NEW INCIDENT IN "NORMA."—Fechter, it would appear, is not alone in his novel stage renderings. Last night a most humorous, though in a sense disagreeable, incident occurred in the Queen's Theatre, in the opera of Norma. In the ninth scene of the second act, where "Norma" reproaches "Pollio" for his infidelity, and where the latter rushes after the former towards the gong, Mlle. Titiens, in her impatience to strike the "sacred bronze," that "a new victim" might be revealed to the assembled Druids, Bards, and Warriors, by some mischance brought the mallet in contact with the nasal organ of Signor Giuglini, as "Pollio," and made a bleeding victim of him on the spot. The accident was not observed till a minute or two afterwards, when the signor, from loss of blood, had to retire. The fair cantatrice, evidently much disconcerted, could not proceed, and the curtain suddenly dropped, greatly to the astonishment of the audience, few of whom had noticed the occurrence. Mr. Wyndham immediately appeared, and explained that a slight accident had occurred to Signor Giuglini; and in a few minutes the signor presented himself again, and, with the blushing priestess, brought the opera to a brilliant close.—Caledonain Mercury.

GIFT BOOK, NEW.—Songs and Tunes for Education, edited by JOHN CURWEN.

The Harmonies by JAMES TURLE, Esq., Organist of Westminster Abbey.

The Pianoforte edition, in handsome cloth binding, with gilt title, price half-a-crown.

This work is the fruit of the editor's residence in Germany. He collected books of music for young people in every town he visited. With the aid of Mr. James S. Stallybrass, the whole of this collection was analysed, and the choicest translated or adapted for English use. The editor, however, never preferred a German piece when an English one would do as well. He aims to educate the feelings and sympathies of childhood by the habit of singing good songs. This he considers the proper office of music in schools. He takes care that the three school ages (childhood, boy-and-girl-hood, and youth) are suited with songs on the following subjects:—Country Scenes, the Seasons, Fancy, and Humour. Kindness to Animals, Home Sympathies, Patriotism, Industry, Integrity, Religion, &c. There are two hundred and sixty-seven songs. This work will doubtless supersede the editor's widely-known "School Music" and "School Songs."

An edition in the Tonic Sol-fa Notation, containing the Treble Voice "parts" only, price, in paper, One Shilling; in cloth, One Shilling and Fourpence. The "Education Songs," containing the words only, price Sixpence.

EVANS'S ENGLISH HARMONIUMS for Cottages, Schools, Drawing Rooms, Churches, Literary and other public Institutions, are made in every possible variety at prices from 6 to 140 guineas. The Manufacturers have to announce the complete success of a New Patent Self-Acting Blowing Machine, the only self-acting blower that has ever succeeded, which may be seen in operation at Hollies Street daily.

The most distinguished living musicians, including Balfe, Sterndale Bennett, Cipriani Potter, Best, Henry Smart, &c., have testified to the extraordinary merits of Evans's Harmoniums.

See testimonials attached to Illustrated Catalogues of Harmoniums, to be had gratis of the Manufacturers, Boosey and Ching, 24 Holles Street, London.

EVANS'S ENGLISH MODEL HARMONIUM, with two rows of keys, price 66 guineas in oak case, or 70 guineas in rosewood case, combines every modern improvement. The most beautiful and varied orchestral effects can be produced upon this instrument, which possesses every gradation of tone from the greatest power to the most delicate piano pieces. The English Model Harmonium is managed with that facility which characterises all Evans's Harmoniums, and is equally effective both in the drawing room and church.

BOOSEY and CHING, Manufacturers, 24 Holles Street, London.

EVANS'S PEDAL HARMONIUMS, with independent Pedal Reeds, can be had either with a single or double row of keys, at prices from £51 to 130 Guineas; also with the new patent self-acting blowing machine.

BOOSEY and CHING, Manufacturers, 24 Holles Street, London, W.

EMILE BERGER'S NEW PIANO SOLO, "LES ECHOS DE LONDRES."

This new fantasia was composed expressly for M. Ole Bull, Herr Formes, Mr. and Mrs. Tennant, and Miss Anna Whitty's provincial tour. It has been played by Mr. Emile Berger (as well as the transcription of Ferrari's popular serenade "Vieni, Vieni") every where with the greatest success, and has invariably been encored.

"The introduction of the two popular melodies, 'Gentle Annie' and 'Dixy's Land,' was a happy idea of Mr. Berger. The audience were delighted, and the applause was so great that the talented pianist was obliged to return to the platform and repeat the fantasia, to the great delight of the audience."—Sheffield Paper.

London: Duncan Davison and Co., 244 Regent Street, W.

VIENI, VIENI.

SIGNOR FERRARI'S admired Serenade. Transcribed for the PIANOFORTE by EMILE BERGER, price 2s.

The above charming morceau has met with immense success throughout M. Berger's provincial tour. It is invariably encored.

HERR REICHARDT'S NEW SONG, "ARE THEY MEANT BUT TO DECEIVE ME?"

Mazurka-Polonoise.

The Poetry adapted by JOHN OXENFORD.

Price 2s. 6d.

Sung at the Crystal Palace Concerts on Saturday by HERR REICHARDT, with immense success.

The Times says: "Herr Reichardt, the German tenor, whose pure, classical style and fervid expression—still remembered, in spite of two years' absence—were displayed with the utmost effect in a characteristic song from his own pen, entitled 'Are they meant but to deceive me?' which exhibited more than one touch worthy the composer of that deservedly popular romance, 'Thou art so near and yet so far.'"

London: Published by Duncan Davison and Co. 244 Regent street, W.

Reviews.

"Two Studies for the Pianoforte"—dedicated to G. A. Osborne—LINDSAY SLOPER, Op. 19 (Ransford and Son).

These are professedly intended as supplementary to Czerny's "Vélocité," and as such will be found eminently practicable (practise-able) and useful. The first is a study for "thirds," the second for "octaves." Both reveal the hand of a master. Mr. Lindsay Sloper might with advantage produce more in this way.

"Introduction to 'the Octoroon'"—JULES BENEDICT (Boosey and Sons).

An arrangement for pianoforte solus of the interesting and picturesque orchestral prelude performed nightly by the band at the Adelphi Theatre, as overture to Mr. Dion Boucicault's new drama of The Octoroon.

"La Dame du Château"—Dr. A. S. HOLLOWAY (Augener and Co).

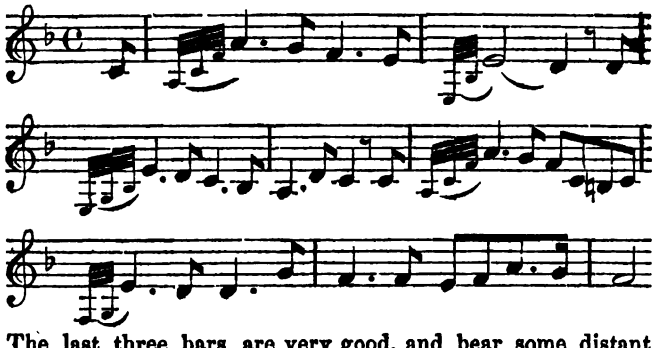
The composer styles this little piece (in which there occurs a good deal of crossing of hands) "Fantaisie élégante," and on that account probably has dedicated it ("by permission") to a lady of title. The theme, upon which he has built some variations not strikingly new, is as subjoined:—



The last three bars are very good, and bear some distant resemblance to something by the French composer, Méhul, in his oratorio-opera of Joseph. None the worse for that.

"The Murmur of the Ocean"—waltzes—by OWEN HOPE (Boosey and Sons).

An extremely pretty, if not extremely original, set of waltzes; and, what is just as rare, extremely well written. Will that do, Mr. Hope?

"Fleur de Seville;" "Sul Mare;" "Fête Bohémienne;" "Silvery Shower"—pour piano—W. KUHE (Chappell and Co.)

But for the unmeaning absurdity of the titles, there would be nothing but praise for these bagatelles, which are not merely pleasing, but, for the most part, very neatly composed. They are, perhaps, somewhat too difficult for their pretensions; perhaps, however, not—a matter of opinion either way. We prefer "Fleur de Seville" (capriee espagnole), because, although a trifle spun out, and containing many repetitions, it really has—in the second part (pages 4, 5) especially—a touch of the Spanish character; and "Sul Mare" (barcarolla), because, with nearly equal success, it has caught the Italian—besides being decidedly the prettiest piece of the four. "Fête Bohémienne" (morceau caractéristique) may boast of a quaint and attractive little "trio:"—

And "Silvery Shower," or "Silberstrahlen" (caprice étude), while of a similar pattern ("arpeggios" for both hands, in alternation—the dexter thumb taking the melody) as some fifty others, is as good as five and twenty out of the fifty, and not much worse than the majority of the remaining twenty-five. The type, nevertheless, is fairly exhausted.

"Souvenir de L'Ambiêve"—pour piano—A. G. GITS (Cramer, Beale, and Wood).

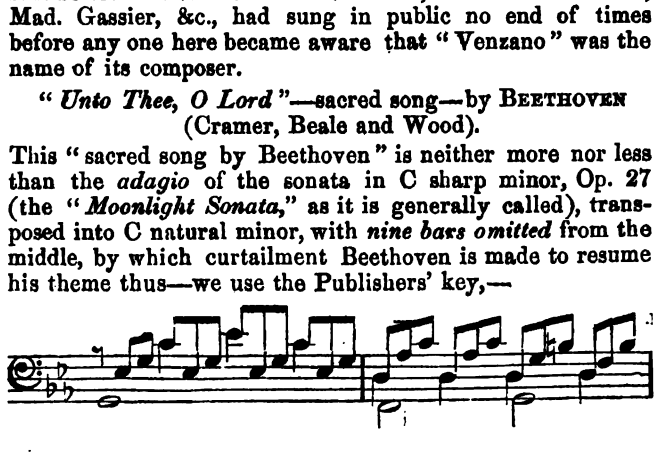
We were never at Ambiêve; but, to judge by the "Souvenir" of Herr Gits, it at least cannot be a very original place. Seriously, there is not one objection that could fairly be brought against this valse, except the now-a-days so very frequent one, that it does not present the shadow of a fresh thought. Brilliant it is, no doubt, and correctly written, as such things go; but why written at all—unless by reason of the necessity of every one composing who can note down what comes into his head with fluency—we are unable to guess. The best part is the trio, in A flat (page 2), where the "canto" is given to the hand sinister, while its companion and superior (novel expedient!) is diligently employed upon a "running passage."

"Il Bacio"—fantaisie de salon, pour le piano—par HAROLD THOMAS (Cramer, Beale and Wood).

Mons. Harold Thomas has made a dashing and effective "valse" ("de salon" of course), much in the style of the "Souvenir" of Herr Gits (just noticed), out of the well-worn theme of Sig. Arditi's well-sung (by Mlle. Tietjens, &c.) "Il Bacio"—a voice-waltz after the manner of the still better known "Valse de Venzano," which Mad. Bosio, Mad. Gassier, &c., had sung in public no end of times before any one here became aware that "Venzano" was the name of its composer.

"Unto Thee, O Lord"—sacred song—by BEETHOVEN (Cramer, Beale and Wood).

This "sacred song by Beethoven" is neither more nor less than the adagio of the sonata in C sharp minor, Op. 27 (the "Moonlight Sonata," as it is generally called), transposed into C natural minor, with nine bars omitted from the middle, by which curtailment Beethoven is made to resume his theme thus—we use the Publishers' key,—



Digitized by Google

instead of in his own manner, thus (still the Publishers' key):—

The reader may be curious to know with what words this new version of one of the most pathetic inspirations of the great master are wedded. We subjoin them in extenso:—

"Unto Thee, O Lord Most High, do we give thanks—
Yea, unto Thee do we give thanks, O Lord.
O! hear us, Lord!—forsake us not,
For Thou art God, and God alone.
Unto Thee, O Lord, do we give thanks,
Give thanks unto Thee.
O! hear us! have mercy!"

Here the nine bars are missing.

"I will praise Thee, O Lord, and magnify Thy name,
For Thou art great, and dost wondrous wondrous things.
Give ear, O Lord, unto my prayer,
For Thou art full of compassion and mercy and truth.
Unto Thee, O Lord, do we give thanks.
Forsake us not."

There is no name on the title-page, except that of "L. v. Beethoven." Perhaps———— but never mind. (It could hardly have been the late John Cramer—"Glorious John"? No, it was not "Glorious John;" that's certain.)

"The Echoes of Killarney"—reminiscence for the pianoforte; "The Echo of Lucerne"—transcribed for the pianoforte; "What are the Wild Waves saying?"—do. do.—by BRINLEY RICHARDS (Robert Cocks and Co.)

The last of the above has already been noticed. With the first and second Mr. Richards has been more than usually happy in the exhibition of that peculiar grace which invests his easy pieces with such a genuine charm. "The Echo of Lucerne" is an absolutely faultless resetting of poor Jullien's tuneful and thoroughly "Swiss" inspiration; while in the "Echoes of Killarney" Mr. Richards has been scarcely less successful with that beautiful Irish melody, "The Boys of Kilkenny" ("The Meeting of the Waters"), which could not have been presented, by a bonâ fide composer for the pianoforte, in a more modest and yet attractive dress.

DRESDEN.—The performance of Glück's Iphigenie in Tauris has proved so successful that the management have determined to revive Iphigenie in Aulis and Alceste as well. Mad. Marie Therese Rietz, wife of the Capellmeister, died on the 13th ult.

ST. PETERSBURG.—The celebrated German tragedian, Herr Dawison, has been engaged for one month at the Théâtre Royal. He receives 7000 silver roubles.

WIESBADEN.—Herr Hagen has just celebrated his 25th anniversary as Capellmeister. The Duke of Nassau has presented Herr Carl Formes with the medal for Arts and Sciences.

SCHWERIN.—At the pressing request of Herr von Flotow, the Intendant of the Ducal Theatre, Herr Richard Genée, of Mayence, has consented to undertake the direction of the Opera, as well as of the Subscription Concerts, during the winter season, in consequence of Herr Aloys Schmitt being so ill as to be under the necessity of retiring awhile from the exercise of his official duties. Headed by Herr von Flotow, all the male members of the operatic company lately serenaded the Grand Duke. After three cheers—Herr Steiner marking the time—had been given for his Royal Highness, the inner court yard of the palace was illuminated by Bengal lights. His Highness sent for the heads of the various departments of the theatre, and thanked them warmly for the mark of esteem they had shown him.

Letters to the Editor.

SIR,—Miss Adelaide Phillips, of Boston, U.S., and not Miss Alice P., daughter of H. P., Esq., is the lady whom the correspondent of Dwight's Journal regretted not to have heard in London. Miss Adelaide P. is a favourite in the American cities in such parts as Azucena, in the Trovatore and Madelina in Rigoletto, and the best new England singer of "He was despised," and songs of that class in Handel's oratorios. She was indebted in part to the generosity of Madame Goldschmidt for the pecuniary means of completing her musical education in France and Italy. I am not a critic of vocalists, and therefore it is of little importance that few songstresses give me so much pleasure as Miss Ada. Phillips.

A. W. T.

"WELL-PAID."

SIR,—Your humorous correspondent A. C., speaking, I presume, of Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, says, "We may have a strong idea that that gentleman does not see the peculiar advantage of doing the kind of thing for nothing."

At two concerts recently given here by Madame —— and Mr. Hallé, the receipts are said to have been 1400*l.* plus 1600*l.* equal 3000*l.*, with two-thirds of which sum Madame was modestly contented (deducting therefrom 300*l.* for her London assistants). This may give A. C. an idea "whether, &c."

TANNHAUSER.

Manchester, Dec. 3.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—A second chamber concert by the students was given at the rooms of the institution in Tenterden Street, Hanover Square, on Wednesday evening, to which the friends and patrons of the Academy were invited. There was a large attendance—too large indeed for the meagre convenience offered by the locality—and many who could not gain admittance to the rooms were compelled to stand in the antechamber or the lobby, and hear as well as they could. The concert, a mere trial performance, was on the whole more than usually satisfactory. Beethoven's Trio in B flat, for pianoforte, clarionet, and violoncello, was played by Mr. W. S. Bambridge, Mr. A. Williams, and Mr. H. Harper. The pianist, Mr. Bambridge, does infinite credit to the teaching of his master, Mr. W. Dorrell, one of the ablest professors of the day. Kuhlau's Duet Concertante, in E minor, for the flute and piano, by Mr. T. R. Ratcliff and Mr. Bradbury Turner, was another good performance. Mr. Ratcliff has a fine tone, excellent mechanism, and is, indeed, full of promise. Mr. W. Masom's performance of Weber's well-known Polacca in E flat is also entitled to honourable mention. Mr. Masom's execution is clear, and but for a slight monotony in his style, his play would be highly commendable. We were much pleased with a duet on two pianofortes by Miss Walsh and Mr. H. R. Eyres, pupils of Herr Pauer. These young artists played together à merveille, and created quite a sensation. Miss Walsh, we believe, won the second medal for piano at the competitive examination last year, and at the last concert of the season proved herself no incapable composer, in a song which won unanimous applause. Beethoven's sonata in E flat, Op. 12, for violin and pianoforte, was capitally executed by Mr. F. J. Amor and Mr. T. W. Walstein. Mr. Amor has already, on more than one occasion, had our good word for his sterling violin playing. His coadjutor also has evidently talent. A part-song, "The Traveller's Return," sung at the end of the first part, is from Mr. Walstein's pen.

The vocal music was allotted to the Misses C. Westbrook, Robertine Henderson, Ibbotson, Armytage, Flewitt, and Bramley; Messrs. Wallace Wells and Rudkin. The ladies were superior in every respect. We cannot greatly praise the selection. The "Spinning-wheel" quartet, from Martha, is out of place in a concert-room. The very good singing of Misses Westbrook and Bramley, and Messrs. Wallace Wells and Rudkin, however, procured it an encore. Miss Armytage displayed a fine mezzo-soprano in the canzonetta "Santa Lucia," which, nevertheless, found out the defects of her organ and her style. Miss Robertine Henderson is perhaps a little too ambitious to shine in the bravura line, although she made a famous "hit" in Adolphe Adam's "Ah! vous dirai-je, Maman?" The finale to Euryanthe — a favourite piece at the Academy — well executed by the students, the solo parts intrusted to Misses Robertine Henderson and Ibbotson, and Messrs. Wallace Wells and Rudkin, brought a very excellent concert to an end.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE members of this great society, the foremost of its class in Europe, and therefore in the world, began their winter season on Friday night, 29th ult., with a programme of the highest attraction. Whatever the vicissitudes attending other public entertainments, the concerts of the Sacred Harmonic Society always seem to flourish; and, indeed, the day would be a gloomy one for art and its followers when an institution carried on with such well-directed energy, in a spirit of unselfishness probably without example, and for the promotion of such a truly noble end, should cease to prosper. Thus every lover of music—more especially of the music of Handel and that of the few masters who have striven, with a genius, a faith in the good work, and an earnestness of purpose most nearly kindred with his own, to raise the dignity of the art by devoting its exercise to the purest and loftiest ends—must have been gratified to see old Exeter Hall crowded in every part on the occasion under notice, and have heartily wished, at the same time, that the edifice itself—the only one in London fitted to receive the Sacred Harmonic Society and its patrons—could boast many more desiderata than it can actually lay claim to as a music hall, and as a building for the accommodation of the public.

The programme comprised the music written by Mendelssohn for Racine's religious drama of Athalie, and the "Dettingen 'Te Deum.'" That a piece so familiar as Handel's Anthem of Victory—his fifth and last setting of the "Te Deum Laudamus"—would be in all respects well given by a body possessed of such resources as the Sacred Harmonic Society, and with so safe and excellent a singer as Mr. Winn for the bass solos, might have been accepted beforehand as a matter of course; but the enormous advance the members of the chorus have been able to make in the more modern, difficult, and comparatively little-known work of Mendelssohn is entitled to some record in detail. The audience—evidently assembled with the conviction that a rare treat was in store—were in high spirits, applauded the principal singers, and Mr. George Vandenhoff, who was to recite the poem, as, one by one, they took their places in the orchestra, and honoured Mr. Costa, the conductor, with what is conventionally termed an "ovation." The result fully justified anticipation, for, on the whole, the music of Athalie has never been so finely performed on any previous occasion since its first introduction to the English public (in 1845, at the Philharmonic Concerts).

The overture—not without reason its composer's chief favourite, inasmuch as it is, at any rate, the grandest he has left—was magnificently played; although the fellowship of harps might to good purpose have been doubled, or even trebled, in number, at the last movement, where the corale with which the overture modestly opens is so brilliantly reproduced in another key, as a climax. The first musical scene, for chorus and solo voices (two sopranos and a contralto), which shows the "elect"—in defiance of the wrath of Jezebel's congenial daughter, who, now supreme over Israel, has reared an altar to Baal—praising and glorifying the true God at the doors of the Temple, scarcely fell short of perfection. The chorus, "Heaven and the earth display"—the broad and well-defined theme of which, by its frequent apparition, knits the whole together, and begins and terminates with equal solemnity a masterpiece of musical structure—could not have been delivered more emphatically. But perhaps the most striking display was the remarkable passage, "O Sinai," in which Mendelssohn, by the simple expedient of choral "unison," combined with orchestral accompaniments as impressive as they are original, has proved himself worthy to approach a subject no less sublime than the Divine wrath, reflected through the natural phenomena of earthquake and tempest. Choral singing more evenly balanced, firmly sustained, or strictly in tune, has rarely been heard. In the solo parts, too, Miss Louisa Pyne (first soprano), Miss Serle (second soprano), and Madame Laura Baxter (contralto), did good service, more especially in the trio, "Ye who through servile fear."

In the second musical scene, which opens with the beautiful passage, "What star in its glory upriseth," for sopranos, altos, tenors, and basses, alternately in separate unisons, and then combined in one, the chorus — although their task is now more trying, because the portions assigned to them belong to a plan considerably more varied and intricate — hardly less merited unqualified approval. The passage, "Behold, Zion, behold!" was certainly taken too fast for the efficient utterance of the words; but with this objection criticism must stop. To name no other particular point, we may single out the splendid corale — "They, Lord, who scoff at Thee" — the enthusiastic outburst of the faithful, first given out in unison and next in full harmony, with elaborately contrived orchestral accompaniments throughout, as a thoroughly grand and impressive performance. Here the effect of the harmonised verse at the end was equivalent to that of the full unison in the opening chorus already named. The argument of the second scene begins with the homage paid by the people to young Joas (Jehoash), son of Ochozias, the object of Athalia's jealousy, and rightful heir to the throne, whom they liken to Samuel, coming forth as of old, "to comfort Israel." This gives rise to the duet, "Ever blessed child," for women's voices, with chorus — a sort of pendent to "He waited for the Lord" in the Lobgesang, and for melody and depth of expression ranking, like that, among the most genuine inspirations of Mendelssohn. The solo performers in this duet — Miss Louisa Pyne and Miss Serle — were all that could be desired; while the piano singing of the chorus was beyond praise — the concluding passage, "O, how blest are they!" being breathed rather than uttered, and wholly realising the poetical idea of the composer. Madame Laura Baxter displayed equal intelligence and vocal ability in the alto solo, "Alas! that all by virtue sainted," and in "Behold, Zion, behold," although, the time of the first being taken too slow, and of the last too quick, it was not always easy for her to preserve the necessary close alliance with conductor and orchestra. In the deeply pathetic passage "The sinner's joys decay," which brings the second scene to an end — not less a wonderful example of vocal expression than a marvellous piece of orchestral colouring — it would not be fair to draw any distinction between the performance of the solo voice (Miss Louisa Pyne) and that of the chorus; both being as nearly as possible faultless.

As the interest of the story culminates, so does the expressive power and invention of the composer; and thus the third scene, which involves the most solemn and important incidents of the drama, is more striking in a proportionate degree than either of its precursors. Our task at present, however, is not to discuss the plan, or dwell upon the extraordinary merits of the illustrations to Athalie, which have been more than once examined at length, but to describe the effect of their most recent performance. It is enough, therefore, to remind our readers that the third scene comprises the double prophecy by Joad (Jehoida), of the destruction of the old and the appearance of a new Jerusalem (in which is typified the advent of the Messiah) — both inventions of Racine, but consistently vindicated in his preface to Athalie — the antagonistic dialogue between the incredulous and credulous listeners to the words of the High Priest; the exquisite hymn, "Hearts feel that love Thee," for trio of women's voices, with chorus; and other passages of the highest beauty. This very imaginative and picturesque scene was almost uniformly well done. Even the ingenious example of choral part-writing, "Lord, let us hear Thy voice," in which the people prepare themselves for the prophetic revelations of Joad — a composition rarely heard to advantage, owing to the complexity of its divisions — was rendered with a smoothness and justness of intonation that scarcely at any one moment deviated "a pin's point" from the required level. The discourse of the High Priest is recited to the accompaniment of the orchestra and here, as all must agree, Mendelssohn has achieved a more singular triumph in the way of musical word-painting than in either of the Greek dramas of Sophocles (Antigone and Œdipus Coloneus) for which, as for Athalie, he composed choral and incidental music at the instigation of the late King of Prussia, who caused them to be represented on the stage of the Royal Theatre at Berlin. The corale for the trumpet solo (one of the most striking features of the orchestral design) — strict Lutheran, and consequently appropriate in a musical embodiment of the prediction of a new and purer faith—was played to admiration by Mr. T. Harper, whose tone and phrasing, to say nothing of his executive skill, indicate an artistic refinement not to be excelled. The band did its part admirably here as elsewhere. The dialogue between the credulous and incredulous auditors of Joad—in which the plaintive cry of the non-convinced ("O Zion, thou art doomed," &c.) is allotted with fine discernment to the piercing higher tones of sopranos and altos, while the response of the faithful ("Our Zion firmly stands," &c.) acquires double force through the contrast afforded by the breadth and vigorous firmness of men's voices—although the opening chorus in the minor key, "Promised joys! menaced woes!" (where doubt is first suggested) was taken at considerably too slow a time, was otherwise irreproachable. The trio with chorus, "Hearts feel that love Thee," which brings the third scene to an end—a model of expressive melody, unaffected sentiment, and graceful combination—was so delightfully sung by Miss Louisa Pyne, Miss Serle (who has no reason to fear being overheard), and Mad. Baxter, and so delicately supported by the chorus, who in the brief unaccompanied phrase, "The calm and holy rest" (a sort of glimpse at the forthcoming "Lift thine eyes to the mountains" in Elijah), outdid themselves, that the audience with one voice demanded a repetition of the whole, and there was nothing left but to accede—which Mr. Costa naturally did, with the best grace imaginable.

The fourth and last musical scene—where the High Priest declares young Joaz heir to the throne of David, and the "Holy cohorts" swear to defend his right—if not quite equal in sustained interest to the third, contains, nevertheless, some very remarkable passages, which offer good scope for the performers vocal and instrumental. First, the justly celebrated March, which, though taken decidedly too slow at the commencement, was otherwise superbly executed by the band—the deliciously fresh and tuneful trio (the "moving-bass" accompaniment to which was given to perfection by the gentleman who wielded the most conspicuous trombone) being particularly happy, and, by the accelerated speed it assumed, bringing about the resumption of the principal subject of the March with twice the pomp and vigour of the outset. Then the chorus, "Depart, ye Sons of Aaron"—where the people urge the warriors to strike in honour of their legitimate king—was done to perfection, a bonâ fide gradual "pianissimo" (in which, by the way, not the least noticeable point was the skilful management of the supposed receding trumpet, an instrument rarely amenable where such an effect is contemplated) being obtained towards the conclusion. From this point to the climax—including even the rhythmically capricious passage, "Where are Thy blessings, O Lord?" which was taken too rapidly for the words to be clearly intelligible—and, last not least, Miss L. Pyne's noble delivery of her last important solo ("Last of a race of kings"), all, with hardly a point excepted, was as correct and grand as could be wished, the repetition, with striking and interesting modifications, of the opening chorus, "Heaven and the earth display," the recurrence of which at this place gives a satisfactory completeness to the entire work, being as solemn and edifying as at the beginning. This performance of Athalie, in short, has won new laurels both for the members of the Sacred Harmonic Society and their vigilant and untiring conductor. Nor must Mr. Brownsmith, who presided with his accustomed zeal at the great (too "great") organ, be passed over without honourable mention. That Mr. George Vandenhoff's well-marked, pointed, and perhaps over-dramatic declamation of the text of Mr. Bartholomew thoroughly suited the taste of the audience, was shown by reiterated plaudits.

The Messiah (first ante-Christmas performance) is announced for December 13. The first great choral practice of the London Contingent of the Handel Festival Choir took place last night, when Acis and Galatea was to be rehearsed.

ROYAL ENGLISH OPERA.

THE PURITAN'S DAUGHTER.

A NEW opera from the pen of Mr. Balfe has now become one of the special requirements of the musical season. The public look forward to its production with curiosity and hope, and but too frequently the fortunes of the English opera are dependent on its success. Lucky Mr Balfe! who thus interests the musical world beforehand and enchains it afterwards, and holds, it may be, the existences of hundreds suspended from the nib of his pen! The triumphant career of our English (Irish) composer has, however, been honourably and consistently achieved and sustained. The favour bestowed on the composer of the Siege of Rochelle some quarter of a century since has never veered about, but has rather been confirmed and augmented with each succeeding year. New candidates for operatic honours have put in their claims from time to time, with greater or less results; but after due season the old liking has returned, and the old feeling has resumed its sway. Profounder musicians may have entered the arena of competition, and more conscientious labourers in the vineyard may have presented more carefully gathered fruits; but one touch of nature makes the whole world kin, and as Mr. Balfe in his compositions aims to please the million in the first place, and endeavours to charm without effort, he has always the majority with him, who, after all, are the true judges in the matter, and can alone confer immortality. It is not the musicians but the multitude who have given lasting fame to Don Giovanni, Il Barbiere, Fidelio, Masaniello, Der Freischutz, &c. An opera not addressed to ordinary comprehensions had best not be written at all, at least as far as regards publicity. No composer, we have a shrewd suspicion, ever wrote a work for the theatre who had not the pit and galleries in view as well as the boxes and stalls. If he had not he was an inconsequential workman, who did not do justice to himself or those who employed him, and who, in fact, attempted to impose on the world. Mr. Balfe is undeniably the composer for the people. His flight, long or short, is invariably beneath the clouds. He never soars into the empyrean with the eagle, which too often implies quitting the range of vision altogether, but is content with occupying the regions where the real song-birds tune their throats, not always, be sure, perched on a thorn with the linnet, nor hid in a thicket with the blackbird and thrush, but now and then mounting with the lark, never out of sight, and always "True to the kindred points of heaven and home."

This is the secret of Mr. Balfe's immense popularity. He makes himself always understood, never goes beyond his depth, writes without the fear of scholastic anathemas, and prefers simplicity to profundity and elaboration.

The new opera produced on Saturday last, under the title of the Puritan's Daughter, created more than usual interest, inasmuch as it was rumoured that Mr. Balfe had at last procured a librettist worthy of his talent. A new book by a rational hand for Mr. Balfe was, indeed, a godsend, and a masterpiece was anticipated—need we add, has been been realised? Now that Mr. Balfe has shown himself eager to collaborate with an experienced writer and a scholar, we may look forward even to more brilliant achievements than the Puritan's Daughter.

The libretto is by Mr. J. V. Bridgeman, a gentleman well known in literary circles for his scholastic attainments, and also as a contributor to the stage in various departments of the dramatic art. The story is ingenious and simple, and not taken from any source with which we are acquainted. The period is that of Charles II. Wolf (Mr. H. Corri), formerly colonel of Cromwell's regiment of "Ironsides," and some Puritans bound in the same cause, have received information that King Charles, accompanied by a small escort, intends making a journey from London to Dover. They conspire to fall upon the escort and carry off the King. A ship is required to convey Charles abroad when taken, to obtain which Wolf promises the hand of his daughter Mary (Miss Louisa Pyne) to Seymour (Mr. St. Albyn), a buccaneer. Seymour has a lieutenant Drake (Mr. Wallworth), who, under the cloak of obedience, waits to requite his captain for having formerly carried off his betrothed. The Puritans meet in a ruined chapel attached to Middleton Hall, where Colonel Wolf resides with his daughter and Clifford (Mr. Santley), his secretary. Mary Wolf and Clifford are attached to each other. Wolf has chosen Clifford for his secretary, though a Royalist, as his father and himself were friends in boyhood. At the meeting of the conspirators there are two unsuspected listeners—Mary Wolf, who has strayed to the secret door, and Ralph (Mr. George Honey), the comic character of the piece, who, having overheard Seymour observe he would find treasure in the chapel, meaning Mary Wolf, comes in search of concealed gold. The Puritans having sworn their oath of vengeance, hear a noise at the door. Seymour rushes off and brings in Mary. The Roundheads are furious at being discovered, and Seymour making known to them the atttachment between Mary and Clifford, they swear that Clifford shall die unless the girl marries Seymour. Mary, to save her lover's life, consents, and takes an oath never to speak of what she has witnessed. Clifford is distracted at learning from Mary that she is about to become the wife of another. Not being able to obtain any clue to this change in her feelings, he is maddened by jealousy.

In the second act King Charles (Mr. Patey) and Rochester (Mr. W. Harrison) seek shelter from a tempest in Middelton Hall, and are received by Clifford. When Colonel Wolf comes in, he perceives, to his surprise and delight, that the King is in his power. The hall is surrounded, and all chance of escape prevented. Clifford alone has leave to quit the mansion unquestioned. The Merry Monarch, who pays court to Mary, in consequence of a wager with Rochester that he would carry her off without discovering his rank, learns from her how unjust he has been towards Clifford, whose father lost life and fortune in his cause. Stung with remorse, he promises that Clifford shall be restored to his estates, and declares himself to be the King. Mary remembers the oath of the Puritans, and determines to save the King's life. She attempts to lead him off by a secret passage, but every outlet is guarded. She conceals Charles on the approach of Clifford, and when the young cavalier is about to take leave of her for ever, the King stands before them and endeavours to reconcile matters. Clifford, at first incensed, is ultimately assured of the innocence of Mary, and determines to effect the King's escape at the risk of his own life. Charles and Clifford change cloaks and hats, and the King passes through the guards.

In the last act, on the discovery of the King's escape, Rochester, Clifford, and Ralph are about to be shot, when the Royal troops, headed by the King, break into the hall; Seymour is shot by Drake, and the Puritans are led off to meet their deserved fate. All things are satisfactorily explained, and Clifford is united to Mary.

The opera commences with an overture as remarkable for the brilliancy of the instrumentation as for the felicity of the ideas. The horn movement, above all, with which it opens, is striking and melodious. The introductory chorus, "Here's to wine!" is extremely attractive, and pleased the audience on the threshold. The overture, by the way, was loudly applauded and repeated. The comic duet, "I would ask a question," for Ralph and Jessie (Miss Susan Pyne), is written in the composer's most fluent manner, and in his peculiar humorous vein. The ballad of Wolf, "My own sweet child," is after the sentimental pattern, with a florid cabalietta for Mr. H. Corri. The comic song for Ralph, "What glorious news is that I've heard," is one of the most original things in the opera. The opening phrase is suggestive of one of the Irish melodies, but all the rest is as new as it is attractive. The accompaniments are racy and full of variety, and the whole song is characteristic and replete with interest. The manner in which the popular air, "The power of love," is hinted at rather than brought in at the end is exceedingly happy. The scene where the Puritans take the oath of freedom, if wanting in grandeur and elevation, is grave and solemn, and towards the conclusion is particularly impressive. In the concerted morceau after the oath there are some happy and telling bits. Mary's appeal, "Wouldst thou see me perish?" is beautifully plaintive, the oboe being employed in the accompaniment with striking effect. So also Mary's response to the oath, "I swear by all I love," in which a wonderfully fine effect is obtained by one note sustained pianissimo by the choir, while the soprano voice is singing. The ballad for Mary, "Pretty, lowly, modest flower," is one of the gems of the opera. The leading phrase is beautiful, and the florid passages at the termination brilliant and effective. The duet for Mary and Clifford, which constitutes the finale, "Yes, thou must cease to love me," has many felicitous points. The opening movement is extremely melodious, while the Italian grace and flow of the ensemble, "Oh! dared I speak," is not likely to escape the least observant listener. Clifford's ballad, "Oh! would that I had died ere now," which follows, created, perhaps, the greatest sensation of the evening. Although a real Balfe-sentimental tune, it is new and beautiful, and will be heard all over Europe. With infinite tact and corresponding effect, the composer has made Mary repeat the air in form of a prayer, after Clifford has sunk stupefied into a seat.

The second act commences with a recitative and air of a bold character, "How peal on peal of thunder," for Clifford. The trio for Charles, Rochester, and Clifford, "By the tempest overtaken," is characteristic of the situation. The concluding motive is very sprightly. The terzetto, "My welcome also to this roof," allotted to Charles, Rochester, and Wolf, is a genuine inspiration. It is succeeded by a vigorous strain for Wolf, "Can it be, do I dream?" which is worked into a turbulent invocation. The duet, "Let the loud timbrel and the trump," would require another Tamburini and Lablache to give it full effect. The song for Rochester, "Though we fond men all beauties woo," is gay and spirited. The long duet between the King and Mary has many points of interest, but is uselessly elongated. The gratitude of the young girl would have been better expressed in two than two-and-thirty lines. Miss Pyne, whose singing was superlative here, never proved herself a more consummate mistress of the vocal art. Rochester's bacchanalian song, "Let others sing the praise of wine," given with great animation by Mr. Harrison, was one of the hits of the performance. The air is not merely catching, but haunting; the burden is irresistibly quaint; and the very essence of comedy is attained. The ballad, "How well I recollect the night," which Mary addresses to Clifford, is original and beautiful, and is sure to win its way to the highest favour. The duet which follows wants condensation. A charming terzetto follows, "What man worthy of the name," but its effect is dissipated by the long concerted piece which follows. The quatuor, "Erelong death, perhaps, shall lay me low," is noble and brief, as it should be in the situation. The close of the second act is solemn and striking. Mary, believing Clifford to be the King, laments over his fate; Clifford, aside, calls upon Heaven to give Mary strength to endure the coming blow; while Rochester, under the influence of Bacchus, in snatches of the drinking song, celebrates the good qualities of punch. This scena is conceived and developed with the highest art and skill.

The music of the third act is hardly of equal interest with the other two. The song of Rochester, "Hail, gentle sleep," is smooth and flowing. The scene involving the treachery of Seymour, the discovery of the King's flight, the baffled rage of the Puritans, the confession of Ralph, the examination of Mary, the doom of Rochester, Clifford, and Ralph, and the distraction of Mary, although interesting from a dramatic point of view, is not well adapted for musical purposes. It is too long, and, being all of one tone of sentiment, becomes somewhat monotonous. Certain unison passages given to the conspirators have a powerful effect, and the by-scene between Wolf and Mary, where the daughter pleads to her father for Clifford, is touching and beautiful. Uproarious applause is obtained nightly by Miss Louisa Pyne, in the ballad, "My father dear, though years roll by," in which the splendid singing and unusual energy of the lady completely electrify the audience. The finale is a rondo given to the soprano, brilliant and showy, and well calculated to exhibit the perfection of Miss Louisa Pyne's mechanism.

A more triumphant success than that achieved by the Puritan's Daughter, we do not remember at the Royal English Opera. To this success almost every artist in the performance more or less contributes. To Miss Louisa Pyne, Mr. Harrison, and Mr. Santley, the chief honours of the execution are due. We never heard Miss Pyne sing more superbly. Mr. Balfe, indeed, seems to have written instinctively to set off her voice to the greatest advantage. Mr. Santley, too, never sang more nobly or with greater effect. Mr. Harrison was exceedingly humorous as Rochester, and makes great fun in the drinking scenes, and is altogether admirable. Mr. George Honey has an important part in Ralph, and contrives to amuse the audience with his whimsicalities. Miss Susan Pyne must be complimented for undertaking a subordinate character like that of Jessie, to which, however, she imparts, by her mirth and sprightliness, no ordinary significance.

The band, under the zealous conduct of Mr. Alfred Mellon, we need not say, is thoroughly up to the mark, and the chorus are excellent.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

THE Fourth Concert of the Fourth Season (and last but one before Christmas).—Monday Evening, December 9, 1861.—The Instrumental Pieces selected from the Works of MOZART; the Vocal Pieces from those of VARIOUS COMPOSERS.

PROGRAMME.

PART I.—Quartet, in E flat, for Two Violins, Viola, and Violoncello (first time at the Monday Popular Concerts) MM. Vieuxtemps, L. Ries, H. Webb, and Paque (Mozart). Song, "Vo far guerra" (Rinaldo), Miss Banks (Handel). Canzonet, "Sympathy," Madame Louisa Vinning (Haydn). Sonata, in B flat, for Pianoforte alone, Miss Arabella Goddard (Mozart).

PART II.—Sonata, in B flat (written for Mlle. Strinasacchi), for Pianoforte and Violin, Miss Arabella Goddard and M. Vieuxtemps (Mozart). New Song, "Never forget," Miss Banks (G. A. Macfarren). Song, "On music's softest pinions," Madame Louisa Vinning (Mendelssohn). Quintet, in A major, for Clarinet, Two Violins, Tenor, and Violoncello (repeated by unanimous desire), MM. Vieuxtemps, Lazarus, L. Ries, H. Webb, and Paque (Mozart).—Conductor, Mr. Benedict. To commence at eight o'clock precisely.

NOTICE.—It is respectfully suggested that such persons as are not desirous of remaining till the end of the performance can leave either before the commencement of the last instrumental piece, or between any two of the movements, so that those who wish to hear the whole may do so without interruption.

Between the last vocal piece and the quintet, an interval of Five Minutes will be allowed. The Concert will finish at about a quarter after ten o'clock.

Stalls, 5s.; Balcony, 3s.; Admission, 1s.

Tickets to be had of Mr. Austin, at the Hall, 28 Piccadilly; CHAPPELL and CO., 50 New Bond Street, and the principal Musicsellers.

LONDON: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1861.

AMONG composers for the organ, Bach, by unanimous consent, stands the highest: and of all his many contributions to the "King of instruments," the most universally admired are his pedal fugues. J. N. Forkel*, Bach's biographer, and the intimate friend and correspondent of Charles Philip Emanuel, the "Patriarch's" second son, although a diligent seeker after Bach's MSS. does not seem to have been acquainted with more than a dozen of the pedal fugues. In alluding to the "grand preludes and fugues with obbligato pedal†," Forkel remarks, "the number of these cannot be ascertained; but I believe that it does not exceed a dozen; at least, with all my inquiries for many years, at the best sources, I have not been able to collect more than twelve, the themes of which I will here set down. To these I may add a very artificially composed Passacaglia; which, however, is rather for two clavichords and pedal than for the organ."

Subsequent explorers have been more fortunate — adding to the treasures amassed by the industry and research of Forkel almost three times as much as he himself procured — and, among other things, some of the finest of the organ pieces. Kittel, a pupil of Bach, and organist of Erfurt—who had accumulated a very extensive assortment of the unpublished works, which was unfortunately distributed after his death — owned, together with other compositions for the organ, thirteen fugues, with pedal obbligato, among which we find the grand fugue in G minor, without prelude. The twelve, of which Forkel has given a thematic catalogue, are in C minor, A minor, G major, E minor, B minor, C major, D minor, C major, D minor, F major, G minor (not the one so frequently performed by Mr. Best), and the prelude and fugue in E minor, known to every organist. The set of Six Preludes and Fugues (Sechs Præludium und secks Fugen mit Pedal), published at Vienna as far back as 1801, were most probably selected from the Forkel and Kittel MSS. How many compositions of the kind Bach really produced it is impossible to guess; but, in all probability, the best of them are printed in the most recent German editions of Griepenkerl and others.

If any proof were wanting to show that Bach was one of the greatest organ players that ever lived, these "pedal fugues" would suffice. "His great genius," observes Forkel, "which comprehended everything, and united everything requisite to the perfection of one of the most inexhaustible of arts, brought organ playing to a height of excellence it had never attained before his time, and will hardly reach again." "The admirable John Sebastian Bach," says another writer*, "has at length, in modern times, brought the art of the organ to its greatest perfection; and it is only to be wished that after his death it may not decline, or be wholly lost, on account of the small number of those who still bestow any pains upon it."

"When John Sebastian Bach," says Forkel, "seated himself at the organ, which, when there was no divine service, he was often requested to do by strangers, he used to choose some subject, and to execute it, in all the various forms of organ composition, so that the subject constantly remained the ground-work of his performance, even if he had played, without intermission, for two hours or more. First, he used this theme for a prelude and a fugue, with all the stops. Then he showed his art of using the stops, for a trio, a quartet, &c., always upon the same subject. Afterwards, followed Psalm tunes (choral), the melody of which was intermingled in the most diversified manner with the original subject, in three or four parts. Finally, the conclusion was attained by a fugue, with all the stops, in which either another treatment only of the first subject predominated, or one, or, according to its nature, two others were mixed with it. This is the art which old Reinkin, at Hamburg, considered as being already lost in his time, but which, as he afterwards found, not only lived in John Sebastian Bach, but had attained through him the highest degree of perfection."

The foregoing is only a paragraph selected from a long and interesting account of Bach's excellent qualities as a performer on an instrument he loved as much as the clavichord itself; and for which he wrote so many masterpieces. Although the organ fugues are more than a century and a quarter old, they possess all the charm of novelty. Nothing can possibly be more unlike our mighty Handel than his no less mighty contemporary, "the giant of Thuringia." Both the material and the machinery of the two men differ essentially: there is more variety in Handel, but there is more unity in Bach, a freer flow of rhythmic tune in the former, but greater depth of harmony and greater ingenuity of contrivance in the latter.

IN the new opera, The Puritan's Daughter, an attempt has been made to transfer the special interest heretofore invested in the tenor singer to the baritone. For the first time, we believe, in the history of the Opera, the part of the lover has been taken from the high voice and given to the low. Why Mr. Balfe should have acted in direct contradiction to all his predecessors, Italian, German, French, and English, seems unaccountable, and we cannot pretend to offer any solution to so difficult a problem. We may speculate, nevertheless, upon the fact of how far such a violation of all precedents is admissible under any circumstances, and what may be its ultimate effect on the constitution of operas.

From time immemorial—at least, since the male soprano went out of fashion — the tenor has been the recognised representative of the lover's part, which, in almost every instance, has been the principal male part. But not in operas only was this the case. In oratorios, cantatas, and in all character pieces, the most important music has been assigned to the tenor. Exceptions may be taken to the operas of Don Giovanni and Figaro, and the oratorio Elijah, since in these masterpieces the baritone or bass has been made the chief personage, and the tenor rendered subordinate. But in each of these examples the composer had been influenced to write for a special singer. Moreover, it must be remembered that in neither of Mozart's operas does the bass play the real lover's part, or sing the lover's music. Don Giovanni's most passionate strains, however beautiful, want the heartfelt tenderness which we find in the songs, &c., apportioned to Don Ottavio — witness the airs "Il mio tesoro" and "Della sua pace," and the duet "Fuggi crudele" — while the music of Figaro, the veritable lover of Le Nozze, has nothing of love in it whatsoever; at least, no tender appeal, no passion, no outpouring of the heart. Le Nozze di Figaro is an opera of pure intrigue, and the absence of the usual principal element is thereby in part apologised for. In Elijah, too, although the chief momentum of the music and its greatest features are intrusted to the bass voice, by far the two finest airs in the oratorio—"If with all your hearts," and "Then shall the righteous"—are given to the tenor, proving in what superior account that class of voice was held by the composer. Rossini has written more than one opera in which the baritone or bass plays the conspicuous character, but not one in which the principal lover's part is assigned to that register of voice. Assur in Semiramide and Maometto in L'Assedio di Corinto are the leading personages in these operas, and both are basses; so, too, in the Gazza Ladra, Fernando is the bass and is of far more importance in a musical and histrionic sense than Gianetto, the tenor; but none is a lover in the real dramatic acceptation of the term. In fact, it comes to this; composers have discovered, and the world has endorsed the discovery, that the tenor voice is the most truthful exponent of love and tenderness, and that what is bold, energetic, and forcible, belongs by right to the grave voice. We certainly cannot call to mind any opera in any language, in which the bass is made to undertake the lover, and consequently must look upon Mr. Balfe's alternation of the parts as somewhat daring, if not hazardous. How it may end is entirely matter for speculation. An English opera without a tenor has ere this been written; but never, if our memory serve us right, one in which the tenor has been made subsidiary or secondary to the bass. Mr. Balfe is a first-rate authority, and nothing in operatic writing that has received his sanction and judgment is to be treated lightly. Of course the majority will treat his new arrangement of the voices as a serious innovation, while some, no doubt, will look upon it as an attempt to revolutionise opera. We ourselves hardly know what to think, until such time as a fair trial has been made. The Puritan's Daughter is likely to have a long run, and the career of that opera must satisfactorily determine how far the composer has been justified in departing from tradition and precedents, and aiming at reformation. We fear, however, it will not be easy to move the public from the recognition of not merely an authorised form, but an old established preference.

THE PURITAN'S DAUGHTER.

To the Editor of the MUSICAL WORLD.

SIR,—It having been generally reported in the music trade during the past week that persons from our house were sent to Covent Garden Theatre on the first night of The Puritan's Daughter to hiss that opera, and that it was owing to their united efforts that the encore to Mr. Harrison's drinking song was received in such a very unfavourable manner, will you allow me to give a flat contradiction to that report, and to state that only two persons (my brother and an assistant) were present on the occasion in question, and that neither one nor the other expressed in any way whatever any disapprobation of Mr. Harrison's song, or his performance of it? I am very anxious that this should be known, as I believe that the petty conduct which has been attributed to our house can have originated only in the mind of one person who is unhappily a prey to many delusions, which include one that every person he meets is his enemy, and is conspiring to overthrow him. The more natural way to account for the unpleasant sounds which were heard is, I think, the extreme length of an opera on the night of its first representation, and the impatient character of the rather boisterous public which makes a point of being present on the "first night" of every new work of importance.—I am, dear Sir, yours obediently,

JOHN BOOSEY.

VOCAL ASSOCIATION.—The Right Hon. the Earl of Dudley is expected to preside at the annual meeting of the Vocal Association during the present month. His lordship, who is always a liberal patron of the fine arts, has contributed greatly to the success of the Society, since he has consented to become the president, by the establishment of the annual conversazione, certainly one of the most brilliant and interesting of the season. The Society commences its rehearsals for 1862 under the direction of Mr. Benedict immediately after the general meeting.

MADAME GRISI'S FAREWELL TOUR.

THE party crossed over from Glasgow to Belfast on Saturday evening, and had a tolerably rough passage. Sailors would have called it "a dirty night" in every sense. It was dark and stormy, the wind howled and the waves were high—a combination very distressing in its effect upon the tourists, and which detained them some two hours longer than usual on the voyage. After a day's rest, however, they completely recovered themselves, and by their performance at the concert on Monday evening in Belfast, it seemed as if the sea-trip had been beneficial rather than otherwise. The concert was the most successful of the whole tour, and is thus spoken of in the Belfast News Letter of Dec. 3:—

"THE ANACREONTIC SOCIETY—FAREWELL OF MADAME GRISI.—Last evening, the Anacreontic Society gave their second dress concert for the season, and the fact that Madame Grisi was engaged to appear for the first time in connection with the Society, and for the last in this town, attracted a most crowded and fashionable audience, that filled the Music Hall to inconvenience. Mad. Grisi has been so long before the public that any elaborate notice of her wonderful powers or of her successful career would be now altogether out of place. Perhaps no great artist has ever, for so long a time, maintained the supreme position which Mad. Grisi is only now surrendering with reluctance. The eminent prima donna took part in the canto 'Giulia gentil.' There was little demand upon our powers in this morceau, save in the long drawn-out note at the close of the chorus, and which was like a reminiscence of the oak scene in 'Norma.' The canto was encored vehemently, and the last verse was repeated. The larger portion of the audience were agreeably surprised by the first bars of the romanza from Flotow's Marta, "Qui sola, vergin rosa," but the initiated were aware that the gem of the opera is, in fact, the charming Irish melody, "The last rose of summer." It was indeed an unusual treat to hear Grisi sing this exquisite air. There was no profusion of ornament, no overlaying of the melody with unmeaning roulades—it was the old strain, pure and simple, given with a clearness of tone and a depth of feeling that it would be impossible to surpass. The applause of the audience, as the delicate concluding tremolo died away, was warm to enthusiasm, and Mad. Grisi, on reappearing, substituted "Home, sweet home," which was an equally great success."

Of Miss Conran, who made her first appearance since her return from the Continent on this occasion, the same paper says:—"Her voice is a mezzo-soprano of much sweetness and extremely flexible, capable of conveying the most delicate shades of expression. In the duet 'La ci darem,' from Giovanni, she sang sweetly and effectively, but it was in the una voce from Il Barbiere that her great effort was made. If there was a fault in this, it was that there was too rapid a succession of ornaments; but her fioriture are something surprising, and many of the most accomplished artists of the Italian school might envy Miss Conran's attainments in this respect. After both her appearances Miss Conran was deservedly recalled and warmly applauded; and to have won such plaudits singing beside Grisi was no light praise. Of the other lady artists, Mad. Dario sang "Ah forse e lui," from Traviata, with remarkable power. Mad. Lemaire sang Meyerbeer's 'Nobil Signor' very correctly and fluently, and was applauded. Signor Galvani, an exceedingly pleasing tenor, sang Donizetti's 'Com' è gentil,' and also did good service in many concerted pieces; and Signor Ciampi, a young basso profundo of great promise, and of evident talent, sang 'Largo al factotum' with all the effect of which that well-known buffo song is capable. In the trio, 'Pappataci,' from Italiana in Algeri, Signors Ciampi, Cresci, and Galvani sang so well as to win a hearty encore. Indeed, it was one of the gems of the evening; and the delicate tenor passages of Galvani, imitated by Ciampi's falsetto, at once surprised and delighted the audience.

"The members of the society played two overtures, Don Giovanni and Oberon. These were performed with remarkable verve, and Oberon especially told upon the audience. The vocal members sang Wallace's chorus, "Come away to the chase," with admirable effect; and Webbe's glee, "The mighty conqueror," was also well given. The concert concluded with "God save the Queen," in which Mad. Grisi took a solo verse, and the whole strength of the society and the remaining artists joined in the chorus, the entire audience standing during the performance. At its close Mad. Grisi was warmly applauded, and bowed her acknowledgments to the company. The concert was conducted, in his usual efficient manner, by Herr Leo Kerbusch."

On Tuesday the party proceeded to Dublin, and commenced the series of farewell performances at the Theatre Royal with Lucrezia Borgia.

The reception which Madame Grisi met from her enthusiastic admirers in Dublin was cordial in the extreme. The applause lasted several minutes upon her making her entrée as the Duchess. Her singing throughout the opera was marked by its original sweetness and effect, while her acting seemed to have lost none of its former vigour and expression. She sang "Com' è bello" very much as of yore, while her "Il segreto" drew down rapturous applause and an immediate encore. In the second and in the last scene of the third act, her vocalisation was truly grand. Signor Galvani made a most favourable impression, and sang amongst others the solo "Di Pescatore" very effectively. Mad. Lemaire as Orsini evinced a great deal of ability, and Signor Cresi as Don Alfonso proved the possession of an excellent baritone, which he managed artistically. The choruses were full and effective, and the opera, as a whole, was admirably performed. During the acts Mad. Grisi was called before the curtain and enthusiastically applauded.

On Wednesday Rigoletto was given, Mlle. Dario making her début before the Dublin public as Gilda. Of this, and Miss Ellen Conran's return to her native city, we shall speak more fully next week.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—If the attendance at these entertainments is to go on increasing at the present rate, St. James's Hall will be quite inadequate to accommodate the multitude. The influx last Monday was enormous; not only had every stall its occupant, but the balcony, galleries, area and orchestra were all densely packed with an audience whose earnest attention and thorough appreciation were by no means the least agreeable incident of the evening. The programme was from "Various Composers," the instrumental part comprising the septet and pianoforte sonata in E minor, op. 90 of Beethoven; Dussek's sonata in G (op. 69, No. 2), for violin and pianoforte; and Haydn's quartet in C (op. 33, No. 3): the second and last for the first time at these concerts, in accordance with a plan introduced this season of always presenting two "novelties." The greatest attraction was undoubtedly the septet. The names of Messrs. Vieuxtemps, Webb, Paque, and Severn, as violin, viola, violoncello, and double bass—with Mr. Lazarus, clarionet; Mr. C. Harper, horn; and Mr. Hutchins, bassoon—are a guarantee for the perfect execution of the septet, which was attentively listened to throughout,—the performance occupying some forty-five minutes,—and the scherzo rapturously encored. In the Tema con Variazioni each instrument seemed to vie with the other, and one hardly knew which to admire most, the composition or the performers, who were "applauded to the echo" on leaving the platform. Apropos of the pianoforte sonata (in which Mr. Charles Hallé displayed all his well-known executive power and thorough comprehension of the composer's intention), we must not omit allusion to a pledge from the director that henceforth the "Analytical Programme" will comprise a detailed analysis of the solo sonata, "with illustrations in musical type," at every concert, which will make these books all the more valuable to such as wish to obtain a thorough understanding of each movement. The sonata duet, Dussek (which had been already twice given), although perhaps not quite so catching at first hearing as its companion in B flat, was evidently well suited to the general taste; while Haydn's quartet, despite the concert being longer than usual, kept the majority of the audience in their places to the last. Mlle. Florence Lancia's charming voice and unaffected style were exhibited in Dussek's canzonet, "Now summer has departed," and Schubert's "Young Nun," the latter, by the way, most particularly characteristic of the composer of the "Erl King," and so well sung as to lead to an encore, which, nevertheless, was modestly declined. Mr. J. W. Davison's song, "Swifter far than summer's flight" (Shelley), and Mendelssohn's "Savoyard's Song," were both well given by Miss Leffler, Mr. Benedict accompanying the vocal music with his customary taste and ability. At the next concert Miss Arabella Goddard will make her first appearance this season, and Mozart's quintet is to be repeated "by desire."

NATIONAL CHORAL SOCIETY.—Mr. G. W. Martin, founder and conductor of this society, has invited 3000 soldiers from the various garrisons in the metropolis to a grand performance of Handel's Messiah, to be given by the members at Exeter Hall on Thursday next. The number in the chorus is over 700, and the number of instruments employed on the occasion will be nearly 100. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge and a number of other military officers of the highest standing have offered their patronage and support. The concert is the first of a series which Mr. Martin proposes to give during the winter to the soldiers with the view of creating a taste for choral music among the men, thus providing them with a means of rational amusement during their leisure hours. The principal soloists will be Miss Elenora Wilkinson, Mrs. Merest (late Miss Maria B. Hawes), Messrs Wilbye Cooper, and Lewis Thomas.

A NEW PRIMA DONNA TO COME.—"Miss Austin, a lady resident in our own locality," writes the Northern Daily Express, in treating of Mad. Grisi's farewell concert at Newcastle, "and the pupil, we understand, of Miss Emily Grant, though apparently suffering from intense nervousness (natural to a first appearance), sang Mozart's impassioned aria, 'L' Addio,' with great purity of style and expression; and in Frank Mori's new ballad, 'A thousand miles from thee,' gave unmistakable evidence of the fine quality of her voice, and of her careful and excellent training in phrasing, production of tone, and general management of a class of organ usually requiring the most careful, artistic, and judicious attention. In both pieces she was most warmly received and applauded, nothing short of an encore sufficing in each case, which was doubtless quite as much due to the intrinsic merit of her performance, as it was prompted by the kind feeling of encouragement to a débutante. To the first encore she replied by repeating one of the stanzas of the aria, and to the latter, which was the more enthusiastic of the two, she but increased it when Sig. Vianesi played the symphony to Hatton's "Good-bye, Sweetheart," and which, as sung by her, was not the least successful effort on her part of the evening. We have no doubt that Miss Austin will one day prove a refined and elegant vocalist."

Provincial.

The Western Daily Mercury of the 4th inst. publishes a long account of a concert given at Plymouth on the previous night, from which we extract the following:—

"Last evening Mlle. Anna Whitty, Herr Formes, M. Ole Bull, Mr. Emile Berger, and Mr. and Mrs. Tennant appeared and performed at the Mechanics' Institute before an audience which crowded the hall. It is long since so attractive a concert party visited the west, and under any circumstances the prospect of hearing, in addition to the celebrated Formes, and 'that magician of the bow'—Ole Bull—the newly arisen English prima donna, Mlle. Anna Whitty, must have drawn the musical world together in great force. The popular songstress comes among us with so many testimonials of the highest character from every city and town she has visited since her arrival in this country from the scene of her still greater triumphs, that expectation was on tiptoe. But, apart from this, Herr Formes is not to be heard in the provinces every day, and the opportunity of listening to his masterly interpretations is not one that many musical people can afford to lose. The fame of M. Ole Bull's performances on the violin is world-wide. The programme combined the varied talents of the performers with excellent taste. For instance, Mlle. Whitty sang, in the first part, Pasiello's exquisite rondo, 'Non più mesta,' her performance of which has so delighted every audience before which she has sung it, in the opera and the concert-room, during her recent tour, and, later in the evening, Mr. St. Leger's pretty love song, 'Somebody is waiting for me;' in addition to her part in several concerted pieces. Her voice was in good condition, and fairly open to criticism. Not to a single note of the 'Non più mesta' did Mlle. Whitty fail to give its proper importance and expression—yet she ran over the exceedingly difficult passages with which the composition abounds with all the graceful ease that characterised her performance of the simple English ditty afterwards. The first solo of the great basso was 'The Wanderer,' which he sang in German, with the alternating torrent-like impetuosity (!) and pathetic tenderness which belong pre-eminently to himself. In response to an encore, Herr Formes gave one of Mozart's humorous airs, with all the merry vivacity of a true Leporelli. In the second part, he sang his own beautiful ballad—'In sheltered vale'—in splendid style, accompanying himself upon the piano. Mrs. Tennant substituted 'Baby mine,' for 'Sweet spirit, hear my prayer,' in the early part of the evening, and afterwards was encored in a Scotch air, which she sang prettily. Mr. Tennant was encored in 'Far, far away, my love,' a new ballad by Charles J. Hargitt; and loudly applauded in 'Annie dear, good-bye.' Mr. Emile Berger's accomplishments as a pianist are of a high order. His execution is easy, spirited, careful, correct, and masterly. He performed two compositions of his own, indicative of considerable ability, a fantasia on popular airs, and a solo of less pretension, but containing some remarkably beautiful passages. The lion of the evening was M. Ole Bull, who was, at every appearance, greeted with tremendous cheers, and at every disappearance enthusiastically encored. The great violinist's first performance—Paganini's famous solo, 'Di tanti palpiti'—was beyond praise. It is impossible to describe the masterly interpretation of this solo. Now the performer was simply a violinist, and the next moment the tones that issued from the instrument were so flute-like that those who heard them doubted their senses. When they died away, the hall resounded with applause which could no longer be restrained, and M. Bull returned to amuse his admirers with a curious exhibition remarkable mainly because so foreign to the instrument upon which it was given. His next performance was an arrangement of 'Le Carnival' by himself. Again, the violin was the most wonderful of fiddles and the most delightful of flutes by turns; and, above all this, the artist's bow elicited from its strings such trills as only the nightingale and M. Ole Bull's violin can produce."

The Manchester Examiner and Times writes as follows respecting Madame Lind-Goldschmidt's second concert at the Free-trade Hall:—

"The second concert, a miscellaneous one, took place to an audience exceeding in numbers that assembled at the Creation. Mad. Goldschmidt had selected for her opening effort the scena and aria from Beatrice di Tenda, 'O! miei fedeli.' There are few vocal compositions, perhaps, more difficult; and it must not be disguised that the difficulty was apparent, even under the skilful interpretation of Mad. Goldschmidt, who has always possessed the peculiar faculty of disguising the means of art in its most minute expression. The conquering of these difficulties went to show how far the voice has changed in quality of tone from that charming freshness and brilliant facility that belonged to Jenny Lind in the zenith of her fame. The truth of conception, the great versatility of style, and, occasionally, those flashes of greatness which few have ever touched since the days of Malibran or our own Mrs. Wood, were there still; and an audience, worked up by these qualities (to many of them previously unknown), could afford to forgive a little faulty intonation. The duet with Mr. Reeves from Lucia may be put in the same category. Then came the rondo 'L'amero saro sostante,' with its quaintness of character, into which she threw a spirit quite her own, and marked by the old inspiration. Here Mad. Lind was finely supported by the violin solo obbligato of Mr. H. Blagrove, and took the opportunity of introducing one of those long-sustained sotto voce notes of which she used to make so much in the chamber scene of the Somnambula. There was great beauty in all this, and it was warmly applauded. In the 'Fatal moment,' the terzetto from Robert le Diable, with Mr. Reeves and Signor Belletti, there were pleasant recollections of the earliest of her triumphs, though the husky quality might be considerably observable. In the 'John Anderson,' and again in the 'Norwegian Echo Song,' where simplicity of expression, along with an unstrained delivery of the voice, were the leading characteristics, Mad Goldschmidt showed much of her former peculiar charm. These were, indeed, a treat to those who admire simple beauty rather than ornate elaboration, and were vociferously applauded. Mr. Reeves and Signor Belletti, we need scarcely say, did ample justice to the music set down for them. In the duet from Lucia, it is only fair to Mr. Reeves to add, that he decidedly carried away the best portion of the laurels, whilst in Molique's serenade, 'When the moon is brightly shining,' he excited the audience to the call for an encore, which, however, he succeeded in avoiding. Messrs. Goldschmidt and Hallé played Mozart's concerto for two pianofortes in E flat; but the audience were evidently there to hear singing, rather than instrumental performances, even when treated with a violin solo from Mr. Blagrove, and a violoncello solo from Signor Piatti. The fact is that the concert was too long under the circumstances of a great leading excitement."

Of the performance of the Creation, which took place the previous day, it is only necessary to mention its triumphant success, that Mad. Lind-Goldschmidt sang her very best, and that she was assisted by Mr. Sims Reeves and Signor Belletti.

From a highly interesting account of Mlle. Patti's performances in Italian opera in Dublin, which appeared in a recent number of the Irish Times, we extract as much as the crowded state of our columns can afford :—

"The series of operas which Mlle. Patti inaugurated," writes our contemporary, "came to a close with Marta, on Saturday evening. From the beginning the young prima donna has had a succession of triumphs. Nothing could be more brilliant than the talents she displayed, and the exhibition of the rich gifts bestowed on her by nature at so early a period. No great lyric artist to our knowledge has manifested so large a share of histrionic and vocal ability in mere girlhood. Only eighteen years old, yet singing with the highest culture, the most dazzling brilliancy and finish in every character, and acting with the tact and experience of one who had trod the boards for years; and possessing the fresh charm of girlhood, the grace of beauty, and the buoyancy of youth. Any one so fitted to enrapture the young, please the mature, and gratify the experienced in art, we have never witnessed on the stage. She sings the music of Rossini, Mozart, Verdi, Donizetti, and Flotow, with equal truthfulness, and frequently adorns their writings with fioriture appropriate and dazzling, executed with an ease which astonishes. If she has a fault in her vocalism, it is redundancy of ornament, and too frequent a recurrence of bird-like staccati passages. The part of Lady Henrietta, in Marta, is particularly suited to Mlle. Patti. Her acting is tempered by good taste; and the tact she displays in the by-play is worthy of all observation. Then her singing is distinguished by a truthful adherence to the text, enriched by ornamentation in keeping with the various themes, and softened by an expression pure and natural. To speak of some of her flights of song is now superfluous, as all who have heard them must have been equally delighted and amazed. This latter unique portion of vocal art she exhibited in 'The Spinning Wheel' quartet. In the Italian version of the 'Last Rose of Summer' she evinced a purity of style never excelled by any of her predecessors, while she put them all in the shade by her rendering, to an encore, of Moore's words to the same melody. She then gave 'Home, sweet home,' and to another re-demand, 'Twas within a mile of Edinboro' town.' The Scotch tune she sings with unspeakable archness, and an originality of tone and manner which cannot fail to charm. At the termination she was greeted with acclamations, and left the stage laden with bouquets. As she emerged from the stage-door to her carriage, she was met by a cavalcade of the students of Trinity College — almost all Honourmen — who took the horses from the vehicle and drew her to the hotel, amidst deafening cheers. And thus ended the climax to one of the most triumphant successes within our memories."

The Dublin Evening Mail has a long article about the Ole Bull-Formes-Tennant Concerts given at the Rotundo on Saturday last, from which we supply the following :—

"The two concerts given on Saturday attracted large audiences. M. Ole Bull had not been heard here for years. Paganini's best disciple, he has preserved the effects of that great violinist, and those who hear him can form a notion of the wonderful talents of the original. Besides, M. Ole Bull has a speciality of his own full of charm, and manifesting a thorough mastery of the instrument. His playing of the 'Carnival de Venise' was in the style of his great predecessor; but 'The Mother's Prayer' was entirely his own, replete with beauty and feeling. 'Di tanti palpiti' showed he had preserved the traditions of the Italian maestro, while the 'Re cuerdo d'Albufera,' a pastorale, was another instance of the performer's manner, evincing delicacy, delicious intonation, and irreproachable phrasing. Herr Formes sang with all his usual fervour. 'In sheltered vales' is a composition of much beauty, and will make an effective teaching song for the chamber. Schubert's 'Wanderer' was given with ample expression, and 'Non più andrai' bravely. Mrs. Tennant possesses an elegantly-toned mezzo-soprano voice, almost approaching a contralto. Her method is good, and she must become an acquisition to the concert-room. We should like to hear her in sacred works, as the rich tone of her voice particularly fits her for that style of music. She sang Mozart's 'Voi che sapete' with much truthfulness, and in Hatton's song of 'Baby mine' also exhibited the same excellent training. As to Mr. Tennant, he has now shown that he can justly take a place amongst the best English tenors of the day. He sang with great purity Hargitt's ballad 'Far, far away,' Blumenthal's 'Evening Song,' and 'Annie dear, good-bye,' and was encored in all three. M. Emile Berger performed 'Les échos de Londres' on the pianoforte. Mlle. Anna Whitty sang 'Non più mesta,' and gained an encore. She also rendered 'The Angel's Whisper' with much expression, and Pasiello's 'Nina pazze per amore' with brightness. The latter was redemanded. There were a couple of concerted pieces given by the entire vocal party, and the whole performances were received with pleasure."

The Leeds papers are all very flattering in their reports of the recent operatic performances by the Milner-Cooper Company at the Princess's Theatre. The résumé of the Intelligencer, being the most concise and comprehensive, we submit it in extenso :—

"The Milner and Cooper Opera Company, consisting of Misses Annie Milner, Harriet Payne, Bronti (soprani); Mrs. Fanny Reeves (contralto); Messrs. Elliott Galer, Henry Weston, John Manley (tenors); Messrs. Henry Wharton, Oliver Summers, Raimond, and Aynsley Cook (baritone and basses), with Mr. H. C. Cooper, late solo violinist and leader of the Philharmonic Society, London, as director and conductor, have given a week's performances at this theatre. Our readers will recognise in the above names, musical talent of a high order, and the party being accompanied by a very efficient band and chorus, nothing was wanting to render the production of the several operas they appeared in complete and satisfactory. The following works were performed in the order named: —La Sonnambula, Il Trovatore, Maritana, Don Giovanni, Norma, and La Figlia del Reggimento. Miss Milner, who is a native of Leeds, possesses a clear soprano voice, of extraordinary compass, and evidently cultivated to perfection by a close study of her difficult art. She is likewise an excellent actress, and we trust she has a long and brilliant professional career to look forward to. Mr. Henry Wharton has frequently appeared before a Leeds' audience, and we believe received a portion of his musical education in this town. His singing and acting justify all that was predicted of him. The rest are too well known to require any special notice; it is sufficient to record that one and all exerted themselves to the utmost to secure the satisfaction of the audience, whose expressions of approval each evening were a certificate of success. Mr. H. C. Cooper, as conductor and leader, contributed largely to the success of the pieces. The attendance, we are sorry to say, was not always so good as might have been expected."

The Times and West Riding Express are no less complimentary. The Leeds' Mercury gives a long report of the appearance of Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini, at a concert held in the Victoria Hall, under the auspices of the Leeds' Town Hall Concert Society, on Tuesday evening week. We subjoin a few extracts :—

"On no previous occasion have Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini been received in Leeds with more hearty appreciation. Mlle. Titiens, in the air from The Creation, 'With verdure clad,' displayed the great resources of her magnificent voice, and distinguished herself as an artist capable of taking the highest position in a style with which she had previously been but little familiar, and which belongs to the English rather than to the Italian school of art. In selecting 'With verdure clad,' she subjected herself to a comparison with her great compeer, Jenny Lind, who only a few days ago sang the same air in the same room, and nearly before the same audience, but the contrast was one from which she had no reason to shrink. Indeed, the styles of the two artists are so dissimilar as scarcely to allow of a contrast, and each may with perfect justice be said to hold the highest position of honour. The air 'M'appari,' from Martha, was beautifully sung by Signor Giuglini, and the first part was brought to a close with the 'Miserere,' from Il Trovatore, Dr. Spark accompanying on the organ, and Signor Arditi on the piano. In the second part, Mlle. Titiens sang 'La Stella,' composed for her by Signor Arditi, in which she was encored. A similar compliment was paid to her in 'Home, sweet home,' when she sang another valse, also composed for her by Signor Arditi. Signor Giuglini was encored in the serenade, 'La Donna e Mobile,' and gave with an exquisite pathos the air 'Then I'll remember thee.'"

DUBLIN.— (From a Correspondent). I was at St. Xavier's Chapel on Sunday last, and heard the following admirable selection of sacred music performed by Mr. and Mrs. Alban Croft and family, and an excellent chorus :—Gloria chorus, from Haydn's seventh Mass; Sanctus, from Mozart's twelfth Mass; "Laudate Dominum," Mozart (sung in splendid style by Miss Kate Croft); "Splendente te," chorus, Mozart (solos by Miss Marie and Celia Croft); "Tantum ergo," Alban Croft (sung by Miss Kate Croft);

Digitized by Google

"Laudate," Gregorian; and "Prayer and Funeral," composed by Mrs. H. St. Leger. Miss Kate Croft is a fine handsome girl, only eighteen years of age, with a beautiful soprano voice, of a charming silvery-toned quality, and an excellent musician. I think, from the specimen of her singing last Sunday, she is destined to fill the vacancy caused by Mad. Clara Novello's retirement from public life.—L.

SPOHR IN LONDON.

ONE morning, Spohr received a missive which was conveyed to him by his servant, Johanning, in much such terms as these: "M. Spohr is requested to be present at four o'clock to-morrow evening in the closet of the undersigned." Not being acquainted with the signature which followed, and the footman who had brought the letter being unable to inform him on what account his master desired to see him, the extremely susceptible artist replied, in the same laconical style, that he should not be disengaged at the hour appointed. Thereupon a second letter succeeded, couched in less imperative terms than the first. This time it was—"M. Spohr is begged to be good enough to honour the undersigned with a visit, to appoint any hour that may be convenient."

On the day following, Spohr stood face to face with an old man with silvery locks, whose countenance beamed with a friendly smile, and who had stepped out to the head of the staircase to receive him, but could speak no word of either German or French, while Spohr was equally unable to speak to him in English. After standing and looking at each other for some time with mutual embarrassment, the Doctor, that is to say the old man, settled it by taking the composer by the arm and conducting him into a large apartment, the walls of which were, so to speak, tapestried with violins; others, which had been taken out of their cases, were scattered about on the chairs and tables. The Doctor hereupon handing Spohr a bow, and pointing to one of these instruments, the celebrated violinist came to the conclusion that what was wanted of him was that he should give his opinion as to the value of all these fiddles. He had the patience to try them all, one after the other; and after having selected six, he again took them up, one by one, in order to pick out the best. It was by no means a light task, for there were an enormous number of them, and the Doctor handed them every one to Spohr in succession, without letting him off in a single instance. He had observed that our fiddle-fancier had cast the tenderest glances towards one in particular of these instruments, and that his countenance lighted up with the extremest joy every time the master's fiddle-stick was drawn across its strings, and to this very one he assigned the palm of superiority. The Doctor, enchanted at the verdict, not only treated the judge with an improvisation on the viol d'amore, but when Spohr bade him farewell, presented him with a five-pound note, which the musician laid upon the table, again shaking his head in token of refusal. But the Doctor did not let slip the occasion which soon after presented itself of being equal with him, and paid ten pounds shortly after for a ticket to his concert.

This concert was the most profitable which Spohr had ever given. Almost all the persons to whom he had had letters of introduction, and among them the Duke of Sussex and the Duke of Clarence, took stalls, for which some of those wealthy noblemen paid in the most liberal manner. A large proportion of the subscribers to the Philharmonic Concerts kept their tickets, and as the worst places cost as much as half-a-guinea, and the room, capable of containing about a thousand persons, was crammed, the receipts were magnificent. Add to this that the performers in the orchestra resigned their emoluments, in admiration for the talents of the concert-giver—"out of friendship for me," modestly says the latter. The event thus ushered in under such brilliant auspices was, however, marred by incidents of an alarming nature, and which had a calamitous effect on the health of Dorette, Spohr's cherished companion.

Here let the author of the memoirs speak in his own unaffected language:—"My concert took place on the 20th of June, the day on which Queen Caroline made her entry into London, on her return from Italy, to appear before Parliament to answer the charge of adultery. London was divided into two camps; the most numerous, which embraced the middle classes down to the lowest rabble, declared for the Queen. The city was in a state of violent commotion. The bills of my concert, pasted up at the corners of the streets, had disappeared under immense placards, commanding in the name of the people a general illumination of the city. Johanning came in with the intelligence, that any windows not illuminated would be smashed. My wife, who was, moreover, anxious about her first appearance, trembled at the scenes which were about to be enacted. I endeavoured as best I could to reassure her, and I succeeded. My new symphony was executed in a masterly manner, and was even more successful than when it was played for the first time. During the air of Handel which followed, 'Revenge, Timotheus, revenge,' I was in an adjoining apartment, tuning my wife's harp, and afterwards led her into the concert-room. Our duo was about commencing, the audience was subsiding into the silence of expectation and listening to the first chords of our performance, when, on a sudden, a fearful riot occurred, followed by a cannonade of paving stones against the panes in the windows in the adjoining room, which was not illuminated. The gas with which this apartment was lighted was quickly turned on. The mob, satisfied with the victory which had crowned this demonstration, moved onwards, vociferating cries of delight. All at last resumed their places, and tranquillity was sufficiently restored to permit us once more to begin. I was afraid lest emotion should have an injurious effect on Dorette's playing, and awaited her first chords with anxiety, but they sounded full and vigorous. Our success increased after each part of the duo, and at the end the applause seemed never likely to cease. As we descended from the platform, delighted with our triumph, neither of us had any suspicion that it was our last in common."

HANOVER-SQUARE ROOMS (The Queen's Concert Rooms).—The Proprietor, Mr. COCKS, of New Burlington Street, has the satisfaction to announce that the Restoration of these Rooms (unrivalled for their acoustic properties) is now approaching completion. The Establishments have been designed in a style suitable to the character of a building honoured for nearly a century past with royal patronage, the arena of the triumphs of the "Concerts of Ancient Music" and the far-famed "Philharmonic Society," and where Haydn made his first bow to an English audience, and conducted his Symphonies, composed expressly to be performed in these time-honoured Rooms. The decorations throughout the building are costly and elaborate, while especial attention has been paid to the greater convenience and comfort of visitors, by the addition of lavatories, &c. The external repairs, however, have been unavoidably postponed till the autumn of next year. The refreshment department is confided to an eminent restaurateur, but parties will be at liberty to provide their own refreshments. Engagements may now be made for Concerts, Balls, Soirées, Lectures, Bazaars, Fancy Fairs, Meetings, Sabbath Services, &c., dating from the first week in January next. On the completion of the restoration, the Rooms will be open for inspection.—Information as to terms and other particulars may be obtained of Messrs. Robert Cocks and Co., pianoforte manufacturers, and music publishers to her Most Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, and to his Imperial Majesty the Emperor Napoleon III.—London, 6, New Burlington Street, and 4, Hanover Square, Regent Street, W., Dec. 7, 1861.

CHOIR BOY.—There is a vacancy in a London Church Choir for a boy with a good voice, having some knowledge of Music. He will receive a general education, be trained in singing, and paid a salary proportionate to his acquirements. Apply to Mr. PITTMAN, THE CHAPEL, LINCOLN'S INN.

MADAME RUDERSDORFF and Mr. OLE BULL beg to announce that they intend making a tour through the provinces for Concerts and Oratorios, accompanied by first-rate Artists, to commence on Monday, Feb. 17th, 1862. Full particulars will be shortly announced. All communications to be addressed to Mr. Jarrett (Musical and Concert Agent), at Messrs. Duncan Davison and Co.'s Foreign Music Warehouse, 244, Regent Street, W.

SONG,

THE WORDS BY

JOHN OXENFORD, ESQ.,

THE MUSIC BY

NIELS W. GADE.

"Christ came to earth upon this day,
That sin might be forgiven,
And in an humble manger lay,
The holy Lord of heaven.
The guiding star above Him shone,
And shepherds hail'd the Holy One.
Hallelujah, praise our Lord!

"Arise, my soul, no longer mourn,
Rejoice in thy salvation;
In David's city One is born,
Who brings us consolation.
Betake thee to that Infant mild,
Thyself in innocence a child.
Hallelujah, praise our Lord!"

Reviews.

"La Vivandière;" "La Prière d'une Mère;" "The Angel's Harp"—for the pianoforte—composed by J. THEODORE TREKELL (Chappell and Co.).

The first is an "Impromptu Militaire;" the second is a "Rêverie;" the third (and on the whole the most commendable) is a "Rhapsodie" (why not Rhapsody?—seeing that the rest of the title-page is in English); all three are (more or less) original pieces for the pianoforte, which have the merit of not being made out of operatic airs or "popular ballads," besides the advantage of being tolerably easy to play.

"The Lanka Quadrilles;" "The Kandy Rifle Volunteers' March"—for the pianoforte—by G. GASSNER (Boosey and Sons).

We have volunteers, too, in Ceylon. Tant mieux. The more the merrier. If our Kandy riflemen are to be inspired to deeds of arms by the strains of military music, they can hardly do better than make their bands play the vigorous "March" of Mr. Gassner as often as possible. Both its themes are good—an elegant trio in A flat contrasting gracefully with the spirited subject upon which the March commences. The Lanka Quadrilles are as lively, tuneful, and rhythmical as could be wished.

"The Blue Bells of Scotland"—arranged for the pianoforte—by J. L. HATTON (Boosey and Sons).

A brief introduction; the old air newly harmonised; three variations, happily contrasted; and a few bars of brilliant coda; all well contrived and effectively written—as might have been expected from Mr. Hatton.

"Two Hundred and Fifty Chants, single and double"—adapted for voice, organ, harmonium, or pianoforte—by RUDOLF NORDMANN (Boosey and Sons).

A rich and varied collection, containing some of the most genuine specimens of Purcell, Boyce, Tallis, Croft, Greene, Gibbons (Orlando), and other eminent English church-composers.

"The Golden Wreath"—by T. MURBY (Boosey and Sons).

"The Golden Wreath" is a collection of "twenty songs for youth," adapted to popular melodies, and on the whole selected with exemplary discretion.

Six Christmas Carols—with pianoforte or organ accompaniments—edited by W. BIRCH (Boosey and Sons).

A Welcome Christmas Gift. We are glad to find the Emperor of "Carols"—"God rest ye! merry Christians"—among the six. "The Boar's head" is racy; "Come, let us celebrate the day," appropriate and pretty; "Nowell! Nowell! Nowell!" quaint and Christmasy;"* "Christians, awake!" inspiriting; and "A Christmas Carol," excellent. But best of all, we repeat, is "God rest ye! merry Christians;" and this, in spite of the "melancholy minor" key. For our part we never desire to see, or hear, any "carol" but this. It cannot be surpassed, and could hardly be equalled. We would have the "Waits" sing and play no other, except perhaps, now and then, "Nowell!"† which (also in the "minor") is decidedly next best. Mr. Birch has performed his task of harmonist unexceptionably; and the words are throughout good.

* "Mobled is good;" so is "Christmas-y."

† "Noel" in French.

"Boosey's Musical Cabinet."—Nos. 62 and 65 (BOOSEY and SONS).

No. 62 consists of the most attractive melodies in Mr. Howard Glover's opera of Ruy Blas, admirably arranged for the pianoforte by Mr. Rudolf Nordmann. No 65 comprises 100 reels, country dances, jigs, Highland flings, strathspeys, and what not—a collection, rich and rare, of the national dances, not merely of Britain, but of all countries, including even Persia and Circassia.

"La Vivandière," valse militaire; "Fantasia sur 'Un Ballo in Maschera;'" "Galop de 'Rigoletto'" "Mazurka d'Un Ballo in Maschera'"—pour piano—RENE FAVARGER (Chappell and Co.).

The "Galop" and "Mazurka"—both genuine examples of Verdi's fancy and talent in the composition of dance music—are arranged to perfection, and will no doubt find numerous admirers among amateur pianists of all grades. The Fantasia too—in which the delicious quintet, "E scherz' od e follia," figures prominently—has also some excellent points, and is brilliant without being difficult. The "Valse militaire" is but so-so. M. Favarger is happier with other peoples' materials than with his own.

"Ballade Orientale;" "Il mio Tesoro," Cavatine, transcrite et variée—pour le piano—POLYDORE DE VOS (Cramer, Beale and Wood).

We have nothing to say against the "Ballade Orientale," except that it is somewhat dull, and that the "why" of its orientalism does not plainly appear; but for the hash made out of Mozart's exquisite melody we have nothing but unqualified condemnation. M. de Vos writes well enough for the piano, although his muse is not particularly inventive; and he should know better than to make mince meat of such things as "Il mio tesoro," with the divine spirit of which he has evidently no sympathy.

"The Skylark"—Words by the ETTRICK SHEPHERD, music by JOHN RAYMOND (Joseph Williams).

The Ettrick Shepherd's well-known and beautiful apostrophe to the "Skylark" has been set in a kindred spirit by Mr. Raymond, whose melody, bright and joyous, rings in the ear like the song of the bird it seeks to illustrate. The accompaniments are as simple as could be wished, and the whole thing indeed, is the model of a plain ballad.

MRS. J. HOLMAN ANDREWS is giving a series of Soirées Musicales, for the practice of vocal and instrumental music, sacred and secular, at her residence in Bedford Square. Her choir, consisting chiefly of amateurs from the higher classes of society, has acquired an unusual degree of proficiency. The delicacy and precision with which they executed Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, at one of the later soirées, show how completely a good musician, and an excellent accompanyist like Mrs. Holman Andrews, can keep a body of singers under command, and oblige them to pay attention to "light and shade," and the other requisites necessary to produce the effects intended by a composer. Mrs. Holman Andrews deserves praise for the high amount of training she has put her aristocratic pupils under. Some well selected four-part songs and standard glees are included in the programmes, and render "an evening with Mrs. Holman Andrews" both improving and agreeable.

MR. SWIFT IN DUBLIN.—In writing of one of Grisi's recent "farewell" performances, the reporter for Saunders' News Letter, speaking of Mr. Swift, says:—"The Pollio of Mr. Swift was amongst the best renderings of this part that we have heard for many years in Dublin. His voice, always a tenor of great sweetness, has gained considerably in power since we heard him last, without losing a particle of its melody. He was encored and rapturously applauded in the 'Me protegge,' and other solos incidental to his part. He was equally happy in the concerted pieces."

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

December 5.

I HAVE a multitude of small matters to communicate, which will make my letter a sort of mince-pie — appropriately enough in anticipation of approaching Christmas. Order and method will therefore be banished; and, as in the delicacy alluded to, a lump of suet is juxtaposed to a fragment of lemon candy, and the heterogeneous jumble is further jumbled by other inscrutable additions, so will good, bad, indifferent, and mysterious elements rush into fortuitous concourse in the following letter. May the compound prove no less savoury but much more digestible than the term of comparison I have chosen for it.

Mouthful the first. — M. Victorien Sardou, author of the Pattes de Mouche, has written an opéra comique for the Théâtre Lyrique, which is accepted, and the composer who is associated with him is M. Vaucorbeil. They say the poem is good, and the music likewise. It may be hoped, in this case, that the manager of this house is going to turn over a new leaf, and do something for the encouragement of art in its true sense. This same M. Sardou is the popular dramatist of the day — which does not prevent his making lamentable failures every now and then. What is the good of being popular if you cannot make your indulgent patron swallow a few pecks of trash? M. Sardou works his vein of popularity with might and main, as is the worst with all popular authors, until it yields kicks instead of ha'pence, and then they desist with many curses on the fickleness of fame. Sardou is still in the ha'pence stage of his career. He has a new piece, called Nos Intimes, at the Vaudeville, which is said to be quite a work of merit; but I don't believe it, though it draws crowds. The loose, frothy stuff, the greasy skimmings of the pot au feu of social common-place, which passes here and elsewhere for comédie de mœurs, is antagonistic to the stability of my stomach. But I suppose, as your taster-general, I shall have to make myself bilious and flatulent with a few spoonsful of the mawkish mess. Faugh! An ounce of civet to sweeten my imagination! Here it is. Alfred de Musset presents the deodorising agent in the shape of a charming comedy, in three acts, entitled, On ne badine pas avec l'Amour, which the Théâtre Français has borrowed from the defunct poet's published works, with some slight modifications to fit it for performance. It is capitally acted by Mesdames Favart and Jouassain, and MM. Provost, Delaunay, Monrose, Barré, &c. There is still much talk and excitement in anticipation of the chant which Rossini has composed, or rather remodelled, for the benefit of the Cherubini fund. "The Titans," it is to be called. It was written, two years ago, to some very fine lines by the husband of Mad. Ferraris, the celebrated danseuse, whose name (the husband's) is M. Torre. Italians who have read the poem are enchanted with its vigour and rough energy, appropriate to the theme. Here is the first stanza: —

"Guerra — sterminio! e questo
Sol del Titano il grido
Quanto son numi io sfido
Giove con lor cadra!"

The chant was originally composed for one voice with a pianoforte accompaniment, but Rossini has arranged it for four voices with instrumental accompaniment.

Mouthful the second.—A Milan paper devoted to music has been publishing a series of letters from authors, actors, composers, and other celebrities, addressed to a music publisher of Italy, M. G. Ricordi. Among them is a letter from the singer Donzelli, recommending to Ricordi the singer Lablache, at that time almost utterly unknown. Translated it stands thus: —

"Palermo, October 15, 1817.

"Dear Friend,—I admonish you that the artist I am introducing to you is a primo buffo; he calls himself Luigi Lablache. He is only twenty-three, but I can assure you that he is even now of the calibre of the brave friend Galli, as much in figure as in voice. See what you can do for him; I assure you that neither you nor I, in procuring him an engagement, will cut a bad figure. The theatre which would seem best to suit Lablache is La Scala; he would fill that house with his great voice, and would bring to memory Galli:

"Your friend,

"DONZELLI."

M. Rubinstein, nothing daunted by the equivocal success of his last opera, is said to be preparing another on the subject of Lalla Rookh. Prosit. But I do not think it will set the Neva on fire; which reminds me that the Liceo at Barcelona, destroyed by fire last April, is being rebuilt, and is, in fact, almost in a complete state. The opening will be in January next.

Mouthful the third.—A recent sale of autographs in Paris has occasioned the publication of several interesting passages from letters written by eminent musicians, actors, singers, managers, &c. Among such may be cited the following from Meyerbeer to M. Germain Delavigne, recording his high opinion of Nourrit:— "As for facility, you have as much as he (Scribe) can have, and if we were together we should not need any one. Such not being the case, this is what I propose: let us come back to our first idea of taking in Ad. Nourrit as a collaborator. He understands divinely how to lay out for music; he is full of intelligence, and besides, as a man, is of the noblest and most elevated character."

The following scrap from Baptiste Ainé of the Comédie Française might be taken home to the present generation, without abatement of its scourging bitterness:—

"Bad taste is gaining upon us, or else poltroonery. People want to execute without devoting too much attention to the matter; to weep without being moved; to laugh without honest gaiety. A frittering style, wit on a needle's point, rose-scented packets or assafœtida, in short, drawing-room, and consequently, quite insignificant comedy, this is what is required by the people of Israel and by us."

The following contains a bit of unconscious self-painting by old Kalkbrenner; it was written in 1818, and touches on abuses not yet altogether swept away: —

"It is impossible to obtain a footing at the Conservatoire, either to play or to get a symphony played. I must tell you that this is a very singular country; everything is done by intrigue and by women; talent is only in the second rank. You must write in the papers, and shout out very loud, 'I am a great man,' and at last people will say, 'Well, since he says it, it must be so — he is a great man.' Mutatis mutandis de te fabula narratur — my poor priggish old chalkburner."

A letter from Miss Adelaide Kemble is among those recommending a certain artist as strong enough for any part, as he had twice carried her in his arms without any signs of breaking down. The person who furnishes these epistolary fragments to the paper from which I take them, and who signs himself A. Dureau, thinks it fine to sneer, apropos of this mild jest of the ex-prima donna, at English facetiousness or want of facetiousness, and calls the thing not bad for une Anglaise. When will Frenchmen learn to talk only of what they understand? They are all shamefully ignorant of the language, literature, manners, habits and modes of thought of other nations, and pass off their puppyish blindness under the mask of affected contempt. Because Frenchmen are blundering and ridiculous in this country, we know better than to set them all all down as fools and jackanapes. Many Englishmen can, however, judge perfectly of their general aptitude for humour or wit, and will pronounce them, on excellent grounds, lamentably deficient in a quality upon which they set the more store as they lack it the more remarkably. Conventional set jokes, made by the one or two smart Frenchmen they ever had, are bandied about incessantly, and this passes for national quickness of wit. Natural, or rather native, individual humour they have none, and their professed gaiety is a mechanical contrivance to prevent their sinking into absolute hebetude—the forced laugh and pumped-up spirits of a shallow, dull blockhead, who dreads a moment's earnest conversation lest it should betray the emptiness of his head or the callousness of his heart. I should like to know who this Dureau is, and what he has ever written or said to prove his title to snigger at English humour. I have a good mind to challenge him to an encounter of wit in his own language, but that it would be perhaps cowardly to take such an advantage.

Mouthful the fourth.—M. Eugène Prévost has returned from New Orleans.

Mouthful the fifth.—M. Eugène Prévost was premier chef d'orchestre at the French Opera of New Orleans; and on his return to his native land to breathe his native air, the following graceful tribute of respect and esteem has been presented to him, the signatures to which speak trumpet-tongued for the merits of the individual to whom it is addressed: —

Digitized by Google

"To Monsieur Eugène Prévost, late pensionary of France in Rome' first chief of the orchestra of the French Opera of New Orleans, knight of the royal order of Charles III. of Spain, &c. &c.

"Paris, November 1, 1861.

"Monsieur and honourable confrère,—Having learned that you were returned from America, we seize this occasion to offer you collectively the expression of our lively gratitude. Thanks to your talent as a chef d'orchestre, and to your zeal as a fellow-countryman, the lyrical repertoire of three great Parisian stages has become, for the last twenty-three years, that of distant countries.

"Receive, then, monsieur and dear confrère, our sincere and unanimous thanks, and believe truly that the former pensionary of Rome, the author of Cosima, has not been forgotten by us; and that when the public papers bring us from America flattering news of our works represented at New Orleans, it is pleasing to us to refer the great share of their success to you.

"May this written proof, monsieur and dear confrère, of our gratitude be sometimes read over again by you, when you shall be far away from our dear country.

"Accept once more, monsieur and dear confrère, the assurance of our esteem, and of the gratitude with which we term ourselves your devoted friends and confrères,

"(Signed) G. Rossini, Auber, F. Halévy, Carafa, Ambroise, Thomas, L. Clapisson, M. Reber, F. Massé, Félicien David, Grisar, G. Meyerbeer, H. Berlioz, G. Kastner, A. Elwart, secretary."

MOUTHFUL THE LAST!—A CHOKER!—The above is not a hoax, and I admit that its facetiousness is not to be surpassed by any Anglais or Anglaises born in the present century. What civilisation and better intercommunication with our neighbours may do hereafter, no one can say. This way of puffing yourself through the trumpet of another is worthy of imitation, if only for its ludicrous effect.

COLOGNE.—The third Gesellschafts Concert took place on Tuesday the 26th ult., under the direction of Herr Ferdinand Hiller. The following was the programme. Part I.—1. Overture to Hamlet, by Niels W. Gade (first time); 2. Concerto (No. 2) for violoncello, by Goltermann, executed by Herr A. Schmit, teacher at the Conservatory; 3. "Ave, Maria," for female voices, with orchestral accompaniment, by Johannes Brahms (first time); 4. Symphony in G minor, by Mozart. Part II. "Die erste Walpurgisnacht," by Goethe, composed for soli, chorus and orchestra, by F. Mendelssohn Bartholdy. The two novelties achieved rather a succès d'estime than an enthusiastic triumph. Even leaving out of consideration the strange idea (with which, it is true, three or four other composers had previously been seized) of writing a musical prologue to such a tragedy as Shakespere's Hamlet, seeing that the piece, as a whole, affords absolutely no opportunity for musical expression, Gade's overture, considered merely in a musical light, is not an inspired work, but simply an ordinary, nicely written piece of music, without, however, the advantage of any originality in the instrumentation, a quality which renders his symphonies so taking. J. Brahms' "Ave, Maria," voluntarily renounces all claim to the impression that a female chorus, purely sung, invariably produces on us, on account of its neglect of harmony in simplicity, which choruses for female voices absolutely demand. Shrill modulations, and sharply piercing notes, which go through one, produce a disagreeable effect, because they constitute a glaring contrast to the grace and mildness of the female character. The motives, too, or rather the motive, for there is only one, is deficient in the language of fervour and devotion requisite in a prayer. The mere announcement of the Symphony in G minor was hailed with delight by the lovers of real music, and their expectations were completely satisfied by a performance admirably delicate, and, in the proper place, full of passion. Mendelssohn's "Walpurgisnacht" was, as it always is, most warmly applauded. We feel bound to state, however, that we have but rarely heard this unique and genial work so well played as on this occasion. The two principal solo parts, moreover, tenor and bass, were exceedingly well sung by Herr A. Pütz, of this place, and Herr J. Remmertz, of Düsseldorff, so that the whole work, with the aid of the fine chorus and band, conducted as we are accustomed to hear things conducted by Herr Ferdinand Hiller, impressed the audience profoundly. —A recent letter from Venice contains the following piece of intelligence: Richard Wagner has left for Venice, where he intends stopping some time. The question which has so long excited the curiosity of all musical circles, namely, whether his Tristan und Isolde would be brought out in the Austrian capital, is at length, decided. The score has been purchased for a considerable sum (a sort of compensation, as it were, for his long and fruitless sojourn in Vienna), and the opera will not be produced. On account of the total want of melody in it, nay more, of the absence of anything like melodic or rhythmical symmetry, this opera contains so many nuts perfectly uncrackable by the memory of the surest singers, that a musical wit observed: "Wagner would be obliged to provide regular memories of the Future before the work could be produced." Before his departure, Wagner had the overture and several of the scenes rehearsed, for the benefit of a select circle of confidential friends. On perceiving some astonished faces, he remarked that, in Isolde he had certainly gone a few steps farther than in Lohengrin. "Say a hundred miles," replied Ander. In fact, a pianoforte trial convinced every one, that the innumerable rehearsals necessary to get up Tristan would ruin the voices of the singers, and completely deprive the public of the services of the principal members of the company for a very long period. Apropos of Wagner, the production of his Tannhäuser, according to a statement which has gone the round of the German papers, cost the management of the Grand Opera in Paris a pretty penny. The mise-en-scène generally costs 80,000 francs; twelve Sundays on which there was no performance occasioned a loss of 60,000 francs; the extra orchestral rehearsals necessitated an expenditure of 20,000 francs; and the engagement of Mad. Tedesco, the tenor Niemann, and the barytone Morelli, for seven months, took 105,000 francs more out of the treasury, making a grand sum total of 265,000 francs, all money thrown away, seeing that the opera was performed only three times, and that the fire in the scene-rooms did not spare the scenery of Tannhäuser. Of a truth the Music of the Future appears rather a costly amusement. The building of the new theatre is being pushed forward with great activity. The work of roofing in has already begun, and, unless the weather should be very unfavourable, will be completed in a very short time. The new theatre will be much larger than the old one, and contain 1800 persons. The managers of the Conservatory of Music have determined on giving, during the winter, a series of so-called Musical Evenings in the large room of the establishment. At these Musical Evenings, the audience will consist of subscribers to the institution, and other patrons and lovers of art, and the students will gradually learn to face a more numerous public, and give proof of the progress they may have made. The first concert of the series took place on the 2nd inst., when the young aspirants for artistic fame acquitted themselves in a highly creditable manner. The programme consisted of compositions by Rode and Beethoven for the violin; Capriccio in E major by Mendelssohn; concerto in A flat major, by Hummel; sonata, with violin, in E flat by Beethoven, and suite by J. S. Bach, for piano; soprano aria in F from Don Juan; female chorus, by Cherubini; alto aria from Hercules, by Handel, and a couple of two part-songs, new, by Ferdinand Hiller.—(From an occasional Correspondent.)

PESTH.—M. Musard from Paris has been here. He was announced beforehand with a grand flourish of trumpets, but was only moderately successful. To entitle a selection of waltzes and quadrilles, with, at most, only too or three light overtures, a grand concert, is rather too good a joke. Concerts of this kind should have been performed in the dining-room of an hotel, and not in a theatre. The sole interesting feature about them was M. Legendre's solo playing on the cornet-à-piston.

BREMEN.—The Künstler-Verein have commenced operations for the winter season. At the first meeting, Professor Gravenhorst recited fragments from a new poetical version of the Odyssey, in which he treats the songs of Homer, as he formerly treated the Greek tragic writers, although with greater freedom and more in accordance with modern forms. After his recital, three members of the musical department of the Association, Herren Streudner, C. Schmidt, and Cabisius, jun., performed a trio by Anton Rubinstein. The next meeting, on the 20th ult., was dedicated to the memory of Handel, when the musical members availed themselves of the opportunity offered them of performing a work of that master, which has scarcely ever been heard here. This was one, or, to speak more correctly, two of the Oboe-Concertos, or concertante orchestral works, composed by Handel in the years 1716, 1720, inclusive, when he was musical director of the Duke of Chandos at Cannons. There is every reason to believe that these compositions were never played in Germany during the last century, while, during the present one, they have only been performed once in Dresden, namely, last winter. On the present occasion Dr. F. Chrysander, Handel's biographer, had the kindness to place the score in his possession at the disposal of the Association. These compositions had been most carefully rehearsed, and were admirably performed under the direction of Herr Rheinthaler. They are most interesting, not only as specimens of the mode of thought and instrumentation of the period at which they were written, as well as of the master's style, but they are conceived in a grand and comprehensive spirit, and betoken the mind of their creator, which was subsequently so powerfully developed. They are shortly to be published in conjunction with other pieces, such as the Organ-Concertos, the Water-Music, etc., with which they bear an affinity. They were preceded by some of Handel's finest bass arias, the performance having been previously inaugurated by a biographical introduction, giving a short account of the great master's labours, divided into three principal periods,—his years of study and travel, up to 1720; the years he devoted to the composition of operas, from that date up to 1720; and those he dedicated to oratorios, from the conception of The Messiah to his death in 1759.—The second Private Concert, on the 19th ult., proved, by the performance of Mad. Clara Schumann, a worthy pendant to the first of the series, when Joachim delighted the audience. Mad. Schumann played Beethoven's Concerto in G major, and The Carnival, one of her husband's earliest compositions, whose second symphony in C major was afterwards executed by the orchestra, as a mark of their respect for this gifted lady. The orchestra executed, also, Mozart's overture to Figaro, and Beethoven's to Leonore (No. 3, C major). Mlle. Mathilde Enequist Biondini, of Paris, sang Mendelssohn's Concert-Aria and an elegant bravura piece, with violin accompaniment, by Victor Massé. The opera is going on very well, and every praise is due to the management for the manner in which it is conducted.—From an occasional Correspondent.

MADAME GRISI'S FAREWELL TOUR.

THE operas in Dublin have been given in the following order:—Tuesday, December 3rd, Lucrezia Borgia; Wednesday, 4th, Rigoletto; Thursday, 5th, Norma; Saturday, 7th, Trovatore. Speaking of the performance of Rigoletto, the Freeman's Journal says:—

"The rôle of the prima donna (Gilda) was sustained by Mlle. Dario, a youthful cantatrice, who sang for the first time on any stage in an entire opera. Mlle. Dario possesses a pure soprano voice of exquisite quality and ample range, and has evidently had the advantage of adequate professional culture. In addition to these, she has great natural intelligence, and an appearance in the highest degree prepossessing and intellectual. Her rendering of the cavatina 'Caro nome,' which abounds in difficult staccato passages, was perfectly faultless in tone and execution, and elicited the enthusiastic plaudits of the house. Again in the duet with Signor Galvani (the Duke), 'E il sol dell' anima,' she was, heard with charming effect. Her crowning effort, however, histrionic as well as vocal, was the duet with Rigoletto (Signor Cresci), 'Tutte le peste.' Here she displayed a richness of vocal resource, and a vivid conception of the exigencies of her part, which proved her to be an artist 'to the manner born.' It is needless to say that the fair débutante was rapturously applauded. Mlle. Dario, who, it may not be uninteresting to state, is the daughter of Irish parents, natives of Belfast, is still extremely youthful, and it is therefore not anticipating too much in predicting for her a brilliant professional career. Signor Galvani acquitted himself admirably throughout as the Duke, and in the 'Donna e mobile' was warmly encored. Nothing could be more effective than the performance of Signor Cresci as Rigoletto, and the same remark applies to Signor Ciampi as Spara Fucile."

From the same paper we take a notice of Norma, which opera seems to have excited an enthusiasm unusual even in the Dublin Theatre Royal:—

"A crowded and fashionable house assembled last evening in the Theatre Royal to enjoy, perhaps for the last time, the performance of the greatest dramatic lyrist of the present day in her great character of Norma, which, whether looked upon as a musical or histrionic creation, has never had so true and successful an exponent as Mad. Grisi. She appeared last night before an audience perhaps as fastidiously critical as any in Europe, many of whom have heard her in the palmy days of her brilliant career; but we question if she was ever listened to with more wrapt attention or greeted with warmer enthusiasm than on this occasion. Her appearance on the stage as the Druid priestess was the signal for loud and general applause, which was reiterated again and again, until the great cantatrice seemed to be embarrassed by the deep feeling evidently excited in her heart by the cordial and impressive greeting accorded to her. The first notes of her voice were heard in the recitative prefacing the grand aria, 'Casta Diva,' which she gave with matchless grace and expression. Loud and repeated plaudits followed her execution of this fine solo. She was not less effective in the sweet cabaletta, 'Bello a me ritorno.' On few occasions has Mad. Grisi been more brilliantly successful, both as an actress and a vocalist, than she was last night in the grand scena with Pollio, especially in the 'Ah non tremar,' which she gave with all the well-remembered fire and vigour of her vocal and dramatic genius. Bouquets were showered around her from the boxes amidst thunders of applause.

"It is a most pleasing contingency to be in a position to give well-merited praise to a rarely gifted and deserving artist. The pleasure becomes still more enhanced when that praise has to be accorded to a young and fair countrywoman, and the daughter of a distinguished musician, a citizen of Dublin, Miss Ellen Conran, of whose merits as a musician and whose fame as a vocalist the American and British press have largely spoken, sustained last night the part of Adalgisa. On presenting herself on the Dublin stage for the first time in Italian opera last night, she was greeted with one of the most enthusiastic receptions we have ever witnessed—the house (to use an old stage term) 'rose at her' from boxes, pit, and galleries—the cheering was most vehement and protracted. Her vocal tones fell on the ears of an audience prepared to hear sweet music from her lips; but there was a power combined with a dulcet melody in her notes, coupled with a brilliancy of execution in the solo passages, which literally took the house by surprise. Her musical taste was displayed to the full in her exquisite sustainment of the duetto morceaux with Mad. Grisi, and if ever a débutante has had just reason to be proud of an enthusiastic reception at the hands of an apprecient audience, that person is Miss Ellen Conran. The Pollio of Mr. Swift was amongst the best renderings of this part that we have heard for many years in Dublin. His voice, always a tenor of great sweetness, has gained considerably in power since we heard him last without loosing a particle of its melody. He was encored and rapturously applauded in the 'Me protegge,' and other solos incidental to his part. He was equally happy in the concerted pieces. The Oroveso of Signor Ciampi was beyond question good. The choruses were effectively and smoothly rendered. Signor Vianesi, the talented conductor of the music, and Mr. R. M. Levey, the equally gifted leader of the orchestra, discharged their respective duties with skill and tastefulness. The last act of Sonnambula brought out a charming and sweet-voiced Amina, in the person of Mlle. Dario, who went through the arduous concluding scena in a manner that brought down the hearty plaudits of the audience."

This last week Don Giovanni and Ballo in Maschera have been given, the operas before mentioned having been repeated on the other nights. The party also appeared at the Philharmonic on Friday evening, Dec. 6th, and yesterday, at a morning concert. Mad. Grisi's positively last appearance on any stage will be in Dublin on Saturday, Dec. 21st. The opera will be Norma. It is said she will on this occasion be presented with a public address, and that great preparations are being made to celebrate the event. Among other "demonstrations," a torch-light procession, à la tedesco, is spoken of as having been organised in honour of the Diva by her ardent admirers.

ROYAL ENGLISH OPERA.

THE success of Mr. Balfe's new opera, which, after the first performance we characterised as "indisputable," becomes more and more decided with each successive representation. The work, as we have already remarked, contains every element of popularity. The story is interesting, the dialogue amusing, the verses elegantly written, the melodies striking, original, and characteristic; the concerted pieces, though comparatively few in number, invariably well constructed; while the choruses, though still less numerous, are equally dramatic and effective. All the artists, moreover, without any exception, are fitted with characters eminently suitable to their histrionic powers, and with music singularly well adapted—with one exception, perhaps—to their vocal resources. With so much to recommend it, The Puritan's Daughter, as we observed a week ago, "can scarcely fail to be popular." Add to all the advantages we have cited, the important consideration that the orchestration is clever, spirited, ingenious and interesting, and none can wonder that those who were pleased with the opera at a first hearing have found their gratification increased by a second, that the theatre has been more and more crowded at each successive representation, and that the applause, while quite as genuine, was last night still more hearty and enthusiastic than on the occasion of its first performance.

Indeed, we cannot pay a higher compliment to the composer of The Puritan's Daughter than is implied in the opinion that very much of his opera improves greatly on acquaintance. The ballads, of course, impress the ear at once, as much on account of the unusual intervals purposely employed as of their melodic beauty, and these effusions must naturally fall upon the listener with equal rapidity; but such admirable compositions as the bright and sparkling opening chorus; the very cleverly written trio, "By the tempest overtaken," at the beginning of the second act, in which the King and Rochester beg hospitality of Clifford; all three subjects of which are charming, while the second is particularly melodious; the still more perfect succeeding trio, "My welcome also to this roof," to which the entrance of Colonel Wolf gives rise, and the interest in which is so well sustained by the lovely accompaniment; the quarrel between Charles and Clifford in the presence of Mary, still in the form of a trio, and opening with a fine phrase for the baritone on the words, "What man worthy of the name;" the finale to the act, again a trio, in which Mary's prayer for the safety of the king, Clifford's anxiety for his lady love, and Rochester's sleepy devotion to his punch-bowl, are all expressed and combined with rare skill and singular effect; and lastly, the noble hymn, "Man is but as summer grass;" all these compositions, we say, will give increased delight the oftener they are heard. But the musician's interest in The Puritan's Daughter will probably be sustained as much by the interesting orchestration as by the cleverly constructed concerted pieces. In the instrumentation of his operas, indeed, Mr. Balfe's natural tact and long experience stand him in equal stead; in this branch of his art he has scarcely a rival in the English school, and the only living composer to whom he in this respect bears resemblance is Auber, who, perhaps, has been more uniformly happy and successful in the scoring of his numerous works than any composer of any time. The remarks we made last week on Mr. Balfe's shortcomings—such as his disregard of the words he sets to music, and his neglect in observing what is called couleur locale, absolve us from the necessity of again alluding to the subject. We must, however, remark, for the hundredth time, how much the forced interpolation of sentimental ballads injures the effect of striking dramatic situations. When Clifford, for instance, hears from the lips of his betrothed that she is about to marry another, the distracted cavalier gives vent to his passionate despair in a smooth and melodious apostrophe, in two verses, to "Mem'ry," while the heart-broken Mary quietly takes a seat in the background—like "Patience on a monument smiling at (her lover's) grief." Again, in the last scene, it now being Mary's turn to sing a ballad, the blood-thirsty rage of a mob of infuriated Roundheads is suddenly arrested in order that the lady may discourse very sweetly—but again in two verses—on the qualities of a "loving daughter's heart." But these instances, even, do not prove the evil results of the system so well as the exception. We allude to the conspiracy scene, in which no ballads are introduced, and which we have no hesitation in pronouncing a masterpiece from beginning to end. The long and melodious prelude for four horns, which also forms the introduction to, and at the same time the most effective portion of, the overture, is not merely scenically useful in giving time for the conspirators to assemble and disperse, but is singularly suggestive of the mystery and secrecy which envelope their proceedings. Nothing can be more striking than the solemn strains, sung in unison, in which the Puritans take the oath; or more vigorously expressive of their bigoted zeal than the first phrase of the harmonised chorus, "Stern, relentless, we pursue;" or more picturesque and lively than the phrase with which the violins con sordini accompany the dialogue between Mary and Seymour; or more dramatically conceived than the declamatory passage—unaccompanied, except at its close, when the chorus is introduced on a single chord with fine effect—in which Mary swears to preserve silence about all she has seen and heard. One of the most striking subjects, by the by, of this scene, is frequently repeated in the after parts of the opera whenever the conspiracy is referred to, and always in the happiest manner. It would be ungracious to lay stress on the circumstance of a charming phrase, which constantly recurs in the last act, being very similar to one in the ball-room scene of La Traviata, or to object that other strains here and there are reminiscent both of Verdi and Auber; while it is, perhaps, idle even to remark that the fine melody for the baritone, "Why should ermined robes, forsooth?" will recall to mind "Scots, wha hae wi' Wallace bled!" for such accidental resemblances are well-nigh unavoidable, and Mr. Balfe can certainly not be charged with lack of inventive power.

The opera has decidedly been much improved by considerable curtailments, all of which have been most judicious. Wolf's first ballad, Ralph's long scena or aria, and Clifford's song, "How peal on peal of thunder," have all been excised, besides which Seymour's death agonies, and some small portions of dialogue, have also been dispensed with. The opera, however, is still too long, for it occupies more than three hours and a half in performance. In case of the dimensions of the work being still further reduced, we would recommend the omission of Wolf's cabaletta, "Can it be, do I dream?" which may very well be spared; and also of Rochester's ballad, "Hail, gentle sleep," which seems to us to be quite out of keeping with the character of the gallant courtier.

The performance is now quite as good as it was on the first night, and it could scarcely be better. We can still find only one fault with Miss Louisa Pyne's personation of the heroine, and that is in the delicate matter of costume. Setting aside the improbability of any lady of any period, and in any climate, walking through secret passages and about ruined chapels in a low dress of white satin, it is simply impossible that a Puritan's daughter could have been allowed ever to wear such a costume. This is not a matter of the highest importance; but in a performance for which, in all other respects, no praise could be excessive, the slightest blemish is conspicuous; and, indeed, the incongruity of Mary Wolf's appearance must strike the most indifferent observer. Miss Louisa Pyne's costume is in general a model of taste, and the Puritan's daughter will doubtless soon cease to be an exception to the rule. We have often had occasion to characterise her singing as "perfect," and if any word could still more strongly express our estimate of her achievements in her new character, we should not hesitate to use it. It is rare, indeed, to hear on any stage so sweet and sympathetic a voice, cultivated to the highest degree of refinement, and controlled by irreproachable taste. Miss Pyne's rendering of the very quaint ballad, "Pretty, modest, lowly flower," was charming; and for the cadence—which to us seems anything but agreeable—the composer, and not the vocalist, is responsible. Equally plaintive was her singing of the still more graceful ballad, "How well I recollect the night," the first subject of which is deliciously melodious and thoroughly original, while her execution of the rondo finale—only remarkable for its extreme difficulty—was wonderfully perfect. In the character of the Puritan's daughter, Miss Louisa Pyne manifests more than ordinary dramatic power; and, in the interview with the King, Mary's hysterical joy at Charles's promise that her lover's title shall be restored, was expressed with remarkable truthfulness and effect. Mr. Santley's Cavalier is in every respect a worthy companion of the Puritan's daughter. The sweet and luscious tones of his splendid voice, the remarkable elegance of his vocal phrasing, and the energy and fire of his acting, completely justify Mr. Balfe's bold innovation in writing the part of the lover—a genuinely sentimental lover, and not a Don Giovanni—for a baritone voice. Mr. Santley's singing was throughout unimpeachable. The delicacy with which he subdued his voice in the masterly trio which brings the second act to a close, and his fine delivery of the declamatory passages in the same scene, are not less worthy to be commended, though less striking than his passionate rendering of the ballad, "Bliss for ever past," which bids fair to rival in popularity any of Mr. Balfe's most popular previous efforts. The only vulnerable parts of Mr. Santley's performance are in connection with this same ballad. In the first place, he does very unwisely to repeat it night after night, although he certainly is sorely tempted by the enthusiastic applause it evokes. All the music for Clifford lies high for his voice, and his delivery of this song, fine and noble though it be, betrays already the inevitable effect of singing beyond his natural compass. His repetition of the ballad, too, increases the absurdity of the situation to which we have above referred. But, if the song is to be sung twice every night, it will surely be as well to transpose it, say from G flat to F; it would, we imagine, be quite as effective in the latter key, and Mr. Santley would then be able to sing it any number of times with perfect ease. In the libretto Clifford is directed to "sink stupified on a chair" at the conclusion of his ballad. Mr. Santley, however, after declaring that his "heart is dead," falls full length on the ground as suddenly and violently as though he had been referring to the physical instead of the mental condition of that essential organ. Mary is thus compelled to commit the absurdity of singing over her lover's prostrate form, instead of running for assistance as other girls would naturally do. Mr. Harrison sustains his character with such genuine talent for comedy as perhaps no other tenor in Europe could exhibit, and for which his most ardent admirers have hitherto not given him credit. He might, we think, do well to omit the "hiccough" in his singing of the "punch-song," as that operation is already suggested in the accompaniment; but his version of this most original inspiration is extraordinarily clever and spirited. We trust that Mr. Harrison's signal success in such comic characters as Corentin and Rochester will tempt him to pursue a line in which he would find no equal.—Daily Telegraph.

LONDON: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1861.

LATELY, when the proprietor of the Weston Hall, in Holborn—which by a pleasing fiction is supposed by many to be dedicated to music—took his benefit—proprietors taking benefits is a supererogation of appeal for public support—the prices were doubled—what trust in his patrons! what dependence on popular relief on the part of the landlord!—and the hall was crowded to suffocation. Upwards of fifty pounds worth of champagne was sold, and of grilled suppers the calculation was beyond even the waiters' fathom. What quantity of spirituous liquid and bitter beer, with screws of the narcotic weed, was consumed, was still further removed from ordinary guess-work. The only means, perhaps, by which a solution of the problem might have been arrived at, was by admeasurement of the smoke, which, we are assured, was so dense and penetrating that it might have been carved with a knife. The high patronage of "swells" is, beyond a doubt, involved in "five-shilling stalls, champagne and grilled suppers." The sum expended during the performance would more than have paid for a stall at the opera. Do "swells" really patronise these reeking booths where as much smoke as victuals and drink is nightly swallowed by partakers of suppers? or are "swells" absolutely of no account in the consideration of the use and appropriation of musical entertainments? Perhaps we do the "swells" injustice, and should rather apply the cognomen of "gents" to those miserable pleasure-seekers who are unable to distinguish between black and white, and can find no gratification except under the influence of spurious and violent excitement. To such smoke is the proper atmosphere, bitter beer the proper beverage, and songs of the "Oh! Bob Ridley, Oh!" genus the proper entertainment. Can such noughts in the human scale exercise any influence in determining the success of an amusement one way or the other? They can indirectly. Without taste or appreciation of any kind for music they may be attracted to these misnomered Concert-halls, and give them their support. The most brainless are not always devoid of feeling for malt and cigars, and perhaps the frequenters to these hot stews are mostly composed of such as have no mental resources, and are driven thither by physical requirements. The poor fellow who cannot think may yet find himself stirred to pleasure by smoking and drinking; and an occasional burthen or strain may fire his dull brain into something like ecstacy. Let us not suppose that music, per se, possesses any special attraction in these places. For a few, "Jump, Jim Crow" and "The Sands" may have profounder charms than the most melodious song of Mozart or Rossini; but the majority are enticed by the combination of allurements, wherein eating, drinking, smoking and smirking under bonnets, constitute no mean power over the "gentish" imagination. Ah! that "smirking under bonnets" is peradventure, the direst spell of all. The young ladies who "assist" at these halls are, indeed, syrens, whose beauty and agreements would thaw the frigidity of Ulysses himself, especially if stimulated to sensibility by birds-eye and whiskey. And can we blame them? Can we call those erring mortals who yield to the potentiality of book muslin and magenta ribbons? Forbid it Cupid, Venus and the Dame aux Camelias! We have fallen ourselves, and cannot proclaim our invincibility in the field of beauty!

There are two ways by which we may hope to see these Music-halls lose their power and prestige. First, by a change in the tastes of those who now support them; secondly, by the extraordinary growth they are now assuming, which must lead to a plethora. The most frantic admirers of slang tune, slang sentiment, and slang singing cannot go on for ever enraptured with the antics of the "celebrated Sam Cowell," the "inimitable Mackney," and the "Untiring Stead" (vide daily posters). We have listened more than once (martyrs that we were!) to one or other of this renowned terzetto, and on no occasion could we gain a glimpse of meaning through the rank stupidities that assailed our ears and eyes. It seemed to us, indeed, that nothing was easier than to concoct (we mean, of course, to find) a "celebrated Sam," an "inimitable Mack," or an "untiring Stead." Given, for instance, a muscular man with bounding heels, great power of grimace, a screeching voice, genius to play on the bones or banjo, and copper confidence. Let him be dubbed with a sounding adjective. Set him in front of a footlight, pull the string, and bid him go on. His success is certain. We are told that Mr. Cowell and Mr. Mackney make each about 40*l.* per week. What sum the talents of the "Untiring Stead" figure at we cannot say. Possibly at something like that of his celebrated brother artists. Can this state of things endure? Assuredly not. Fools are not so plentiful that they can regulate taste their own way for any length of time; and common sense will in the end prevail over dulness, affectation and narrow-mindedness.

Best hope of all, and truest, is that the success of the Music-halls will induce to many similar speculations, which must lead to competition, and inevitably end in ruin. A greater number of Music-halls will demand a larger public; proprietors will embark in more lavish expenditure to ensure fuller attendances; distinction will be made, for the first time, between good, bad and indifferent; the rival halls, in short, will leave each other no chance of gaining profit, and the result will be the annihilation of all. Now is the time for the so-called Music-halls to reap a harvest. By and by the soil once so fertile will yield no crop.

To the Editor of the MUSICAL WORLD.

"WHY"—asks the Recensionen of Vienna—"has Johanna Wagner (Mad. Jachmann) appeared in the drama?"

If we consider this lady's career—extending over more than twenty years—as a singer, the final result of her professional exertions does not strike us as occupying quite so prominent a place in the history of the modern stage as a number of German musical critics have taken upon themselves to represent. Her vocal efforts were deficient in the creative element, properly so speaking, for all that was most brilliant in them was founded upon the genial impersonations of Mad. Schrœder-Devrient. In Berlin, Mad. Wagner's imposing figure exercised a special power of attraction, and her Orpheus gained for her the undivided approbation of the lovers of classical music. Although not of great compass, her voice possessed strength, and, in the lower register, rich volume. But, without pity for herself, she speedily ruined these advantages, by singing such parts as Valentine, Fidelio, &c., which required of her voice what was almost an impossibility. The friendly warning of criticism was allowed to pass by unheeded. Accustomed to lay on her colours thickly, what she principally aimed at, in her impersonations, were startling effects, which, as her voice, by being continually forced upwards and downwards, had become dull and flat, she was at last unable to produce. That a lady who has sung for ten years in one place, should have found a circle of admirers and enthusiasts, is something perfectly natural. Unfortunately, the applause lavished on her by these persons was no longer able to fire, lightning-like, the masses, and, despite all exertions in other quarters as well, Mad. Wagner was compelled to think of retiring from the Opera. In order that this step might not involve her retirement from the stage altogether, an expedient was hit upon: it was agreed that her claim for a pension should be bought for a respectable sum, and, in addition, that her expressed wish to be allowed to appear in spoken drama should be granted. In this way was the appearance of Mad. Wagner, the singer, in Goethe's Ifigenie brought about, after due endeavours, by means of puffing, to gain over the sympathy of the public for this "first attempt."

"How"—continues the Recensionen—"did Mad. Wagner make her appearance in the drama?"

On the occasion of the festivities accompanying royal birthdays, people here, as a general rule, were not in the habit of seeing the theatre very crowded, and custom required that the audience should refrain from loud applause. The "dramatic attempt" of Mad. Wagner, the singer, drew a house crammed to the ceiling, and, with that want of tact, which usually distinguishes over-zealous friends, Mad. Wagner, in defiance of all precedent, was received with applause which seemed as though it would never cease, and honoured, in the course of the evening, with bouquets, just as if she had been an actress already crowned with fame. People, however, soon became aware that the "attempt" was not successful. The tumultuous abuse of applause, unfortunately now naturalised in ballet and opera, was transplanted into the more modest area of the theatre, and it is almost beyond dispute that a "higher" claque than the ordinary one intended to surprise the public, the critics, and the Intendant-General. A number of the Berlin critics were, it is true, bewildered by such a hubbub, and saved themselves from pronouncing an opinion, by indulging in cheap enthusiasm; the more prudent ones, however, although speaking with evident mildness and indulgence, were but little edified by Mad. Wagner's Ifigenie. Herr Rötscher, for instance, wrote as follows:—"Subsequent performances will enable us to say what share respect for the dramatic singer had in these ovations. That the lady should, immediately on her appearance, be greeted by uproarious applause, was not a mark of much tact, since Mad. Wagner was appearing for the first time in this branch of art. Indeed she will do well, as a rule, to seek protection against blundering friends, who, to judge by this first sample, can only injure her. The present criticisms ought to be addressed exclusively to the aspirant in this new field for her exertions. If we were to mention everything with which we disagreed, we should be obliged to extend our notice into a regular treatise." We are, therefore, not alone in our tolerably candid criticism, and it was to be feared that the public, as in so many other instances, would suffer from a terrible reaction, after their fit of frenzy was over. When personal sympathy has cooled down a little, people will at length endeavour to determine in what consists the difference between, and the merit of, the peculiar mental task of a singer and an actress, for a part like Goethe's Ifigenie is far from being properly represented by any one possessing only a majestic form without a large amount of deep feeling.

Even the second performance of Ifigenie was moderately attended, and the applause trifling. But the second part, Maria Stuart, quite sobered the public. Mad. Wagner's action was moderate, but unmeaning. Her best scene was that with Burleigh, though here again we heard nothing save hollow and monotonous declamation, overloaded with ponderous false accentuation. We perceived no sign of anything like soul or intensity of feeling. The grand scene in the third act, stripped of all declamatory spirit, was dull and colourless, the actress anxiously avoiding the exhibition of aught approaching passion.

On the 2nd November, Mad. Wagner appeared as Orsina, in Emilia Galotti, and, although nearly ashamed of so much blame, we confess we never before heard the Prince's deserted mistress represented with greater roughness and coarseness of tone, while the unfavourable impression thus produced, was increased by an unbecoming dress. Where was the proud Italian woman, the fiery and passionate Orsina, whose exasperated soul, filled with the desire of revenge, is meditating the death of the faithless Prince? Lessing's dialogue brought out, on this occasion, no fiery excitement, no feverish emotion; the actress had not the slightest conception of the part. The vision in which a "Himmlische Fantasie" should dawn, "as though in a trance," upon the hapless Orsina, now almost mad, was spoken by Mad. Wagner close to the prompter's box, while Odoardo (Herr Kaiser), was walking up and down, immersed in thought, at the back of the stage. Indeed, as a rule, the other actors and actresses did not appear to exist for the débutante—provided only the cue was given at the right time. As we left the theatre, an admirer of the lady, on our observing that the fourth act of Emilia Galotti was absolutely nothing, unless the representative of Orsina exhibited intense passion, said to us, "Ja, ja, det is nich ihr Genre!"* "Oh! yes. That is not her line!"

If we consider the three parts, Ifigenie, Maria Stuart, and Orsina, selected by Mad. Wagner for her débuts, it is self-evident that such a selection implies no ordinary aspiration, for, had the fair and respected vocalist succeeded in dramatically carrying out these three grand but heterogeneous female conceptions, she would have encircled her brow with a crown of artistic excellence such as had never before existed. But she was deficient in the soul and voice necessary for so lofty a flight. Up to the present time, the Berlin public have, with admirable forbearance, watched the dramatic essay of a fair singer, greatly respected by them, and have spoken only in "silent circles" of the absolute inefficiency of their favourite. Had a strange actress played the above characters as Mad. Wagner played them, we very much doubt that the critics and the public would have preserved such exemplary silence. For the gratification of certain individuals, or as a stroke of policy intended to work upon the curiosity of those who pay their money, such an experiment on the part of a dramatic singer, hitherto the object of popular applause, may be all very well for a short period; but the engagement of Mad. Wagner as prima donna assoluta in drama, might, perhaps, be productive of bitter regret, at some future period, and is, therefore, not advisable. Every one capable of forming an opinion will agree on this point.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—No arrangement has yet been come to with respect to the reopening of this time-honoured establishment in the Spring. M. Bagier declines to put down the 7000*l.* stipulated for by the Earl of Dudley in advance; and thus, for the present at least, the affair is "off."

MAD. RUDERSDORFF AND M. OLE BULL.—Provincial readers will observe in our advertisement columns the announcement of an intended tour by these popular artists. The great success M. Ole Bull has met with throughout the tour he is now making with Miss Whitty, Herr Formes, Mr. and Mrs. Tennant, and Mr. Emile Berger, will no doubt attract the attention of those "entrepreneurs" who have not yet speculated on his popularity. The talent and position of Mad. Rudersdorff need no recommendation at our hands.

THE MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

WHAT is the row in Regent Street
On every Monday night?
Are people going music-mad,
That thus they push and fight?

The carriages from Vigo Street
Reach up to Portland Place,
And thousands on the smooth "trottoir"
Join in Apollo's race.

When James's Church tolls out the time
For Vieuxtemps to appear,
That classic crowd will scarcely breathe:
A pin drop you might hear.

Then "Violino Primo's" arm
Uplifts the horse's tail,
And quick th' excited multitude
Applaud the pussy's wail.

And on walk Las'rus, Webb, and Paque,
Charles Hall' appears soon a'ter;
"Largo," "Allegro," "Presto,"—now
'Tis Beethoven's sonata.

Next Reeves ("our Sims,") with "Adelaide,"
So often heard before;
But which, if sung ten thousand times,
Would always win "encore!"

Then Arabell', with gorgeous dress,
Comes sailing up the stairs,
And ushers in the "Blacksmith,"
Best loved of Handel's airs.

Th' elated mob can no more keep Imprisoned their delight,
At having such a shilling treat,
And all upon one night.

No more shall macaroni slim,
Stewed frogs, or saur kraut,
Reproach us with our prejudice
For beef and double stout.

W' invite them just to stand outside
And watch the crowd depart,
And then to say who likes the most,
Beethoven and Mozart.

THE CHRISTMAS ENTERTAINMENTS.—At the Royal English Opera Covent-garden, a pantomime will be produced, written by Maddison Morton, and in which Mr. W. H. Payne will be the prominent feature. The theme selected is Swift's remarkable satire of "Gulliver's Travels," and a grand transformation scene, by Calcott, is already whispered to be a stupendous feature. At Drury Lane, which has well maintained its celebrity for this kind of amusement, there will be a grotesque burlesque pantomime, by Mr. E. L. Blanchard, founded on those legendary stories of the nursery, "The House that Jack Built" and "Old Mother Hubbard and her Wonderful Dog," and which will be, as usual, magnificently illustrated by Mr. William Beverly. The Haymarket pantomime will be, as usual, furnished by Mr. Buckstone himself, entitled, Little Miss Muffet and Little Boy Blue, or Harlequin and Old Daddy Long Legs. The Princess's again advantageously employs the smart pen of Mr. H. J. Byron, who has founded his pantomime opening on the adventures of Whittington and his Cat. The St. James's has a mythological extravaganza by Mr. William Brough, on the subject of Perseus and Andromeda. The Lyceum has enlisted the services of Mr. Leicester Buckingham, who has based his extravaganza on the story of Little Red Riding Hood, Miss Lydia Thompson being the heroine. The Olympic has a fair extravaganza written by Mr. Burnand and Mr. Palgrave Simpson. The Strand is sure to be well furnished with another of Mr. Byron's pun-crammed burlesques. The subject selected is Puss in Boots. Sadler's Wells has an extravaganza-cum-pantomime, written by Mr. E. L. Blanchard, entitled Cherry and Fair Star; or the Singing Apple, the Talking Bird, and the Dancing Waters. The Surrey pantomime will be called Harlequin Hey Diddle Diddle, the Cat and the Fiddle; or Oranges and Lemons, and the Twelve Dancing Princesses, linking the nursery rhymes with an effective German fairy tale. At all the other theatres vast preparations are being likewise made, and managers are looking forward to a season which, if only as prosperous as their several displays of liberality, tact and energy, seem likely to render it, will be one of the most remunerative known for many years.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

The selection on Monday night was again, in the instrumental department, exclusively dedicated to Mozart. One composition alone was drawn from the former programme—viz. the Quintet in A for clarinet and stringed instruments, the enthusiastic reception of which at the first Mozart concert fully justified its early repetition. Mr. Lazarus was, of course, the clarinet, M. Vieuxtemps, and his associates—Herr Ries, Mr. Webb, and M. Paque—forming the string-quartet. The same excitement was created by this ingenious and exquisitely melodious composition as before—notwithstanding the fact that it was now the last piece of the evening.

The pianist (her first appearance this season) was Miss Arabella Goddard, who met with such a welcome as is only accorded to artists standing highest in public favour. This lady's "soirées"—which, though abandoned, are not wholly forgotten—may be said in some measure to have paved the way for the Monday Popular Concerts—now fairly an institution, her connexion with which, from the beginning, has been alike advantageous to the promoters and to herself. With her distinguished foreign contemporary, Mr. Charles Hallé, indeed, Miss Goddard may be said to have hitherto shared the responsibilities and honours attaching to the office of "pianist to the Monday Popular Concerts"—an office of no small credit, if creditably filled, inasmuch as the satisfactory performance of the duties it entails presupposes a familiar acquaintance with the entire repertory of the great pianoforte composers, so as to be ready, almost "at a moment's notice," with any given sonata, trio, or quartet. Miss Goddard, however, has demonstrated her efficiency in this respect, and in the works of every recognized master—from Bach and Handel to Mozart, Dussek, and Hummel, from Beethoven to Schubert, Weber, Mendelssohn, and Sterndale Bennett — at various intervals successfully appealed to the sympathies of the musical public. Mozart with her has always been an especial favorite, the unaffected purity of his music being thoroughly congenial to her own unaffectedly expressive style of playing. A more graceful example of his genius than the sonata in B flat major (the third of four sonatas in the same key) could not possibly have been chosen. The slow movement (passing over the numberless beauties of the allegro and rondo) is an inspiration. The audience—which crowded St. James's-hall in area, balconies, gallery, and orchestra—listened to the whole with wrapt attention, applauded movement after movement, and at the conclusion unanimously recalled the pianist. Miss Goddard's other performance was in the celebrated sonata for pianoforte and violin written expressly for Mademoiselle Strinasacchi, a famous "virtuosa" in her day, whose execution on the fiddle, when Mozart reigned "King of Harmony" at Vienna, astonished and delighted the amateurs of that gay capital, and most especially the Imperial connoisseur, Joseph II. This is the sonata which was written in such haste, that, at the public performance — the violinist being Mademoiselle Strinasacchi, the pianist Mozart himself — one of the players ("it is easy to guess which," says M. Oulibischeff) had nothing on his desk to read from but a blank sheet of music paper. Mozart (as usual), having been unable to find time for noting down his own part, the sonata was given without rehearsal, and the great composer had to improvise, or trust to memory, for his share of the duet. "What!" exclaimed the observant and very musical Emperor, at the end of the sonata, "has it again come to this?" "Yes, Your Majesty," replied Mozart (evidently an old sinner), "but not a note was missed." How well Mademoiselle Strinasacchi may have played we have no means of deciding; but, if her performance of the sonata in question was equal to that of M. Vieuxtemps on Monday, she must have been one of the most finished, expressive, and masterly executants the art has known. Miss Goddard's reading and execution of the pianoforte part were absolutely faultless. Never, indeed, do we remember the young and charming artist playing in greater perfection. The violin sonata was received with the same enthusiastic warmth as that for piano solo.

In the admirable quartet in E flat (No. 4 of the renowned "six" inscribed to Haydn) the accomplished Belgian violinist — who is, if possible, playing better this year than last — surpassed himself; and thus the concert both commenced and terminated with éclat. This quartet is one of the three, after hearing which, the patriarch, Haydn, delivered his memorable speech to Leopold Mozart (father of the composer): — "I tell you, before Heaven and as an honest man, that I look upon your son as the greatest composer in the world." Haydn, years afterwards, became acquainted with the young Beethoven, but did not change his opinion, although the first sonatas, the first trios, the first quartets, (Op. 18), and the grand septet, were already extant, to show that a formidable rival even to Mozart had suddenly appeared.

The singers were Miss Banks and Madame Louisa Vinning, both deserving favourites of the public, and for both of whom were set down pieces attractive in themselves and happily contrasted with each other. Haydn's canzonet "Sympathy," and Mendelssohn's beautiful setting of Heine's poem, "Auf flügeln des Gesanges" (Anglice, "On the Pinions of Song"), were allotted to Madame Vinning, who in each was successful, more especially in the canzonet of Haydn, after which she was complimented with a "recall." Miss Banks, in a florid air from Handel's Rinaldo (the first of the 39 Italian operas composed for London), exhibited the results of her St. Martin's-hall training, under Mr. Hullah, to eminent advantage, and, later in the even ing, proved herself a thorough mistress of the homelier English school, obtaining a well-merited encore in a new and very expressive ballad, entitled "Never forget," one of the most recent compositions of Mr. Macfarren. Mr. Benedict accompanied the vocal pieces with his accustomed masterly skill. The regulation now adopted, which allows an interval of five minutes between the last vocal and the last instrumental piece, being eminently practical, has afforded general satisfaction. During the performance of Mozart's quintet, with which the concert terminated, there was nothing but the strictest attention; and the delight with which it was heard from end to end was not a bit less genuine than a fortnight since, when it was the first instead the last of piece in the programme.

MISS ARABELLA GODDARD AT THE MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The "feature" of last night's concert was the appearance of our pianist par excellence, Arabella Goddard, who, after passing the autumn in repose, has resumed her arduous professional labours. She was, it is almost unnecessary to say, most cordially greeted on entering the orchestra, and her performances were received with the vehemence to which she is so well accustomed, and which she well deserves. It being what is called "a Mozart night," she played two sonatas of that master. The first was one of the four sonatas, and perhaps one of the most beautiful, which he composed in the key of B flat. It is especially remarkable for the extreme beauty of the slow movement—an andante cantabile, full of graceful melody, and profound harmony and modulation. The other was his well-known sonata in the same key, for the piano and violin, written for Signora Strinasacchi, a celebrated female violinist of that day, and performed by himself and that lady at her benefit concert at Vienna in the year 1784. Last night the sexes of the performers were reversed: for Mozart we had Miss Goddard, and for Mlle. Strinasacchi, Vieuxtemps; and, we have no doubt, the beauties of that most exquisite composition were as charmingly developed as they were the first time it was ever heard. The slow movement, in particular, which is full of pure Italian melody, was sung, on both the instruments, as deliciously, and with as much expression, as could have been done by the finest performers of the Italian stage. To obtain a thoroughly vocal tone and style is the greatest acquirement of the most accomplished pianist, and no pianist that we have ever heard possesses this acquirement in a higher degree than Arabella Goddard. The other instrumental pieces were the Quartet in E flat, played by Messrs. Vieuxtemps, Ries, Webb, and Paque; and his Quintet in A major, for clarinet, two violins, tenor, and violoncello, repeated in consequence of its great effect at a previous concert—an effect owing in a great measure to the delightful playing of Mr. Lazarus. The vocal performers were Miss Banks and Miss Louisa Vinning.—Daily News.

WILLIS'S ROOMS.—A concert was given at the above rooms, on Tuesday evening, by the band of the St. George's Rifle Volunteers, under the immediate patronage of the Right Hon. the Viscountess Palmerston, the Lady Constance Grosvenor, the Right Hon. the Countess of Yarborough, Lady Egerton (of Tatton), the Hon. Lady Hamilton Seymour, the Hon. Mrs. Ives, the Hon. Mrs. Lindsay, the Hon. Mrs. Rowley, the Right Hon. Sir Hamilton Seymour, G.C.B. and G.C.H., &c. &c. &c. The band was assisted by sundry professionals, and a few amateurs of note. The professionals included Mlle. Florence Lancia, Miss Messent, Mad. Louisa Vinning, Miss Lascelles, and Mr. J. Morgan (vocalists), and Miss Eleanor Ward, Messrs. Brinley Richards, and Ganz (pianists), Mr. Wuste-mann (flute), and Herr Stoeckel (horn). Mlle. Lancia created the usual sensation in the "War-song" from Attila, and in Mr. Frank Mori's new ballad, "A thousand miles from thee," in both of which she was loudly applauded. Miss Messent sang the spirit song from Lurline, and the "Young Recruit;" Mad. Vinning, "Tell me, my heart" and "Bonnie Prince Charlie," and Miss Lascelles, the song of the goatherd from Dinorah. The amateur vocal performances, however, carried away the honours of the evening. A tremendous encore was bestowed on Messrs. Tremeer, Platts, and Bishop, members of the St. George's Corps, in Martini's terzetto, "Vadasi via di quà," while the last-named gentleman narrowly escaped the same compliment in the "Muleteer Song," from the Rose of Castile. The fact that the three gentlemen were in uniform no doubt enhanced the interest of the performance. Messrs. Brinley Richards and Wilhelm Ganz, both of the Rifles and both in costume, played a grand duet on two pianofortes, Mr. Wustemann a solo on the flute, and Herr Stoeckel ditto on the horn. A section of the West London Madrigal Society contributed some pieces, and the bands of the corps—that is, the brass band and the drum and fife band—played some quick steps, marches, and popular airs. We were somewhat surprised to find that the patriotic song, entitled "The Banner of St. George," composed by Mr. Balfe, written by Mr. John Brougham, and specially dedicated to the members of the St. George's Rifle Volunteers, had been omitted from the programme.

ST. JAMES's HALL. — The Messiah was very efficiently performed on Tuesday night, under the able and energetic direction of Dr. Wylde. The performance was signalised by the re-appearance of Mrs. Merest, whose singing of sacred music was deservedly esteemed some years ago, and who must still be well remembered as Miss Maria B. Hawes. It would be unfair to express any opinion of her present powers from her singing on Tuesday night, for the nervousness natural after so very long an absence from public life is alone sufficient to account for any defect in intonation which might have been remarked. Mrs. Merest was, perhaps, most successful in "O, thou that tellest." Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington was more than usually admirable in the great airs, "Rejoice greatly" and "I know that my Redeemer." Miss Spiller made a very favourable impression in the air "Come unto Him;" Mr. Perren sang the "Passion music" with feeling; and Mr. Lewis Thomas undertook all that is allotted to the bass. The chorus was thoroughly efficient throughout, most conspicuously so in "For unto us" and "His yoke is easy." Mr. George Lake, who presided at the organ, performed his task with remarkable care and discretion.

GALLERY OF ILLUSTRATION. — Mr. John Parry, whose "pantomime" song has proved so attractive in the entertainment given by Mr. and Mrs. German Reed, with his assistance, favoured the public on Tuesday night with a new descriptive song, in which the vicissitudes of a Colleen Bawn are musically and humourously related. A sort of overture for the pianoforte introduces the Irish airs, "The harp that once thro' Tara's halls," "Nora Creina," "Fly not yet," and "St. Patrick's Day," two of these — "Nora Creina" and "Fly not yet" — being afterwards very cleverly combined. Mr. John Parry's well known talents as an executant enable him to give the utmost effect to this peculiar version of the Hibernian melodies The leading incidents of the Colleen Bawn are amusingly described, and the characteristics of one or two of the principal actors in the original caste at the Adelphi are skilfully represented. The words of this "relation" are by H. J Byron, and Mr. Parry has engaged the co-operation of Mr. Frank Musgrave in the arrangement of the music.

MR. F. SCOTSON CLARK gave a pianoforte recital at the West London College, Bayswater, on Tuesday evening. The room was crowded. A new song, by Mr. Scotson Clark, "The Sea hath its Pearls," charmingly sung by Miss Robertine Henderson, though placed the last piece but one in the programme, was encored. Mr. Scotson Clark did not spare his exertions. He played no less than eight times during the evening. Among his most successful performances were some Lieder ohne Worte of Mendelsshon; "Baby's Song," by Howard Glover; Benedict's Irish fantasia "Erin;" and an elegant little piece of his own composition, entitled "Rêve de Bonheur," which no doubt many of his fair young listeners longed to have repeated. Besides Miss Henderson, Mr. Clark had the assistance of Miss Billing, whose singing was much admired. Mr. Scotson Clark concluded his interesting performance by a mazurka of Chopin, and a tarantella of Stephen Heller.

EXETER HALL.—Mr. G. W. Martin's Choral Society gave a performance of Handel's Messiah on Thursday evening, to which were invited the soldiers now quartered in London, nearly 2000 in number, comprising, amongst other regiments, detachments of the Coldstreams, Scotch Fusiliers, 2nd Battalion of Grenadier Guards, the Royal Life Guards (blue), a sprinkling of the sappers and miners, some of the cadets training for military schoolmasters at the Duke of York's Asylum at Chelsea, and in the gallery a strong muster of the wives of many of the men present. The hall presented an unusual appearance; the body, usually occupied by the reserved seats, and mostly tenanted by ladies, being filled to within a short distance of the orchestra by a mass of red coats, here and there chequered by the dark uniforms of the Blues. Nor was it the occupants alone that altered the look of the hall, for in front of the large gallery hung two enormous flags, one bearing the lion of England, another the harp of Erin (what Scotland had done to be left out of the category we know not), while from the side balconies smaller banners depended, lending altogether an aspect not unfitted to the present state of feeling on the all-absorbing topic of the day. The performance was ushered in by a dirge, words by Rev. Dr. Bonan, music by G. W. Martin, "No shadows yonder," sung as a tribute to the memory of the late Lord Herbert, and, as such, reverentially listened to by the military body present, who are not likely soon to forget one who was so pre-eminently entitled to the honourable title of the soldier's friend, and who sacrificed his life to duty as completely as ever hero who fell on the battle-field. Touching the performance, what can one say of a work of which so much has been written, and which, in the space of four days, is given no less than three times? Mr. Martin aims at producing an effect rather by a multiplicity of voices than the numerical strength of the instrumentalists in the orchestra; and although the choruses were more than once amenable to criticism, allowance must be made for a Society which is but yet in its second year, and has already made a considerable progress, which we have no doubt further practice will still more tend to develope and improve. With the present rage for music halls, with their vulgar comic songs, utterly devoid of humour, their silly sentimental ditties, their never-ending Ethiopians, their wearisome operatic selections, anything that encourages a purer and healthier taste is deserving of support, and the seven or eight hundred choristers who compose Mr. Martin's phalanx will do well to labour diligently, and as they are mostly composed of young and fresh voices, may eventually raise themselves to a position as a choral body second to none. The solos were entrusted to Miss Eleonora Wilkinson, Miss Porter, Mr. Wilbye Cooper and Mr. Thomas, all of whom sang their best, the latter gentleman narrowly escaping an encore for his artistic rendering of "The trumpet shall sound," which seemed exactly to hit the taste of those for whom the oratorio was mainly given, the playing of Mr. T. Harper, in the trumpet obbligato, rousing their enthusiasm to such a pitch, that we quite expected they would insist upon its repetition, as they did with the "Hallelujah chorus," in which the whole audience stood, in accordance with time-honoured custom. The performance concluded with "God save the Queen," in which the soldiers joined vociferously, and then gave three tremendous cheers for Mr. Martin and the Choir, which made the very walls reverberate.

We should like to know why the taste and refined condition of the army alone has been taken into consideration, and why the navy has been excluded, or rather overlooked. The reason is, perhaps, that there are no sailors in London, which would seem a very feasible reason. But no doubt Mr. Martin has it already in contemplation to give a series of performances at some of the principal seaports, and should the military concerts succeed, the people of Portsmouth or Deal may look forward to a great musical treat; at any rate, the navy, we think, has as deep a claim on the musical hospitality of Mr. Martin as the army, while, as a body, the sailors are greater lovers of music than soldiers.

BRIGHTON.—The Art Society gave their second annual conversazione at the Royal Pavilion, on Monday, and commenced their evening's entertainments with a concert, in which Miss Ransford, Mr. Luigi Montgomery, and Herr Reichardt assisted as vocalists; and Mr. Aptommas (harp), and M. Edouard de Paris (piano), as instrumentalists. Miss Ransford, among other pieces, sang, "The Bailiff's Daughter of Islington," from Chappell's Collection; and Mr. Montgomery "The Village Blacksmith," both with good effect. Herr Reichardt sang his two new songs, "The Golden Stars," and "Are they meant but to deceive me?" excellently; and in his popular lied "Thou art so near," he was loudly encored; when M. Edouard de Paris addressed the audience, and said that Signor Reichardt would sing Balfe's new Rifle Song "The banner of St. George," an announcement that the audience received with shouts of applause; and had they not feared to fatigue the singer, would, at the conclusion, have made him repeat it, so delighted were they with the energy that Herr Reichardt threw into his singing. M. Edouard de Paris played two brilliant fantasias of his own composition, and accompanied the vocal music; and Mr. Aptommas was obliged to repeat his solo on "Welsh Melodies."

BRADFORD.—(From a Correspondent.)—On Thursday evening the second full-dress concert of the season was given in St. George's Hall, on which occasion the following distinguished artists appeared:—Mlle. Tietiens, Sig. Giuglini, Sig. Canedi, and Sig. Bossi, together with Sig. Arditi, who officiated as conductor. There was an attractive and well-arranged programme, and altogether the concert was a brilliant success. On the 12th and 13th proximo, Mad. Lind Goldschmidt and party appear; as the prices of admission are at least one-half lower than have been charged elsewhere, full houses are expected. The hall will hold almost 4,000 people, and is considered by musical authorities one of the best sounding halls in the kingdom, so the party will enjoy peculiar advantages.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

The fifth winter concert, on Saturday last, was, in some respects, the most interesting of the series. The selection was excellent, and included two novelties of various degrees of merit, and Miss Arabella Goddard made her first appearance for the season. The novelties were Schubert's overture to Rosamunde, and Reber's overture to La Nuit de Nöel. The former is a highly effective and dramatic prelude, with great brightness in the ideas, and brilliantly instrumented. The latter is French in idea and treatment, but telling in the orchestra. Both overtures were well played. The symphony was Haydn's in G, one of the most melodious of the old master, and as fresh as if it were written in the present day. Mr. Manns evidently made his mind up to have it well executed, and he was not disappointed. Miss Arabella Goddard, who was received with an unusual demonstration of applause, performed Mendelssohn's concerto in G minor, and Liszt's fantasia on Rigoletto. The incomparable young artist never played with more wonderful brilliancy, or greater depth of expression. The slow movement in the concerto could not be surpassed for poetic sentiment, delicacy and finish, while the finale displayed the most astonishing rapidity and certainty of execution. The fantasia of Liszt created no less profound a sensation, and being shorter, the audience were desirous to hear it again. Miss Goddard, however, only returned to the platform and bowed.

The singers were Miss Maria Stanley and M. De la Haye, neither of whom had been previously heard at the Crystal Palace. The lady sang the cavatina "Com è bello" from Lucrezia Borgia, and Mendelssohn's "On Song's bright pinions." She has an available mezzo-soprano voice, and indicates good training in her singing. The sharpness in her intonation may be laid down to the nervousness of a first appearance. M. De la Haye, too, has much merit. He has a tolerable tenor voice of the veiled kind, and is by no means a novice in his art. He wants, however, warmth, which was too plainly evidenced in "Adelaida;" a scene from Verdi's Due Foscari was his second effort.

There was a large attendance of subscribers and casual visitors, and the concert, thanks to the prohibition of encores, was over in reasonable time.

LEMBERG.—Meyerbeer's Dinorah has been given with complete success.

CAMBERWELL HALL.—(AN "ENCORE CONCERT.")—At the Concert given by the Amateur Musical Union—writes a correspondent—on Saturday evening, December 7th, Miss Poole, Miss Bellingham, Mr. George Perren, Mr. H. H. (an amateur), and Mr. Lambert were the vocalists. Miss Poole sang charmingly her three songs, "Go, happy rose," "The bailiff's daughter of Islington," and a new MS. song (composed expressly for her), entitled, "A day too late," and in each was enthusiastically encored. Miss Bellingham, though suffering from cold, gave "the Knight's vigil" and Wallace's "Sweet and low" very effectively, in the latter receiving an encore. Mr. Lambert (Chapel Royal, Windsor,) gave Benedict's fine recit. and air, "Rage, thou angry storm," with great spirit, and was encored in Richards's "Suliote war-song," while Mr. Perren's refined singing of "Yarico to her lover," and Ascher's new song, "Alice, where art thou," met with great applause, and both were encored. Mr. H. H. contributed two songs, Paesiello's "La prima volta," and Hobb's "Phillis is my only joy," the latter encored, whilst the choir distinguished themselves in "Oh hills, oh vales," and the "Sancta Maria" (Dinorah), Meyerbeer. Mr. F. O. Williams, in addition to his duties as accompanyist and conductor, played two solos on the pianoforte.

EMILE BERGER'S NEW PIANO SOLO, "LES ECHOS DE LONDRES."

This new fantasia was composed expressly for M. Ole Bull, Herr Formes, Mr. and Mrs. Tennant, and Miss Anna Whitty's provincial tour. It has been played by Mr. Emile Berger (as well as the transcription of Ferrari's popular serenade "Vieni, Vieni") every where with the greatest success, and has invariably been encored.

"The introduction of the two popular melodies, 'Gentle Annie' and 'Dixy's Land,' was a happy idea of Mr. Berger. The audience were delighted, and the applause was so great that the talented pianist was obliged to return to the platform and repeat the fantasia, to the great delight of the audience."—Sheffield Paper.

HERR REICHARDT'S NEW SONG, "ARE THEY MEANT BUT TO DECEIVE ME?"

Mazurka-Polonaise.

The Poetry adapted by JOHN OXENFORD.

Price 2s. 6d.

Sung at the Crystal Palace Concerts by HERR REICHARDT, with immense success.

The Times says: "Herr Reichardt, the German tenor, whose pure, classical style and fervid expression—still remembered, in spite of two years' absence—were displayed with the utmost effect in a characteristic song from his own pen, entitled 'Are they meant but to deceive me?' which exhibited more than one touch worthy the composer of that deservedly popular romance, 'Thou art so near and yet so far.'"

The Sands! Come unto these yellow sands.—A Sailor telling a Yarn and a Boat Lying too—The Pier Master's ap-Pierance—Clown makes a Man's hair turn sandy and proves himself in the wrong box—by a slight Miss-Take, which a certain Miss won't Take—Pantaloon gets some Shell-fish in a very Sel-fish manner—Clown astonishes the Native-Sailors that can use their Cut-Lasses, but don't Cut Lasses when they can join with them in a National Hornpipe—Clown gets a Sensation Leader—The Great Donkey Stir St. Leger—Clown and Pantaloon's Concert—fine ears for Music—they fish in troubled waters—a Divided Interest—a sudden Squall (Children and all)—The latest novelty in Parachutes. Scene—A Dismal Swamp—after a storm a calm appears, and Harlequin's Home on his Throne of Splendour.

Doors open at half-past 6, to commence at 7 o'clock.
Tickets for boxes, pit, and galleries may be had at the box-office before the opening.

TO COMPOSERS ABOUT TO PUBLISH.—J. H. JEWELL, Music Publisher, undertakes the Printing and Publishing of every description of Musical Work, greatly under the usual charges. Estimates given.
104 Great Russell Street, Bloomsbury, W.C., near the British Museum.

GIFT BOOK, NEW.—Songs and Tunes for Education, edited by JOHN CURWEN.
The Harmonies by JAMES TURLE, Esq., Organist of Westminster Abbey.
The Pianoforte edition, in handsome cloth binding, with gilt title, price half-a-crown.
This work is the fruit of the editor's residence in Germany. He collected books of music for young people in every town he visited. With the aid of Mr. James S. Stallybrass, the whole of this collection was analysed, and the choicest translated or adapted for English use. The editor, however, never preferred a German piece when an English one would do as well. He aims to educate the feelings and sympathies of childhood by the habit of singing good songs. This he considers the proper office of music in schools. He takes care that the three school ages (childhood, boy-and-girlhood, and youth) are suited with songs on the following subjects.—Country Scenes, the Seasons, Fancy, and Humour. Kindness to Animals, Home Sympathies, Patriotism, Industry, Integrity, Religion, &c. There are two hundred and sixty-seven songs. This work will doubtless supersede the editor's widely-known "School Music" and "School Songs."
An edition in the Tonic Sol-fa Notation, containing the Treble Voice "parts" only, price, in paper, One Shilling; in cloth, One Shilling and Fourpence. The "Education Songs," containing the words only, price Sixpence.
